The Quest of the Perfect Neighbor

THE quest of the faultless neighbor is a wild goose chase, with the goose at the pursuing end. To use a slang expression, "there ain't no ich critter." Long years ago I gave up the quest. Nay, more, I have lost all desire for a perfect neighbor. I fear he would be like a perfect iceberg, delightful to look at, but uncomfortable to hobnob with, for would he not be to me a constant reminder of my own failings? How could a perfect neighbor be content to associate with me?

But good neighbors; neighbors with kindly eyes, and pleasant ways, and warm palms, and still warmer hearts; of such there is no lack save as their neighbor lacks—that neighbor bring me. Good neighbors! I have them on the north and on the south, on the east and on the west; yes, they compass me about at all points of the compass.

What are the ingredients or qualities of a good neighbor? Let us analyze a good neighbor. First of all he must have a real liking for folks. He may stand entranced at the golden glory of a sunset, the songs of the birds may be sweetest music to his ears, the flowers and the trees and the cooling ferns alike appeal to him, but even more than all these he must like people. The man who desires the whole round world all by himself was not cut out for a good neighbor—the cloth was too scanty! He would make a good Robinson Crusoe—that is, if he were allowed to hang out a sign; "No man Friday wanted!" A good neighbor simply must like folks. Their troubles, sorrows, joys, habits, eccentricities, likes and dislikes, will be alike interesting to him. Is not every new neighbor a new and interesting volume of the book of life? Here is a great Human Library; each volume cries loudly to the good neighbor: "Read me next!"

The next ingredient is unselfishness. Selfishness is the deadly Upas tree under which neighbors may not sit and escape unscathed. Unselfishness says, "Give! Give pleasure, help, consolation, appreciation, lift on your neighbor's burdens, share his sorrows as well his joys, divide your blessings." T unselfish neighbor rejoices instead being envious when some good fortu comes to a neighbor; whether it be bumper crop, or a big inheritance, only a raise of wages, that good neighb says heartily; "Glad to hear it." Y do not have to exhaust a dictionary express real gladness.

This brings to our notice that mo delightful offspring of unselfishne the winsome, ice-destroying, friendshi making quality of a good neighb appreciation. What is so helpful appreciation? Here is a neighbor's b who is far from brilliant. Others ha made the grade easily in school. F John it has meant hard, faithful wor it has meant study when other bo were at play. The good neighbor se—a good neighbor is never blind—a he says a few words to John, a few wor of appreciation that John will nev live long enough to forget. The appr ciation of a good neighbor is alwa genuine—his appreciation is inspirati for his neighbor.

The appreciative neighbor-farm looks over the line fence and say "That is a good field of corn y have there, Brown." The appreciati neighbor-merchant says to his nex door neighbor, "Good trade you a getting, Thompson; you deserve i you have worked hard to get it." A preciation warms hearts and bin neighbors together with bands of ste

One of the most desirable qualiti of a good neighbor is what has be sometimes called a pennyroyal tongu A pleasant, goodly herb is pennyroya it has none of the bitterness of prince pine or of the dandelions that I detest so heartily when I was a barefooted bo A pennyroyal tongue is never bitte it uses comfortable, kindly words; it more ready to praise than to blame, encourage than to discourage. By means let us include this pennyroy tongue, and though I mention it la it is by no means least of the virtues a good neighbor. G. W. TUTTLE.

Interchurch Survey

THE Interchurch World Movement of North America is now carrying on a survey of the whole country, as part of a world survey of Christianity. Ralph E. Diffendorfer, head of the survey, tells of a California town with 1,000 population which has not a single church. A nearby town of 1,600 has fourteen Protestant churches, with attendance ranging from 125 down to twenty-five. All get "missionary support," that is, contributions to the expenses from outside sources. O of these competing little churches h a promise of $500 a year "if it is neede to maintain the denomination in th town."

In Ohio, the only state which h had a rural survey in an adequate wa there was revealed one section contai ing no church within a radius of twenty five miles of a certain point.

Hotel Baggage Hustler

IN TRANSYLVANIA they have husky peasant girls as baggage hustlers in many of the hotels. This strapping young woman, who is about 18 years of age, loathes shoes principally because shoes cost a small fortune in this part of the world just now. You can buy a pair for 600 kronan in Sibiiu, the former Hungarian town in which this young person resides. That is about $30 in American money, and the shoes you get for such an exorbitant price are not much for looks or wear. Prices will fall somewhat when the blockade is lifted and commerce is resumed with the outside world. But the Sibiiu folk are not very optimistic about the outloo because once th shoes get to Ru mania and ar landed at the Bla Sea ports, it's long way over th mountains t Transylvania.

THAT'S why Sheridan Road in Kenilworth and Winnetka, Illinois, is paved with concrete.

This famous street leading through these wealthy Chicago suburbs receives practically all of the motor traffic passing in and out of Chicago through the exclusive North Shore residential district. Normal traffic is indicated by a count of motor vehicles made Sunday, May 11, when over 4,000 automobiles passed over the concrete pavement shown above in six hours.

Kenilworth and Winnetka didn't have to consider first cost — but they were vitally interested in last cost. When you consider cost, let it be ultimate cost only. The Boy Who Expects to Study Law

By CHESLA C. SHERLOCK

IF ALL boys who are about to start to college are like I was, they will be impatient of advice. Advice is certainly a cheap commodity and to some it is useless to offer it, but now and then it falls on fertile ground and does some good. It is in that spirit that these remarks are addressed to the boy who expects to study law.

From time immemorial all ambitious American boys have been led to believe that the profession to follow was that of the law. The lawyers were the molders of the Constitution, the leaders of the community life, and the bulwark of the civilization which we pride so much.

That is all very nice; it sounds good, but let the young man about to enter the study of the law remember that this is the glamour of the thing, just as there is supposed to be a glamour to the business of going to war. Once you get into the job in earnest you have time to stop and think the matter over. Then it occurs to you that some of the outside things about your chosen profession have all been tinsel and brass.

The country needs lawyers of the type of Webster, Hamilton, Lincoln. It does not need merely lawyers, it needs men of this larger stamp; but if you are impulsive, a "hustler," impatient of twenty or thirty years' slow plodding before you "arrive," be careful in choosing the law as a profession.

If you feel that you must have a lot of money in this world, get a copy of Martindale's Law Register and look up the ratings of the lawyers in the United States. See how many, many of them are rated at less than $5,000 each.

There are something like over one hundred and twenty-five thousand lawyers in the United States. Except in certain remote localities, the "competition" is keen, which means a greater struggle than would be necessary if so many ambitious young men did not rush into the law merely because they thought it was a means to an end, such as politics.

If you are politically inclined, and wish to make money in the law business, you will soon find that you will have to give up one or the other. I happen to know a certain United States senator who gave up a law practice that was netting him about one hundred thousand dollars annually a few years ago to enter politics. Today he is an old man, admittedly at the "end of his string" politically, and he is nearly one hundred thousand dollars in debt. His law business is gone, everything gone merely for the "honor" he enjoys in being in office.

So if you are fitted and earnestly desirous of becoming a lawyer, do not fritter away your chances of large success at the bar by listening to the appeals of such temptations as politics. And if you once decide to enter the practice, stay by it to the bitter end. Do not resolve to sink if necessary, but resolve to swim! It is easy to die, to fail, but it is hard to live!

Be sure that you are temperamentally fitted to be a lawyer. The lawyer must possess the knack of meeting people; he must be a good mixer. He must have a pleasing personality, an analytical mind and a steel-trap memory. He must be a keen student not only of current affairs and of human nature, but of the great mass of law which he must digest each day. He must be a good business man, for lawyers are no longer advocates, they are business men.

He must be thorough in all that he does. If you do not like details and painstaking work, do not imagine that you have the right qualities for a lawyer.

Do not decide to become a lawyer merely because you feel that you are a great orator. Oratory and the law were divorced two generations ago. Lawyers are business men today; the good ones are rarely seen in court. They sit in offices and hand out opinions to business men much in the same way that judges do. The good orator is really the poorest paid lawyer in the practice.

Have you patience? You must have it to be a lawyer. Patient in cross-examination; patient in waiting for business; patient in waiting for clients to pay their bills—patience is the corner-stone of the lawyer's makeup.

Pick out a good college; generally your state university will be the best, if you expect to practice within the state. It will keep in closer touch with your own statutes than a distant college would.

If you expect to practice law upon completion of your course, get a connection with a good law office in the city or college town and work there afternoons and Saturdays. It will give you the much-needed practical experience. And practical experience is the most important element in good schooling. Really all the university course is for is to teach you where to find the law and give you a few elementary principles so that you can go about the work intelligently. The worst stumbling-block of the young lawyer is procedure. Work in the law office whether you have to from a financial standpoint or not. It will pay in the long run.

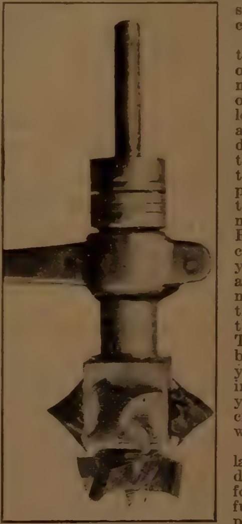
If you expect to study law merely for the foundation it will give you for other work in the future, study it for that purpose. Have your purpose in mind at the start, and stick to it. There is nothing to working in the dark.

As a good foundation, there is nothing that exceeds a good law course.

Auger That Bores Square Holes

By ROBERT H. MOULTON

SINCE time immemorial one of the favorite jests of the college classroom and the machine shop has been that apparently impossible thing, an auger that would bore square holes. But now such a tool is a reality, for a Peoria, Ill., man has perfected a rotary drill which not only bores square holes, but holes of almost any imaginable shape. Furthermore, it has been pronounced by engineers of one of the leading universities of the country to be practicable, simple and cheaply manufactured.



View of the rotary drill as an auger for boring square holes in wood

The tool is really five augers in one, four little conical rotary cutters milling the corners of the square as the main shaft sinks through the wood. In boring steel or stone two operations are required. First a round hole is drilled through, and then the four rotary cutters mill out the corners at a single operation. The speed with which the drill operates is amazing. For instance, it will bore a square hole through a one-inch piece of marble in five minutes, whereas by present methods it takes four hours or more on the part of a skilled worker.

About a dozen parts constitute the drill, and by slight adjustments it can be made to bore holes of any desired shape. The inventor is a blacksmith, Carl H. Schmidgall, and he was ten years perfecting the device.

Does Prohibition Pay?

B RMINGHAM'S ANSWER by MARY CHASE CORNELIUS

RMINGHAM has had four years of prohibition, and it has paid wonderfully!

four years the young men and of Birmingham have gone their without the constant temptation e saloon before them. Crime of sort has decreased and is decreasteadily.

haps the most tangible evidence s fact is the splendid building that een converted from a city jail to a tal school. Before the whisky was banished from the city the lors of this structure resounded to urses and groans and ribald songs motley throng of prisoners; today ongs are those of happy children are having their chance. Here and girls are being started along the that leads to good citizenship.

stead of having an average of 125 ners per month in the county jail, verage drops down to 24 for months time.

hen the campaign to close the sa- was on, the gloomiest predictions made as to the effect prohibition d have on business. In no case these predictions proven true. The today is bigger, better, and more perous, besides being an infinitely r place in which to live and rear and daughters.

It must be remembered that Birmingham, with its vast coal, iron and steel industries, attracts to itself a most cosmopolitan population; and yet it is a city of 215,000 population without a saloon, Sunday baseball, or Sunday moving pictures.

And they used to call it Bad Birmingham!

Here are a few figures that may be studied by those who think that prohibition does not pay.

Arrests by police and detective departments for two years prior to July 1, 1915 (the date on which prohibition went into effect in Birmingham):

Murders	126
Drunks	7,069
Disorderly conduct	8,178
Total, all offenses	42,963

Arrests for two years, from July 1, 1915, to July 1, 1917:

Murders	60
Drunks	2,514
Disorderly conduct	4,843
Total, all offenses	30,806

Arrests from July 1, 1917, to May 1, 1919:

Murders	52
Drunks	1,541
Disorderly conduct	2,722
Total, all offenses	19,984

Beginning Business on a Shoestring

By ALBERT SIDNEY GREGG

HIS little story is about a rich man who began business in an Ohio town in a way that ought to shame fellows who complain that they ot get a start because they lack tal. He would do something violent should give his name and town, and r convenience I will call him Dennis. so far from his right name that dy can possibly guess who he is, here he lives.

t eighteen Dennis was working for a company for $10 a month, his being to load wagons from coal es by pulling a lever which allowed coal to run down into the wagon ath.

s he worked he studied and thought, tried to devise some way by h he could get into business for self.

Why not lease the coal chutes self?"

his thought shot into his mind one like a flash, but he shook his head y, for he did not have the necessary tal, and besides he was merely a However, the idea stuck, and he d not think of anything else that ed as promising.

me time after this the lessee of the chutes gave them up. Before anyy else knew that they were open for e Dennis went right into the office he coal company owning the chutes applied for the right to operate the tes. They were located on the B. & racks. Coal hauled from the mines of coal company was dumped into the bins on an elevated track, and who had the lease was expected to be ly to buy coal by the carload, pay freight, and sell to whoever came it. When Dennis proposed that the pany lease to him, the president inclined to regard the proposition joke.

Why, you are just a boy working for wages, and you have no capital How can you manage it?"

"Here is my plan," replied the intrepid Dennis. "You lease me the chutes at $25 a month and sell me a carload of coal on thirty days' time. I will persuade the freight agent to trust me for the freight. Then I know where I can get a delivery wagon on time, and after the coal arrives I will begin selling it around to the houses and stores myself. I know the people and can work up a cash business quickly. The profits on the first carload will give me cash for further operations."

The president was favorably impressed with the young man's initiative, and after a little further inquiry he replied:

"All right, Dennis. I know you and your people, and I am going to give you a try-out. You may have the chutes and the coal on your terms, and I wish you good luck."

Dennis went away whistling. He was very much elated. Next he went to see the freight agent, and told him all about it.

"So you are going to run the chutes yourself? Well I'll be hanged! Will I trust you for the freight on a carload of coal? Of course, I'll trust you. I'll keep my eye on you, so you can't get away without paying me."

Then Dennis bought a coal-cart, a horse, and a set of harness for $55, to be paid for at $5 a month. In all of these arrangements Dennis did not pay down a cent of cash.

His first carload of coal came through in due time, and Dennis sold the coal according to schedule. He met his obligations, ordered more coal, and kept right on doing business. In a few months he had accumulated capital so he could pay cash like any other merchant.

He was in the coal business for twelve years, and when he quit he was selling four carloads of coal a day.

New Work in South China

1917 the North Siam Mission opened a new station at Chiengrung he Yunnan Province of South China. W. C. Dodd writes of this field: he Nosu are the chief of one of the es grouped under the name of Lolo. saw 109 of them baptized at Sapon, north of Yuman-fu, one Sunday were there. Mr. Metcalf, whom we ght to read Tai, baptized 108 Lisu at the same time. We saw 700 to take Communion at Saposhan. e 4,000 Lisu at Szemao under Mr. Fullerton are learning to read the 'Pollard script,' a modification of the Chinese, as all these Lolo tribes speak a dialect totally different from our Tai and more closely allied to the Chinese. If there are no other missionaries to give them the Gospel, we must look after the Miaos and Yaos, etc., 'the Hill tribes! the Hill tribes!' Dr. McGilvary's great soul longed for, that are within the bounds of our Mission. But our stupendous Tai task must first be met."

Constant skin-irritation and the involuntary habits of babies destroy their sleep. Cleanliness safeguards it—the warm bath and then the protective application of talcum.

Dust and rub Mennen Borated Talcum Powder softly into all the chubby folds and creases of that flower-soft skin! The soothing is almost magical. The little limbs are relaxed and comforted. Sleep comes—storing up a future of health, calm nerves, abounding energy.

Mennen's was the first Borated Talcum, and has never been bettered. It is safe.

Adults enjoy it also, for a talcum shower after the bath—talcum in tight shoes—after shaving—talcum between the sheets on a hot night, have brought skin-comfort to the whole family.

Questions and Answers

F. W. G., South Berwick, Me. "I am much interested in the letter of W. H. S., Waco, Texas, in the issue of August 23, and am sorry to say that I agree with every word he writes. We are not finding fault or criticizing anybody, but simply stating facts as we find them. I have been a commercial traveler for forty years. A prospective customer asked me if I sold the 'Golden Rule.' I said, 'No, but I practice it. Having been a Christian for forty-seven years, I could not do any other way.' Paul said: 'As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith.' There are a lot of religions in the world, but not nearly enough Christianity. It is a sad fact that many, many church members do not know any more about being born again than Nicodemus. If they did, the business, shows, theaters, secret societies, would go out of style."

V. A. W., Hartshorne, Okla. 1. Lord Kitchener died in the sinking of the British cruiser Hampshire off the Orkney Islands, June 5, 1916. The cruiser struck a mine laid by a German submarine. She was on her way to Archangel. Lord Kitchener was en route to Petrograd to confer with the Russian government regarding military measures. It was rumored that the Germans learned of his sailing through treacherous Russian sources. 2. Miss Marietta Holley is living at Pierrepont Manor, N. Y. It is to be presumed that she is not idle and another book is not impossible. 3. Jack London died November 22, 1916. He was born in San Francisco in January, 1876, was educated at the University of California, was at various times a sailor, gold miner, tramp, writer, lecturer and journalist, and at all times a Socialist. His first book was "The Son of the Wolf," his most famous book "The Call of the Wild," and the last book published (six came out after his death) was "The Red One," published in 1918.

Mrs. L. B. K., Athens, N. Y. 1. The word khaki is pronounced "kahkee." 2. The moon is a dead, cold sphere. It reflects the light of the sun, and has no light of it own. It is not a planet, but a satellite of our planet, the earth.

Mrs. C. B. V., Augusta, Ga. The Roman democracy, at the time Cæsar proclaimed himself emperor, governed all of what is now Spain, Portugal, France, Belgium, Switzerland, Italy, Dalmatia, Jugoslavia, the Balkan nations, Greece, the Turkish Empire, Palestine, Egypt and the Mediterranean shores of Africa. In addition the Roman legions had partly conquered what is now Britain, Holland, the German Rhine country, southern Austria, Hungary and Bessarabia. Rome governed the whole civilized Western world. The older civilization of India was little known in Roman times, although there was some commerce through what is now Persia. The still older civilization of China was hardly known to the Israelites, although it is mentioned in Isa. 49 : 12

J. A. B., Cassville, Wis., asks:

1. Q. How many men were in the United States Army at the time the armistice was signed? A. The total number on November 11, 1918, was 3,703,273.

2. Q. Was a law passed providing that a soldier, sailor, or marine, might keep his uniform permanently after being discharged? A. Yes.

3. Q. What are the conditions for applying for the $60 to which discharged soldiers are entitled? A. Claims for the $60 bonus authorized by the act of February 24th, 1919, should be sent to the Zone Finance Officer, Lemon Building, Washington, D. C. The application should be accompanied by (a) the discharge certificate (or a certified copy thereof) or order for discharge or release, if no certificate was issued, but both certificate (or certified copy thereof) and order if both were issued, the paper bearing indorsement of final payment being required; (b) a statement of all military service since April 6, 1917, showing place and date of reporting at first military station, and (c) the address to which the check should be sent.

4. Q. May I have my War Risk Insurance reduced from $10,000 to $5,000? A. Yes; by applying to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, stating amount you now carry and amount to which you wish it reduced, and giving full name, rank, organization, serial number, address at time of enlistment, and present address.

5. Q. How many airplanes were sent overseas by the United States? A. General Pershing states in his report to Secretary Baker that altogether he received 1,319 machines from the United States.

6. Q. How many colored soldiers served in the United States Army? A. The total was nearly 400,000. The number serving abroad in France, Germany, and Italy, was over 200,000.

7. Q. Which are the fastest regular trains in the United States? A. Among the fastest regular trains for a short distance are the New York Central "Empire State Express" between New York and Albany, covering 143 miles in 175 minutes, and the "Congressional Ltd." on the Pennsylvania Railroad, which makes the run from Jersey City to Washington, 227 miles, in 4 hours, 46 minutes.

J. H. A., Yonkers, N. Y. "You invite the comment of other readers on the letter of W. H. S., Waco, Texas. As you so truly say, our friend is 'a little too apt to judge,' which is one of the things our Lord so sincerely condemns in the Sermon on the Mount. What Rimmon was to ancient believers, the riches, honors, and pleasures of this world are to Christians. And it was difficult for Naaman, the Syrian convert, to know how far to go, yet be consistent. If he goes too far, he is condemned as against the innocent pleasures of life; and if the other way, he is charged with loving the world as much as others. So Jesus, when he was with worldly people, was accused of gluttony and winebibbing. It is difficult to lay down an infallible rule in such cases. This Syrian convert Naaman went to Elisha with this very question. (See II Kings 5 : 18, 19.) And it will be seen Elisha merely said: 'Go in peace.' He did not tell him what to do. It was as if he had said: 'It is a matter for your own conscience to decide.' We must have charity for all. These are extraordinary times we are living in and with the high cost of living people must stir themselves to make even a poor living. Yet it might appear to W. H. S. that they were worldly. There were 7,000 that had not as much as bended the knee to Baal in Elijah's time, and so today there are multitudes struggling and doing their very best to live honest, upright, Christian lives, and we do not know them any more than W. H. S."

R. B., Mason City, Iowa. "God is love" means that he has a passion for mankind as much greater than the greatest human love as his infinity is greater than our humanity. The three words "God is love" have been held to be the key to the whole Scriptures. God evidenced his love in the creation. Through all of Bible history and the writings of the prophets there runs a golden thread of God's love interwoven with the darker threads of man's disobedience. Finally in Christ the divine love is revealed in full and declared in its completeness. Men at last having apprehended in part the great love of God, are bound by that love to love one another. If we truly love one another, the struggle and misery of the world will be but shadows in contrast with our joy in Him.

ages ago, fable tells us—preparing for a journey, poured a ration of milk into his canteen—made Eastern fashion, of a sheep's stomach. Having a long, hard road before him, he pressed on till nightfall without halting for a midday meal. Then seeking refreshment, he found to his amazement, in place of the milk, a mass of curds. No one then knew that the stomach lining of some animals contains a ferment called "rennin," which quickly coagulates milk. In his haste he had selected a stomach in which some of the rennin still was active. Thus, purely by accident, he had discovered one of man's greatest foods. For what remained in the canteen after he had drained the whey, was CHEESE. Surely it's a far cry from that crude product of accident to the scientific triumph in sterilized food—

ELKHORN CHEESE
8 VARIETIES IN TINS

Yet, until the advent of Elkhorn, the fundamentals of cheese making remained but little changed through all the centuries. Even today no two rural factories are producing cheese of exactly the same quality and flavor. And bulk cheese, although originally good, may absorb enough foreign odor or flavor before reaching your table to make this wholesome food a keen disappointment. But the Kraft process, which produces Elkhorn Cheese—in Tins—gives a flavor always uniform and the sanitary protection that a sensitive food should have. It is science producing a perfect cheese in a faultless container.

ELKHORN CHEESE—in Tins—is made of pure, rich milk, in our sanitary factories of Wisconsin. It is ripened to just the right point, then blended and thoroughly sterilized. It's the ripening and blending of the makes of different factories that gives the supremely delicious flavor, while the sterilizing, in a sense, predigests it—makes you like Elkhorn, makes Elkhorn "like you." When you open the tin—with a key—and look upon that tempting round of golden goodness, the appetizing freshness and creamy richness is further enhanced by the knowledge that the first hands to touch it are yours.

For each parchment lined tin is mechanically filled and hermetically sealed—safe from dirt and germs. Stock your pantry shelves with ELKHORN. From fancy varieties to the plainer kinds it suits all tastes. No preservatives, no rind, no waste —good to the last morsel. Taste it and you'll recommend it.

Why we paste a Gold Seal on every genuine Congoleum Art-Rug

Congoleum Art-Rugs have been such a wonderful success that inferior imitations are often described as "just the same as Congoleum." But they are not the same as Congoleum by any means, and so to protect the public, we paste a Gold-Seal Guarantee on the face of every Congoleum Gold-Seal Art-Rug and on every two yards of Congoleum in roll form.

It is your absolute guarantee of satisfaction or your money back.

If you do not see the Gold Seal, have your dealer show you the name "Congoleum" which is stamped on the back of the genuine material, as an extra safeguard against substitution.

CONGOLEUM Gold Seal ART-RUGS

CONGOLEUM GUARANTEE
SATISFACTION GUARANTEED OR YOUR MONEY WILL BE REFUNDED

CONGOLEUM Gold Seal Art-Rugs have solved one of the housekeeper's biggest problems by providing attractive, durable, easy-to-clean Rugs at low cost.

They come in a variety of choice exclusive designs in soft artistic colors. They may be had in various sizes and patterns suitable for any room in the home where a moderate priced, serviceable floor-covering is needed.

Popular Sizes; Popular Prices:

6 feet x 9 feet	$ 9.75
7½ feet x 9 feet	11.85
9 feet x 9 feet	14.25
9 feet x 10½ feet	16.60
9 feet x 12 feet	19.00

The firm, smooth surface of Congoleum prevents dirt or dust from getting down into the rug, and makes it positively sanitary and easy to clean. A hasty going-over with a damp mop is all that is necessary.

It is a great convenience, too, that Congoleum Gold Seal Art-Rugs do not "kick-up" under foot nor curl at the edges, but always lie perfectly flat without fastening.

have developed a new Mitchell spirit.

spector feels his responsibility.

Minimizing Wear

We have added smoothness as well as strength. By exacting methods we are minimizing wear.

We have reduced power waste in the motor. The crankshafts are twice balanced on two new-type machines.

Gears are mated to exactness. Engines are tested on electric dynamometers. Rear axles are tested by electric apparatus. Transmissions are tested in a sound-proof room.

We have spent over $300,000 on new machinery and equipment to attain this finer car.

Cheaper Operation

Every effort has been made to cut down cost of upkeep. A thermostat controls the temperature of liquids, air and gas. A new method secures better vaporization. Fuel cost has been lessened.

Other improvements keep the car looking new. The body frame is extra-staunch. A new-type top has been adopted—a top which won't grow shabby. Extra finish gives enduring luster. Interlaced hair is used in the upholstery to keep the cushion shape.

The rear springs are unbreakable in use, as shown by countless tests. And they are long cantilevers which give matchless riding comfort.

An Honest Car

The new car is a beauty. It is new in lines and color, in finish and equipment. But the great fact is that in hidden parts we give you the best we know.

This new Six will keep its newness. The satisfaction which it gives you will endure. The years will show its quality.

The price is kept down by factory efficiency. In this model plant we build the complete car—motor, chassis and body. And in every department we use modern cost-reducing methods.

Ask for our catalog, or let your Mitchell dealer show you what we've done. Any man who learns the facts will want a Six like this.

THE CRUCIBLE OF EXPERIENCE PERFECTED TH

APPERSON

"The Eight With Eighty Less Parts"

Before precedent had been set the Apperson Brothers went calmly ahead with the building of a motor car. In 1893, in co-operation with others, they built with their own hands the first mechanically successful American automobile.

Since then they have been doing the "impossible" in motor car construction.

While others scoffed, they produced.

And they believe today, as then, that only facts count.

Therefore, the Apperson is a car of definite values.

Dynamic America demands results—Apperson produces them.

The Apperson will glide, in high, with smooth, unbroken, comfortable acceleration from 1 to 40 miles an hour in 20 seconds.

It will come to a dead stop from 40 miles an hour in 4 seconds—40 yards. It will turn about in its own tracks—a complete turn in a 38¼ foot circle.

With the speed of its Jack Rabbit forbears, today' Apperson possesses an uncanny ability to make astonishing tire and gasoline records.

These car qualities exist today because 26 years have taught the Apperson Brothers. They know how.

And the combining of racing speed with comfort and ease of handling and all-'round economy is a sixth sense, not to be acquired by the tyro.

The man who has done big things in his own business comes naturally to the Apperson. For here is a car he can buy without doubt or mental reservation.

Here is a car that calls to his good judgment. Here is a car that is sold as he likes to buy—on what it will do. The car of definite and permanent values.

Drive an Apperson First—Then Decide.

Your Apperson dealer is the kind of man who talks your car language.

HOULDERING ARMENIA'S BURDENS

Critical Situation in the New Republic and the Tentative Program for American Administration

By RAE D. HENKLE

HE leaders in government of the United States y be said to have agreed on one international ligation, that obligation is Armenia. Regard- s of party, and regardless of attitude on the f peace and the League of Nations as a whole, virtual unanimity in the view that this country t back of the infant republic of the Caucasus ure its safety and development. The states of are anxious to see us assume the guardianship, Armenians themselves are eager to place them- the closest possible relationship to us. But easure of responsibility are we shoulder for an alien people sep- rom us by more than five thousand avaged by war, threatened even massacres on a huge scale, without le resources, and whose status has t indefinitely fixed by the Peace nce?

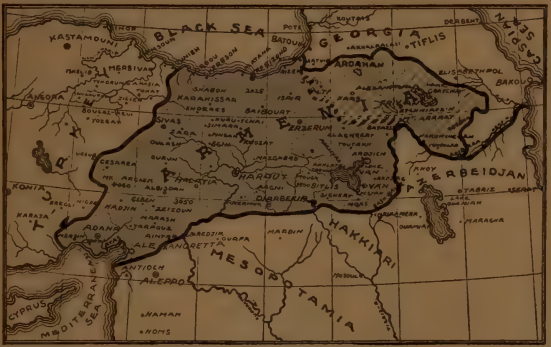
the main premise has been agreed must pull the Armenians out of the of desolation in which the war and ussulman have left them—the by which this relief is to be extend- s serious problems of national policy nay be very far-reaching. It will be ly difficult for the government to te a course of action in Asia Minor will not be construed by other as a precedent and bring down on erican people the reproach of ignor- pleas of other oppressed nationalities erhaps just as great a claim on itarianism.

the purpose of obtaining data on ome decision may be reached, Major James G. Harbord, with a staff of han forty experts in almost as many t lines of inquiry, is in the Caucasus now at the direction of the President. mmission is charged with a thorough gation of the new Armenian state, with partic- ference to its capabilities for defense, its devel- d undeveloped resources, the capacity of the peo- self-government and the quality and character of aders, the economic situation, including an esti- f the financial support the republic will require be- is self-supporting, and some approximate figures sums that will be needed immediately for relief.

mission went first to Erivan, the capital, here it consulted with the defacto government e military chiefs. From there the members ed in all directions to get a closer understanding situation. General Harbord, in the meantime, en seeing not only Armenian, but Russian, Turk- British officials, all of whom are directly inter- in whatever decision is ultimately made. At me time he is keeping a very close watch on the y situation, and in cooperation with Rear- l Mark L. Bristol, American naval com- in Near Eastern waters and our diplomatic entative in Constantinople, is exercising a very restraining hand over the Turkish army and its ar Kurdish, Tartar and Georgian allies.

immediate danger to the whole Armenian is very frankly recognized. England, who has olicing Asia Minor and the Caucasus since the ice, is withdrawing all her troops, numbering ivisions. This withdrawal was announced in t, to be completed early in October. At the the announcement Lieutenant General , who was in command, hurried to Paris to t the immediate despatch of American forces to d the British. General Bridges placed the num- men urgently needed at 200,000. The American mission explained the impossibility of sending contingent into the Black Sea country, or in e despatch of any force at that time, and ntations were made to England looking to the ary suspension of the order for British with- These representations were met with the ent that the policy of the London government required the early evacuation of all territory in which Great Britain was not directly interested; a policy determined on to meet the steadily growing demand at home for a quick lessening of war expenditures.

Alarmist reports on the military situation, especially in the Caucasus country, were promptly circulated in Paris. Unfortunately there was, and continues to be, much basis for them; so much basis, in fact, that Admiral Bristol felt it necessary to warn the Ottoman government against taking any hostile steps against Armenia. This warning Turkey interpreted as a threat on the part of the United States, and entered a complaint against it to the Peace Conference which brought a great deal of critical comment against the United States from British and French interests. The warning served its purpose, however, for late in September Turkey formally assured Admiral Bristol that "so far as the government could exercise control" Turkish troops would engage in no hostile activities against the Armenians.



THE REPUBLIC OF ARMENIA

The dotted line shows the old Russo-Turkish frontier. About 25,000 square miles of the new state are taken from the Russian Caucasus

SOME question may be expressed as to the extent of the control by the war office in Constantinople over the troops in Asia Minor, but even if that control should prove to be complete there is a direct menace to the people of the new republic from the fanatic Kurds and Tartars and the forces of the pseudo-republics of Georgia and Azerbeidjan, both of which are perfectly willing to aid in the extermination of the Armenians. These four enemies, with the Turks, have been closing in on Armenia on three sides with the withdrawal of the British divisions to the south, and the danger of a repetition of the horrors of 1915 is very real.

Militarily the Armenians at present are almost helpless. The republic has organized an army of about 40,000 men, to which may be added independent contingents numbering 10,000 more, and altogether a trained force of some 75,000 might be counted. Unfortunately the army has little equipment, almost no ammunition, and even less of a commissariat. So long as the Turks were in control of their destinies the Armenians were not permitted to bear arms, and such rifles as they had were surreptitiously obtained. Transit and economic conditions have not permitted the importation either of arms or munitions since the armistice, and all the government of the republic have been able to get hold of are such as the British could release or such as were found in the districts evacuated by the Turks.

So Armenia finds herself in possession of an army with no means to fight, opposed by groups of determined, well-armed, fanatical enemies under what at best is but indifferent control, and with little liking for humane methods of war-making.

Friends of Armenia and representatives of both parties in Washington have been considering just how the United States can meet the emergency.

Europe has learned that the people of the United States do not look favorably on any proposition that involves the use of American soldiers in foreign countries, either as an active military force or in the new character of international police. The discussion of the League of Nations, too, has developed a very strong opposition to the idea of a mandatory, which presupposes a call for troops in untoward circumstances. It is to find a way around these two primary impediments to action in Armenia that a series of conferences have been held in the last few weeks in Washington. The result of the negotiations, in which adherents of the League and its opponents have participated, is a tentative program with these outstanding features:

> Temporary administration of Armenia undertaken without reference to the mandatory provisions of the League of Nations Covenant.
> The use, as a military force more for its moral effect than for its physical strength, of marine detachments attached to American naval vessels in Near Eastern waters.
> Financial support for the republic of Armenia based on the recommendations to be made by the Harbord mission.
> Assignment of a limited number of American army officers for the purpose of training the Armenian army.
> The retention of many of the experts attached to the Harbord mission as technical and financial advisers to the Armenian government.

Unless there is a radical change in the situation before official announcement is made of American intentions, the above outline will comprise the basis of our work to convert Armenia into a state able to take its place in the community of nations. The powers frankly are awaiting this word from us.

The newly constituted republic of Armenia is well worth whatever efforts we shall expend in putting it on its feet. It has an area of between 125,000 and 135,000 square miles in some of the richest parts of the old Ottoman empire. Incredibly wealthy in natural resources, it has excellent trade outlets to the world through both the Mediterranean and the Black Seas. Sentimentally and economically, the bulk of this trade should flow to the United States. The Armenian for years has looked on the American as his best friend, and this dependence on friendship and unselfish interest is one of the present inspirations of the hard-pressed people. The American missionary has been the support of the Armenian in times of trouble for decades. He has fed the hungry, cared for the ill, protected the weak and wherever possible has stood as a bulwark against the cruelty and oppression of the Turk. He has held aloft a standard of love and sympathy born of Christianity, and a very human comprehension of the native troubles, and he has always kept in his mind that injunction of Gladstone's, "To serve Armenia is to serve civilization."

In taking over the directions of affairs in Armenia not the least of our difficulties will be the reconciliation of the ambitions of the diverse races which comprise the republic. A rough census of religions shows about 3,000,000 Christians, 1,300,000 Moslems, and the remainder other beliefs.

REDUCING A RACE'S ILLITERAC

Boys learning carpentry at St. Augustine's School

A REDUCTION of sixty-seven per cent. in the illiteracy of a race within the span of fifty years is a record that no other age in history can boast. It has come to pass in the United States among the Negroes since the freeing of the slaves and the beginning of educational work among them. In 1867, when St. Augustine's School for Negroes at Raleigh, N. C., was started by the Episcopal Church, the illiteracy of the race was ninety-seven per cent. When the school passed its fiftieth year the illiteracy had been reduced to thirty per cent.

In that fact is to be found a corrective of the pessimism with which the progress of the race is too often regarded. No race in all the world has made such rapid strides in education, and education is the foundation-stone on which other advancement is built.

St. Augustine's is the largest and most important school for Negroes maintained by the Episcopal Church. Its faculty consists of thirty-five teachers and officers, exclusive of the staff of St. Agnes's Hospital, which is a part of the school. The total yearly enrolment of the school is about 500, while approximately 1,000 patients annually are treated at the hospital.

At the close of the Civil War, Episcopal Church authorities recognized the need for teachers for the colored people, and St. Augustine's was started to train teachers and leaders. For a long time a theological department was maintained in connection with the school.

Collegiate, normal and industrial courses are given—the former primarily to fit men to enter upon a course of study for the ministry of the church, the normal course to prepare teachers for the parochial and public schools, and the industrial course to prepare the pupils to work intelligently at some trade which would return them a decent living.

The industrial department maintains cooking and sewing courses for the girls, carpentry, printing and bricklaying for the boys. Several of the school buildings bear witness to the skill and industry of the young men trained in carpentry and masonry. St. Agnes's Hospital was built of stone quarried on the 110 acres of the school grounds, and was largely erected by young men trained in the industrial classes of the school. The same is true of the library, Taylor Hall, the transepts of the chapel, and several of the brick structures.

The students are divided into two classes—those who work their way through the school by working during the day and going to classes from four to six o'clock in the afternoon, and those who pay $9 for their board and tuition and attend school in the morning and industrial classes in the afternoon, and devote the evening to study. There is also a primary

The Big Job of the War Risk Bureau

IF THE $600,000,000 which has been paid in checks to the dependents of the military and naval forces of the United States by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance were turned into dollar bills and placed end to end the money would make a string of bills over 71,000 miles long.

If the $40,000,000,000 insurance which has been written for men in the military service of the country, were turned into silver dollars and stacked one on top of another it would make six hundred thousand stacks as high as the Washington Monument.

All of which gives some indication of the fact that the Bureau of War Risk Insurance has been handling a fairly good-sized job. The Marine and Seamen's Division of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance did an insurance business of $2,389,541,252. Premiums collected on this business amounted to $47,593,555 and operating expenses and losses $30,548,663. This left more than $17,000,000 on the profit side of the ledger, which, together with the untouched $50,000,000 sinking fund created for the business by Congress, made a sum of more than $67,000,000 to be returned to the Treasury of the United States.

Four months after the bill providing insurance for seamen had been passed, the law was amended to provide family allowance, compensation for disability, and insurance for all men in military service. At the time of the enactment one and a half million men were already in the training camps, a quarter million were abroad, and that number was growing daily by thousands. By the law's provision a period of only one hundred and twenty days was allowed within which insurance applications could be written by the men in service. Besides the insurance applications there was the Form 1–B by which the man either claimed or disclaimed government allowance for his dependents.

THE Bureau had no organization and it had no home. Nobody knew how best to administer government insurance business, and nobody knew by what processes the troublesome proposition of family allowances might be handled. And the work proved highly technical; process after process was devised, revised and discarded as each in its turn broke down in the test of the peculiar task to be handled.

It is no marvel that errors occurred—the marvel is that they were not many times as great as they were.

But errors were made entirely outside the Bureau and for which the Bureau was held responsible. Insurance applications and the Form 1–B constituted the Bureau's sole means of identifying a man in handling his case. Any inaccuracy or insufficiency of information in these papers caused complications and distressing delays, and there were many inaccuracies due to the haste in which they were written up. Ignorance, especially among the colored troops of the South, and the difficulties of language among those of foreign birth or extraction made errors in these papers inevitable.

As an evidence of what wholly unexpected errors happened, when a sudden order came for duty overseas, the records of a whole division, including insurance applications and Form 1–B, were packed and taken to France. Two duplicates of the original papers had to be written up and sent by different routes to Washington.

HUNDREDS of thousands of checks had to be sent out each month. These hundreds of thousands of checks had to be written. In addition to the writing of the checks they had to be proofread. After the typist had finished, each check was checked against the award card for errors in name, address or amount. Then the checks had to be signed, and besides there still remained the difficult task of mailing them out. Clerks were added until there was no space left to put them. Night shifts were added to the day staff and the Bureau operated on a twenty-four-hour-day basis. With the usual Civil Service day beginning at nine o'clock in the morning and ending at 4:30 in the afternoon, an order was issued that the Bureau workers would be expected to report at 8:30 in the morning and stay on until five in the interest of speeding up the work. The order was cheerfully accepted. In addition whenever there was any intimation that extra work would be needed from the day force the situation was accepted willingly and cheerfully. Throughout the entire organization there was a splendid conception of the fact that the work of the Bureau, more than any other Government agency, touched intimately the heart of the soldier and those dear to him, and any and every servic might thus be rendered was not only a duty privilege.

The Bureau now occupies a new building with the site cost $2,300,000. It is eleven s above ground, has three sub-basements and a floor space of 608,000 square feet. It has every fort and convenience for its 16,000 employees, ninety per cent. of whom are women.

In equipment there are 4,000 typewriters, a of tables which, end to end, would extend five half miles, and desks that would extend over miles.

In this splendid new home the Bureau will co its service to service men. The problem immedi ahead is the campaign of contact, a campaign by it is hoped that every man who wore the fi uniform of the United States will be reached sonally and made aware of the tremendous adva which is his in the opportunity to continue pe nently the government insurance which was wr for him during the war.

The Director of the Bureau, R. G. Cholm
Jones, has authorized the following statement t an end to rumors that the government's insu business is to be turned over to private compa

"Government insurance issued to the m forces of the United States during the war is p nent government insurance. The work of p nently maintaining and administering such ins is one of the functions of a bureau of the govern known as the Bureau of War Risk Insurance o
Treasury Department and created by law.

"There was never thought by those who e the law, nor has there been thought by any one ified to speak since the law's enactment, of an cedure other than permanent government insu for soldiers, sailors and marines, permanently ministered by the government."

In Government Insurance lies the one sure tunity for every service man to receive the extr pensation to which he is so justly entitled, this campaign of contact the Bureau may

EUNITING OF CHURCH FORCES

By B. H. DARROW

HE division of Church forces in some country communities into two or more uncorrelated or even competitive groups has brought about such a state of undernourishment that quite 1e old leaders are sick of it all, but don't know "get off." It was not so with Olmsted Falls, ted Falls is a village of about 400 in the midst ood farming community, some fifteen miles est of Cleveland, on the New York Central d. The people are generally industrious and sive, with quite a number of foreigners, most n are Catholics.

e is a fairly strong Catholic Church; but for he two Protestant churches, Methodist Epis- and Congregational, have been struggling for ce. About four years ago, when each church ding it difficult to raise about $500 a year for a and giving little to benevolences, a strong feel- se that all was wrong and there ought to be ind of a federation of their forces. Each had a y of about $4,000 value, while the Methodists addition, a parsonage that was poorly located dly in need of repair.

gregations were small and on the decline; the were discouraged. The children and young became especially discontented, and wondered ey could not all go to the same church and school as well as to the same public school.

mmittee of two was appointed by each church after conference, called a meeting of the two es to consider the matter; but opposition de- d and the matter was dropped. About two later the question was taken up again and a ttee, six from each church, was appointed.

ER this committee had worked hard for many eeks on the problem, a letter was sent to all the nity to ascertain the mind of the people on the on. A largely attended meeting was held, with t superintendents present to confer on the mat- hese men were favorable to the proposition, but t see how it could be effected, fearing the loss evolences to one or the other (which amounts to while the disposition of the property was a big m. But the committee felt that something be done; so at it they went again, with the de- ation to have a federation of some kind. Some wanted a complete union of the two churches; but it was too big a jump to expect the one body to join the other all at once, while the separation from all denominational ties was deemed unwise.

The status of the ladies' organizations was one of the big problems, but that was left for the ladies to settle themselves; and they did it well. The society was called the Women's Guild of the Community Church. All charitable and benevolent contributions are divided equally between the two denominational causes. The ladies work together splendidly, and the larger numbers add interest.

The two buildings being opposite each other on the same street, it was easy to use both, the Methodist Church being used for worship and the Congregational for social purposes, while both are used for Sunday School work, affording more rooms for classes. The Primary and Junior departments meet in the one, the Intermediate and Senior in the other.

Each church retains its own organization, with secretary, treasurer, and trustee, who have the care of the property. Each church is responsible for its own denominational funds, although in the general budget of the Community Church an amount equal to ten per cent. of the pastor's salary is set apart for that purpose to be divided equally between the two.

ALL affairs of the Community Church are directed by an official board composed of the pastor, pastor's cabinet, and board of directors. The cabinet consists of two members from each church, their work being that generally done by deacons. The board of directors consists of three from each church, and they do the work generally allotted to the trustee board. They appoint from their own numbers a chairman, a church secretary, and a church treasurer. The Sunday school superintendent is elected at the annual meeting of the Community Church.

The plan is working admirably. There is a fine spirit of unanimity and fellowship among the people.

The public respect the church very much more than before. A budget of $2,000 was presented in December for the coming year and was readily subscribed. There is not the least difficulty in raising a salary of $1,300, with parsonage for the pastor, who is chosen by the official board of the Community Church, with the sanction of the district superintendents of the two denominations, and called for one year at the time, with no time limit set.

The present pastor, and the first, is Rev. Albert Secord, who began work on December 1 last, and the people are responding splendidly. Interest everywhere has greatly increased. The church is appealing to people now that it could not touch before. There is a feeling, too, that they are big enough to accomplish something. A growing desire is manifest to lose sight of sect and think only of the Church. Those wishing to join the church now desire to unite with the Community Church and not the Methodist or the Congregational. Of course this is inadvisable. There is little doubt, however, that the Federated Church is a transitional step, and that some day, if all old distinctions have lost their value, the church will become thoroughly one.

THE church is planning a much enlarged program of missionary effort. A very good Men's Club has just been organized with many leading men of the community as members. Two troops of Boy Scouts have been formed with the aid and encouragement of the pastor. A Boys' Band of fourteen pieces is entertaining the church and the townspeople and responding to many invitations to play elsewhere.

At Easter time over thirty people were taken into the church, the number of Methodists and Congregationalists being about equal. The Methodist Conference has not lost, for it has more Methodists in Olmsted Falls than formerly. The same applies to the Congregationalists. Everywhere there has been gain and improvement due to the Federation. The community is now planning to build a new parsonage.

The Federated Church takes the lead in many community social affairs and festivals, and Rev. Mr. Secord is a member of many committees not bearing directly on church affairs.

There has been a spirit of waiting on the part of many, to see how the federation developed and succeeded. But that time has practically passed, and everybody seems well satisfied. The greatest optimism prevails regarding the success of the movement. The church has been saved by Olmsted; now the church will reinvigorate the life of its people.

The Square Deal Towns—A Factory That Is a Democracy

THIS day and age of general unrest and dis- ntent among the laboring people, of strikes, of tterness between employer and employee, it is f and a pleasure to pause for a moment and see the philanthropy and honest good-will of one yer toward his men has accomplished—to see t cooperation between capital and labor.

t at the entrance to a thriving little town stands e gray arch put there by the workers, tempo- , in honor of a big celebration soon to be held preciation Day they are going to call it. On the we read, "Entrance to the Square Deal Towns." Square Deal Towns are three, already estab- l, and another one under way. Come with me moment. We will visit them. I will show you ample of practical philanthropy, of generosity yond your wildest dreams. We are now on the side of the gray arch, in Johnson City, the first e Square Deal Towns—named for George F. son, the man who has made his factories a true cracy.

the distance is one of the huge, red shoe factories, ng, humming with thousands of busy workers. efore we reach the factory, we must pause briefly e the library. Your Home Library, it is called, true home it is, looking for all the world like a , pretentious dwelling. For a moment we will inside and see the two large front rooms filled books, the magazine room at the other side of the the spacious sun parlor with its handsome wicker ture, and the lovely dining-room finished in ch gray.

ining-room?" you exclaim, in surprise. "In a ry?"

suredly! For here is where the factory girls, or one, for that matter, may entertain—have their parties and luncheons—everything furnished pt the food: silver, dainty linen, a complete en in which to prepare food—everything which might desire for entertaining.

stairs are the children's rooms. The children are for a moment forgotten in the Square Deal s. Here are tiny chairs and tables, plenty of esting books, and here even, in the hall, is a sani- little drinking-fountain. The other rooms up- s are attractively furnished reading-rooms.

xt to the library are the tennis courts, brilliantly d at night for those who care to play. Directly ck of these courts is the playground—every- g here to delight the heart of a child—swings, , sand-piles, rings, poles, all complete.

Attached to the factory and in front of it is a large dining-hall where the workers of the big Endicott-Johnson factories can procure a warm lunch—meat, potatoes, vegetables, dessert—at a ridiculously low price, thus doing away entirely with the old, unhealthful, unsanitary lunch box.

And now you are about to go back to the street car; but no—not yet. I have more to show you. Over a railroad bridge we will go; thence to the rear of the great factory, and there we behold the swimming-pool. The water is of different depths, all plainly marked, slightly warmed when necessary, and constantly changed. Here is a nice bath-house, lifeguards, everything for the comfort and pleasure of the factory workers and public at large.

Now we have seen the first of the Square Deal Towns, we will board a car for Endicott. As we leave the town, we see at the left other huge red factories, filled with their busy, happy workers.

Six miles and we are in Endicott—a town in its infancy, as may be seen by the residences, all practically new, prosperous, well-kept, attractive. Here too are the huge red factories with a swimming-pool beside them and dining-hall attached.

You will also be interested in seeing at Endicott the home of the millionaire philanthropist and father of the Square Deal Towns, who calls his workers his big, happy family.

And notice that large residence at the right as we step off the car. It is another library, even larger and finer and more complete than the one in Johnson City, and like that a present from Mr. Johnson to his happy family.

But let us turn our attention for a moment to the left—to Ideal Park. First we come to a large pavilion where free concerts are given. Beyond this pavilion is another large swimming-pool and bath-house, and right beside it a smaller pool, with a large spray for the little tots to paddle about in. Just at the side of the pool is a big pile of white sand. All the comforts of the seashore!

Going still farther we come to a steep bank, at the foot of which flows the river. Along this bank are several small open buildings with long tables for picnic parties. One of these is a boat-house, where we may rent a canoe and paddle along the river if we desire.

But hark! I hear music. Oh, yes; the playground. The kiddies are not forgotten at Ideal Park. Here are the swings, chutes, sand-piles, just as at Johnson City; but here—ah, I have saved the best until last—here is a large new merry-go-round, three horses abreast, filled with merry, happy children. A free merry-go-round! See all of the little ones in line, waiting their turn, for one may ride as often as one desires, only you must wait your turn.

Beyond the playground and at the left is a large race-track and grandstand, something in the way of amusement for the older members of the happy family.

Union, the last of the three towns, is about a mile west of Endicott, an old, old town, but new enough to enjoy all the privileges and advantages of its younger sister, Endicott. The fourth town, near Union, is now being developed.

Here, then, I have shown you a factory which is a true democracy. No grumblings, no complaints about the down-trodden laborer or profiteering capitalist. Just one big, happy family. They have their own little factory magazine devoted entirely to their interests; they have their recreation department, which has drilled and developed the large Endicott-Johnson chorus. In short, everything has been done and is being done to make the life of the worker well-nigh ideal.

EVE WOODBURN LEARY.

STATE
CAR

SUNDAY school chapel cars came into existence a good many years ago. They have carried the Gospel message into many places in which it was almost an entirely new note in the lives of the people. The Sunday school automobile is something of more recent growth. The one illustrated is the car of the New York State Sunday School Association. It has traveled all over the state distributing Sunday school literature, helping in the establishment of new schools and carrying workers to conventions and calling the attention of the people to the Sunday school by its very presence.

RUMANIA THE TROUBLE-MAKE

A building in Constanza showing effects of an air raid. An American "gob" is standing in front

PURCHASE of a dozen eggs, a loaf of bread or half dozen apples, bananas or oranges by the American housewife is a simple transaction. She gives her order, the dealer fills it, payment is made, and the purchaser leaves without further ado.

Not so in Rumania, the most easterly member of the Balkan group. Purchases are not made so easily and quickly. With foodstuffs priced at figures that astound us despite our own H. C. of L., the purchase of even a single egg may require ten minutes of bargaining. Eggs are not bought by the dozen in Rumania, where they were selling at twenty cents each when the writer visited the devastated country a short time ago. They are sold by ones and twos. When a person buys a dozen eggs at one time, which is an exceptionally rare occasion, he is immediately stamped as independently wealthy.

Scales are one of the most important articles in the life of the Rumanian. He may be able to get along minus a lot of things, but there is one thing, it seems, he never will be able to do without, and that is a pair of scales. When the housewife, for instance, seeks to buy two eggs, she goes to the box with her scales and she may weigh several dozen eggs before she finally decides upon the pair she wants. It is all a question of the greatest weight. The eggs that weigh the most are the ones she chooses.

The same is true with every other article that in this country is sold by the unit and not by weight.

Rumanians when going shopping frequently carry their own scales with them, distrusting the veracity of the scales at the stores.

Though bread is supposed to be made in standard weights, as in the United States, the Rumanian never accepts the offer of the dealer. He invariably will weigh a dozen loaves or so before making the selection. Bread was priced at sixty cents a loaf when I was in Rumania, and it was made of a dark substance that was anything but appetizing.

RUMANIA was very hard hit by the war. The country was literally torn to shreds. The Germans, after retreating following the sweeping victory of the Allied arms over the Turks and Bulgarians, thoroughly looted the nation. All its harvesting machines were stripped, all movable machinery was carted away, stores were plundered of their stocks, and even the window-panes in the homes, churches and business blocks were removed.

THE Rumanians, after having virtually put themselves outside the pale of the Entente by reason of their sudden invasion of Hungary and capture of Budapest, are once more accepted among the Allies. But they have not been greeted enthusiastically, and in fact they may be said to be present on probation until such a time as their intentions toward Hungary are fully exposed. Herbert Hoover, on his return from an inspection trip through the eastern part of Europe, has compromised the Rumanian hopes by reporting to the Supreme Council that in spite of repeated assurances to the contrary, the Rumanian army continues to strip the Hungarian lands of all food and materials. Rumania has excused her march into Hungary by asserting it was necessary to put down Bolshevism. The Allies in Paris, however, take credit for the overthrow of communism in Budapest and blame Rumania for adding still another complication to the problem.

The Nationalist feeling in Rumania has grown rapidly with the government's defiance of the Peace Conference and the latter's acceptance of the situation, and there is a determination now to retain not only Bessarabia, Bukowina, Transylvania and a part of the Banat of Teneszar, but all of Hungary as far west as the Theiss River.

Only the prompt response made by America to the urgent call for foodstuffs after the signing of the armistice resulted in the opening of the Dardanelles and the Bosphorus to commerce and saved the country from being swept by starvation, plagues and Bolshevism. No other country since the fighting ceased has felt the warmth of America's big heart more than Rumania.

American cargo vessels, manned by naval crews, steamed one after the other with big cargoes of flour, milk and other foodstuffs into the Black Sea port of Constanza. Hundreds of townfolk gathered at the docks to welcome the ships. Most of the people were getting their first glimpse of the Stars and Stripes as the colors flapped in the brisk breeze over the taffrails of the sturdy carriers, and it was obviously a happy sight to them.

As the sacks of white flour were hoisted out of the holds and unloaded, the Rumanians looked on with joy and bewilderment. They could not believe that this was real wheat flour because of its pure whiteness. They had never seen flour so white before.

When American officers and enlisted men went ashore, even civilians saluted them and showed them unusual respect in other ways. The people all exhibited what appeared to be a deep-seated gratitude. They regarded the Americans as their saviors.

The food entering through Constanza is sold by the American Government to the Rumanian Government at cost. The Rumanian Government, in turn, apportions it out in allotted individual quantities without profit. It was these first shiploads of food from America that unquestionably saved Rumania from being torn wide by Bolshevism. From an apparent growing sympathy with the Russian Reds, the sentiment after the arrival of the foodstuffs from America turned solidly against them and came to a climax with open warfare against Bolshevist invaders who attempted to enter the country over the eastern f

Every article of food and wearing app Rumania is exceptionally high. Soap is ularly scarce. For instance, a well-known of face soap that retails in America for ten bar is sold in Constanza for $1.25, and in Bu which is inland, for $1.50. Sardines, which chase here for 15 cents a tin, are sold there fo to $2 a tin. Shoestrings brought 20 cents shoes of almost any variety found ready ta from $30 to $50 a pair. The small boxes of n that can be bought in the United States for a a box cost 25 cents a box in the Balkan country. stockings vary from $1.50 to $3 a pair. Oth cles are sold at correspondingly high prices.

It is a common sight to see Rumanian wome ing down the streets clad in a garb made entir of gunny sacks. Children go barefoot even dead of winter despite the harsh Black Sea wi snow. American sailors found children sleepi in the cold nights in vacant lots or on the w shoeless and with little clothing on. The smuggled dozens of these orphans on boa American naval craft and outfitted them from to foot in clothes contributed by the crew, gav a bath, brought them food from the general me then gave them a comfortable place to sleep.

While the American ships unload tons upon flour in Rumania, it is significant to reflect that the war Rumania was the granary of Europe. her fields are waste, she has no threshing machin it will take a long time to strengthen a faltering Invasion of Budapest by Rumanian troops ov protests of the Peace Conference, particular American members, is puzzling to men who visited the Balkan nation. Rumania owes a debt of gratitude to the United States and th would show almost open defiance of this cou hard to understand. Possibly it is because Ru ans now hate the "Reds" with a bitter hatre they fear Bolshevism will sink its fangs into country unless they pounce upon it beyond the limits.

India Moving Toward Church Unity

A MOST significant development in the direction of Church Unity is taking place in South India. Your readers probably realize the sad effects of denominational divisions on the mission field, where the Church is weakened by sects and schisms and unable to present a united front. Many Christians here on the mission field long that they may be one, that the world may believe, even as Christ prayed.

Recently a conference of Indian ministers on the subject of Church Union met at Tranquebar, where more than two hundred years ago the first Protestant missionary work was begun in South India. There were present ministers of the four chief bodies of this section, the Church of England, the Wesleyans, the Lutherans and the South India United Church. This last body is in itself one of the greatest achievements of Church Union on the mission field, as it already includes all the members of the Congregational, Dutch Reformed, Free Church of Scotland, Established Church of Scotland, and the Basel Reformed Missions, gathered in one united Church.

The Indian members of each of these four denominations read papers on the subject of Church Union and stated the special convictions of their own denomination and the contribution they felt they could make to the future Church of India. The two largest bodies represented were the Church of England and the South India United Church. The members of these gradually drew together and found themselves, after prayer and conference, in complete agreement upon a possible basis of union to form a United Church of India. They agreed that there were three Scriptural elements they wished to embody in this united Church; the Congregational element, utilizing the gifts and power of the laity and recognizing the universal priesthood of all believers; the Presbyterian element, or the representative, organized element enabling the whole Church to come together in Synods and a General Assembly; and the executive or Episcopal element. The more these Indian ministers studied the question the more they felt that all three elements should be included. They felt that in the early Church there was a measure of central control in the hands of the Apostles, and that there were "bishops and deacons" in the local churches. They felt that this centralized power had never grown less in the Church, and that from the second to the sixteenth century, or for fourteen hundred years, the only type of government which prevailed in the Church was an Episcopal government. As they studied the question they found that nearly three-quarters of the Christians of the world today were under an Episcopal form of government (Protestant Episcopal, Methodist Episcopal, Roman, Greek, Anglican, etc.) and that the remaining one-quarter of the Christians in the world were split up into several hundred different divisions, no one of which has the power to unite the others. The Indian leaders felt that the only hope of ultimate union on the mission field was a return to a simple, constitutional, primitive episcopal basis, the bishops to be chosen by the Church and their powers limited and defined by it.

The basis of union proposed by the Indian ters sets forth the belief "That union is the God, even as our Lord prayed that we might one that the world might believe. . . .

"Upon the common ground of the historic pate and of spiritual equality of all members two churches we propose union on the foll basis: (1) The Holy Scriptures of the Old and Testaments, as containing all things necessary vation. (2) The Apostles' Creed, and the Creed. (3) The two sacraments ordained by himself, Baptism and the Lord's Supper. (4) historic episcopate, locally adapted. We under that the acceptance of the fact of the Episcopate not involve the acceptance of any theory of the of the episcopacy nor any doctrinal interpre of the fact. It is further agreed that the term union should involve no Christian community necessity of disowning its past, and we find it no of our duty to call in question the validity of other's orders."

The proposition is then made that the South United Church choose from its own members tain men who shall be consecrated as bishops, or more bishops of the Anglican Church laying hands upon the candidates, together with an number of ministers as representatives of the India United Church. When this is done the bodies will be in intercommunion. It will then come a simple matter to arrange further progres cooperative action.

interesting to note the small beginnings of ous enterprises. Great oaks, so the saying runs, little acorns grow. Every one knows that coral islands have been formed from tiny bugs that have fastened on to each other and died. So it is not unbelievable that a Mecca toward which the eyes of the Christian world have turned—come August—for fifty years should owe its being to the fact that for some reason, mosquitoes once preferred Asbury Park to Ocean Grove!

Dr. Marshall was talking again.

"There has been some talk," he told me, "of one day erecting a great educational institution here at the Grove. Surely with its background of religion and service it is a right and fitting place at which to have such a university. Already Ocean Grove is known as one of America's musical centers. We have during our meetings, concerts by the greatest organists, violinists, and pianists, as well as by such singers as Caruso, John McCormack, Galli-Curci and Madame Homer. The organ in our auditorium is the largest and most powerful in the world, if not the most expensive." Dr. Marshall paused for a moment, and then—

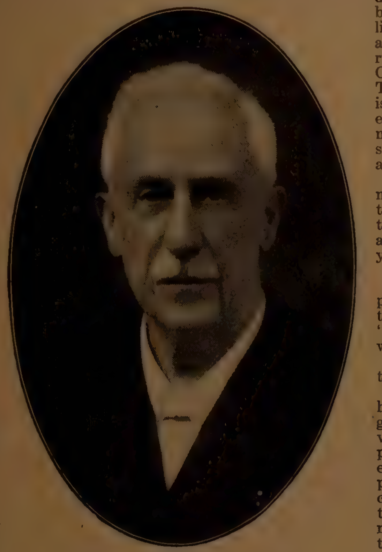
"This year, too," he told me, "we have had more lectures than ever before. And they have been splendidly attended, especially by the young people."

I interrupted.

"Were there more young people at the Grove this year than ever before?" I asked. "I'm rather curious to know whether the war—"

It was Dr. Marshall's turn to interrupt.

"Yes, I think there were," he told me seriously. "A great many soldiers were converted this summer by our preachers. And the soldier element brought other young people—boys and girls who came perhaps for a good time, and took something far more vital and lasting than the memory of a pleasant vacation away with them."



Rev. James William Marshall

AFTER a while I left Dr. Marshall and went out into the keen salt breezes of the Grove. It was the first part of September—the closing time of the Jubilee camp meeting—and folk were getting ready to go home. In front of one tiny cottage I saw a pile of baggage labeled Colorado. In the doorway of a tent I saw a truck with New Mexico on it. All about me, under the wide spreading trees, I saw children playing. An air of peace and well-being lay over the place. It seemed as if the folk who visited there had something very worth while tucked away in their hearts.

A little old lady, seated on the porch of a cottage, nodded to me as I passed down the street, and, following a blind impulse, I turned in at the neat shell-bordered path and spoke to her. At her invitation to stay a while I seated myself upon one of the porch steps.

"This certainly is a lovely place!" I began, feeling rather at a loss for words.

The little old lady laughed and picked up a hank of gray yarn that was lying on the floor beside her.

"I'm glad you came along," she said. She was not at all embarrassed by the fact that I was a stranger. "I wonder if you'd mind holding this wool for me while I wind it into a ball."

I said that I wouldn't mind; and, after the yarn was adjusted about my hands, I asked a question.

"Have you come to Ocean Grove for many years?" I asked.

The little old lady wound vigorously.

"Indeed I have," she said. "I like Ocean Grove better'n any place I know of. Why? For three reasons. First of all, He's—" she paused in her work of winding and glanced up toward the sky, "He's here! And then, everybody has a good time—in the best sort of a way. Sometimes folk have a good time not in the best way. You know what I mean. And the third reason is that a person learns something new and hears something new most every day."

I WAS sorry to leave the little old lady when her hank of yarn had been converted into a neat ball. But she had given me an idea. I drifted down the street until I came to the small park in front of the Auditorium. There, sitting under a tree, I saw a woman in a black gown. I went into the park and sat down beside her.

"It's almost over, isn't it?" I asked by way of starting a conversation. She looked up, startled.

"Yes," she said, "it's almost over. Later this afternoon we'll walk around Jerusalem. And that'll be the end—for another year. And I'll go home!"

"You live far from here?" I questioned.

"Yes, quite far," said the woman. For a moment she seemed disinclined to talk, and then, all at once, she was speaking hurriedly:

"I came here in—in a resentful mood. One that I loved went to war—and didn't come," she choked suddenly and her slim nervous fingers smoothed the folds of the black gown—"didn't come back. And I felt that it wasn't fair. I hated," her voice grew firm again, "everybody and everything.

"I had to get away for a while or I think that I would have gone mad. So I came to Ocean Grove—not because of the meetings, but because it isn't an expensive place to come to. And here I found—God." She paused for a moment, and I—for I hadn't anything to say—I waited.

"It wasn't," said the woman, after a while, "it wasn't the evangelists, or the singing, or the sea, or the services. It wasn't any one thing. It was the spirit of the place. It was the Spirit back of the place."

WHEN I left the woman in black I wandered over to the small model of Jerusalem that stands not too far from the Auditorium. It is made of clay, a group of miniature buildings laid out in the plan of the ancient city. I stood a while, in silence, looking down upon the quaintly shaped roofs and the little crooked streets, and as I stood there a man came and stood beside me, an old man in clothes of a clerical cut.

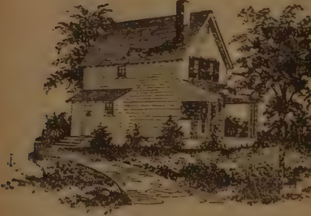
"Lookin' at Jerusalem?" he questioned genially, and laughed.

"Yes," I told him, "I am."

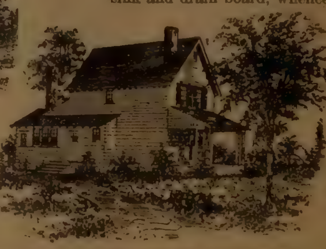
We stood together, looking down into the toy village. And as we stood there I thought of all that little group of clay houses typified. It was as I stood there lost in thought, the old man spoke again.

"It'll mean a lot more, this year," he told me, "the walk around Jerusalem! For Jerusalem, this year, is in the hands of Christians."

A HOUSE BUILT A BIT AT A TIM



This cozy four-room cottage is the first of Jack's carpentry



The first addition consists of the installation of a kitchen and laundry

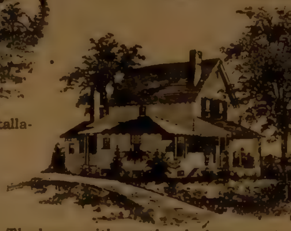
A HOUSE better than the one Jack built, handy, convenient, capable of extension as the finances of the owner and the size of his family justify, and adapted to provide snug, cozy quarters for the farm family, is the unique structure recently turned out by architects of the United States Department of Agriculture. This house is capable of gradual development in that it can be constructed a few rooms at a time.

Just suppose that Jack is a young farmer starting out with a limited capital on a 160-acre farm. To begin with, he and his wife need only a small house such as is shown in figure No. 1, which consists of two rooms on the first floor, one of which is used temporarily as a kitchen, and two bedrooms upstairs. In this plan the chimney is temporary and will need to be razed when permanent additions are made. There is a full cellar underneath the building, access to which is by means of a temporary hatchway. A permanent inside cellar stairway is provided for in the first addition. If the young farmer cannot afford to put up a front porch, he may add this convenience later on, but for the sake of appearance and comfort he should include the porch at this time.

As his farming operations expand and more money becomes available, he may add to his small domicile a kitchen and laundry, as illustrated in figure No. 2, and install a running water system, than which no feature of the house is more essential to the comfort of the family. In fact, if his pocketbook will permit, it is advisable that he build the house as shown in this plan at the outset, as everything connected with it is permanent and hence does not involve extra expenditure for facilities which will be used only temporarily.

When the owner and his hired man wish to enter the house they come in at the rear, grade entrance, whence they can pass up a few steps to the laundry where they can wash up. This laundry contains a closet where they may hang up their coats before entering the dining-room. The entrance to the laundry also provides ingress to the cellar. The arrangement of the entrance and wash-room permits the men to pass in and out from the dining-room without going through the kitchen.

Provision is made for a fully equipped laundry, and if the owner desires the installation of electric power, a power washer and wringer may be used. There is also a small closet for an ironing board. In the kitchen there is a broom closet which provides storage space for cleaning utensils. Used dishes are transferred from the dining-room to the kitchen through a pass cupboard or dresser which is located next to the sink and drain board, whence the washed dishes may be removed and placed in cupboards on either side of the sink, where they are available from both the kitchen and the dining-room. Reserve dishes, such as desserts, may be placed in the pass cupboard, where they are accessible from the dining-room when required. These uses of the pass cupboard save the housewife many needless steps between the two rooms.



The house with another bedroom and bathroom added

In one corner of the kitchen are a storage pantry, a work-table with drawers, and a cupboard conveniently arranged for the preparation of food. The range is handy both to the sink and work-table. The space in front of the chimney can be utilized during the summer season for a kerosene oil stove.

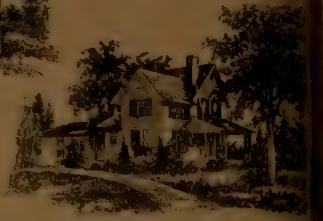
Above the two stoves is a built-in hood, ventilated by means of a register which opens into a flue adjoining the smoke flue. The air in the ventilating flue, being warmed by the heat of the smoke flue, tends to rise and create a draft, which removes odors and heat from the kitchen. The triple casement windows of the kitchen and the several openings in the laundry assure ample ventilation, which will add greatly to the comfort of the housewife during the summer months. It would be desirable to include in this first addition the open porch adjacent to the laundry, which, if screened, can be used for dining purposes during the summer.

As the owner's family increases, or as he needs more farm labor, it becomes necessary to expand the accommodations, and he therefore may add an additional bedroom and a bathroom. This involves a one-story addition to the house, as shown in figure No. 3. All these improvements go to promote general livableness, as a house is not a real home unless every part of it is in constant use.

Because visitors usually call at the rear entrance, anticipating that their knock at the front door may not be heard in the kitchen, where the housewife usually is occupied, the entrance to the house has been placed on the north side, protected by a small porch which may be enclosed, and near the kitchen. From the entrance hall all parts of the house are easily accessible; the living-room, dining-room, bedroom, bathroom, and stairway.

The bathroom and one bedroom have been placed on the first floor because many farm families prefer this arra it has its advantages, too, especially in the ca ness, when the housewife can attend to her duties and at the same time keep an eye patient. The location of the bathroom ma altogether satisfactory to all owners, as it i close to the entrance, but this factor is not jectionable in a farmhouse as in a city or s dwelling. The living- and dining-rooms have exposure in summer—the prevailing breezes be the south and southwest—and they should most comfortable in winter, as they are prot the north side by the bedroom and hall.

Finally, after several years, if the demands f tional space continue, the owner may add second-floor bedroom, which can be placed over the first-story bed shown in figure No. 3. Als time, if conditions justify can be added a one-stor at the rear, consisting of house with ice-bunkers, wh vide refrigeration for h foods and for the cooling and cream stored in the dairy room at the of the wing. If properly insulated, the ice-b need only be filled once every week or tw eliminating the bother of transporting ice dail a more or less distant ice-house, and the ann due to carrying the ice through the kitchen. storage space is provided under the roof of th story wing, so that no matter whether wood is used in the cook-stove, the carry is short under cover.



The piecemeal house completed and equipp the practical modern conveniences

The completed design, illustrated in figure of the house which Jack may build, consist structure of seven rooms—a living-room, dining bedroom, kitchen, and bathroom on the groun and three bedrooms with large closets on the floor, all conveniently arranged. The comm cellar provides ample storage room for vegetal well as space for a heating-plant and bunkers f storage. All the porch floors are of concrete, m off in squares to give a more finished appearan

The exterior of the house is plain, yet it is pl in proportion and line. At any time in the de ment of this house the owner has a dwelling t convenient and attractive.

No farmhouse appears to the best advantage out a suitable setting of foliage, just as a pa needs a frame to give it a finished effect. The ing need not be as elaborate as that shown i accompanying illustrations, but the arrange should be logical and practical. The trees abou house are both useful and ornamental; they the views of the house from the road, at the time shading the ground and preventing the tion of heat, which is perhaps as great a sou discomfort in the house as the direct rays o sun on the roof and walls.

His Last Nickel Founded His Fortune

SOME twenty years ago a rascally partner beat J. C. S. Johnstone, then of Faribault, Minn., out of all he had. After years of habitual comfort, at the age of forty-one and in hard times he faced the world with practically nothing but his hands. He went to Minneapolis and tramped the streets for work in vain. At last he had but five cents between him and beggary or starvation.

Walking along the street, uncertain whether to try again or give up the battle altogether, he was asked by a Salvation Army girl for a nickel for the poor. Moved perhaps by the unconscious irony of the request, he gave her his nickel and told her it was his last cent.

"The Lord won't forget," she said, and went on.

Almost convinced that the Lord had forgotten him, Johnstone watched her at her work. The next thirteen men she accosted gave her nothing. The fourteenth gave her a dollar. He remembered that he had asked for work several times and had always been refused. He made up his mind to ask again and again, up to fourteen times. He got the job.

That was the end of his distress. He saved his wages, and a year or two later bought a little mill out in the woods. His business prospered steadily. In ten years the commercial agencies were rating his wealth at nearly seven figures. He was always utterly convinced that should he let a Salvation Army collector pass unheeded his prosperity would end.

Superstition?

Do you say that the giving of that last nickel had nothing to do with the man's later success?

If you do, then you know little about the real forces that rule in this life.

The human mind is like a chemist's crucible—many chemicals go in and from the combination there may result a new one bearing no resemblance whatever to any of its ingredients. Two bitter poisons may come out a substance as sweet and nourishing as honey.

Out of conflicting emotions and impulses resolve was suddenly created, and thereafter there was force in the man.

Who can say that a man who, standing at the of despair, gives away his last penny can remai same man that he was before?

Is there any man, not a fool, who denies that is a divine force—call it what he will—which strength into the heart that is turned toward endeavor?

None can fail to see, shining above the confli creeds as a sun-kissed mountain-peak shines a its mists, the Christ truth, impressed upon us day, that the man who takes as the foundatio his life the principle that what is done for the of humankind is not done in vain creates a struc which the storms of all time cannot shake.

The man whose only hope is centered upon his nickel and can give that to humanity has the st him that counts for success, no matter what he have been before. Charles Grant Mill

A SERMON BY REV. B. Y. STAMBAUGH*

T T—Matt. 26 : 58. "But Peter followed him r f."

WAS not merely the cold that made their teeth hatter, as they made their way in the dead of ight, out through the gate of the city to the Mount of Olives. They were, for the most part, d in thick cloaks and mantles, and so huddled er in the wake of their guide as to seem a r company than they really were. Men of ly gait and furtive gesture, dirty and ill-kempt, plain that they were cut-throats and thugs, for the occasion and armed with knives and s and great clubs. They were led by one in the of the high priest, who in turn was guided by ho wore the garments of a Galilean.

peat that it was not merely the cold that made teeth chatter and that caused them to huddle er so. The thing which did it was Fear—abject, stitious fear of Him they had come to seize. It heir dread of the miraculous power that had been ested from time to time by the Nazarene whom had been hired to abduct in this secret fashion. is not surprising, then, that after they had crept althily up the hill and had made their way so dy among the trees of the garden—depending utely upon the careful plan by which Judas was liver him into their hands—it is not surprising they were thrown into confusion and that they ack stumbling in disorder, as, without waiting for s' kiss, Jesus confronted them and said, "I am he ye seek." And their fears still more quieted when, after a violent outburst e part of one of his followers, he healed the wound had been inflicted upon the high priest's . So they bound his hands and forced him back to the city in their midst. They scat- out now, in a longer procession. The torch- flared among the trees, and the lanterns ed upon the vicious glee of their faces as they ened along. Then, we are told, "all the dis- s forsook him and fled."

o, not all. For, striding firmly along beside majestic Figure in the midst was that young- of the disciples, whose gentle face and quiet s had made him seem least able of all to meet master tribulation. That was John the Be- d. And then there was also Peter, who did forsake him—who would not take to his heels e darkness and escape. The Gospel writer, ever, says this of him: "But Peter followed off" (Matt. 26 : 58). And that has spoiled r's record.

WISH to lay emphasis first of all, however, upon this fact: Peter followed him. James, ip, Nathanael, and all the rest, had deserted; Peter followed him even on the way to Cal- . We sometimes fail to give him credit for , but he deserves it. He knew they were tak- Jesus to his doom, and that it was a dangerous g to be known in that mob as his follower. Lord had warned his disciples that their lives ld be forfeited if they persisted in following . He had even created that moment of con- on among the assailants in order that the ven might escape under cover of the diversion. re were plenty of good excuses for Peter to e among the trees. It was even more danger- for him than for any of the others, because ad made himself a marked man by flying into ge and attacking the slave of the high priest, as the mob came up. The rest might escape gnition, but not Peter. Surely we must honor poor Galilean fisherman who refused to save elf by flight—who followed, in the agony of pair, that One to whom he had once said, ord, to whom else can we go? Thou alone hast words of eternal life."

is always an honorable and creditable thing a man to let himself be known as a follower of ist. For following Christ is always a difficult . It does not take much physical courage in e ages, but in all ages it has taken moral rage. And surely you must realize that it takes some physical courage, even in these days, to set yourself deliberately to the following of One who offers absolutely no assurance of material prosperity; who, on the contrary, warns you of sacrifices you must make and advantages you must forego; who offers you certainly much less probability of the attainment of material prosperity than you could otherwise expect. It would be much easier always to dispose of your problems by simply forsaking Christian ideals and convictions, and taking the line of least resistance, like the disciples who forsook their Lord and fled. The easy way is to observe primarily the law of self-interest—to "look out for Number One." So I say there is credit due every man or woman who will honestly recognize the leadership of Jesus, and will set himself to the task of living a life of usefulness and service.

NOW, in this connection, let me say a word of optimism on the more creditable side of our present-day civilization. I have hurled my invectives against the general trend of modern life—its materialism, its sensuality, its luxury, its self-indulgence. And I am not proposing to take back a single word. I am still firmly convinced that, unless there can be a new revival of spiritual life—unless Christian growth can overtake this wonderful growth in material civilization, and do it soon—the human race will be heading toward perdition. Yet I feel that it is only right to recognize the fact that this civilization still calls itself Christian, that the record of history shows that there has been a very definite social progress in the right direction for the past two thousand years. Without doubt, the standard of personal morality, in spite of the retrogression of the past decade, is much higher than it was a hundred years ago. Moreover, this marvelous flowering of science and invention which is the pride of our time is but a by-product of many centuries of Christian culture. It is a by-product which might become a tremendous factor for good, instead of the menace it now is, if the Church were only in a position to direct it in the right way. Never, in fact, have the opportunities before the Church been so great as they are today.

And I am sorry to say that seldom has the Church been less able than today to take advantage of these opportunities and to use them for the salvation of mankind. For the Church and most Christian individuals are, again, like Peter; and the record of Peter on the night of the betrayal was vitiated by one fact: Peter followed him afar off. Although he couldn't quite desert his Master altogether, he failed to make the most of following him. He might have been walking stoutly beside Jesus, as John was doing. But instead, he was stumbling along in the dark, barely within sight of the procession. In spite of the courage and devotion that were in his heart, he was behaving like a coward. Instead of coming forward, without evasion, ready to be of help to his Friend in need, he was yielding to a "yellow streak" that did not belong to his nature at all.

What a lot of people there are who follow Christ, but follow afar off! You have heard this said of some one perhaps: "He has just enough religion to make him miserable." I know a great many splendid people —men and women of strong character, earnestly and sincerely trying to follow Jesus—good, substantial, friendly, kind-hearted people—who act as if they thought of themselves as utterly without these qualities—as though they even disapproved of such qualities—because they will not openly confess Christ and enter into Church fellowship.

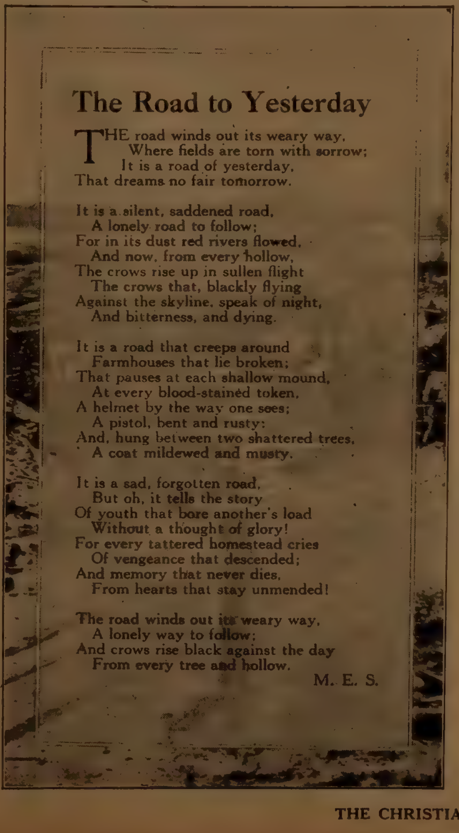
And churchmen likewise fail to make the most of their wonderful opportunity of close comradeship with Jesus. We stumble along behind in the darkness, barely able to keep somewhat aware of the general trend of moral and religious problems. We do not participate in the real joy of the Christian life, because we are not willing to allow our own lives to be closely identified with that of Christ. Perhaps we have vagrant, selfish whims and ambitions that keep us from a fuller comradeship with our Lord. Perhaps we are afraid that if we get too much enthused over our religious life, it will keep us from some of our pleasures—which is probably the truth. Or perhaps we are simply unwilling to exert ourselves for the sake of a deeper religious and moral life—for a closer walk with God. We are being untrue to our own possibilities, in having so little companionship with our Saviour.

Now I have a conviction that this is one of the elements contributing to the ineffectiveness of the Church in the present crisis. Instead of following Christ closely and making his wonderful ideals of social reconstruction our aim, we have been concerning ourselves over our denominational differences, matters of usage, polity, and the like. Instead of caring supremely about following Jesus closely in deeds of loving kindness and unselfish service, we have cared a great deal about preserving our own social respectability, putting harmless interpretations on our creeds, repairing our denominational fences, and saving our own miserable little selfish souls. And because the Church has got into this half-hearted way—frequently almost out of touch with her Lord—our whole so-called Christian civilization has got out of contact with him, and has become the hideous nightmare of madness that the war has revealed to us. The Christian nations have been following afar off!

IT WAS because he had been following afar off that Peter did not get inside the judgment hall with Jesus and John. And it was because he was standing outside that he was tempted and denied his Lord.

In the present crisis, you an I, as Christians, are called upon to meet many difficult situations. The Church is face to face with many grievous temptations. Shall we allow ourselves to be so greatly influenced by our business interests, our political affiliations, and our denominational allegiances, that we will be false to our Master? There is danger of it.

John went into the judgment hall and even followed to Golgotha. It was John, standing at the very foot of the cross, to whom Jesus committed his most intimate and precious trust, saying, "Son, behold thy mother." Our Lord has mighty tasks and glorious responsibilities to give his Church, if we will follow him closely—if we will remember that the chief concern is to merge our paths with the Way of Life, and to lose our own lives that they may be found in the Christ life.



The Road to Yesterday

THE road winds out its weary way,
Where fields are torn with sorrow;
It is a road of yesterday,
That dreams no fair tomorrow.

It is a silent, saddened road,
A lonely road to follow;
For in its dust red rivers flowed,
And now, from every hollow,
The crows rise up in sullen flight
The crows that, blackly flying
Against the skyline, speak of night,
And bitterness, and dying.

It is a road that creeps around
Farmhouses that lie broken;
That pauses at each shallow mound,
At every blood-stained token,
A helmet by the way one sees;
A pistol, bent and rusty:
And, hung between two shattered trees,
A coat mildewed and musty.

It is a sad, forgotten road,
But oh, it tells the story
Of youth that bore another's load
Without a thought of glory!
For every tattered homestead cries
Of vengeance that descended;
And memory that never dies,
From hearts that stay unmended!

The road winds out its weary way,
A lonely way to follow;
And crows rise black against the day
From every tree and hollow.

THE WELCOME TO PERSHING

LOOKING back over the history of the "triumphs" of ancient days, we easily reach the conclusion that these events are better managed now than they were in the times when the victor, in all the splendor of majesty, swept through the streets in his chariot, with a long train of captives led behind him in chains. Among the two millions who assembled to welcome General Pershing and his heroic First Division in the brilliant pageant on September 10, all, if asked, would have instantly pronounced the modern method incomparably the better. Never has the metropolis entered more wholeheartedly or jubilantly into the spirit of any great public occasion. As the long line of troops swept past, with their leader and his staff riding in front, it was a living panorama of modern heroism in full combat equipment that marched to the stirring music. All the paraphernalia of battle were there; yet, as the last and greatest of the parades, it was essentially a peace celebration. Our forces in the great struggle had been largely instrumental in bringing back peace to the world, and in the cheers of the multitudes and in the tears that glistened on many a cheek, there was more of gladness over the restoration of peace than of sheer exultation for victory's sake. It was a welcome to the peace-bringers, more than an acclamation of the heroes of the strife.

And those were wonderful days for the big metropolis. From the moment the cannon had roared its first salvos of greeting to Pershing, he was the center of attraction. Receptions, presentations, entertainments, banquets, with the customary addresses, followed each other in quick succession. The spirit of the people seemed to flow out spontaneously to the gallant soldier and his comrades, whose heroism in the great war has done so much toward enriching the fame of the nation. During the entire ordeal, General Pershing showed the modesty of manner and speech which have been characteristic of him all his life. There were times, however, when he seemed to be almost overcome with the evident joy of the people and the eagerness of their greetings. In these few moments his reserve seemed shaken and his voice trembled while he spoke; the strong soul which had faced the storm of the cannon unmoved was utterly unprepared for such ovations. But the emotion was only temporary. The great captain of America's host knows now how expressive can be the love of our people for one whom they cherish in their hearts as the highest living type of the American soldier.

SUMMER MEMORIES

WE HAVE been strongly impressed with the fact that during the summer just ended, more than ever before, the heart of the nation has reached out to our little folks at Mont-Lawn. We know this from the numerous letters that have come to us from everywhere, which express the liveliest and kindliest interest in the army of little tots who have spent a happy holiday at the "Children's Paradise." Happiness is contagious and so is the sympathy that such a work begets in the minds of thoughtful people. In many lands today God's people are helping to care for the children who have been bereaved by the war. The big heart of America throbs with the same generous impulse as the picture of Mont-Lawn rises before it.

A mother in a Western state writes us: "I have three bright children of my own, and my mother-heart goes out in loving sympathy to the children of Mont-Lawn, whose lives you are doing so much to brighten." Another letter tells of a mother who, when the family was expatriated from a European country and their belongings confiscated, came to America. Here they found freedom and liberty to live and to bring up their children as they would have them reared. Such a one, seeing or hearing of the ideal life of our little folks at Mont-Lawn, would irresistibly be won to the support of a work which was an actual realization of what they had often wished and prayed might come to their own children.

Another side of the picture is given in a letter from a New England friend, who writes: "I have seen with my own eyes the suffering of the little children on the East Side of New York, and I know the real need of the work you are carrying on." And a similar sentiment is expressed in a letter from Pennsylvania, the writer of which says: "My heart goes out to these dear children. What I send enclosed is to be used to send some dear boy to Mont-Lawn. I say send a boy, for some time in the future he may be a power. May the Lord bless to these little ones the fresh air and food they will enjoy while away from the hot city."

But here is another kind of letter, from a Sunday school class, who, with their teacher, formed the delightful project of sending some little child to Mont-Lawn for ten days. Could any more pleasant experiment in simple Christian service be tried than this? Another class, calling themselves "The Willing Workers," whose members for two or three years past have been sending children to Mont-Lawn, this year made up their united gifts "to send two poor little kiddies—a boy and a girl—to the Home." More joy has come from that gift than from a score of investments in mere pleasure-seeking.

Not only the young in classes, but staid and experienced members of the Ladies' Aid and similar organizations, have had a share in this delightful kind of service. One lady writes: "My dear mother loved little children. She pieced and made many little quilts for their beds. God bless Mont-Lawn and all of those who help to make it such a heavenly place." With which quotation, which sounds so like a benediction, we will put the pile of letters aside.

Well, the gates of Mont-Lawn have closed for the season; the playground is silent and deserted; the chapel has no longer the sweet, young voices to fill it with heavenly music; the little beds are tenantless, and "Fort Plenty," scene of the children's banq ings, is empty. All the little ones have gone ba their homes and to school. But during the con months they will not forget the long, delightful s mer days, the sports, the music and all the enjoyme
These experiences have become a part of their yo lives, and awakened in them the spirit of gratitud those dear friends who gave them such a deligh summer.

Does Prohibition Pay?

FALL RIVER, Mass., Sept. 6.—Increasing signs of prosperity of the textile industry of this city are evidenced by returns of the quarterly meeting of the Citizens' Savings Bank, the treasurer's report showing that the deposits during the past six months have increased $416,605.66, making the total increase for the year $810,833.38. Prohibition and high wages, coupled with regular employment, has had its effect in enabling many of the citizens to acquire the saving habit for the first time in their lives, according to the report.

THE above dispatch to the New York Tribune is a striking answer to the much-mooted question, "Does Prohibition pay?"

The italics are mine—to emphasize the significant fact that a leading savings bank places prohibition as a primary cause of increased saving in a great community of textile workers. Let me italicize again to bring out another noteworthy fact:

"Prohibition and high wages, coupled with regular employment, has had its effect in enabling many of the citizens to acquire the saving habit for the first time in their lives," says the treasurer's report.

Steady employment at high wages has meant little to many thousands of American families in years past, because John Barleycorn got the money instead of the home or the savings bank. But now the savings habit is one of the many good habits that have taken the place of the many bad habits that followed in the wake of the liquor habit.

Prohibition can, indeed, be discussed as correctly from an economic as from a moral point of view.

As a New York business house, the Blackman-Ross Company, recently pointed out in the course of a forecast of future business conditions in America, "the $2,500,000,000 a year previously spent for alcoholic beverages is equal to the retail price of all the goods all America buys from department stores in a year, and is equal to one and a half times the value of our entire wheat crop even at war prices.

"National prohibition means that a net sum equal to three and one-half times all the entire nation spends for all forms of education each year, equal to twice as much as the whole nation spends for meat each year, would be available for the purchase of additional beneficial commodities or for saving—net, because this sum has been in addition to the cost of the necessities of life."

An article in the September 20 Christian Herald quoted a leading New York banking house's report from 1,339 business men in every section of the United States as saying that there was a deficiency, rather than a surplus, of labor in each of their communities. As these reports were made just one month after prohibition went into effect, it is clearly shown that more essential and beneficial industries have absorbed at once the great labor forces formerly engaged in the liquor industry. Thus the vast two and a half billion dollars' saving from prohibition becomes practically an immediate net saving.

These billions of our national wealth, formerly worse than misspent and wasted, are already going far to make hundreds of thousands of American homes better places to live in, to make millions of people better fed, better clothed, and better able to live normal, healthy lives. And "many are able to acquire the saving habit for the first time in their lives."

Prohibition certainly does pay.

BOSTON'S POLICE STRIKE

BOSTON has had an experience in its police st which carries a lesson to the whole coun
For several days, the usually law-abiding E ern city was a scene of rioting and looting of vio disturbances by uncontrolled mobs bent on misc which the remnant of the police who remained loy at their posts were totally incapable of handling.
they not been reinforced by State troops and men from the Navy Yard Guard, besides bodie citizens who volunteered for the emergency, the si tion might have gone wholly beyond control. A was, it was such an experience as New England long remember. Fortunately the disturbances short-lived, but they were sufficiently serious to m a score of other municipalities throughout the cou put on their thinking-caps, and ask themselves w would probably happen in their respective juris tions, if the constituted guardians of law and o should take it into their heads to follow the exa of the Boston police and go out on strike.

Policemen, more than almost any other clas workers, owe a duty to the public which should m it imperative that all questions arising between t official superiors and themselves, relative to wa etc., should be adjusted by arbitration. It may urged that the same method might reasonably a to employees in the postal service, and also to t in railway and general transportation lines. We h seen how millions of citizens suffered recently in N York through local railway strikes, and how inter exceeding those immediately related to the st many thousandfold were injuriously affected. Po strikes go even further, as they leave whole comm ties defenseless against the operations of the crimi class, which is always ready to seize such an oppo nity. What happened in Boston might happen day in any American city, where rowdies, thieves looters would make a harvest of the opportunity defenseless city. Criminals came even from ot states to prey upon the Bostonians, and the prese of the troops alone averted what might have bec a calamity.

Our police, have great responsibilities, to cast as which, would expose many thousand times their o number to lawless depredation.

OUR HAPPIEST INDUSTRY

FARMING has generally been considered an dustry characterized by hard work with bu meager reward. This idea is a result of conditions surrounding farm work, over which farmer himself has had but little control. Po farming is the greatest force at hand today to br about better conditions. Tilling, seeding and harv ing, always at the mercy of the weather, must be d within certain time limits, if satisfactory crops are be produced. Labor, even of the most incompe sort, is constantly growing scarcer and more diffic to obtain when really needed. Such conditions h resulted in the farmer becoming merely a wor rather than a manager. He has had no time to p the development of greater acreage with the con quent increased crops, nor has he been able to att to the important details of farm management, neglect of which leads inevitably to an enorm shrinkage in profits.

The means which will allow the farmer to mas these conditions, spend his hours in planning ra than in laboring and doing chores, devote some h time to making his home all he would like it, are hand. The adoption of power machinery will largely supplant hand and horse labor, and will only permit increased acreage, but will increase yield from every acre tilled. With the greater prod tion and greater profit will come also a shifting of heart and health-breaking drudgery from men machines. Greater prosperity includes all of things that mean greater happiness, greater ease greater comfort. It will bring contentment to home and make it the happiest place in the world the boys and girls; and besides adding strength a character to farm life it will give power and prospe to the nation.

Meddlesome Helpfulness

SUNDAY. Phil. 1 : 7. "I have you in my heart." George Macdonald somewhere makes a striking contrast between meddlesomeness and helpfulness. He is describing some no[illegible]man who was ever ready to help his fellowmen; and he adds this arresting word to his description: "And so he refrained from meddling." I suppose that the difference is just this: meddlesomeness is well-meant aggressiveness; helpfulness is thoughtful hospitality. When I am meddlesome I force my brother's door to obtain an entrance; when I am helpful, I open my own door and offer bountiful entertainment to my brother. One is clumsy kindness; the other is wise and delicate kindness. One is fussy and undiscerning; the other is considerate and serene.

I would describe vital helpfulness as the hospitality of the large heart. The helpful folk are those who are constantly enlarging the roominess of their hearts, and welcoming and entertaining a larger company of guests. However many guests there may be, there is no suggestion of being crowded, and there is always room for more. These are noble entertainers. Their sympathies are always larger than the necessities which call at their doors; and the meats and delicacies upon their tables are prepared with such luring and gentle courtesy that the guest is almost made to feel that he is the host and the giver, rather than the receiver. I recall such a man who helped me in my college days. His helpfulness came again and again into my life, and it came as gently and unobtrusively as the angel-ministry in the days of the apostles. There was no fuss, no noise, no rattling of a purse. I just found a table spread in the wilderness, and the one who had done it came as it were on tiptoe, and I scarcely heard a sound. And when years afterward I spake to him about it, the good soul had forgotten it altogether, for his life was spent in such ministries. This quiet hospitality of the open heart was one of the stalwart virtues of the apostle Paul. "I have you in my heart." And this must be one of the defining distinctions of every disciple of Christ. Money may play little or no part in the ministry. It is often most needed where there is an abundance of money. In many a rich man's life, and still more in many a rich woman's life, there is an aching need for the healing hospitality of a great and understanding heart. And the helpful heart, just because it is wise and roomy, is great in its discernments, and men and women are helped by just being understood. God gave unto Solomon "largeness of heart." It was his choicest gift. J. H. J.

Other-Worldliness

MONDAY. I Cor. 7 : 31. "The fashion of this world." Jesus said of his disciples: "They are not of this world, even as I am not of the world." The corollary of this is Other-worldliness, as Paul puts it: "Be not conformed to this world: but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good and acceptable and perfect will of God."

The point of departure here is, "They are all doing it." Shall we fall in with the fashion or not? The world wheels up to your door in its automobile and invites you to take a Sabbath spin. Others are doing it. Why not? But pause a moment and ask, Will the Bridegroom go with his bride that way? Conformity to the world is non-conformity to Christ. There is only one thing, under such circumstances, for a Christian to do; namely, to brace himself back on his principles and let the crowd sweep by.

What is the result of falling in with fashion as against the precept and example of Christ? You will remember, in the story of Sinbad the Sailor, how a magnetic rock standing out of the sea, drew the ships' bolts and clamps one by one, until nothing remained but a dismal wreck. So do Christian principles yield to the fashion of the world about us.

And the remedy? There is none, but to get back to Christ. By our loyalty to him let us be mindful of the sharp and fast line which he drew between the self-indulgence of the passing hour and the life which is lived in view of the Eternity further on. D. J. B.

The Message to the Church

TUESDAY. Rev. 1 : 3. "Blessed is he that readeth and they that hear." The unity of the early Church was the more wonderful because the believers were of our common clay—men of like passions with others. Peter had denied his Master thrice. Thomas had doubted. Nicodemus had come to the Lord by night. Seven devils had dwelt in Mary Magdalene. Only yesterday, it seemed, the disciples had intrigued for preeminence, had rebuffed the children, had shrunk from the cross, had demanded the visible Kingdom. Among them were Ananias and Sapphira, who kept back part of the price; Simon Magus, who offered money for the grace of God; Entychus, who slept during a sermon; Rhoda, the excitable housemaid; Saul with his bigotry; Peter with his prejudices; the Corinthian women with their gossip. There were Galatians, bewitched by rabbis; Thessalonians, who put a date to the Second Coming; and Ephesians, who had lost their first love. Judaizers from Jerusalem wanted to lay burdens on the Gentiles, which was too strict; while at Pergamos the Christians ate things sacrificed to idols, which was too lax. At Thyatira, the unwary were seduced by a prophetess, Jezebel. And the Laodiceans were neither hot nor cold.

Each church did its own works, faced its own problems. But the Voice that spoke was one, the Eye that saw was one. To Ephesus God was the Presence among the candlesticks. To Smyrna, he was the Resurrection in death. To Pergamos, he was the sharp two-edged Sword. To Thyatira, he was our nature in glory. To Sardis, he was Light in the darkness. To Philadelphia, he was the Key of destiny. To Laodicea, he was the Amen, who keeps his promises. What wonder if the Christians maintained their unity? They had all things in common, because on every soul came a fear which all could share. P. W. W.

Union with Christ

WEDNESDAY. Phil. 1 : 21. "For me to live is Christ." It is said that Dwight L. Moody once refused to accept a gift of thirty thousand dollars so that he might retire from evangelistic work when he had passed his sixtieth birthday. To live preaching the Gospel was Christ to him; he loved such a life far more than rest from activity. Does not the world need many earnest, consecrated workers who live like him in helping to save lost men?

Paul, though in prisons oft and in persecutions everywhere, found that for him to live was not only the love, joy and peace of Christ shed abroad in his heart, but it brought to him the realization of Christ himself, his personality, his companionship. Is it any wonder that Paul had suffered the loss of all earthly things, that he might win Christ, who brings with him eternal riches for his children to enjoy?

What a glorious exchange Paul made! In Christ he is "poor, making many rich; having nothing, yet possessing all things; unknown, yet well known." No grander definition of true religion was ever written than this: "For me to live is Christ." It means, the Author of my life becomes the Saviour of my soul; the Sustainer of my being the Partner of my life. We are made heirs with him to the eternal inheritance. With him, all things; without him, nothing! The infinite Friend who laid down his life to redeem us, takes up his abode in the hearts of his followers forever and ever. E. W. C.

That Gold Dollar

THURSDAY. Zech. 13 : 9. "I will try them as gold is tried." "Everything is going up in price," say all the people, without thinking that the dollar has depreciated. The gold dollar is so unstable that it is as much the cause of high prices as anything connected with production or commerce. The chief trouble in these hard times is that the gold dollar will not purchase one-half of the food or clothing it did two years ago. The workmen who earned one dollar then must earn two dollars now in order to purchase the same necessities.

Yet only a very few people think of that. Christianity is so like a gold dollar in its valuation by the people. It is gold, and gold is gold everywhere; but men and women depreciate its exchange value. As a man with thousands of gold dollars is more eagerly sought after under some circumstances than at other periods, so a man with a Christian character is more highly esteemed in one place, or at one time than at another. Whence come wars and divisions among you? They come when the Christian teachings are undervalued; when the gold of the Gospel has depreciated.

The only thing that will bring peace and prosperity to this stricken world is to restore Christ to his proper value. When the Christ Spirit is more appreciated, and men everywhere do conscientiously reverence that dear Name, and do all love God, they will all naturally keep his commandments, and all laws will be only fraternal regulations for the convenience of the human family.

Let us strive to raise the valuation of Christ among men. The people have lost faith in the dollar and its influence has lessened accordingly. The world has lost much of its faith in our Lord, and every kind of hard times is the infallible result. Let all who love the Lord and desire the good of mankind urge upon men the necessity of placing higher value on Christ Jesus. R. H. C.

Pentecostal Preaching

FRIDAY. Acts 2 : 6. "The multitude came together." How does Christ save a trembling civilization? What is it that makes civilization tremble? An insecure—a narrow foundation. The miracle of tongues gives us the clue to that wonderful development of telegraph and mails and printing which draws together the whole human race. Today, there is hardly a language known to man which is not the vehicle for a written Bible and a proclaimed Gospel.

The disciples themselves had noticed with what unerring insight Our Lord knew the thoughts of the people whom He met. At Pentecost, there was the same diagnosis of character. What aroused attention was not fine preaching to great crowds, but casual conversation among individuals. Peter's sermon which followed was only an explanation of the phenomenon. These foreigners had found what they least expected and that was a friend in need.

The Friend did not speak Hebrew to Persians or Greek to mixers; nor did he intone or use special phrases. The disciples conversed in natural terms,—the words that a mother uses when she handles her new-born child. The idioms of Pentecost were the idioms of the day. It was Christian talk, in terms of club and dinner table,—a pulpit theme with, the diction of the press and platform.

At Pentecost, the converts rubbed their eyes and said to each other, "Here we are after the nightmare, back in our Father's home, where we have all things common." It is significant that they began at once to drop their labels. They came to Jerusalem, as foreigners come to America, filled with local patriotism, but in Christ they were no longer Parthians and Medes and Jews and proselytes. P. W. W.

The Priceless Pearl

SATURDAY. Heb. 2 : 3. "How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?" When the Koh-i-noor diamond, meaning "Mountain of Light," was found by a native of India, it was given to Lord Lawrence. He thrust the gem into his waistcoat pocket and amid his many cares forgot all about it. News of the finding of the great diamond having reached the queen of England, she ordered it sent to her at once. Lawrence, chiding himself for his carelessness, sent for the native servant, asking him if he had seen the stone. "Oh, yes," he replied, "I put it in one of your boxes." When the servant unwrapped it from the paper, he remarked, "There is nothing here, Sahib, but a bit of glass."

Our own personal salvation is "a pearl of great price." When the precious gem is obtained, do we not often put it away in a napkin, forgetting all about its wonderful value? God wants the gem to shine, a brilliant in the world's darkness. It is not necessary to break the pearl of great price to destroy its value; we need only neglect it. How shall we escape, when we are asked by the King for the gem which was to shine in his crown of glory?

Suppose you saw a passenger tossing playfully a diamond over the side of a ship, and catching it again? Would you not warn him? What if he replied, "There is no danger"? You still would gaze upon the perilous act till the cry came, "Lost! Lost in the depths of the ocean!" Is not every careless neglecter of his soul's salvation liable to lose more than the whole world is worth? He is a passenger over the ocean of life, toward the haven of eternity; behold him sporting with his soul—created and formed in the image of God. If lost, how can he buy it back or pay for its rescue? E. W. C.

PUTTING THE BIBLE ON THE SCREEN

How Picture Sermons Supplement Word Sermons in Spreading the Present-Day Message of Chri

By K. K. SURBECK

TEACHING the Bible from the "movie" screen has been found an effective and popular method of "getting over" the message of Christ to the people. This has been especially true where the appeal is directed toward the youth of the community, which has preferred the motion picture theater on Sunday nights to the church.

There are picture sermons, just as there are word sermons, and in a surprisingly large number of cases the ear is closed to the message the eye will gladly receive. Wide-awake pastors who have called on the screen to supplement their pulpit work have become ardent advocates of the "movies," and Mr. Surbeck, in the accompanying article, emphasizes the need of a wider use of the screen, not only for religious instruction and inspiration, but in the great nation-wide movement for Americanization.

THE Methodists in staging their religious pageant in connection with their great Centenary Movement announced that "the Church is beginning to learn that there is a tremendous potential force in dramatic presentation of religious themes, and it purposes that men shall see it as well as hear it."

True, the eye gets infinitely more than the ear, but few are privileged to travel far to see pageants. If great creations for the spreading of faith were put upon the screen, however, the whole world might see.

If it is possible for money to talk in religious matters as it does in material affairs, we are verging on unprecedented forwardness of big movements in the Church. All the big denominations and many small ones are raising millions and millions of dollars to help humanity lift its head Godward. If the Church has discovered any greater medium than the "movie" screen for the hoped-for spreading of the Christ message, the Church has yet to make known that medium.

If the Church were at least insistent upon getting those things upon the screen that would turn men's minds to thoughts of God, that would literally drive people into church, into the house of prayer, would it not be worth while? The Bible, enlivened by dramatic color, is plentifully rich in human and divine interest to furnish as endless a chain of "movie" themes as it ever has sermons. Why not teach the Bible from the screen?

The subject of prayer, for instance, would make a mighty theme. Beginning with the giant Bible wrestlers in prayer, such as Jacob, Daniel, Elijah and the Christ himself, pass down through history to men of our own time, touching upon the circumstances in life in each example which has driven and still does drive brave men to their knees. Lincoln said the affairs of state made him drop to his knees. Gladstone used to spend one hour each day when at Hawarden at meditation in the little church. In all, it would be very wholesome to show how the greatest of the great are not averse to falling upon their knees. Nothing coming from the great commander Foch has inspired so much confidence in America as the fact that the Marshal has often been observed in the act of devotion.

OR, AGAIN, such themes as an able producer might find in the seventh chapter of Acts. In this chapter Stephen's address before his accusers is a wonderfully suggestive review of the whole Jewish history, culminating as the chapter does in the stoning to death of Stephen, whose glorified state while suffering martyrdom shows the spirit and power of the Christ doctrine and demonstrates what faith will do and how it touches the other fellow when he truly sees it working in his fellow man. If this were to be put on the screen so it would have the same effect, or even a small measure of the same effect, on beholders today as it had on Paul as he stood watching Stephen's countenance while suffering martyrdom, what greater thing could the Church ask for?

One thing, there is no more wickedness in the mechanical make-up of the "movie" apparatus than there is in the make-up of a church pipe organ. What is needed, however, is insistence on something better on the screen, and something still better all the while, rather than negative prating or nagging at what is objectionable.

Who can deny, before an earnest, prolonged experiment has been made, that the "movies" might not solve many a seemingly insoluble problem for us now? If it is possible to produce boy criminals by feeding youth on bad pictures, why would it not be possible to grow God-fearing, upright, 100 per cent. American citizens by feeding boys, fathers of men, good pictures in every city and town, in every theater throughout the land?

IF CHURCH people in their great forward movements would encourage the recognized "movie" companies in getting what must be had to throw a new and different light on our inner selves, to help us achieve 100 per cent. Americanism, would not the effort and money be well expended?

Don't let us wait for some big organization or some head-and-shoulder-above individual to take the lead, but let everybody who can talk and write begin to talk and write today—at once. Club women, church women, wives, sisters and sweethearts, young men and old men, should go to the local managers of "movie" theaters and tell these managers what Americans want to see on the screen. And all should write repeatedly to the producing companies and tell them over and over again what pictures are wanted.

In our conversations with and our written communications to the people of Movieland, let us acknowledge the motion picture as being a great advent, because it brings the whole world and every phase of human existence before our eyes, whether we have the price of travel or no. We want, also, to express appreciation for all the creditable entertainment we have been given and then, without wasting words, hasten to enumerate the better things we want.

Since the screen seems to have captured the whole public, surely it is right to ask the "movies" to send their patrons out with a little firmer, more wholesome grip on life—with an inspirational reheartening at every visit for the big game of life.

THEN there are some few people who want a proletariat level. Instead of leveling down, let us level everybody up, up! We want mountain-plateau leveling—our highest, for the masses as well as for the classes. By thrusting into the soul the big feel of responsibility, when emergency arises every man will become a hero. Moreover, we want eve citizen of America to feel that the emergency is now and it is up to every person to aid in freeing our cou try from the stigma of unpatriotism, selfishne advantage-taking and profiteering. In order to ke the word Americanism where it belongs, we have to lift our whole people and all our institutions up true places of altruistic idealism.

I wonder what would be the result if our Americ people were to authorize our government to expe money as freely to get real Americani to moving on the screen as we ha spent for munitions and war pro ganda? To get money to put the rig leaven into the "movies," with t speed that our hour of need requir imagine an Americanizing Movie Fu

The Church, Mr. or Mrs. or M Philanthropy, would do well to of scenario writers handsome sums to wr big, clean, American programs for t screen. Why could not big prizes offered for the best-worked-out scenari from such themes as Ruskin's "Sev Lamps of Architecture," teaching t dignity of labor and those mighty v tues of character whose sum is—we what we like to term a whole-soul American.

Writers have to live. They wri what they are made by the people believe the people want. And if we, t people, make the appeal we will find that writer whether for the screen or the magazines, or both, ha real, genuine souls, and that they are capable of pr ducing, and will gladly produce, that which will aid creating better conditions on earth, if they are b given the encouragement to do so!

LIFE is certainly full of paradoxical ways of e pressing itself. When the real author's real so quality really gets to the surface, it instantly fin response in the hearts of the people. The essence all art is just soul. Let me illustrate by quoting som thing of Mrs. Mary Maurice, a "movie" actor, bett known as "Mother Maurice":

"The story (The Prodigal Son) was too old to ma much of an impression on the crowd. But there w something in the photo-play that got into the hea of at least one hardened sinner and started lo thoughts in a man's mind. That something was old woman with the heartbreaks of a lifetime writt on her gentle, patient face. Her stooped shoulde her gnarled and withered hands, the sunken, tir eyes, marked the woman who had lived and loved an suffered. When she knelt to pray for the boy who ha gone into the world and had drift away from her, something more tha play-acting was in her eyes.

"The man who had started out do the town watched the old fa intently. On the trembling lips read the prayer, 'Lord, my faith sh not be in vain.' He had started o to make a night of it, had this man to get his money's worth of fun a excitement and sport after the fashio of his kind. But the picture of the o woman had gotten into his soul, an like a ministering spirit was leadi him back across the years. Of a su den the lure of the town was gon That something which the world cal conscience cut him off from his kin

"He went back to his shack an wrote a letter to the old woman—"

At best, there is very much of hear ache, backache, toil and sorrow in th world. So when we go into the th ter for an hour to rest, to be cheere to rob our minds for a brief time of t cares that fill our days, should we n have the privilege of seeing life playe up as it should be and could be—as th all-wise Maker of life intended it to be Ought we not to get some inspiratio to make us better, braver, truer, happier men, women and children? Seeing whatsoever is good to look upo would help us to realize our ideal for, aside from the betterment at hom by putting our very best Americanis on the screen we would gradually li the whole world's confidence in ou idealism. It would help our impac upon all other peoples. It would b as casting bread upon the earth troubled waters.

Verily, whatsoever we sow as nation, that shall we also reap. And moreover, righteousness will exalt u ever, while suffering the degeneracy o ideals will heap reproaches on us.

Mule carts in Barbadoes

THERE has been much discussion in British newspapers of a proposal to turn over to the United States the British West Indies in part payment of Britain's war debt to this country. The islands include the Bahamas, Barbadoes, Jamaica, Bermudas, Trinidad and Windward Islands.

Jamaica, the most important island of the group, has a population of 750,000, of whom two-thirds are colored. Its area is 4,200 square miles. Kingston, the capital, has one of the finest harbors in the West Indies, and is well fortified. The island's chief exports are tropical fruits, coffee, sugar, arrowroot and mahogany.

The Bahamas, next in importance, are a chain of 700 rocky islands lying east of the Florida coast. It was on one of this group that Columbus landed in 1492. The Bahamas have a population of about 50,000. Nassau, on the island of New Providence, is the capital.

clock on the mantel struck four. School out and Helen would soon be home. Mrs. ynard looked up the street anxiously as she near the open window to wait—for all day daughter had been more than ever the cen- er thoughts.

ince Helen was a mere baby, Mrs. Maynard ed forward with dread to that day when her r might come to value the companionship ice of others more than her own. And lately ever since Helen and Dorothy Chesterton ome such good friends—she feared that time e.

And day by day the hurt had eper and deeper into her mother's heart.

clock struck five, interrupting Mrs. Maynard 'every. Startled, she looked out of the window d gave a sigh of relief as she saw Helen and y swing into view. She proudly watched the ls coming down the street. Helen was fair, r rosy cheeks and well-formed little body vidence of the good health she enjoyed. y was dark and, while the same age as Helen, ther as tall nor as active. When they reached rch, the girls were so engrossed in their con- on that Mrs. Maynard remained unseen at en window.

u'll surely go?" asked Dorothy.

ell, I haven't asked yet. But it will be all f your mother is going. She is, isn't she?" questioned anxiously.

! Yes! Mother will go! Maybe your mother too, if you asked her," suggested Dorothy.

," replied Helen, "I'm sure she wouldn't. other isn't like yours—she almost never goes nywhere—and besides she is so busy on lay."

smile faded from Mrs. Maynard's lips. And moment later, up in her own room, tears gave sion to the grief and fear that had been ering in her heart so long. Never for a day e forgotten the one big desire that she might h mother and chum to her daughter. But she iled, she told herself. She had been so busy re had been so many things to prevent her being the mother she wanted to be to Helen. ow the very thing she had worried about all years had happened! Helen was growing up looking to some one else for the influence and ship that meant so much to her. Mrs. Ches- was thoroughly charming and had uncon- ly become the object of Helen's girlish ad- ion—almost worship! The remarks over- at the window merely confirmed what her ure intuition had told her long ago. But what she do to regain the place she once held in aughter's life?

denly she realized that the dinner hour was As she hastily dried her tears, she caught a se of herself in the long mirror opposite the Something in the reflection held her gaze and aw things which before had gone unnoticed— was beginning to look old! As she stood there adly admitted to herself—with tears of despair ing anew—that Helen's new ideal was younger more attractive.

ring dinner Helen talked continually of the g planned for the coming Saturday and as rose from the table, she turned to her mother asked:

Mother, are you older than Mrs. Chesterton?"

Why, dear, I don't know how old she is—do " replied her mother, flushing.

Dorothy says she is thirty-eight, but I don't k she looks that old, do you?"

rs. Maynard heard no more. Thirty-eight! words kept ringing in her ears! Could it really hat she was three years younger than Mrs. sterton? She remembered the mental contrast had made that afternoon in her own room. It ed almost impossible!

fter dinner when the table had been cleared and work was finished, Helen ran up to the Chester- for a little while and Mr. Maynard went down- to keep a business appointment. In a way Maynard was glad to be alone. For the second that day she went up and stood before her mirror. Once again her thoughts traveled back to those first few years after she was married. She remembered the days when she had planned the life of the little girl then toddling at her knee—those happy times when Bob had proudly told her she was the most beautiful little mother in the world. What gloriously happy days they had been!

The full realization of her present problem swept over her. She went very deliberately into Helen's room, opened the dresser drawer and drew out a little photograph of Mrs. Chesterton She studied it carefully, perplexedly for a few moments. Then suddenly a great understanding seemed to come over her. She hurriedly put out the light and went back to her room. And—strangely enough—she smiled at her reflection in the long mirror!

THEN one day a few months later, Mrs. Maynard received an invitation from Mrs. Chesterton to attend a party to be given at the Chesterton home in Dorothy's honor. Mrs. Chesterton wrote that all the girls and their mothers would be there and urged Mrs. Maynard to come.

When Helen came home from school, she enthusiastically told her mother the details of the affair as she had heard them from Dorothy. At the time her mother said nothing, but at dinner that night both Helen and her father were treated to a surprise that was almost a shock, for Mrs. Maynard, quietly announced that she would certainly attend the party. Mr. Maynard could not help but wonder at the new light in his wife's eyes as she talked of going—and Helen, recalling all the exclusive people who would be present, scarcely knew whether to be glad or sorry!

Then finally the night arrived. Helen dressed and left early at Mrs. Chesterton's special request, to take dinner with Dorothy and help receive the guests. She was having such a good time that she forgot to watch for her mother. But suddenly she was conscious that the girls about her had stopped right in the midst of an animated conversation and that they had all turned their eyes toward the door. She heard Esther Warren whisper, "Sh! It's Helen's mother—isn't she beautiful?"

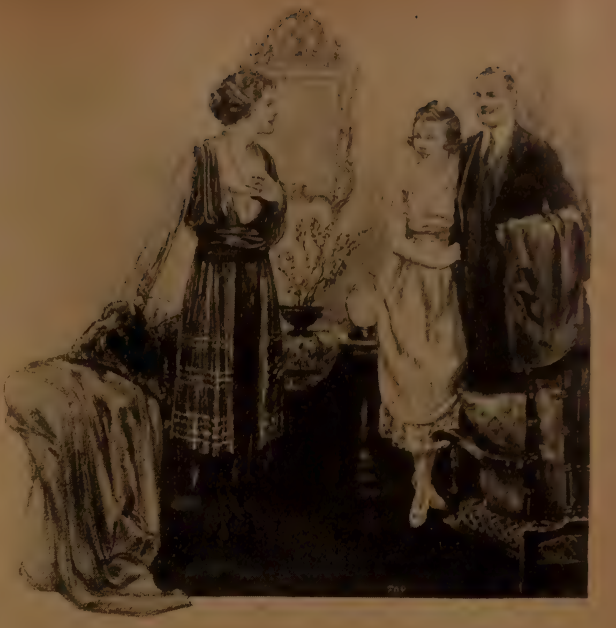
Helen looked, too, and saw a wonderfully attractive, handsomely gowned woman entering the room. Of course Helen knew on the instant that it was her mother! But for one long moment she stood bewildered! What fairy godmother had wrought such a change? Dressed in a charmingly becoming and distinctive evening dress, her mother looked years younger and, yes—even more fascinating than Mrs. Chesterton,

Helen could hardly refrain from rushing over to her mother at the moment. But all through the evening she adored her from a distance. And when finally she had an opportunity, she said in a tone no mother could ever doubt or forget, "Oh! Mother! You are beautiful to-night!"

Every one agreed that the evening was a big success. But to one woman there, happy in the knowledge that she had again come into her own, it was more than merely a successful party. Mrs. Maynard, happier than she had been in years, felt like a girl again and was the center of an admiring group all through the evening.

As for Helen—her eyes were continually on her mother and her face shone with pride as, one after another, the girls told her what a wonderful mother she had.



At home that night, Mrs. Maynard had further proof—if any were needed—of her triumph.

AT home that night, Mrs. Maynard had further proof—if any were needed—of her triumph. Helen couldn't find words to express her love and admiration. And the proud and happy smile on Mr. Maynard's face told better than all the tender things he said, how marvelous had been the transformation.

"Mother," Helen pleaded finally, "why have you never worn that beautiful dress before—I didn't dream you had any clothes like that?"

"Neither did I," chimed in father. "Confess, dear—how did you do it?"

"Well," laughed Mrs. Maynard, "it's getting late and I think Helen ought to go to bed at once and get her beauty sleep. I'll tell her the secret to-morrow. But if you want to hear it to-night," she smiled shyly at her husband, "you shall."

"Bob, do you remember," she said a little later, when they had drawn their chairs close together before the fire in the library, "how when Helen was still a baby, I used to tell you that I always wanted to stay young enough to enjoy her pleasures and be a real chum and confident to her. You smiled at my fears. But always since then, I have carried the shadow of that fear in my heart—that some day Helen would look to others for the things I wanted to give her myself.

"Well, a few months ago I realized that Helen was growing up and away from me. I realized that I had failed in the very thing I wanted most to do. I don't suppose you even noticed it, but when Helen met Dorothy she started to talk continually of Mrs. Chesterton. She copied her mannerisms, her ways of talking—Dorothy's mother became an ideal for her. I knew Mrs. Chesterton was a fine, good woman, and Dorothy was a nice companion for our daughter. But finally I saw that Helen's interests were becoming centered more and more outside her own home and that Mrs. Chesterton was unconsciously taking my place in her life.

"Then one day I overheard Helen talking to Dorothy about a party they were planning. Dorothy suggested that Helen ask me to go, but Helen said I wouldn't care about it—that I seldom went anywhere—that I was not at all like Mrs. Chesterton. You will never know how that remark hurt and yet it was perfectly natural for Helen to think as she did.

"At the table that night Helen said Mrs. Chesterton was thirty-eight years old. Can you imagine my surprise? Up in my room that afternoon, I had decided I was getting old. But now I realized that it was something besides age. I went up to my room the most unhappy woman in the world. At thirty-five I was a failure as a mother—and perhaps as a wife.

"Again I compared myself with Mrs. Chesterton. I was sure it wasn't age, because now I knew I was younger than she. Then what was it that made the difference? The answer came to me like a flash while I was looking at Mrs. Chesterton's picture—I had neglected my appearance.

"It was chiefly a question of becoming clothes. But how could I get them? With Mrs. Chesterton, of course, it was different. She had plenty of money. But we were having a hard enough time to get just the really necessary things. Then I remembered having seen in one of my magazines the story of a woman just like myself, who found a way to win back the happiness she thought she had lost by learning right at home in spare time how to make all kinds of pretty clothes.

"So I went to my room, hunted up the story and read every word again. Right away I saw the wonderful possibilities of this new practical plan, and it seemed so much the very opportunity I needed that I sent for further information about it.

"WELL, in just a few days a beautifully-illustrated book arrived telling all about the Woman's Institute and the new method it has developed by which any woman or girl anywhere can easily and quickly learn at home in spare time all the secrets of the the dressmaker's art. When I read how 30,000 women of all ages and in all circumstances, had solved their clothes problems in this fascinating way I made up my mind that I, too, would do it! So I joined at once and took up dressmaking.

"As soon as I saw my first lesson I knew that I, too, had found the way to Happiness! Any woman or girl can learn by this easy, fascinating method. The language is so simple a child can understand every word of it, and the pictures make every step marvelously clear.

"Right away I began to feel like a different woman. I was so interested I devoted every possible moment when you and Helen were away to my lessons. And, of course, I made rapid progress—I couldn't help it. The textbooks seem to foresee and answer every possible question and the teachers take such a personal interest in your work.

"Almost right away I began making actual garments. Why, I made a beautiful waist after my third lesson!

"What was most important to me, I learned not only how to make every kind of garment, but I learned what colors and fabrics were most appropriate for me, how to develop those little touches that make clothes distinctively becoming to the wearer. My course opened up a whole new world to me. When, after just a few lessons, I finished my first dress, I could scarcely keep my secret any longer. But I determined to put the course to the severest kind of test before I told any one.

"I soon learned to copy models I saw in the shop windows, on the street, or in fashion magazines. Every step was so clearly explained that the things I had always thought only a professional dressmaker could do were perfectly easy for me!

"Besides having more and prettier clothes than I ever had before in my life, I have made a lot of pretty new things for Helen, although, of course, she doesn't know it yet!

"SO that's the secret, dear," concluded Mrs. Maynard as her husband clasped her to him proudly. "I'm happier than I ever was before in my life. And I owe it all to the Woman's Institute! I'm sure nothing else could have done what that wonderful school has done for me!"

More than 30,000 women and girls in city, town and country have proved that you can easily and quickly learn at home, as Mrs. Maynard did, through the Woman's Institute, to make all your own and your children's clothes and hats or prepare for success as a dressmaker or a milliner.

It costs you nothing to find out just what the Institute can do for you. Simply send a letter, a postcard or the convenient coupon below and you will receive—without obligation—by return mail the full story of this great school that has brought the happiness of having dainty, becoming clothes, savings almost too good to be true, and the joy of being independent in a successful business to women and girls all over the world.

The Treaty in the Senate

THE Treaty of Peace, with its League of Nations Covenant, is before the Senate for final action, and for the first time in the history of the American Congress a document of such character is being debated publicly. "Pitiless publicity," promised for Paris, is a reality in Washington.

Under majority and minority covering reports, the Committee on Foreign Relations transmitted the treaty to the full Senate after two months of deliberation; the majority report containing recommendations for thirty-eight amendments, the minority report urging ratification without alteration. It is on the basis of these opposing reports that the discussion now is being conducted. The argumentative features of the two communications, one written by Senator Lodge as chairman of the committee and the other by Mr. Hitchcock, ranking Democratic member, follow closely the attitude taken by the principal opponents of the treaty on the one hand and by President Wilson on the other.

Three amendments proposed by Senator Lodge are of major importance. The remainder refer to American membership on various commissions set up in Europe and elsewhere which the majority of the committee decline to approve. The principal amendments provide for a vote by the United States in the League of Nations equal to that of any other power (directed particularly to the fact that the British Empire will have six votes with virtual control of two more); return of Shantung directly to China, and a clause excluding the aggregate vote of a member of the League in the settlement of a dispute in which one of its self-governing colonies appears in the rôle of a disputant.

The majority reservations provide for the right of unconditional withdrawal from the League; control by Congress of any American activities in behalf of members of the League whose territories or rights are threatened by a third power (Article X); the right to decide what are internal problems as affecting the United States; and a plain preservation of the Monroe Doctrine from review or interpretation by foreign powers.

These amendments and reservations, the majority insists, are necessary to safeguard "American independence and sovereignty." Their adoption, it is declared, will cause no delay in the consummation of peace, for the reason that the Peace Conference is still in session, and France, Italy and Japan, among the five great powers, have not yet ratified the treaty. Resubmission of the document to the conference could be accomplished immediately, says Mr. Lodge.

The report prepared by Mr. Hitchcock denounces the majority action as an effort to destroy the League, and asserts that the rejection or amendment of the treaty "means that the United States will sacrifice all of the concessions secured from Germany by a dictated peace." Twelve separate concessions, including reparations, are cited as being contained in the agreement.

President Samuel Gompers and other high officials of the American Federation of Labor, who are dealing with the grave and complex labor situation

The debate in the Senate, complicated by the presence of the President and opposition Senators on the stump, has lost some measure of its dignity, and in many cases has developed very sharp personal exchanges. If the accounts of correspondents traveling with Mr. Wilson are to be accepted, the President has failed in his addresses to greatly alter public opinion. Close attention has been accorded to his speeches, but they have not aroused the enthusiasm on which his supporters were counting. It is agreed by all the newspapers that there has been a marked contrast between the Wilson meetings and those addressed by the treaty opponents, notably Senator Johnson.

Leaders in the Senate now estimate that a final vote on ratification will be taken during the last week in October.

Boston Police Strike

THE question of whether policemen owe allegiance to the public or to the labor union is being fought out in Boston. Of the 1,600 men on the Boston force, 1,300 went on strike for recognition of their union in affiliation with the American Federation of Labor. The authorities, state and city, declare there can be no arbitration of such an issue, and that policemen are sworn public servants. Striking, they insist, is desertion. Five regiments of Massachusetts State Guard have been policing Boston, which, in the first few days of the strike, was the scene of fatal rioting and looting. Federal troops have been held in readiness to take charge of the situation. The police now express their willingness to return to duty, but the city is recruiting an entire new force.

The Steel Workers

TWENTY-FOUR presidents of unions engaged in the steel industry, supported by the American Federation of Labor and disregarding a plea by President Wilson to delay action until after the approaching conference of workers and employers in Washington, called the strike authorized in August, to be effective on September 22. Admittedly the action is directed against the United States Steel Corporation, which has consistently refused union recognition, and followed on the refusal of Elbert H. Gary, chairman of the board, to receive a delegation of union leaders. Mr. Wilson was asked to use his influence to secure an audience for labor with the head of the steel interests, but it is not clear that he took steps to this end.

It is the expectation of the presidents of the unions involved that the strike will be cumulative in its effects. So closely inter-related are many departments of the industry that the closing down of one which may be strongly unionized will compel the early closing of others which may be less thoroughly organized. Eventually the tie-up might extend even to building operations where structural steel is used. Since it is no secret that the steel interests are determined to fight out the question of unionization of their plants, there is the probability that all work will be suspended, and to counter the strike, the plants will be ordered shut down; an order which would amount to a lockout involving more than 1,000,000 workers. The Pittsburg, Chicago and Birmingham districts are most vitally affected.

Church Aid for Americanization

THE Protestant Episcopal Church is offering the strength of its organization to the Department of the Interior, which has charge of the campaign to Americanize the 13,000,000 persons in the United States who do not read or write English. The Episcopal Board of Missions has named the Rev. Thomas Burgess its "Americanization Secretary," and Mr. Burgess has asked every bishop of the church to make adequate appropriation for extensive work in cooperation with the government's activities. It is estimated now that the church will spend $1,000,000 in the next three years in this direction. An intensive effort is being made, at the same time, to persuade every Episcopalian to hold himself responsible for the Americanization of all the foreign-born in his neighborhood. Special clergy will be trained for service among the alien residents, and there will be a larger measure of supp given to the Greek and Russian Ort dox churches.

Peace with Austria

IN THE Stone Age Hall in the histo old Château of St. Germain, Dr. K Renner on September 10 signed aw the last claims of Austria to empire wh he placed his name on the Treaty Peace with the Allied and associat powers. Frank L. Polk, under-secreta of state and now head of the Americ peace mission, signed for the Unit States. China, by subscribing to t document, placed herself in the Leag of Nations without the necessity of considering her decision not to agree the German treaty. Rumania and Ju slavia were the only states to withh their signatures. The issue caused t collapse of both governments, but th are expected to fall into line af a short time in which the internal pol ical effect of the refusal can be gauged a refusal based on a clause protecti racial minorities. The fact that a de nite declination to enter into the pea would mean the loss to Rumania three provinces ceded to her by t Peace Conference, and also the loss her share of reparations, is regarded sufficient to bring her into line event ally. The net result of the treaty is t reduction of Austria to a third-rate sta with about 7,000,000 people, oversha owed in size and importance by bo Jugoslavia and Czechoslovakia; a sta with no outlet to the sea; a state pr scribed from allying itself with any of i neighbors.

Industrial Crisis in Britain

THE issue between labor and the go ernment of Great Britain has bee definitely drawn. By a 58 to 1 vote nearly 5,000,000 trades-union membe the Trades Union Congress has reject the government's scheme for the ma agement of coal mines and insists their nationalization under the prov sions of the plan outlined by Justi Sankey in his now famous "Sanke Report." The parliamentary commi tee of the Miners' Federation has take up the question anew with Mr. Lloy George, and in the event of non-agre ment a special session of the congre is to be summoned to decide "the for of action to be taken to compel the gov

Boyville, a new kind of suit for your boy, is designed to stand the strains. It is a suit made of a specially woven all wool fabric—a suit with new strength to withstand the wear and tear at more than twenty points of strain.

This new kind of suit is designed to save you the trouble of sewing up seams, save you from constantly sewing on buttons, sewing up sleeve linings, tacking on belt loops and endless patching and fixing.

A New Standard of Value

Boyville pockets are held permanently in place by canvas stays. Seams are double stitched and taped. Sleeve linings are backstitched to stand months of pulling and tugging. Even the buttons are reamed so that they will not cut the thread.

And you will have no more regrets that your boy is not better dressed. Even in style the Boyville is different. It is really two suits in one.

Never before has a boys' suit been made with such wear resisting materials and sold for so little. Boyville sets a new standard of values. The Boyville with its more than twenty special features of strength, its specially woven all wool cloth—costs only $12.85.

Boyville clothes will look better and last longer per dollar of expenditure than any other clothes for boys.

ernment to give way." The congress now is committed to a campaign for the nationalization of all British industries. The resolution rejecting the Lloyd George program for the mines was seconded by J. H. Thomas, M.P., head of the railway men's organization, which indicates the attitude that powerful organization will take on the issue. The only one of the great unions lukewarm in its support of nationalization is that of the seamen.

The result of the vote was a decided shock to political London, where predictions are freely made that the reassembling of Parliament in October will be followed very soon by another general election. Labor leaders are firmly of the opinion that the coalition government is doomed.

John Mitchell Is Dead

THE death of John Mitchell at the age of forty-nine has removed from the ranks of labor its most influential link with the great body of employers, and from public life one of the most remarkable Americans of the time. Almost literally born in the pit's mouth, he was a breaker boy at ten, miner at sixteen, labor organizer after he reached voting age, and president of the powerful United Mine Workers of America when he was twenty-nine. It was under his direction that the anthracite miners embarked on their famous strike in 1902 that brought him into conflict with George F. (Divine Right) Baer, won him the friendship and confidence of Theodore Roosevelt, and made of him a national figure. For nine years he fought the battles of the miners and of labor generally. William Jennings Bryan wanted him as a candidate for the vice-presidency on the Democratic ticket in 1908. Many times he had been discussed for the governorship of New York State, but Mr. Mitchell consistently declined to consider public office except that of membership on the State Workmen's commission, until the exigencies of the war made him Food Administrator for New York. Much of his time since retiring from the presidency of the Mine Workers has been devoted to the work of reconciling the views of capital and labor, in which his counsel always was for peaceful and honorable settlements of disputes. As one eulogist has said, he was a labor evolutionist, but not a revolutionist.

John Mitchell—the well-known labor leader and a man who once refused the nomination for vice-President of the United States, has passed away. He was operated on at a New York hospital for gall stones and apparently rallied, but pneumonia set in. Even transfusion of blood from his youngest son failed to save him

Santo Domingo's Appeal. A mission has arrived in Washington from Santo Domingo to ask the American government to end its three-year military occupation of the West Indian republic. The mission wants the affairs of the country returned to native hands. It has already presented its case to the Peace Conference.

The Largest U. S. Submarine. The first American "fleet" submarine has just had its final trials, when it attained a speed of 20.92 knots on the surface and 12.65 knots submerged. The craft, called the AA-1, is 270 feet long, with a surface displacement of 1,150 tons. England and Germany have larger submarines, but none with such speed or effective cruising radius.

Emigration Nearly Normal. The Commissioner-General of Immigration, in an effort to counteract reports of a great flow of aliens from the United States to Europe, has issued a statement showing that emigration is about normal. War conditions have so interfered with immigration, however, that the net gain in foreign residents in the last five years has been only 554,456.

Hurricane in Florida. A hurricane striking the southern tip of Florida, did more than $2,000,000 damage in Key West alone, where 320 frame houses were razed and two churches were destroyed. There was no loss of life.

All Soldiers Accounted For. The last American soldier reported "missing" has been traced. The War Department finds that of the total, 23 per cent. died, 16 per cent. were found to be prisoners, 25 per cent. were lost from the unit temporarily through confusion of battle, and the remainder were found in scattered hospitals.

Cardinal Mercier Arrives. Cardinal Mercier, primate of Belgium and one of the big, outstanding figures of the war, has reached the United States to thank America, in the name of the Belgian people, for the aid extended to them during the war. Cardinal Mercier was officially welcomed by the government. His visit will extend over a month.

New Hampshire for Suffrage. New Hampshire is the latest state to complete its ratification of the Federal woman suffrage amendment. Minnesota preceded it by one day.

British Aid for Aircraft Makers. The British government had decided to actively aid in the formation of commercial aviation concerns and to give the use of sheds and trained personnel to private business. Arrangements are being made for the government to take over all privately owned aircraft in case of emergency.

Italian Detachment Annihilated. Italy's troubles in Albania are mounting. The Albanians strongly resent the presence of Italian troops of occupation and a bitter guerrilla warfare has been in progress since last winter. The Italians in many places are withdrawing to the seacoast for better concentration and defense. News has just come of the annihilation of a column of 300 Italians at Kastrall.

Honduran President Flees. President Bertrand of Honduras after withstanding the attacks of revolutionists for several weeks turned over his office to a council of ministers and fled to the United States when the rebels reached the outskirts of the capital. The United States Cruiser Cleveland is in Honduran waters to protect American interests.

How to Put on a Sunday School Play

By AGNES MILLER

e Editor of the Christian Herald will be ed to furnish lists of plays suitable for ay school purposes on request.

HERE is nothing more worth while to the religious educator who sympathizes with the natural dra- .c instincts of childhood, and who eciates the value of the Sunday ol play in supplying a means for onstrating the religious and ethical hs learned in the school than the essful production of a good play, na, or pageant. At the same time, a production presents special prob- s. The Sunday school play must e some moral or spiritual purpose le it entertains or instructs, and it t, as a rule, be given under circum- ces made trying by limited funds the absence of much equipment or stance. To aid in the solution of such problems as confront the rage Sunday school, this article has n written. It is based on years of erience in producing plays in a vari- of Sunday schools.

he choice of a play is the first ques- to be settled. Sunday school plays as a rule given for one of four sorts ccasions: the religious festival, the sionary celebration, the patriotic nt, or the social gathering. In choos- these plays, teachers should resolve have their selections entirely worthy the school. For all occasions except purely social, the play should have e distinct lesson for the children who e part in it. This may be religious, t is not necessarily so. Indeed, many the best plays for children and young ple teach, through their own stories, sons of courage, faith, affection, help- ness, and other virtues which are of greatest value. Plays with a single r part should not be chosen, as the n is not to develop actors, but to velop children. As children nearly ways love to take part in these per- mances, the choice of as beautifully itten, imaginative and heroic plays can be found will stimulate them to eir best efforts.

OR the staging of the play the average Sunday school offers a platform d often little besides. The ideal mple stage should have at least two trances, one right and one left, and a rtain. It should also be at least ten et deep, so that those who take part n move easily on it. When there is ly a platform on which to produce the rformance, these points can usually be proximated. A carpenter can deepen e platform with a temporary board ructure, entrances can be imitated on ther side with screens, and it is nearly ways possible to hang a curain.

I should like, however, to emphasize e point that it is the performance ther than the staging which is impor- nt in a Sunday school play. If the ildren and young people who take part through their lines with sincerity and irit, the teacher will have accomplished e delivery of the spiritual message hich occasioned the giving of the per- rmance.

As to scenery, when regular scenery is npracticable, as is usually the case, the aneled background ot the wall behind he school platform makes an appropri- te setting for many interior scenes, or a lain curtain, preferably dark green, ay be draped across the whole back- round. This latter device, with a row f potted plants across the front of the tage, will readily suggest an outdoor cene. It is always best, with limited eans, to have a plain background and ut one's efforts on attractive furni- ure, rugs, and the like, and on making ostumes as effective as possible.

But however pretty, costumes should ever be expensive, nor should they e a continual source of expenditure to the Sunday school. The businesslike procedure in costuming is for the school o own the clothes, so as to have a per- manent wardrobe. To do this, ask once for a small appropriation to buy costumes for a certain play. Let a committee of teachers buy the materials and make the garments. After the performance, lock them up. They can either be used again and again, as, in the case of stock costumes like a Santa Claus suit, or they can be recut for other plays. I know of one such wardrobe which was still in use at the end of five years. With each succeeding production, a few new costumes may be needed, but this expense is very slight and lessens, with the increasing wardrobe, until it disappears.

In costuming, as in choosing plays, seek the simple. Let your first care be for color, remembering the necessity of selecting colors that will look well when seen together at a distance. The best materials to use are colored canton flannel and cheese-cloth for draped costumes, silkolene, and cambric. As to patterns, it might be said that many of the books listed in this article give pictures of the garments used in the plays, and, as noted, the Missionary Education Movement rents Oriental costumes. The Tissot pictures give splendid ideas for clothing for Biblical plays, and for medieval dramas the Sargent pictures of the Holy Grail series are helpful. It may be of value to many teachers, also, to know that the well-known paper-pattern manufacturing houses sell for a few cents an abundant variety of patterns for European peasant costumes, such as the Dutch, Spanish, and Turkish native dresses, as well as military and naval suits and Indian outfits for boys, Uncle Sam and Columbia costumes, and other fancy dress patterns. These are of great use in patriotic celebrations.

THE rehearsal of a Sunday school play should begin as short a time as possible before the production. If rehearsals drag, interest will be lost. It is better to have several a week for two or three weeks before the play takes place, than to have one each week for six weeks.

A good plan to get rehearsals started well is to call all those who are to have parts together before the first rehearsal takes place, and read the play aloud, or, if too long, tell the story of it. Then assign the parts, and distribute the lines to each one participating. These should have been previously typewritten or copied, if the expense of providing each member of the cast with a copy of the play is to be considered. Tell the children how far to study on their parts, and announce a definite hour and date for the first rehearsal. These details must all be thought of and carried out strictly in producing the Sunday school play, because the available time for children to come to rehearsal is usually limited, and because the way to avoid disorderly rehearsals is to give simple, clear and explicit directions. Sometimes it is best to hold a rehearsal for only part of the play, as, for instance, in giving a pageant. In such a case one or two scenes may be gone over at one rehearsal, and one or two others at the next. This plan avoids having children present who are not kept busy, as would be the case if the whole cast were called together each time.

Of course a dress rehearsal should always be held, so that the whole production may be gone through from start to finish. In this way the children become accustomed to their costumes, and familiarized with the stage or platform exactly as it appears at the performance.

IT IS the experience and belief of the writer that the Sunday school play provides both pupils and teachers with great opportunities for growth and service, and that the most unpretentious dramatic entertainment, properly directed, is of great value. The work involved in the production teaches the children how to pass on to others the lessons they have learned; it shows them the great value of team-work; it lets them express their spiritual and social ideas freely, and it sets the right standard for wholesome pleasure. Teachers will find that these little plays often provide great opportunity for their work in character-development and in increasing the value of the Sunday school as a live factor in the life of the community.

"There's a Reason"

You can learn a lot from ADVERTISING

The main thing an advertiser wants to do is to tell you plainly just how and why his goods are worthy of your consideration. You can learn a great deal from that alone, because many things you see advertised are the things you buy and use in your regular daily life. By reading the advertisements, you can learn the names and read descriptions of the things that are best and most satisfactory.

But advertising teaches even more than that. All advertisers try to make their advertisements themselves valuable to you.

A good many people have learned a whole lot about good music, good books, good food, good clothes, ways to keep healthy, ways to live comfortably, ways to keep the house and grounds looking well—they've learned all these things and many other things just by reading advertisements.

Read the advertisements right along, and you will learn a great deal that will be helpful and valuable to you as you go through life.

What's Wrong With the Church?

OCCASIONALLY a conscience-stricken church member who has not attended a service in four months shakes off his indifference and boldly asks the world, "What's wrong with the Church?"

I confess to being conscience-stricken, and I think I've found the answer to the question. It is simply this: "You and I are what's wrong with the Church."

"If they would have about a thirty-piece orchestra an' good singin' I'd go to church, I think. Wouldn't mind the preachin' an' prayin' then," remarked a man of the world.

Now, candidly, isn't that just the state of mind we are all in? We're too satisfied with the pleasures of the moment to feel the need of spiritual things. Conscience is lulled to sleep. Our lives are too crowded with things to allow our minds to follow any train of thought for very long. We shirk the effort of thinking and put off the question of church-going with superficial excuses.

Listen to the alibis! Take any family in the neighborhood as an example and one readily understands why a church that seats two thousand comfortably has less than two hundred in regular attendance.

"The Church of today is too far removed from every-day life," says the business man. "What we need is an institution that meets the problems of the day. I'd support that kind of a church."

HAVING settled the matter, the business man drops comfortably into an easy chair, picks out the photogravure sections from the stack of Sunday newspapers and prepares for the monotony of waiting for the big chicken dinner.

What about his wife? Will she find time to go to church this Sunday? She has been threatening to go ever since Easter Sunday, but of course with the summer heat and all—well, few people go in the summer anyway. Besides, the servant question is acute, and it is quite necessary that she should supervise every detail in the making of the enormity of the day—the Sunday dinner.

Is there a chance that she will get away for the morning service? I'm afraid not this time. She is too busy.

"There are so few young folks in church nowadays," complain the elderly ladies who have occupied the same pews for years and are well versed in the history of the church.

Yes, there are too few. In the summer it is a picnic, a game or the heat that keeps them away; in the winter it is the rain or the cold or something else. It is too much bother to get ready to go, or there are so many pleasures or little household duties that crowd into the morning that it simply can't be helped. On very special occasions we do manage to get there, as on Easter, Christmas or some well advertised event on the church calendar.

And yet, in spite of all this indifference and laziness, we all agree that the Church is a good thing. We take pride in the lofty spires and architectural graces of the particular church we "belong to."

We know too that the Church has done a great deal for civilization. Oh, yes, a very great deal! To prove it we can cite instances of the conversion of a particularly obstreperous brand of Hottentots. Yes, the Church is a necessary part of our civilization, just which necessary part we do not know.

Let's be fair with ourselves. Let's weigh things in the balance. The Church was founded for our own good. It is man's best means of joint worship. It represents not only communion with God, but right relations between man and man. It is an opportunity for a better understanding of our daily problems. It is a source of inspiration, leading us to finer and greater things. Shall we deny ourselves these benefits because it is raining, because there is a meal to cook, because it is easier to read a paper than to think, because we are just lazy?

The Church has its shortcomings, of course. We all find faults. One will growl at the minister, another complain of the gloomy aspect of the church, another thinks the tenor's voice is squeaky, the cushions hard or the decorations ugly. Rarely is there a well-thought-out criticism. The trouble lies not in the church but in our state of mind.

Is the minister apt to be vague? Does he bewail the blackness of our sins and handle the problems of life gingerly? Is there some particular topic we would like to hear discussed? Get acquainted. Find out what manner of man this minister is.

Does this idea of talking it over with the minister sound radical? Stop and think a minute. Remember that the Greatest Teacher mingled with his hearers daily, constantly—and they asked him questions.

If the minister isn't a red-blooded man's man, whose fault is it? If the sermon strays far from our daily life and we fail to get inspiration and helpful ideas for the life we live, whose fault is it? It is your fault and my fault. The church we "belong to" is our church. We are responsible for its growth and influence.

GABRIELE D'ANNUNZIO'S COUP. The Italian soldier-poet, Gabriele d'Annunzio, has led 3,000 men into Fiume against the orders of the Italian government and announced the annexation of the port to Italy. The Italian commander at Fiume, under orders to prevent d'Annunzio's entrance, found his troops refused to obey his orders and ended by welcoming the "invasion." As a result of the coup a very delicate international situation has been developed.

FOR BETTER LIVING

An Unusual Breakfast

By Laura A. Kirkman

"HE ISN'T eating well," we often hear women say, referring to their husbands. "He went off this morning with almost no breakfast."

At such a time unusual dishes should be offered to tempt the man's jaded appetite. He is tired of the old ways in which the foods are prepared. What he needs is an unusual breakfast—a breakfast in which the old friends are offered up in new guise. The following breakfast is of this variety:

Prunes Supreme Cereal
Egg Surprise
Cinnamon Toast
Coffee Hot Milk

Prunes Supreme: Put a few whole cloves, three small pieces of orange peel and two small pieces of lemon rind in a saucepan with one pound of prunes. Add enough water to cover, let come to a boil, and stew until tender. Serve cold in some of the prune liquor.

Egg Surprise: Boil as many eggs as are needed three minutes; remove shells gently; give them a coating of mashed potatoes (either cold mashed potatoes or hot), place them in a colander (they will now resemble doughnuts in shape and size), and submerge them in deep, hot fat. When a golden brown, withdraw and serve at once.

Cinnamon Toast: Toast bread in the usual way, then butter richly, sprinkle with cinnamon, and place in a hot oven for one minute.

New Rubbers in Canning

IT IS poor policy in home canning to use rubber jar rings a second year. New rubbers of good quality are absolutely essential for consistent success in canning. Metal tops should also be inspected carefully, as they must fit perfectly.

Even a new rubber is not necessarily a good one, for there are many rubbers of poor grade on the market today.

A rubber should stand a reasonable amount of stretching and pulling without breaking and should always return to its original shape.

A good rubber will not crack or show results after being pinched between the thumb and forefinger.

Color is no index of quality. Good rings can be either red, white or black.

Sharp Tools on the Farm

LABOR spent by the farmer in sharpening his tools and implements earns a thousand per cent. interest, declares Professor H. H. Musselman of the Michigan Agricultural College. The average farmer is inclined to go along with dull edges, little realizing the tremendous amount of extra labor he is making himself. Mower knives have to be sharp or they will not cut, and are usually taken care of on that account. Other implements that should have more attention than they get, however, are hoes, scythes, corn knives, plows and cultivators. Plows and cultivators are especially apt to be neglected because the horse, who does the work with these implements, can't very well register a kick against dull edges. Tests have proved that sharp cultivators pull a lot easier than dull ones.

Home Power Electric Light

Bright and cheerful homes make it more easy to be happy and cheerful than those where one must first overcome the gloom and depression which result from poor lighting

New Potato Disease

"POTATO wart," a disease believed to have been imported to this country from Europe, has recently been reported by the Department of Agriculture as having put in an appearance in Pennsylvania. Fearing a possible spread of the disease to other parts of the country, the government men are advising farmers to be on the lookout for its appearance and to report any suspicious cases found.

Cleaning Notes

LEATHER may be kept bright and clean by the use of kerosene, or occasionally a little oil.

Marble should be scoured with sand-soap and then polished with a coarse flannel cloth.

Metals are cleaned either with an alkaline solution or with kerosene.

Clean your glassware by covering it with a paste of whiting, ammonia and water, allowing this paste to dry before rubbing it off.

Polished wood surfaces, except those finished with wax, may be cleaned with a weak solution of ammonia or soap.

Make Flavoring a Study

THE intelligent housekeeper regards flavoring as one of the most important branches of cookery. She makes a study of the particular kinds of flavor preferred by each member of her family, and takes pains to satisfy these individual tastes. For she realizes that palatability results in hearty eating—and, consequently, in good health.

Christ and a Country Road

By REV. JOEL BYRON SLOCUM, D.D.

THERE is something fascinating in a country road with its crooks and turns; its hills and hollows; its woodland vistas; its command of orchards, pastures, meadows, and the broad expanse of other farm lands; its never-ending variety and its ceaseless recurrence of new points of interest.

But there are times when a country road loses all these charms and becomes simply a country road. One of these times is when a heavy heart passes that way. On the occasion of the text, there were two heavy hearts. They were sorrowful because they had lost their dearest Friend. And he was so much more than a dear friend. They had expected that he would occupy the ancient throne of David and thus become also their King. So as they walked along the country road—the familiar old road—that day, their thoughts were long, long thoughts, and the journey itself seemed longer than ever, and their eyes caught no gladness from the fields. Then he joined them. You know the rest of the simple, yet beautiful story, culminating with the rapturous exclamation which I have chosen for the text: "Was not our heart burning within us while he spake to us in the way and while he opened to us the Scripture?"

Imagine, if you can, the bitter disappointment that filled their hearts just prior to that meeting. Only a few days before they had experienced the thrill of an enthusiastic expectation. Then they had gone with him through the dark hours of his tragedy, even to the cross. From the cross they had gone to the tomb. And now there had come to their breaking hearts a new fear in the sensational report that his tomb had been broken open.

They were on their cheerless way back to the old routine of the old home. They were plodding along listlessly, for the joy had gone out of their lives and there seemed to be nothing left worth living for now. But it was just then, at the darkest moment of their experience, that he comes to saddened hearts that love him. And his arrival made all the difference between despair and ecstacy. Suddenly they were strangely and unaccountably happy: "Was not our heart burning within us while he spake to us in the way?"

The first lesson of Christ and the country road is the failure of his disciples to recognize him as the Christ. How often, since then, he has traveled the dusty highways of men and they have not known him! They thought him to be simply some fellow mortal. Again and again has Jesus glorified the commonplace with the dignity of his presence; but only those who have had the eyes of the Spirit have known him. The difference between Bethel at sunset and Bethel at Sunrise could not have been indicated in words. But somewhere between sunset and sunrise there had come to the homesick Jacob an experience that caused him to e claim: "How awful is this plac Surely God was in this place, and knew it not." The difference betwe the unattractive limestone crags th rose like a stairway towards the siler stars and the ladder resplendent wit the angels of God in Jacob's dream wa the presence of God. It is only to thos who see that every bush is aflame wit God. The others, as Mrs. Brownin puts it, sit around and pick blacl berries.

Jesus still journeys with us in th commonplace routine of our daily toi Our burdens invite his care, our happ ness elicits his joy. But we must loo up or we shall miss him. I like Bisho Quayle's interpretation of the man wh wanted to live by the side of the roa and be a friend of man. Bishop Quayl in his originality, declares: "That ma was Jesus. And every morning he woul go out into that country road and sa to every passer: 'Good morning, friend And one day an old man came hobblin forward on two canes with feeble step and palsied shake of his head. 'Goo morning, friend!' exclaimed the Man b the side of this country road. But th old man did not raise his downcas eyes. Stumbling forward and grumblin out his complaints, he bewailed his lot 'There is no good-morning,' he cried 'only sin and suffering and hell!' An then he came close to the sufferin traveler and lifted up the silver tone of his voice once more: 'Good morning friend, look up!' And looking up, th old man saw the radiant Christ."

Another lesson of Christ and th country road lies in the fact that whe he did disclose himself to these anguish stricken disciples, he revealed himsel as Deity. As he lifted up his hands t invoke a blessing upon the evenin meal, there was something, either i his appearance or in his manner, tha suddenly snatched the veil from thei eyes, and they knew him. It is significant that the disclosures of Jesus ar revelations of his relations to us a Son of God, and not merely as Son o man.

On the country road of their dee perplexity that day, Jesus proved himself to be, not simply their best friend but also their risen Christ—their victorious Lord.

Let us catch the inspiration tha Christ can bring to the country road and give ourselves anew to the thing for which he died. The road loses itsel in the dusty distance; but he, according to his promise, will be with us even unt the end of the journey.

"In my eye is the star of an unconquered hope,
And in my heart one hope forever
sings:
That, at the next white turning of the road,
My eyes may rest on Him."

Head of the Inter-Church Movement

DR. S. EARL TAYLOR, who heads the Inter-Church Movement to unify Protestantism, is a man of unusual ability. He is a layman and not a clergyman, and as executive secretary of the Methodist Centenary he gathered about himself a staff of experts very much like himself. Dr. Taylor was educated for the mission field, but owing to family reasons did not go. Instead, he became a general promoter of missions in the home church, heading various educational and financial movements until he finally became the missionary leader of his denomination. As head of the Centenary undertaking he was instrumental in raising $114,000,000 for missions, and put new life into hundreds of churches. His aim now as leader of the Inter-Church movement is to co-ordinate the activities of Protestant churches in raising money, community service, and evangelism. This will involve the erection of real live mission institutions in the cities, centralized churches in the country districts, and the development of a new type of church workers to manage such enterprises.

Dr. S. Earl Taylor.

I S., Long Beach, Calif. "Please explain why Easter sometimes does not come the first Sunday after the first full moon after March 20. If my memory serves m t did not occur on that date twenty-four ye ago."

ster is observed on the first Sunday after th ull moon on or next after March 21, and th cannot be earlier than March 22 or later th April 25. Twenty-four years ago, in 18 it occurred on April 14, and in 1894 on M h 25, according to the table given in the W d Almanac.

rs. S. K W. Southworth, Wash "I have re in your paper the names of the pioneer w en enlisted in the cause of woman suffrage, so of whom blazed the way for woman in th various vocations. I note two of the first w an lawyers are not mentioned. Mrs A Kepley of Effingham, Ill., graduated th the law department of Northwestern U ersity (Chicago) in June, 1870. The st would not admit her to practice on ac- t of her sex. Miss Sara Kilgare, then a st ent in the law department of Northwestern, a classmate of Mrs. Kepley, changed to the more liberal university of Ann Arbor, Mich., from which she graduated in 1871, and was the first woman admitted to the Supreme Court. Indiana, her native state, would not admit her to practice on account of her sex. A few years afterwards she was admitted in Ohio, where she practiced law with her husband."

Rev T. R. Gray (Congregational Church), Salem, Iowa, writes: "Will you kindly add these few lines to your answer to Mrs. M. A. B., Philadelphia, regarding the custom, disposition and significance of the sacramental emblems? For years I have sought to correct a seeming disregard among churches of the significance of every detail of the Lord's Supper. First—Jesus took bread. Of what kind? Certainly unleavened bread. None other could be had. So strict was God regarding this, that the Jews purged away every vestige of leaven from their houses. Leaven stands for sin and wickedness; it is putrifaction. Paul wrote, 'Let us keep the feast, not with old leaven, but with unleavened bread of sincerity and truth.' Yet I have noticed that some, with strange lack of appreciation of this fact, purchase a loaf of ordinary bread for this most solemn service. Second—Holy Writ often mentions 'breaking bread,' but never cutting with a knife, which was prohibited for the reason that Christ's body is represented as 'broken for you.' Without any spirit of controversy, may I add a few more words? You say 'After all, it is the spirit of the ceremonial rather than the form which is to be considered.' This is true, the spirit is more than the form: but are there not some who may feel that wrong is being done by use of leaven (emblem of sin) and by cutting with a knife? And to such the whole service, both form and spirit, becomes ineffective."

Rev. Lauritz Larson, secretary of the National Lutheran Council, New York City, writes to the Mail-Bag this interesting letter: "My attention has been called to 'Our Mail-Bag' in the Christian Herald for the 26th of July, and that it contains the following statement in the first paragraph: 'The Kaiser was a member of the German State Church, which was Lutheran in theology.' This statement supports a wrong impression that has been quite general during the war, and which has placed the Lutheran Church in America in a wrong light in the eyes of a great many of our fellow citizens. The German Empire did not have any state church. The various kingdoms composing the German Empire had state churches of different denominations. Thus, the state church of Prussia was not the Lutheran Church. The former Kaiser, his father and grandfather were not Lutherans. In 1817, the king of Prussia compelled the Lutheran Church to unite with the Reformed or Calvinist Church and formed a union church officially known as the Evangelical Church. This church is also represented in America, but has no connection with any Lutheran Church or organization. That the Kaiser was not a member of the Lutheran Church is also evident from the fact that some years ago a certain religious journal in America tried to prove that he was a Presbyterian, something which it is not likely to want to do at present."

John and Peter Become Disciples

International Sunday School Lesson for October 5

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

VE BEGIN this week a new line of study which is different from any of the International Les- s you have had. Instead of taking of the Bible books, or an Old Testa- nt character, or an abstract teaching, have a well-planned search for the terials of a biography of two of pioneer Christians. This has fre- ntly been done with the Life of ul, but not in the International Les- s with any other apostle. The study es us into the four Gospels, the book Acts and into those epistles which less familiar to most of our pupils. pil and teacher will have a better stery of the Scriptures, and a more id and practical conception of the d of men who received and proved value of the doctrines of Jesus.

We are familiar with Peter and John. th were fishermen, sharing the dan- and toil of this work on the Galilean e and learning human nature to- ther as they sold their catch to the xed population of their province. r then, as long before, Galilee might well called "Galilee of the nations," indeed "of the Gentiles." The very eech was affected by this fact; to- rd the close of Jesus' ministry Peter s recognized in Jerusalem as a Gali- n by his accent. Peter and John are ually thought of, each in connection th his own brother, and this in itself lps us to picture their daily life more vidly. From Luke we learn that the o men, who later became inseparable -workers while the Church was in rusalem, were actually partners in eir fishing business. One wonders if ery "partnership" in business or in cial life might not be carried over into ligion as well.

Of the two, Peter is believed to have en considerably more mature. He as married and lived in his own house the busy city of Capernaum. Here saw the Roman soldiers and mingled ith the enterprising Greek and Syrian erchants. Doubtless he acquired a od practical education. Indeed, it is ot fair to Peter to portray him, as some have, as an uncouth, illiterate peasant. The synagogue and the synagogue school had no doubt prepared him to read and to think. He was a strict Jew who was brought very slowly to the broad position taken by later disciples like Paul. His impulsiveness, as well as his sincerity and fundamental loyalty, is reflected all through the New Testament story.

John seems to have ranked next to Peter in the unconscious judgment of the twelve and their friends. There is some reason to think that he had a better education and a wider acquaintanceship than his friend. Jesus called James and John the "sons of thunder," Boanerges, which seems to indicate a vehement temper, of which there are indications.

Both men were keenly interested in religion and sought something more fully satisfying than the current Judaism under the dominance of Scribism. When John the Baptist began to preach, they went to hear him and became "his disciples" with their brothers. They had a vital conviction that the Messiah was about to come, according to the Baptist's prediction. Then there came that memorable day when the desert preacher, who had been taking increasing note of a certain young carpenter from Nazareth, stood with Andrew and John and proclaimed Jesus as "the Lamb of God." Long, long afterward John remembered the time of day when he first followed Jesus. We can imagine a season of eager questioning and quiet, patient answering in the abode of Jesus. Andrew at once sought his brother Peter and broke the great news: "We have found the Messiah!" The first words of the Master were prophetic, as he told Peter that the name, "A Rock," would one day be recognized as fully appropriate.

Early training, the special work of a preacher of repentance and, in Peter's case, the ready message of a brother, brought them to Jesus. These three elements in their Christian experience still form the human side of the average disciple's allegiance. We are seeking Christian homes, and Christian schools, and religious education to furnish the first. We value highly the appeal of the preacher, with his direct appeal and challenge to the conscience and the heart. We know how important is the testimony of the fellow disciples, the personal work of a brother or a friend in bringing men to Jesus.

The contentions of sects and creeds have sometimes obscured the vital fact that personality and character count for more than formula and system in real, living, religious enthusiasm. Compelling personalities are still founding groups of disciples in the world. Christianity, too, as Henry Van Dyke well puts it, is "the religion of a Person," and that Person the mightiest, the truest and the holiest that ever trod the earth. Peter and John were pointed to the Messiah by a man whom they respected and trusted. They felt His power, and followed Jesus even before they had learned the barest outline of his plans. In fact, none of the twelve seems to have fully comprehended Jesus and his doctrines during his ministry, but they understood him! They were held by the charm and power of what he was, even when they did not fully realize the value of what he did.

Are we seeking to lead the Peters and the Johns of our day to Christ? Then we must show the evidences of his Spirit in our lives. In one of our teacher-training studies, the first qualification for a superintendent is given as "a strong, clean, winsome, Christian character, since his place makes his example thrice more potent than his words." Our work for our Lord is the impress of spirit upon spirit, the contagion of a holy enthusiasm, the inculcation of a vital faith, based on the reality of things sensed and felt, rather than precisely learned.

These two rugged fishermen, prepared by high traditions and a practical knowledge of life, were to be closely associated with the Great Teacher for three years, in sunshine and storm, in the study and in the marketplace, in the synagogue and out on the hills with God. Thus were they to become, not disciples merely, but apostles—men sent forth to disciple others.

What 15c Will Bring You from the Nation's Capital

Washington, the home of the Pathfinder, has become the World's Capital and reading the Pathfinder will be like sitting in the inner council with those who will mold the world's destiny for the next generation

The little matter of 15c in stamps or coin will bring you the Pathfinder 13 weeks on trial. The Pathfinder is an illustrated weekly, published at the Nation's center, for the Nation; a paper that prints all the news of the world and tells the truth and only the truth; now in its 27th year. This paper fills the bill without emptying the purse; it costs but $1 a year. If you want to keep posted on what is going on in the world, at the least expense of time or money, this is your means. If you want a paper in your home which is sincere, reliable, entertaining, wholesome, the Pathfinder is yours. If you appreciate a paper which puts everything clearly, fairly, briefly—here it is. Send 15c to show that you might like such a paper and we will send the Pathfinder 13 weeks. The 15c does not repay us; we are glad to invest in new friends. Pathfinder, Box 70, Washington, D. C.

Many Casualties, Few Communicant

LIBERIA, the graveyard of foreign missionaries. That is how this Negro republic on the west coast of Africa is designated by the Board of Missions of the Episcopal Church, because more of its foreign workers have died there than in any other field.

No wonder then that after nearly a century of effort the Church has a long list of casualties, but only 2,500 communicants. This number, however, is nearly twenty-five per cent. of Liberia's Christians.

Liberia's history started in 1816, when the American Colonization Society was organized in the United States for the purpose of forming a nation for the freed slaves in this country. Thus founded by Americans and nominally under American protection, Liberia since 1847 has maintained her independence, despite encroachments of the English and French and constant internal troubles. The latter are no fault of the 12,000 descendants of freed slaves originally sent to Liberia, but are due to the problem these civilized negro have in keeping in check the milli aborigines living back from the coast few miles in the "bush."

In planting their colony the Col nization Society utterly ignored the native tribes, and for fifty years the was constant friction between the col nists on the coast and their black bretl ren in the interior. It was not unt Arthur Barclay, a West Indian negr who went to Liberia when a child, b came President that friendly relatio were finally established with these n tives. It is with these wild tribes of th interior, many of whom are canniba and believers in voodooism, that L beria's future lies today just as it did century ago.

The first white missionary sent by th Episcopal Church to foreign fields wen to Liberia in 1836, and only recentl Bishop Arthur S. Lloyd, head of th Nationwide Campaign, visited Liberi to make a survey of the needs in th mission field there.

The Land of the Long Twilights

By L. E. OST, Swedish Evangelical Mission

LET us first thank you for the regular coming of the Christian Herald! For six years it came to us here at Elim, Alaska. But it did not come only to us. It was eagerly looked for and read by Eskimos and whites, passing from hand to hand, from place to place, until it was absorbed and worn out. Often our copy would be away on its round of cheer even before we could get time to read it. I am telling you this that you may know how the Herald is welcomed even in the regions of the Arctic Circle.

You ought to see the hungry looks in the faces of the hardy prospectors and toilers, the financial pioneers, often by days of travel cut off from the main lines of communication; cut off for many months at a time—you ought to see the look on their faces when a white man or the missionary happens in on them.

And you ought to see and feel the scurrying among the huts and hovels when the missionary with his trusty dogs, or his boat, happens in on the outlying Eskimo communities. Our "whoa!" and brake have hardly brought us to a standstill, before we hear on all sides, "O-waq-ka! Quj-an-na!" (Meeting to-night?) As we answer in the affirmative, "A-ang," we hear a murmur of "Quj-an-na, Quj-an-na, Argsch-ajon!" (Thanks be to God!) And there is something worth while in that, too!

This is the country of which, as one of our trusty mail-carriers said: "It is fight and win, or let go and go down!" This is the country so often misrep resented, and not even yet understood This is the country where the cold ca afford to hover between 20° and 50 below, and even drop to 86° below The coastal strip to the southward— the strip known to tourists, where th cold seldom drops below zero—is onl the welcoming hand stretched out t the civilized world.

But the great land northward is th country proper. There we have abun dance of twilight and darkness durin the wintry months, and a complet circle of light and sunshine in the tim of summer. The darkness is of a bette quality than you have elsewhere, an the light—why, you don't know light until you go northward!

And so, while our people in the States are worrying about coal and conditions, we feel the call rushing through our veins—the call to the Eskimos, the call to the hardy prospectors, the call to the brawny toilers of the North. We are tugging at our anchors and will soon be under way.

Our work was established at Golovin, Alaska, in 1900 and moved in 1914 to Elim, Alaska, and is now known as Elim Mission. It has been supported by the Swedish Evangelical Mission Covenant of America, and locally. We need a substantial lift to get the work in the shape it ought to be in, and will welcome the cooperation of the Christian Herald and any of its readers who are interested in missionary work in the Far North.

"Thou Sweetest Maiden"
in La Bohême

Great music that plays upon your heart-strings

The music which makes the strongest appeal is that which is the most human—which mirrors the emotions we ourselves experience.

That is why "O soave fanciulla" (Thou Sweetest Maiden) from La Bohême is admittedly one of the greatest love duets in all opera. And no matter which of the three Victrola Records of this superb number you choose to hear, the passionate beauty of the artists' interpretations makes you feel the lovers' ecstasy of joy.

It is music such as this that makes the world shine brighter; that makes you glad of the companionship of the Victrola. It satisfies the longing for the sunshine of music which your very nature craves.

Victors and Victrolas $12 to $950. Any Victor dealer will gladly play any music you wish to hear.

IVORY has all the qualities that people of refinement desire in a soap for their toilet and bath.

It is white, as a skin soap should be. It is unscented, but is faintly fragrant with the pleasing natural odor of its high-grade ingredients. It is pure—contains only the choicest materials, which are cleansed and refined until free from all foreign matter. It is mild—so free from uncombined alkali that it feels grateful even to the skin of a baby. It makes a thick soft lather of myriads of lively bubbles—a lather that can be rubbed in thoroughly without drying on the skin. It rinses so easily and completely that it never leaves a trace of soapy stickiness or unsightly gloss. It floats.

Can you think of anything else you would want in your soap?

Are You One of the Hundred Thousand?

Here is a Message for You

A CAREFUL estimate convinces me that at least one-third, or one hundred thousand, of the present members of the Christian Herald Family entered the Family at the request of another member.

If you are one of these, you are now a subscriber because some one, on a day back in the years, told you what a good paper the Christian Herald was, how they had taken it a long while, and how they wouldn't be without it.

Since then you have learned for yourself the real abiding value of the Christian Herald.

You have found your faith strengthened.

You have been built up in spiritual power and understanding.

You have been inspired to do greater things for Christ.

You have been comforted in those sorrows which are inseparable from the passing years.

You have been made acquainted with hundreds of odd corners in the mission fields at home and in every foreign field, and have today an intimate knowledge of the men and women on the frontier of faith, which gives you a real comprehension of the Great Commission.

You have been kept informed on the events of the day by concise articles which told dependably, in few words, what you found elsewhere hidden under elaborate sentences.

You have become a part of a great world-girdling organization which blesses with helpfulness every spot where people suffer. You have touched hands with orphans in China, India, Syria, France and Poland. You have relieved the miseries of war, earthquake and famine. Countless thousands pray for heaven's blessing on your head because, as a member of the Christian Herald Family, you have had a share in changing their dull despair to a confident hope.

And because you have gained all of this you, like your friend of earlier years, are ready to say today, "There is no paper so good as the Christian Herald. I wouldn't be without it."

ALL right, then. Why not do a little missionary work, and repay the debt you owe your friend for introducing you to the Christian Herald by introducing some friend of today to your favorite paper? It is real missionary work.

During the year to come the Christian Herald will be bigger, brighter, more packed full of real spiritual power than ever. I have a vision of a million homes in which the Christian Herald shall uphold the light of Christian faith and shall lead the way toward better days for men and nations. I believe that God will continue to use the Christian Herald as a messenger to the people. Will you not be a messenger to just one home and introduce one of your good friends to the riches of the Christian Herald and the happy fellowship of the Christian Herald Family?

I will Make it Easy for You

IN ORDER to make the introduction easy I will send the Christian Herald for a full six months for just One Dollar. Tell your friends how much they can get for only One Dollar.

Graham Patterson Publisher

If they want to take it for a year at $2.50 we will send them, and you too, one of our New Atlases of the World, bound in cloth.

NO DOLLAR can buy more than will the dollar which purchases the Christian Herald for 26 weeks. In that time there will be two, possibly three, continued stories of the type for which the Christian Herald is becoming famous. There will be also

PREVENTS ACCUMULATION OF CARBON

YOU can keep your motor snappy and full of "pep" by preventing the accumulation of carbon. Don't wait until your engine is choked and caked with it. Use Johnson's Carbon Remover every 500 miles, then the carbon is removed while it is soft and powdery, eliminating the frequen grinding of valves and keeping the motor always clean. No experience or labor required—you ca easily do it yourself in ten minutes—and the cost is trifling.

JOHNSON'S CARBON REMOVER

Johnson's Carbon Remover is a perfectly harmless liquid to be poured or squirted into the cylinders. Millions of cans have been used with satisfaction. It simply softens the carbon, then the heat from the engine pulverizes it and it is blown out the exhaust. Johnson's Carbon Remover contains no acids and does not affect lubrication.

It is the easiest, cleanest, safest and most satisfactory remedy for carbon. It will save you from $3.00 to $5.00 over any other method without laying up your car. A dose of Johnson's Carbon Remover—th engine laxative—will stop that knock—quiet the motor, and give th maximum power with the minimum amount of fuel.

JOHNSON'S

Hastee Patch

This is the ideal repair for tubes, casings and rubber goods of all kinds. No time, labor or heat required. A Patch can be applied in three minutes and it's so simple a child can use it. Gives equally good results on a pin hole, puncture or on a large blowout.

JOHNSON'S

Black-Lac

Here is a preparation with which you can make your gray, dusty top and side curtains look like new. Johnson's Black-Lac is unequalled for blackening fenders, rims, hoods, lamps—and in fact, all worn metal parts. Prevents rust and keeps your car in a high state of repair.

JOHNSON'S

will stop leaks immediately without laying up the car—no mechanical experience required. It is absolutely harmless in every respect. It isn't a makeshift—it's a permanent repair. It will ordinarily seal a leak in from two to ten minutes. A half pint is sufficient for a Ford.

LETTERS IN PRIZE CONTESTS

HOW MY WIFE HAS HELPED ME TO SUCCESS
A HEROINE IN EVERYDAY LIFE
THE GIRL'S IDEAL HUSBAND
MY WIFE'S BEST QUALITY

THESE letters are entries for the $25 prizes offered for the best 500 words. These are not necessarily the prize-winners. Many others will appear from now on until December 15, at which time decision will be rendered as to the best ones published. The prizes will be won by the letters that offer the most effective help to others in solving the problems of life.

A Heroine in Everyday Life

The Story of the Best Woman I Know

IN a little mission school in the Tennessee mountains a girl sat laboriously spelling out a copy of the Christian Herald that had come in a box of papers and books sent to the school. This girl had assumed the responsibility of mother to the younger children at the age of ten; she had helped her father and brothers in the field; she had carded, spun, and woven her own linsey clothes, and with ten dollars earned by shearing sheep she had entered this mission school to "get a little learnin'."

She had had no girlhood such as other girls had. She never saw a doll till she entered the mission school. But her naturally keen mind leaped to take advantage of the opportunities the humble school offered, and she made rapid progress. As she sat spelling out that copy of the Christian Herald her eye was caught by the number in the corner that denoted the circulation of the paper, She understood what it meant. "There must be a lot of smart people in the corner," she thought, "if that many can read this paper."

That was the Afternoon of her Vision, as she called it afterwards. She resolved that she, too, would be "smart." She secured her father's consent, then she set out to the town at the foot of the mountain where she thought she could work for her board while she went to the village school. It was fifty miles of almost impassable road, and she made most of it afoot, part mule-back.

She found a place to work for her board and entered school. When she had learned all that she could learn there she moved on to the city and worked her way through High School. Then she entered college on the same terms.

All this time the memory of that little mission school, of that copy of the Christian Herald, of the hunger for an education, remained with her. There were other hearts back there as hungry as hers had been. After her first year in college she felt herself sufficiently qualified to teach, and she devoted her vacation to moonlight schools. Boys and girls, middle aged men and women, gray-haired men and women, gathered to learn from her. She kept up this summer work till she had finished college, then she went back as a teacher to that school where the vision had come to her. Trained and cultured, as easy in her manners as one born to the purple, she means to spend her life in that out-of-the-way place, giving to others the opportunities that were denied her.

"I must follow the gleam myself," she says, "and I must show its light to others."

She is an artist with the loom, and she is not only teaching her people to read and write, but she is showing them how to weave blankets beautiful in color and design. Mrs. L. M.

How My Wife Helped Me to Success

WE BECAME acquainted in a schoolroom, crowded to capacity, with some one hundred and fifty-three pupils. It was a good place to test patience, tact and real Christian character. My then assistant knew how to win the confidence and love of the boys and girls. She was not petulant and snappy.

I had the temerity to ask her to share with me the untried experiences of life. She was quite willing to run the risk. We have now been in the harness together thirty-eight years.

Have we met with success? That all depends upon definition. If by success we mean happiness, usefulness, rearing children with high ideals and fitting them for noble and unselfish work, preparing them to become a blessing to the world; if we mean health, friends, intellectual and spiritual advancement, we have succeeded. But if success means great wealth, greed, ambition for worldly place and power, we fear we have not succeeded very well.

As soon as we were married, we gave up teaching and a fair salary, and took charge of a small country church at the munificent salary of $200 a year. What did that matter? We had each other, the approval of conscience, and God. We were very rich in faith and hope. We firmly resolved never to complain, never to beg, never to speak unkindly in our home, and to begin and end each day in prayer.

Did we see hard times? Some would think we did, when the pocket-book and larder were empty and our income was often less than $15 a month. The pinchings of poverty were hardly realized, we were so interested in our work. Were there no puzzling providences? Many, very many. There was no gloom, no melancholy and no loss of faith.

Four welcome children came to us in less than five years—three boys and a girl. Wife was nurse, maid, cook, washwoman, teacher, friend, mother! We have been able to see these children through high school, college and university training. The eldest son is an efficient and loved pastor; the second son is chief geologist of a world-wide corporation; the third is on the faculty of one of our greatest universities. The daughter is happily married and lives on the Pacific coast. We have five grandchildren. We have aided my own and wife's brother in obtaining a college education, and done what would be equal to keeping one student in college twenty-seven years, all on a salary averaging less than $850 per year. We have never visited the movies but once, and never attended a theater.

Wife has always kept the home neat and attractive. She has kept music in the home and in her soul.

We have had the best books and periodicals and flowers. Our home life has been a foretaste of heaven.

We have enough to supply our modest needs, and always something to spare for His cause.

Wife has grown dearer with the passing years. To her I gladly give the credit for our success.

My Wife's Best Quality

My Lady of the Comfortable Tongue

IN THE never-to-be-forgotten days of courting bliss, when the trees along the old highway—in the shadows of evening—were wont to nudge each other softly, and whisper: "Just listen to that, now!" one quality of my wife-to-be impressed itself indelibly upon me. Five words will express this virtue: she had a comfortable tongue.

In a little prayer meeting I once heard a dear woman—one of the salt of the earth—offer this luminous petition: "O Lord, make us comfortable to live with!" The tongue is a little member, but its power for comfort or discomfort in the home is almost unlimited.

This country school teacher of mine saw the best side of people; she was quick to note and speak of their virtues, but she was equally silent as to their failings. She saw the virtues, the sunlit side of folk with whom she came in contact. When I paused to consider my own shortcomings I said to myself: "G. W., if you can get that young woman happiness will hobnob with you and comfort will be your familiar friend."

We are now in our fourth decade of married life. Olive plants have been about our table—now they have tables and olive plants of their own, and another generation has arisen to greet us. Prosperity has smiled upon us; adversity has frowned! Life has been no bed of roses, but in adversity and prosperity alike My Lady of the Comfortable Tongue has been a fountain of blessing and content in the home. When poverty looked in at the door and said: "My inning now!" My Lady counted her blessings, and smiled, and was content. Has she not always made the best of circumstances even as she has made the best of people?

This habit of speaking well of people, of enlarging their virtues rather than their failings, still abides with her. Yes, it has grown with the years. She has the love that thinketh no evil; it shines in her face, it glows in her eyes, it illumines her soul life.

In the days when we first companied together I was not a Christian, and it was largely through her example that I became an active Christian. She did not talk me into the Kingdom; she lived me into the Kingdom. She made religion seem practical, and comfortable, and altogether desirable to me.

That good old word, "winsome," is almost obsolete, but a comfortable tongue will keep a wife winsome until the angels beckon and say: "Come up higher." The sharp, sarcastic remarks that we hear in some homes; how they grate, and sting, and wither!

It follows, as surely as daylight follows darkness, that a man could not live with My Lady of the Comfortable Tongue for decade after decade and not take in—and necessarily give out—a little of her comfortable spirit. Dull pupil indeed would I be if there were no profiting, no growth under her magical touch and ministry. Young man, if you would know real comfort in life, just marry a woman with a comfortable tongue. G. W. T.

The Girl's Ideal Husband

"MY IDEAL? Why," quoth Sylvia, "I want some one to be good to me. Not like Don, handsome, but arrogant; nor Bob, wealthy, but oh, as mean as can be; nor even like dear old Ted, happy and gay, but so irresponsible. I haven't met him yet," she continued, "and do you know why? I've been so busy getting educated, and coming out, that I haven't been able to give as much time and thought to my spiritual furtherance as I should; and now I believe I shall try to make religion a potent factor in my life.

"And," she continued, "in this work I feel that perhaps I shall meet the 'some one.' A good man, who if not absolutely, at least tries his utmost to live up to the teachings of that Holy Book; not too serious, of course"—she made a little grimace. "But one who, if I'm just weary and tired, won't censure and find fault, but will just be kind and sympathetic; who'll leave all his grouch, should he have any, and his troubles at his office.

"He may smoke, go out with the boys—now and then," she hastily added—"but he must not be annoyed should I give an evening to the girls, my club, or any other woman's affair in which he could not possibly be interested. And he won't have to wear the neckties I buy him; he may choose all his own wearing apparel; but of course I reserve that same right for myself. But you know, dear, I always want to please him, have him tell me I look nice. A real good man never ceases to compliment his wife on her appearance, anyway—does he?" she questioned, almost wistfully.

"Well," I said, "what would you do about the finances? Who do you think should handle the money?" "Oh," she replied, "I should—at least, I would want him to give me a chance to prove that I am a manager, an economical one, even were there no urgent necessity to exhibit such qualities. And do you know," she whispered, "I would try to start an account all my own, and if ever it were badly needed, then I would surprise him with it. Wouldn't that be splendid?"

I inquired further: "What if you proved not to be a good manager?" "Then," she replied emphatically, "if he could prove satisfactorily to me that I was not capable—I might be hard to convince, you know—he would have to manage the finances—but I'd like to have something for me—just the same, to spend as I liked—and I know my ideal would not refuse me that.

"I do not want to convey the idea that outside of religious circles alone there are not good men—but I should feel safer in trusting my future to a man who has strong Christian ideals. Wouldn't you, dear?" she asked.

And I said I would. E. M. F.

Giving the message on the streets

Taking the Church to the People

By ARTHUR J. SMITH, D.D.

General Secretary Evangelistic Committee of New York City

PROBABLY at no time in the history of the city of New York have thoughtful people in the metropolis been concerned with social problems of so serious a nature as they are today.

When children refuse to salute our flag or sing "America"; when young persons, under age, live together as husband and wife without being married, with the consent of their parents, who are exponents of free love and practice what they preach; when bombs are exploded at the front door of a magistrate's home, and where malcontents are everywhere preaching the gospel of unrest, though it is hardly "good news," serious people are highly concerned with social conditions.

That these conditions exist shows that there is a problem. We hear men in the financial district asking: "Where are they going to strike next?"

Now, there are some who propose as the panacea for the social unrest, sanitation; others say that education is the cure-all; and others still aver that better environment, better housing, higher wages, are the keys to open the doors to social quiet.

But it must be apparent to discerning Christians that these things are futile. One may surround a family or a group with the finest sanitation, in unsurpassed environment, where the housing is all that can be desired, and wages all that one could ask; but if the persons affected are no whit changed within, the outward conditions will not long remain bettered. A pig in a parlor is still a pig. The blanket Indian is still a blanket Indian, though Carlisle may have lent its education; but when Christianity grips the Indian he soon is civilized—Americanized.

HERE is one of the chief justifications of the large expenditures of money made year after year by the Evangelistic Committee of New York City. The Gospel of Jesus Christ makes thieves honest, makes drunkards sober, makes the vile pure, and leads the skeptic to believe and the Bolshevist to become a good American. The results of the work in this city, however, fully justify all that is claimed in the way of social betterment. Even the policemen say that where there is a tent or where work for children is carried on by street workers, there is a marked lessening of child delinquency; the pushcarts and fruit-stands are unmolested, and the cop is less likely to think that "the policeman's life is not a happy one."

On the middle East Side this season, one of the women workers found a large group of children thoroughly Bolshevist in their ideas. They refused to salute the flag and to sing "America." Their parents had told them that the red flag was the only one to respect, and that internationalism and not patriotism should be their ideal. Bible stories and the message of Jesus Christ for children, tactfully presented by the worker, brought about a change, and, for the present at least, these children are Americanized.

Elders as well as children respond to the message. An Italian saloon-keeper heard the message in a tent. He had been a wine-bottler in the homeland, and when he came over he filched a quantity of labels for fine wines and was using them to great profit on wines of inferior quality. When he learned the love of Jesus, he burned the labels and forsook the liquor business altogether.

ON THE East Side, the message of the tent reached a young couple who came to the evangelist in great agitation, insisting that he accompany them home. There they disclosed the cause of their agitation. With the consent of their parents, who were believers in free love and birth control, the couple had been living together as man and wife, but saw that it could no longer be. Would the evangelist marry them? He saw that it was done as soon as a license could be procured.

A like case was discovered by a speaker in a cigar factory on the East Side, where the couple was of older years. At a noon meeting in the factory where both worked, the speaker reached their hearts, and here also the evangelist was invited home and a marriage soon followed.

Not far from the same section, in a hotbed of Bolshevism, the speakers were greeted with yaps as from barking dogs, so that they could not be heard above the tumult. Persisting in making friends with the leaders, in two weeks they gained silence, they had individuals from the group come

Surely such work is worthy of any effort, and of the l confidence and support of God's stewards and all lievers in social uplift. "We never incur a debt" the watchword of the Evangelistic Committee. The asure of the work, both during the summer and in e conservation work of the winter months, is pre-ely cut according to funds received.

N MOST of the cities of the country, during the last few years, the churches have realized this situation, d have taken various measures to go to that world ich would not come to them. So it happens that in st large cities today about the noon hour, the ains of the cornet, trombone or clarinet stridently ll to the passerby to lend an ear. Soon about the x or table or auto, there is gathered a group of from n to several hundred, most of whom remain for ngs, a prayer and a Gospel talk which follows. In ery city these open-air meetings have resulted conversions, in new strength added to the urches and in a valuable development of church embers. In this public declaration of the Gospel essage, more than one young man has become ttled in the faith.

Open-air meetings are supplemented in New York ity by tent meetings being held this year at One undred and Seventy-fifth Street and St. Nicholas venue under direction of the Laymen League. Just the open-air meetings carry conviction of the ed of Christ to the passerby and result in the ving of souls, so the tent meeting draws in all e various elements of the district in which it pitched.

For several summers a tent was pitched in the alian-Sicilian district of the upper East Side. At rst the meetings were greatly interrupted by tur-ulence of various sorts, but the community soon came have faith in them. Now an Italian Presbyterian urch, self-supporting, with over 700 members, has ecome the center of the life of the district.

A little farther north the Association is helping an Italian Methodist church which has nearly 200 members.

Farther south in East Seventy-ninth Street, a Hungarian Baptist church is growing rapidly through street meetings.

Farther south still, in New York's Little Russia, the first attempts of the summer to hold meetings met with violent and successful opposition. Russian autocracy made effective use of the church in keeping the people satisfied with conditions little short of slavery. They were taught to regard the Czar as the Little Father, almost in the same category as Christ and the saints. When the Russian revolted, he classed the church with autocracy and set out to destroy both.

When the evangelists working under the committee entered the Russian section of New York City word was passed around that they were emissaries of the Russian Church and hostility was instant. Stones were thrown and threats of bodily danger were constant. When the police provided protection for the meetings they were made impossible by groups of men and children who groaned, yelled and made every possible manner of noise to drown out the speaker. But after a while persistence won and some conversions resulted by which the Russians learned that the Gospel of Christ was quite different from the preachments of the state church of their native land.

Part of the program for street meetings includes workers with children, who attract little folks away from the meetings intended for their elders, take them half a block or so away and tell them Gospel stories. These street meetings always close with a salute to the flag and the singing of America or the Star Spangled Banner.

In the I. W. W. section, early in the summer, the children refused to salute the flag and sing America or the Star Spangled Banner. Some of the children were quite bitterly anarchistic, but before the summer was ended the whole group, under the impact of a consecrated woman's leadership, were saluting the flag and singing the National Anthem as wholeheartedly as any children in the greater city.

It is too early as yet to appraise the work of this summer. The cards signed by those influenced in the meetings are not filed and classified until after the close of the season in October. Everywhere the meetings have been thronged, interest has been strong and growing, and the results most encouraging.

The following paragraphs culled from reports of the summer's work show something of the nature of the work and its outreach:

One Russian family and seven Russian young men, Bolshevists, reached in open-air meetings, are regular attendants at church services.

"This message has got hold of me, and when I return to Canada I am going to work for young men," said a Canadian business man at the close of an open-air meeting.

THIS summer the general secretary met a student in a missionary training school who said he was converted in one of our tents, and received a call to the ministry.

"Well, I guess that means me," said a young man who was strolling along Fourteenth Street, wondering where he would go, when he heard a cornet playing "Where is my wandering boy tonight?" He stopped at the meeting, listened to the message, returned the next night and accepted Christ.

A leaflet containing the verses of John 3 : 16 and 17 was given to a man by one of our workers, as he was approaching a saloon. He stopped, read the verses, did not go into the saloon, listened to the message at the open-air meetings, and went into a meeting in a nearby mission. That night he slept little. The next day he went to church for the first time in several years. The following Sunday night he returned to the mission and gave himself to Christ. He treasures the leaflet, for it was the thing that led him to Christ.

The Women Who Have No Chance

THE court-room was crowded. There were nearly sixty men to be naturalized. Over fifty of the sixty were from non-English-speaking countries. here were numbers of Italians, Poles, Hungarians nd Lithuanians making up the remainder.

"Wladyslaw Burszynski," called the clerk, "come orward."

A tired-looking Pole, accompanied by his wife and wo witnesses, took his stand before the judge. His onor studied the group as they were sworn.

"Tell me who makes the laws for this country," he aid to Wladyslaw.

"Congress," replied Wladyslaw. "There is a Sen-te and House of Representatives. They meet at Vashington each year."

"Splendid," smiled the judge.

He then addressed the wife. "Do you know the ame of the President?"

There was no answer. The woman glanced in em-arrassment at her husband. He tried to whisper in olish to her but was prevented by the watchful court ttendant.

"What!" exclaimed the judge. "Doesn't this oman speak our language?"

"No, your honor," volunteered one of the witnesses. You see, she don't get out among English-speaking eople. She ain't got a chance."

The judge sighed. "Too bad," he said. "For I ay not make a citizen of this man because his wife ould take his new nationality and become a voter in this state, and we are not going to make citizens of persons who do not speak the English language."

The party walked away in bitter disappointment.

Of the sixty men heard that hot day, nearly twenty of them were refused citizenship for the reason that their wives were unable to speak English—because they "ain't got a chance."

In the city of Buffalo, N. Y., there are hundreds and hundreds of aliens who are being held up on their applications for the foregoing reason, and recently so conspicuous has the situation become that several local women's organizations have taken the matter in hand. The names of 125 petitioners who were so unfortunate as to have non-English-speaking wives in spite of long residence in this country were turned over to the interested agencies, and already good results are being obtained.

The endeavor to help our foreign-born neighbors acquire English is surely a laudable work, and calls for considerable skill; enough to make it interesting. Much depends on the "approach." What can be more absorbing than to scheme ways to "break into" a home that you know will benefit by your efforts? There are a number of devices well understood by the initiate.

Specialize in one race; for instance, the Italians. Acquire a few of their words (how it pleases them!): "Bambino" for "baby"; "Buon giorno" for "good day"; "A rivederci" for "See you again," and so on.

The names of our foreign-born friends, not even excepting the Poles, are not written Solomon and pronounced Nebuchadnezzar. Half an hour with the rules will enable even a beginner properly to pronounce most of them.

Why not, for that matter, study a little elementary ethnology? Learn, for instance, the difference between a Pole and a Hungarian, another way of saying that we should know that Hungarians are Magyars, of ancient Asiatic ancestry; are, in fact, non-Slavic, and cousins of the Finns. All of these peoples have their George Washingtons. To know them is a long step forward in their good graces.

Gain the friendship of some one of the more intelligent women; be neighborly; talk about babies (you'll find plenty of them!). Teach them English by using the dramatic method. Endeavor to connect them with local branches of the public libraries, where they may get books in their own languages as well as ours—for we are not to ask them to forget their own tongues; they have much to teach us.

Warn them against quack doctors, one of the greatest evils in our land, where the foreign-language press, frequently venal to a degree, runs long argumentative advertisements of "fake" physicians.

Do not try to form new organizations for the work. There are plenty already in existence. Offer them your services, if you wish to enroll regularly as a worker in Americanization. The Federal government is about to engage in a nation-wide campaign along this line on a carefully worked out plan, much of which will be heard in the near future.

That there is work for all is shown when it is realized that one-third of all our children have both parents foreign-born, one-third have one parent foreign-born and one native-born, and one-third have both parents native-born. These people use thirty-eight different languages, and over 3,000,000 speak no English at all!

ROY KILMAN.

A NEW PHASE OF CHURCH UNIT

By Rev. FRANK E. HENRY, Glasgow, Montana

A Montana Unity Conference

ECUMENICAL Councils are in vogue once more. One of the notable days of the Christian calendar is July 25, 1919, as on that day was completed the work of the Home Missions Conference of Montana, and the Home Missions Council of Montana was born. The Conference, projected a year and a half ago in New York City, convened in Miles City, Mont., July 8, and again on the 21st in Helena. Sanguine churchmen at the close of the Conference predicted that the meeting would stand out in church history as the beginning of a new era in Christian cooperation. It seemed as though the spirit of Christian brotherhood, which has been so evidently in solution during the last decade of all kinds of interchurch movements, had been suddenly precipitated.

The initial meeting of the Home Missions Conference was held in the Methodist church at Miles City, once a "cow town" on the prairie, and now a bustling little city, "the greatest horse-market in the world." The final meeting was held in the Presbyterian church at Helena, the capital. Helena is like a New England hill town, with narrow, winding business streets, closely built up with five- and eight-story buildings; the residences looking down from terraced boulevards that cling to the mountain sides. During the ten days' interval between the two sessions of the Conference, the members in attendance, except the pastors, divided into three groups, making as many separate tours of the state. The noteworthy feature of these journeyings was the good fellowship engendered, that later proved to be not a small factor in deciding the final movement to cast out the evil spirits of church division.

A MOST encouraging solution of the country town religious problem was found in the "Community Church," usually the only one in a village of from 500 to 800 people. Presbyterians, Methodists and Congregationalists have made this experiment in Montana, and each trial has attained a certain degree of success, to the satisfaction of the members of other churches as well as the denomination holding the church property.

It was one of the recommendations of the Conference that it would be advisable (in most towns of less than 1,000 population, with Catholic and Lutheran parishes and more than one Evangelical church) that the surplus church or churches withdraw in favor of one, to remain as the "Community Church." The withdrawals were to be made by each denomination in turn, so as to maintain the parity of numbers in the state both as to churches and membership. The Conference wisely did not attempt to right all the ecclesiastical wrongs and solve all the religious problems of the day. With rare common sense it left most of the adjustments to the future, its members contenting themselves with simple recommendations of methods of procedure and suggestions of local or denominational conferences to adjust all differences and counter-claims.

ONE definite, positive, revolutionary thing was accomplished, however. The Allocation Committee formed of the home missionary superintendents of the state, divided up the outlying, more or less unchurched, country districts among the several denominations represented. Whether these "mandatories" will be acceptable to the people concerned remains to be seen; but they will be welcomed, in all probability, for the allotments were not arbitrarily made. They followed closely the lines of previous exploitation. Unoccupied territory was given over to the denomination nearest at hand, or most easily able to send forth laborers into the fields.

The complexion of the Conference is indicated by the list of names. These modern Church Fathers are the heads of the national Home Missionary Societies of their respe denominations. Dr. I Barnes (Baptist), of York City, was "Fathe the Council," venerable valiant; Dr. C. E. Bu (Congregationalist), als New York City, a Sau stature, was also an a leader. Other notable ticipants were Dr. Gran Lewis (Disciples), of cinnati, big of heart, the small of body, with a to of flame; Bishop F. W. F (Episcopalian), of Hel democratic and diversifie talents; Bishop Du I (Methodist), of San Fra co, a Southern orator of old school; Dr. B. F. F erton (Presbyterian), of Louis, with the saving of humor; Rev. A. B. Zun of Billings, keen and can representing Montana Lu erans of fifty-seven variet and last but not least, executive secretary of the national Home Missi Council, Dr. A. W. Anthony, of New York C versatile and untiring, who proved to be an encyc pedia of practical knowledge in the Home Missi field. These, with twoscore more well-known past made up the Conference.

THE final organization of the Conference that solved itself into the Home Missions Council Montana resulted in the choice of Rev. G. J. Pow D.D., of Billings, as president. Dr. Powell is st superintendent of Congregational missionary wo Rev. G. Clifford Cress, Baptist superintendent missionary work in Montana, was chosen secreta treasurer. Vice-presidents were chosen from each the other churches—Presbyterian, Methodist (Nor and South), Lutheran, Episcopalian, and Disci It is a noteworthy fact that the three larger denomi tions first named gave the places of honor to the smaller ones. The pastors of the entertaining church Drs. Burdick of Helena and Smith of Miles Ci proved admirable hosts.

The acceptance of a place in future meetings of t Council by representatives of the Lutheran and Ep copalian churches is regarded as assured. Th could not go as far as the others, but their prese gave the ecumenical status to this first Protest Church Council. Its projectors and participants h and expect that it will be followed at no distant d by a National Council, and possibly later by a Wor Conference.

The Rebirth of Boy Wireless

IN NO other country in the world are the amateur wirelessmen so numerous or so skilful as in America. It is estimated that 175,000 amateur stations were in operation throughout the United States before the war. The vast army of youths who taught themselves the complexities of the science proved to be an important factor when the country organized its forces. Now that the great conflict is happily over it is possible for the first time to announce the part they played. During the war a remarkable advance was made in wireless, which was of course carefully guarded. Today the great army of amateur wireless operators will resume their picturesque activities, and with the aid of the new inventions perform new miracles of science.

The antennæ of the amateur wireless stations have been familiar objects in every corner of the United States. One has seen them festooned against the skyline in cities, large and small, or strung from the barns or haystacks in remote farms. The greater part of these 175,000 stations were single affairs, designed and built by ingenious American boys. The apparatus employed was often makeshift and constructed with great economy of material. With the aid of such apparatus, however, hundreds of thousands of American boys taught themselves the principles of wireless electricity and learned to become expert operators.

IT is estimated that perhaps eighty per cent. of these amateur stations were receiving stations; that is, that they listened in on wireless messages, but did not send out any signals. A large proportion of the sending stations were only able to send over a radius of fifty miles or so.

The presence of these stations so widely scattered transformed the United States into a vast whispering gallery. Every day, and especially at night, tens of thousands of schoolboys sat down to their instruments and began an animated conversation with other stations in the neighborhood, or listened in on many interesting messages which were being flashed through the air.

The presence of these countless stations throughout the country led to curious complications. The enthusiastic boy operators often carried on animated conversations which interfered with the sending of government wireless or commercial messages. It became necessary to restrict the sending out of these invisible vibrations, and the government assumed control. The amateurs were obliged to pass examinations and be regularly licensed, and the hours when they could send messages were fixed. When the war broke out the situation became still more difficult. For the first time in history it was discovered the enemy could communicate by the use of wireless, thus overleaping all boundaries. It was decided that the wireless message was contraband of war, and it was dealt with accordingly. Despite the watchfulness of the government it was found that wireless messages were sent from interned ships in American harbors to enemy craft far out to sea.

When America entered the war the government suddenly found itself in urgent need of tens of thousands of experienced wirelessmen to man the new ships of the navy, the transports, the land stations and other posts. It would have required months to train men without experience. No other country in the world drew upon so large a force of self-taught wireless operators. It was found that the amateur wirelessmen with very little training filled the difficult posts with skill and assurance. More than 20,000 of the amateurs were enrolled at the beginning of the war. The government not only saved many millio of dollars, but priceless time in being able to recr this force.

Now that the war is over it is permitted to st that many of the most difficult posts on land and s were filled by self-taught wirelessmen. It was amateur who detected the fact that unneutral me sages were being sent out from the high-power Ge man-owned station at Sayville. The director naval communication during the war was an amate and the chief operator in Washington during th trying period was a civilian. One of the most difficu posts ever held by a wireless man, that of radio ope ator on the NC 4 on its historic trip across the Atlantic, was filled by an amateur, and an amateur w selected to send and receive messages aboard th steamship George Washington when President Wilson crossed the ocean. The list might be continued indefinitely.

WHEN the amateur again opens his stations throughout the country a remarkable new opportunity awaits him. As a result of the discoveries made during the war his work will be more interesting than ever before. At very slight expense the ingenious amateur wirelessman can increase the efficiency of his outfit. Instead of listening in on messages sent out from stations fifty or one hundred miles away, he will now tune his instrument to catch the messages sent ou from the powerful stations at the Eiffel Tower i Paris or that of Nauen in Germany. The American boy on some lonely farm is able to overhear the messages being flashed back and forth across the Atlantic. It is in a sense a reward for all his energy and loyalty during the war, and he can be depended upon to make the most of the opportunity. F. A. COLLINS.

HARVESTING THE BIG RED APPLE

Rapid-Growing Industry in Which 150,000,000 Trees This Year Pay the American Farmer More Than $100,000,000

By EARLE W. GAGE

FOR generations America has been renowned as the home of the juiciest, biggest, crispest red apples. It is within the past decade that raising apples of commercial varieties for pment across the continent and to foreign coun- es has been possible, due to improved refrigeration thods. And with the depletion of the famous old hards of Europe, a new significance presents itself s season; for the American apple-grower must eds answer Europe's demand for fruit.

Although Europe was in the arms of war, our fruit- owers shipped more than $45,000,000 worth of fruit the various countries in 1917; in 1918 this was in- ased to $75,000,000, and it is expected that fully 25,000,000 worth of American-grown fruit will find way across the Atlantic this season, the principal rtion of which will be apples. Our red and yellow ples are more popular in Europe than our wheat, cause there is no substitute for the fruit, while wheat y be purchased of half a dozen countries.

Strange as it may seem, the northwestern section of e United States takes the most prominent position answering Europe's apple demands. The states Washington, Oregon and Idaho, with nearly 15,- 0,000 bearing apple trees, send hundreds of carloads luscious apples across the continent, later to be aded on ships for export. The reason for their adership, in the face of the older ple-growing regions of the East, is at Northwestern leaders have made science of the grading, packing and portation of fruit, abroad, while der growers have rested content with me trade.

Apple-growing in America dates ck to the time of the Indians. Some the old apple orchards still remain New York regions, yet most of em were cut down by General llivan during his raid in the year 79.

TRADITION states that four miles west of Geneva, New York, on the rm of Nathan White, a small nursery sprouts was established in 1792, mong the stumps of an old Indian rchard. On this site and from these prouts an orchard later grew and ourished. And so Ontario County, ew York, has been the birthplace of several varieties our most cherished apples. The Tolman originated n the farm of Thomas Tallman, near Geneva, one of he early settlers, who planted seeds from an Indian rchard. Norton's Lemon, a fruit of excellent quality, hough delicate and somewhat difficult to propagate, riginated about 1800 in the orchard of a Mr. Chap- an, of East Bloomfield. The Northern Spy, an pple occupying a high place in the list of apples of ommercial importance, originated in the same rchard. The valuation of New York's apple crop mounts to approximately $20,000,000 this season, nd there is an increased interest in apple-growing evealed on every hand in the great fruit belt.

Within the last score of years it has been realized hat apples could be produced profitably on a com- nercial scale, not alone in answering the growing domestic demand, but likewise the foreign demand. The introduction of the modern improved varieties, he result of years of careful study and the application f approved scientific methods of culture, as well as he modern apple packages, the barrel and regulation acking-box, and present businesslike methods of distribution, have served to revolutionize the ndustry.

Have you ever strolled down a great city, in he fall season, and noted the rich and amazing displays in the windows of the stores? Did you note that the Oregon and the New York Spitzen- erg, with its riotous, rollicking red, was the entral figure in all the grand displays? And have you ever noticed the large shipments of boxes of rare apples awaiting the sailing of the steamer, to be carried across the sea as a fond reminder of the son who lives in America? Were you impressed with the thought that many of these boxes of fruit had traveled 3,000 miles across the continent, from the apple orchards of Oregon or Washington, in the very shade of the mighty mountain monarchs of the Northwest, and that the same boxes might journey across the Atlantic and across another continent ere they reached their final destination?

DID you ever know that, next to his veneration for his king and the roast beef of Old England, there is lurking in the bosom of every Briton a love for the Yellow Newtown Pippin that impels him to reach to the far ends of the earth for the very best that the earth offers? The best apples on the globe are produced right here in the dear old United States, and all Europe is as much aware of the fact as we are. They are willing to pay high prices in order to secure them. From the very day that our horticulturists realized this fact, commercial apple culture has developed by leaps and bounds. The incentive of high prices, which appreciate from year to year in spite of the rapidly enlarging orchard area, has brought about the employment of new methods of handling orchards in this country, where the gasoline spray engine was first used. The American apple orchards of today are the best and cleanest on earth, and the output is fully deserving of the high prices. The keeping quality is one of the chief requisites in fruit of any variety, and none surpasses American-grown in this important respect.

Owing to the prices realized for our fruits, our landowners are beginning to realize what a bonanza we may have in our orchards, but as yet they do not place anything like a true valuation on their holdings. What valuation can be placed on an orchard which pans out from $500 to $2,500 an acre from a single crop of fruit? Figure the problem out for yourself. Ten acres of the right varieties of apple trees, on the best fruit land will, when in full bearing, produce an average of $3,000 to $6,000 net income a year. Instances are actually occurring each year where even these figures are exceeded.

The first stage of the apple's journey into the big world

This is not an idle dream. The horticultural people are actually doing what the get-rich-quick schemers of the cities promise to do. Many mechanics, merchants and tradesmen of the cities are today developing orchard propositions in the region near their homes with their surplus earnings as a cash deposit, and hope to receive a thousandfold within the next ten years. Their promise was very good before Europe lost her great orchards; it is even more promising now.

WITHIN the last few years one concern has applied its surplus earnings from trade to developing a Newtown orchard in the foothills of Oregon, and had the extreme pleasure of refusing to consider an offer of $35,000 for it within the last year. Another concern has developed a peach and apple orchard in connection with a Newtown orchard, and is now able to sell half of its holding for $15,000.

Practically the entire fruit output, except that from large orchards in Oregon, is marketed through the Fruit Growers' Exchange. This is one of the strongest, most closely welded and economically managed fruit-growers' associations of the coast region. It has systematized and placed the fruit industry on a paying basis; also it has established and maintained a standard that promotes intelligent orchard management, and stands always for better fruit and best prices. The big grower has no advantage over the small grower, which means that the organization is democratic.

Georgia peaches on the way to market, the old Georgia mule replaced by more approved motive power

In this country, as well as in Europe and the Orient, the surface market for apples has scarcely been scratched, but it has widened greatly within the past thirty years. Many who read this can well remember when the apple was principally grown for the cider and vinegar. Yet it is destined to become more popular and of far greater importance commercially than any other three or four fruits grown. As an all-around dessert and culinary fruit it is incomparable. Cold storage has almost doubled the length of the season when it may be eaten. When once the palate demands it, it will be satisfied with no substitute. In fact, there is none. We are turning back to our heritage, for in the days of our great-grandfathers the common adage was, "An apple a day will keep the doctor away." Fruit as a part of the diet represents a most health-giving element.

Without going deeply into statistics regarding apple-growing in the United States, it may be said that the recent census showed upward of 150,000,000 trees in bearing, and more than 65,000,000 trees that will come into bearing within a few years. In this connection it is interesting to note that the geographic division of the country designated as the East North Central (comprising the states of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan and Wisconsin) leads all others in this respect, the number of trees in bearing in these states being reported as follows: Ohio, 8,504,886; Indiana, 5,764,821; Illinois, 9,900,627; Michigan, 7,534,343, and Wisconsin, 2,430,332.

THE figures for trees not in bearing in this region range from one million to three million a state. In productive value of the crop, however, this division is second to the Middle Atlantic division, rated as the most ideal apple-growing section in the world. This division includes New York and Pennsylvania. New York has 15,000,000 trees and Pennsylvania more than 10,000,000 trees. Fruit-growing in New York has assumed such large proportions and has been pursued so long that it is away beyond the experimental stage. There is no state where conditions are more favorable or where the industry is so firmly established as in the Empire State.

So great has the apple industry loomed in New York that the fruit production of this single state represents a value more than $3,000,000 greater than the total valuation of the sub-tropical fruits produced in the United States. New York has a total of 24,988,707 orchard trees, which produce nearly 30,000,000 bushels of fruit, valued at $18,000,000. New York ranks third, exceeded by California and Missouri in number of trees, but ranks second in production, being exceeded only by the Golden Gate State by 2,000,000 bushels, principally due to the fact that the immense prune industry thrives in California. The 15,000,000 apple trees produce more than 7,000,000 barrels of luscious apples, worth on the market more than $15,000,000. And New York ranks first in bushels produced, second in trees.

Mr. Chapman's orchard, in which originated the Northern Spy, not only occupies a unique place in the history of American apple-growing, but its owner a larger place in the hearts of all who are familiar with Mr. Chapman's great contribution to the industry. He was known as "Johnny Appleseed, the apostle of apple-growing." More than a century has passed since "Johnny Appleseed" scattered apple-seeds through a wide range of territory from Pennsylvania to the Mississippi River country.

JOHN CHAPMAN was born in Springfield, Mass., in 1775. About 1801 he emigrated from Massachusetts, joining those forces starting for the yet unknown Western country. In the territory between Massachusetts and Ohio, and as far as Indiana, Mr. Chapman was a familiar figure. He foresaw the tide of immigration going to the West, and, seeing the need of fruit, devoted his life to its culture. Gathering all the apple-seeds he could secure in his native state, he made long trips West, planting the seed and supplying the scattered settlers with enough to provide them with dependable growths. The result was thousands of producing orchards.

A DREAM THAT CAME TRUE

American Jews Prepare a Program for the New Jewish State Which Will Arise in Palestine Und Protection of the Allied Powers

Palestine Hebrew quarters at Mount Zion

THE age-long dream of the Jews of the world—a return of the race to Palestine and the establishment there of an autonomous Zionist state—is at the point of realization. Through the welter of nationalistic jealousies, bitterly contested claims, and acrimonious discussions growing out of the collapse of the Ottoman Empire, the Allied powers have emerged with the assurance of their strongest support for a new Jewish commonwealth in the country of the Jordan and the promise of their aid in the establishment of a state on the broadest lines of social justice.

The political work to assure the recognition of the commonwealth is completed. Official authority for its establishment is promised when the final terms to be imposed on Turkey are prepared. In the meantime the Jewish leaders of the United States are called on to frame a program for government and a plan for the development of the land so that millions of Jews from the centers of oppression in eastern Europe may find there a safe and prosperous haven. The groundwork of the structure has been laid, and at a great convention of the Zionist organization in Chicago in September some conception of the completed state could be obtained. There, leaders like Justice Louis D. Brandeis of the United States Supreme Court, Judge Julien W. Mack of the United States Court of Appeals, Rabbi Stephen S. Wise and Felix Frankfurter, formerly chairman of the War Labor Policies Board, labored in committees for the perfection of what they confidently predict will be the ideal commonwealth. Justice Brandeis and Professor Frankfurter were members of a mission which passed several months this year in Palestine and Paris, and their conclusions reached the convention in the form of this report from the Committee on Committees:

"Mr. Justice Brandeis and Professor Felix Frankfurter appeared at a joint executive session of the Committee on Committees in order to give the various committees which are to draft resolutions for presentation to the convention the benefit of their observations in Palestine and Paris.

"TAKING into consideration the statement made, the Committee on Committees begs to report to the convention the following:

"First, that the political situation concerning Jewish Palestine is eminently satisfactory.

"Second, that the period of practical, preparator work in Palestine has begun. The forms which this work should take are suggested to be:

"A. A campaign against malaria, to be waged vigorously in advance of any extensive immigration;

"B. The purchase of lands on an extensive scale by the Jewish National Fund, the Zion Commonwealth, Inc., and other land-purchasing corporations of the Zionist movement;

"C. A forest station to prevent the encroachment of sand, to stabilize the rainfall, and to provide a timber supply;

"D. Irrigation;

"E. Strong financial support should be given to the Hebrew University.

"Third, Palestine can eventually contain a very large population. The lines of development of Palestine should be agricultural, industrial, and commercial. In order that these may be accomplished, considerable investigation and preparatory study of the land must be made.

"Fourth, the privilege of the task of laying the foundation of a Jewish Palestine is accorded to the Jews of America owing to the present economic condition of the Jews of eastern Europe.

"Fifth, the principle for which the Zionists have been striving during these past twenty-three years having actually been sanctioned by public and official opinion, political discussion should cease. Every Jew can be and should be invited to join in all of the practical tasks that must be undertaken for the development of a Jewish Palestine.

"Sixth, this development will require vast sums of money, which only the masses, including labor and capital, are rich enough and strong enough to raise. Therefore, all present differences of opinion within the movement and concerning the movement must be forgotten, and all the Jews of the world must participate in this great work.

"Seventh, the development of Jewish Palestine in its entirety can be carried out, and at the same time the condition and welfare of the other peoples in Palestine be greatly improved."

Democracy is the ideal of the Zionists for their commonwealth, and there will be scrupulous regard for the rights of the non-Jewish element who in addition to the 150,000 Jewish colonists make up the present population of Palestine. This thought, ever present in the minds of the delegates, found its expression at the convention in the formal statement prepared by Mrs. Mary Fels, in which she said, as spokesman for the convention:

"With the full ideal of democracy before us, we must proceed carefully and without undue haste in the application of progressive principles to the land situation in Palestine. It is now generally agreed that the highest interests of the new Jewish nation would be compromised by private speculation and monopoly in the soil. As the process of setting up the new government goes on, the establishment of law and order with all the benefits of modern civilization will at once be reflected in a tremendous rise of land values, which must not be permitted to fall into the grasp of commercial exploitation, but must be preserved for the good of the whole community by a wise and cautious statesmanship.

"THE danger of too hasty action is illustrated in the case of the native Arab elements of the country. The Arabs now hold about one-half the soil. Over ninety-five per cent. of them are illiterate, and could not be quickly adapted to a new system of land tenure and taxation.

"For this reason it is proposed temporarily to ignore the Arabic real estate, and to apply progressive principles to the Turkish crown lands acquired by British conquest, and to the property of the non-Arabic part of the population. In reference the we propose to exempt improvements from taxati and in lieu thereof to take the ground rental value government purposes.

"This plan of action will at once free the n Arabic real estate from the evils of private spec tion, and by assuring a reasonable supply of land immediate bona fide settlement, will prevent Arabic land from acquiring a speculative, mono listic value. This Arabic land can then be either p chased at a low price and nationalized, or as t Arabs gradually come to understand our good fa and purpose it can be organized under the same ru of taxation and tenure previously applied to the n Arabic real estate.

"By taking such precautions we shall avoid fr tion and possible conflict with t native elements; and in shaping c course with a view to the conditi actually prevailing, we shall mo steadily toward fundamental dem cracy."

What steps have already be taken toward the upbuilding of Jewish Palestine was reported Robert Szold, secretary of the Zion Administrative Commission, which now functioning the land.

"FOLLOWING the arrival of t American representatives of t Commission in February, 1919, i activities were organized into perm nent departments," he said. "Th Finance Department was first cr ated. A budget system, sou financial methods of appropriatio disbursement and accounting, which must b the heart and foundation of any large unde taking, are now established. About $100,000 a spent for current needs monthly, in addition to t $70,000 war relief moneys now furnished monthl by the Joint Distribution Committee.

"The Department of Agriculture supervises d rectly the agricultural work of thirty-one cooperati groups; furnishes the colonists with new and in proved methods of agriculture, horticulture, cattl keeping and bee-keeping. It has begun the work o reafforestation. Over $200,000 was spent by th department last year.

"The Department of Education has already estab lished a school system embracing 86 schools, 46 teachers, and schools where, from the kindergarte to the gymnasium, 11,319 pupils are taught in He brew. The budget for this department during th past year was over $350,000. It is significant tha when so much money is urgently required for materia needs, this largest item of the first budget should b for education.

"The Department of Engineering is now draining the marsh near the National Fund Cooperativ Colonies of Kenereth and Degania, so that the ma laria source in that district may be permanently re moved. During August $30,000 was appropriate for that purpose.

"THE Medical Department embraces the work o the Hadassah or American Zionist Medica Unit. This department is thoroughly establishe under American direction and now represents a fin American achievement. Within the sphere of its activities are modern hospitals, out-patient clinics direct medical relief, sanitary inspection, anti-malaria and anti-trachoma operations. Of the annual budget of much over $400,000 the Joint Distribution Committee is furnishing $200,000. It is typical of American enterprise that medical attention and the promotion of sound health conditions are prime considerations.

"Other activities of your organization in Palestine—for labor and immigration, trade and industry, relief, the building of the main sewer and disposal works in Jerusalem, the support of various cooperative enterprises, the Jewish battalions, need not be catalogued. Enough has been reported to show that there already exists a quasi-government—an officially established and recognized institution for carrying out our practical work.

"Problems no doubt will arise without number. We may have questions incident to industrial development if that business boom occurs in the next few years which I expect. But one who has been to Palestine, and caught the spirit of the Jews there can have no doubt that the problems will be solved and that our ideals of a Jewish commonwealth based on social justice will triumph.

"It remains for the American Zionist organization to combine the practical with the ideal, so our American Jews should assume responsibility for furnishing the material assistance and organization ability which will permit our prayers and faith to be translated into concrete reality."

Birthplace of Hawthorne

Where Nathaniel Hawthorne was born in Salem, Mass.

THIS is the place where Nathaniel Hawthorne, one of America's foremost novelists, was born in Salem, Massachusetts, and that quaint old city is justly proud of her distinguished son. In the Salem customhouse, where he once served as a surveyor, he began to write "The Scarlet Letter," and the desk which he used in his literary work is preserved in the Essex Institute in his native city. "The House of the Seven Gables" is still standing, and is used for social settlement work. Hawthorne was born on July 4, 1804, and this old house, built before 1685, is the place where he first saw the light. Wasn't he patriotic to elect to be born on Independence day?

HE FOUR PARTIES TO INDUSTRY

nalysis of the Claims Labor, Capital, Management and the Public Have on the World's Production

By W. L. MACKENZIE KING

HE shock of war, stirring the world's soul to its very depths, has brought before our eyes the shattered image of an industrial civilization which is full of injustice. It has left us e whether the new order shall be little more eturn to the old, with all its worship of materi- h and material power, and its relative in- e to human worth and human well-being; ier it will be an order worthy of the sacrifices eroic dead, and of those who, on land and sea, dured all manner of hardship and peril to pre- e liberties and freedom that we still enjoy.

is be assured of this: the unrest in the f industry today is no ephemeral and ry affair; no mere aftermath of the convulsion which has shaken existing to its very foundations. It is the voice ef-stricken humanity crying for justice elations of industry. Let us be equally that the sword is not the instrument, ression not the method, to stay this The truth is mightier than the sword, conference and cooperation between all in interest, not in coercion of the by any one, lies the only hope of an e solution.

hall reach no understanding of the prob- industry until we adequately appreciate ndustry itself is, and who the parties t are responsible for the carrying on of y.

stry is the means by which the material es of the world are transformed, through intelligence and human energy, with the atural powers, tools, and machines, into dities and services available for human It is a vast process of transformation, series of transforming processes so inter- and numerous as to unite mankind, in e of world-wide industrial expansion, in erprise that encompasses the globe.

ARE accustomed to discuss the problems of industry in terms of Capital and Labor. ability to find a workable solution to of these problems arises from a vision circumscribed, and an ignoring of other equal in significance and importance. ry on industry in any but the most primi- kind of way, four parties, discharging te and distinct functions, are necessary. t of all, there is Labor, which supplies uscular and mental energy necessary to the processes of immediate transformat there is Capital, which is necessary to le raw materials, the tools, appliances, uipment essential to industrial processes e advances in the way of food, clothing, helter required by Labor pending the dis- ion of the finished product.

en there is Management, or Directing y. So frequently has Management been ated with the ownership of capital, that the ty of the former has more or less been merged e latter. However, a moment's reflection is ent to disclose the complete dissimilarity of ion between the two. Managerial ability is in ture of personal service of the very highest , and is wholly necessary, not only to bring about nt cooperation between Labor and Capital in ork of production, but also to effect and maintain relations with the fourth party, without whose ration in all that pertains to industry the other parties could accomplish little or nothing.

e fourth party is the Community, that entity we speak of sometimes as organized society, whose sanction all industry is carried on, and ose continuous cooperation with the other parties dustry production, distribution, and exchange endered possible.

t only are the four parties necessary to industry, they are equally necessary to one another. tal can do nothing without Labor. Labor can othing without Capital. Neither Labor nor tal can cooperate effectively in industry save the guiding genius of Management; and Man- ment, however great its genius, can do nothing from the opportunities and leges the Community affords.

ur present organization of in- ry in any way suggestive of a ership in which Labor, Capital, agement, and the Community are rded as interrelated and interdepen- . Far from it, as everyone knows has given the organization of stry a moment's reflection. I am ing, of course, only with the domi- types of large industrial organiza- , for it is mainly from this source our present problems arise; trans- tion, manufacturing, mining, etc.

So far as control goes, it is all in the nature of monopoly, and that a monopoly of control on the part of Capital.

The owners of capital, the capital investors, choose the Board of Directors; the Board of Directors choose the Management and dictate the policies. The Management regards itself as responsible solely to Capital. Labor and the Community become a consideration only in so far as they are able to make their power felt.

Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King is the new Liberal Leader of Canada, succeeding to the position held so long by the late Sir Wilfrd Laurier. Mr. King was born at Kitchener, Ontario, in 1874, and is a namesake of the great leader who took so prominent a part in making politics many years ago

It is this monopoly on the part of Capital in the control and direction of industry that has led to the developments that are described as socialistic, ultra-radical, and even anarchistic. More than any other factor, it lies at the root of the industrial upheavals of the present time. The other parties to industry, though feeling themselves entitled to be regarded as partners, have despaired of gaining any measure of joint control by concession. They have felt themselves driven to exact by force what they believe to be their rightful dues. In the case of Labor, this demand for recognition in the control of industry has asserted itself in the form of strikes. In the case of the Community it has taken the form of arbitrary enactment, leading to an assumption of single control by the state or municipality.

What is the Socialistic State, or Collectivism, which is its industrial expression, other than industry so organized as to transfer industrial control from Capital to the Community, to the exclusion of the other parties? Under the Socialistic State, the government would choose the managers of industry, would own the instruments of production, levying taxation where more Capital was required, and would fix the wages of Labor and the prices at which commodities are to be sold.

HERE, on this page, we have the careful, matured judgment of a man who knows both sides of the industrial problems which the world is facing. The Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King is the author of "Industry and Humanity"; he was formerly Canadian Minister of Labor, and he has just been named to succeed Sir Wilfrid Laurier as the leader of the Liberal Party. Mr. King's proposal for a four-party control of industry will be well worth a study at this time of economic unrest.

The war has revealed that the Socialistic State, which many workers have been led to believe is certain to be beneficent and idealistic, may become the most bureaucratic and autocratic of agencies, holding within its power the lives and freedom of men, as well as the conditions of their employment. Germany has given that object-lesson to the world.

The little there has been of state control during the War has also revealed that the substitution of political managers for industrial managers is not likely to be the best for either industry or the state. Of that, all countries have had a taste.

What are the extreme movements on the part of Labor but a similar reaction against the monopoly of Capital control? In its most violent forms, this reaction has found expression in Revolutionary Syndicalism, Bolshevism, and certain forms of I. W. W.-ism, where, in addition to the ignoring of Capital and Management as parties to industry, the Community is also ignored, and Red Terror used to supplant Reason in all that pertains to the accomplishment of lawless designs.

Guild Socialism is similarly a reaction on the part of Labor against monopoly of control on the part of Capital. Like State Socialism, it would rule out Capital's right to joint control just as effectively as Capitalism seeks to rule out Labor's right to joint control; but as the predominant factor in control it would substitute national guilds for the state. Industrial unions would select the managers, own the capital, and determine alike wages and prices.

In protesting against an actual monopoly of control by Capital under Capitalism, and a possible monopoly of control by the state under Socialism, Guild Socialism would establish a monopoly of control by Labor under National Industrial Guilds. This is a natural reaction. It represents the extreme of the protest by a militant Labor Unionism against the monopoly of control by Capital.

But the cure for monopoly of control by one of the parties to industry is not to be found in the substitution of monopoly of control by one of the other parties; it lies in the destruction of monopoly altogether. It is to be found in the substitution of joint control for single control.

Single control, whether it be by Capital, Labor, or the state, sooner or later is certain to mean autocratic control.

IT IS not monopoly of control in any form that we must seek to bring about in this period of transition, but a gradual evolution into a system of joint control, whereby each of the parties to industry will be afforded a voice in the determination of the terms and conditions upon which its services to industry are rendered.

And is not joint control by all the parties to industry in every way eminently wise, as well as fundamentally just? Is it not in every way, in the long run, to the interests of industry, and to the interests of each of the parties to industry?

No one of the parties stands to lose quite so much through a continuance of the struggle arising out of the monopoly of control by Capital as Capital itself. As things are today, it is at Capital, and at Management identified with Capital, that the stones are being blindly hurled. War-ridden, hungry, and penniless men and women have witnessed the wanton extravagance of many of those possessed of luxury. They have become bewildered with a condition which enables an idle investor to reap a fortune while the masses toil excessive hours for a bare subsistence. They have lost sight altogether of the services of Capital and Management in witnessing the debauchery of indolence combined with riches, and the unearned millions of the profiteers.

But let the service that Capital and Management are capable of rendering industry once be lost to sight, and industry itself will be ruined, and with it the well-being of Labor and the Community as well. What is needed is, not the ruination of Capital and Management, but that each be given its rightful place in a system of the government of industry which will make for the good of all the parties to production.

Not a little of the militant attitude on the part of Labor and impatience on the part of the public with the present order of industry is due to a feeling that some managers fail to render to industry any service at all commensurate with the enormous salaries they receive, and to a belief that the interests of Labor and of the Community alike are sacrificed to incompetence and extravagance, which would not be permitted were all four parties to industry allowed some voice in the shaping of industrial policy.

In the emancipation of Management from the single control of any one of Ten Qualities I Want My Child to Hav

By LUCIAN MORT

FIRST. Attention. He concentrates himself on whatever he is doing, whether it is reading, playing, or gardening. This is a valuable quality for my child to have when we consider the hurry and distractions of American life, and the highstrung, impulsive American temperament.

Second. Imagination. He likes color, symbols, mythology, "once-upon-a-timeness," rhythm, "making believe," and dramatics. He loses himself in the boys' edition of the Iliad, the Odyssey, the tales of King Arthur, Robin Hood, the Lang Fairy Books, and tales of Arabia, India, and Japan. The Crusaders and the Saints are real people to him.

Third. Language. He is sensitive to words, and can express himself freely out loud and on paper in his own vivid way, childlike though it is. He is quick at picking up conversational French, Italian, or Spanish, with the aid of teachers, some of whom are resident governesses, while he is yet a primary scholar. By the time that he enters high school he is actually reading Latin and Greek. He has absorbed his classical grammar while his mind is pliable and his memory strong. He began his Latin at eight, and his Greek at ten.

Fourth. Music. He has not the voice of a solo chorister, but he can sing pleasantly by note, he can read music at sight, he can play the piano pretty well, and he thoroughly likes good music.

Fifth. Outdoors. He is fond of sports and camping, and is plucky in them, especially when he is up against a superior player, or running a risk in the woods.

Sixth. Innocence. It is impossible for even a very young schoolboy to be ignorant of evil, but this lad has a wholesome, childlike mind, i. e., his thoughts quickly turn from evil and toward something different and better. He is not precocious nor sophisticated, as so many American city children are. His mind is not burning itself out too quickly. He is not grown-up nor unnaturally wise and bright. He is not a prodigy, but well-balanced and normal, according to the age of childhood which he has reached. He is a child, and remains one as long as he ought to remain. His quality of innocence also means that he has the delightful spontaneity and self-unconsciousness that we note so gratefully among the children of France, Italy, and the Tyrol, and miss very much among our American children of the great cities in the North and the Middle West. Far Western and Southern youngsters are more often genuine children, we are happy to note.

Seventh. Truth. My boy's truthfulness is something deeper than an absence of fibbing and slyness. He looks at people, and life in general, with a simple, direct gaze. He is entirely himself. He is not given to "company manners," an excellence he shares with the children of France. He sees truth in allegory and the parables of the New Testament, but in every-day dealings, at school and at home, he does not mix fact with fiction. Nor is he subject to the delusions of self-love.

Eighth. Affection. He not only loves his parents, his relatives, and his mates, but he likes to show his affection openly, in endearing ways, such as little surprises, and plannings—beforehand. He thinks nothing of throwing his arms about his mother's neck in full view of a roomful. At school he looks out for smaller boys, and queer boys, who are the butts for teasing. Unlike so many American Eastern boys, and more after the fashion of the wholesome Middle West, he is good to his younger brothers and sisters, and unmistakably proud of them. His affectionate nature leads him to be courteous and well-mannered. But our boy's good manners do not imply that he is shy, silent, and says little save "Yes, Mr. So-and-so," in a deferential tone. He is chatty enough but does not "keep showing off." That is, he is unconscious, in the best sense of the word.

Ninth. Cheerfulness. He gets up sleepy, but good-humored. He has a merry laugh. He sees the amusing side of things, but not to the extent of making fun of those whose feelings are evidently hurt. He has something else to say and do when his companions start "getting off" the wrong sort of jokes or stories. But he is not a prig. He doesn't stop to call people down, or say "Don't." His method is one of substitution rather than of elimination.

Tenth. Reverence. He is spiritually-minded. He has a sense of the Presence of God and the Holy Angels. In entering a Church building, his whole manner instinctively changes. He does not have to be told to subdue himself, and act differently from what he would do at a lecture, a schoolroom, or the movies. He prays. He likes to pray. He feels the necessity of prayer as an act of love to God and trust in him, as a thanksgiving for specific mercies, and on behalf of those in sickness or trouble. He learned to pray on his knees with folded hands. Unless he is sick in bed, he would not dream of "kneeling on his forehead," or sitting bolt upright, unless he is traveling. When he passes an open church, between services, he makes a little visit to our Lord even though his words be few, such as: "Dear God, I love you. Dear God, I am sorry for my sins. Dear God, make poor Harry better. They took him to the hospital this morning."

He has a sense of mystery. He likes to attend the services of his church. He likes both the words and the music of the hymns and other selections. If the sermon is uninteresting, he occupies his mind with the stories that the stained glass windows, etc., have to tell. To him, as to the Venetian, the church building and the service are a jeweled and richly illuminated book of the Holy Gospels. He delights in reading the lives of good kings, peasants, missionaries, and martyrs.

God, the devil, sin, prayer, confession, forgiveness, are all realities. His conscience is tender, but not morbid. He is reverent because he loves God, and has a tender affection for the Holy Child Jesus, for Our Lord in the wilderness, and for our suffering Redeemer along his way of sorrow to the Cross. The boy feels that his sin is a grief and a disappointment to the loving Saviour, who has done everything for him. I believe him implicitly when he tells me that more than once, during some silence, our Lord has called him by name; and that more than once he has visited him during his dreams.

Postscript

NEEDLESS to say, my child is not a model of those virtues and qualities which I have outlined under the ten points! But I have seen children who possess a number of these excellences, and I have known a few (thank God) who nearly approach the standard that I have indicated, without being free from faults, or painful little prodigies and phenomena.

The trouble with most of us parents is, not that our ideals for our children are too high, or high enough, but that we spoil them, either by fussing over them too much, or leaving them too much to themselves. We get blind to their faults, and then we say, after the crash has come: "At any rate, I made my mistakes in love."

We all see so many spoiled children belonging to other people that we feel perfectly competent to tell our neighbors exactly what is the matter with their children's bringing up. When it comes to our own children—that is different. Many a time I have heard mothers indignantly deny the doings of little Cadwalader, whose ways are notorious to teachers, companions, neighbors, and every one, apparently, except his own mother. Why, even his father is slightly aware of how his boy is "cutting up!"

The average American boy is too self-conscious to talk and act with real freedom in the presence of his parents and relatives. Notice, I say, "real freedom." Many children are gay, laughing, and apparently frank. Their true selves come out when no grown person, however popular, is around. But as a rule, it is the school teacher, or the pal, who could open the eyes of the parent as to what his boy is really like. But neither the teacher nor the pal cares to be too much of a tattletale. Now I am not implying for a moment that the child is what the world would call "bad."

Many good mothers harm their children by nagging them, and showing their anxieties too plainly. Wise parents don't talk too much to their children, don't scold too long, or explain too carefully, etc. They go ahead, and read and play with the child, and camp out with him, and let him bring home plenty of boys. They don't let him become a movie "fan," but they limit his attendance, not by mere "don'ts," but by providing an interesting substitute, such as the Boy Scouts, the Knights of King Arthur, home games and theatricals, etc.

WE MUST acknowledge that the average American child is what might be expected as a product of our hurry and greed for money—qualities that are just as much a sin of the poor and moderately well-off as of the rich.

Family life becomes extraordinarily difficult for the dweller in a big apartment house. Such a place breeds bad manners, distrust, and unneighborliness. On the other hand, the American farmer is too often so taken up with his bank account that he lives in an untidy house, sinks into coarse and boorish ways, works his wife to death, and regards his children as so many chore-machines and miniature cooks and farmhands. Or if he gets prosperous and is fairly good-natured, he goes on living a sloppy existence, feeling quite above the "airiness" of some people who are showing off by putting on city ways. I once visited the ranch house of a cattle king, who was supposed to be agreeable and good to his family. I have no doubt he was, but after amassing his fortune he was content to go on housing his young and growing family in an unpainted dwelling of soapbox architecture, set in a welter of rusty, discarded farm implements, old shoes, tin cans and desolation. There were but few books in the house, but there were crumbs, jelly, dirt, malodors, a talking machine and an automobile, the last named article being specially devoted to trips to town for the purchase of groceries.

ACK YARDS By Margaret E. Sangster

EARLY all of the houses are alike on the street where I live. They are brownstone city houses with long windows and high stoops—old-fashioned, rather, and com- e to look at. In the summertime awnings ndow boxes are the only marks that distin- hem one from the other; in the winter, when rtains and heavy draperies are up, they seem hingly similar. They are always quietly under the pale springtime sunlight—peace- sleep in the afterglow of the autumn.

n one walks down the length of the street stranger the lack of difference in the houses ight home very forcibly. For the stranger laughs, and says—

w can you ever tell which house you live in? if I had to come back here alone I'd never y way! Don't you ever get confused—par- ly when it's growing dark and the lamps lighted? I would never be able to get ıtened out!"

case like this one points out forcibly to the er that the houses are not alike. One points all subtle differences. But underneath the ousness of those differences lies the realiza- at the stranger is right. For the houses are They show, every one of them, a bland. ace to the world. They are smugly respect- complacently commonplace, utterly devoid inality. No stranger could help wondering, walked down the length of the street, if the ho live in them are as devoid of character as uses.

t is what the stranger thinks of the houses r block—and the people who live in those . But we who know the houses intimately— re a part of them—find them divertingly nt.

U can tell a great deal more about a house— nd the people who live in that house—from ack of it than you can from the front of it. e front of a house is apt to be on dress parade apt to have its hair neatly brushed and its tied and its fingernails manicured; and the of the house—which is not on dress parade— to be overwhelmingly natural.

ne of the back yards on our street have trically arranged flower beds and trim little bordered walks. On wash days, in these back , the clothes are hung out to dry upon neat clotheslines that are strung from shining . And the windows above these back yards leasantly curtained and as speckless as the windows. But there are other back yards that never a flower—that are just sandy heaps of asantness. And the windows above these yards are often not so good to look upon as ont windows of the same houses. Curtains— re are curtains—often hang awry in these ws, and the glass of them is sometimes ged.

e people who live in the houses on our street characteristics and fads which show in their yards. One woman raises violets and another s much of her time playing in a sandbox two round-cheeked babies. The man four s up raises fish—a queer pastime that one never suspect from his filet lace drawing- curtains. He can, at almost any time, be leaning absorbedly above their round glass —watching their aimless swimming and their tain growth. And the woman who lives doors away, in the other direction, displays a temper, at times, that the rose draperies of her parlor do not match.

One gets close to people through the medium of back yards—and it's not easy to get close to people in a city. One gets to know just names where, through the front door, one would never get nearer than the engraved title on a shiny bit of pasteboard. One gets into the way of sharing other people's hopes and fears, of praying that their dearest dreams may come true. One finds out which of them love children and which of them are kind to dogs and little kittens.

IT'S easy enough, friends of mine, to keep the front of our houses neat and clean and above reproach. It's easy enough to see that the front room curtains are hung evenly, that the windows are immaculate, that the flower boxes are filled with gay blossoms. It's easy enough to keep our houses looking so much like other people's houses that a stranger, passing casually along the Street of Life, would have a hard time in finding any mark of difference. A stranger passing casually along would be quite likely to remark, "How can you find your way about? Every house looks the same to me!"

But the world is not made up of strangers who pass casually down Life's street. It is made up of friends who want to enter into your house—to really know you. It is made up of friends who—unless you want to lead the blankest sort of a life—will win their way past your front door and your ultra-correct front windows. It is made up of friends who, whether you want them to or not, will see into the back yard of your house.

And so, it's rather worth while to keep that back yard in order. It's rather worth while to have the walks neatly swept and a flower or two blooming. It's rather necessary—if you want your friends to admire you—to have the windows that look out upon that back yard shining, to have the curtains hung as attractively as the front curtains are hung. And as for the fads and the characteristics that are bound to show to the friends who get far enough into your house to be familiar with the back yard of it—well, it's rather important to have those characteristics above reproach and the fads lovable fads.

A GOOD many political campaigns have been lost because politicians are sometimes not so careful of their back yards as they are of the windows that look blandly out upon life's street. A bit of half-forgotten rubbish, left in a back-yard trashpile, can cause a great deal of trouble if an opposing newspaper gets hold of it. Not a few brilliant careers have ended prematurely because a back yard had not always been kept in order. More than one apparently happy home has been broken because the back windows were not as shiny-spotless as the front windows.

And so, when you're putting your house in order—no matter whether it's your brownstone house on a city street, or the house of your character, or the house of your mind and heart—put it in order in a uniform way. Don't make the front of it attractive because you are expecting folk to form their opinions from the front; make it attractive because it stands for the rest of the house. Because, no matter how carefully you guard your front door—unless you are a very unpleasant person indeed—some one, some time, is bound to know you well enough to get past that front door and into that part of the house from which he can see the back yard.

The Lady Across the Court

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

SHE only comes when night is near,
And stands a moment quietly
Beside her window, in the dusk—
She lives across the court from me—
And, though I cannot see her eyes,
Because she is too far away,
I somehow feel that they are kind,
And very soft, and widely gray!

Her hands are only dim white blurs,
That rest against the window pane;
And yet I know that they are firm,
And cool and sweet as April rain.
And, oh, I cannot help but wish
As, through the dark, I go to bed,
That they might rest a moment like
A little prayer upon my head!

She only comes when night is near,
I do not know who she can be;
I never see her anywhere
But just across the court from me. . . .
I am so small the curtains hide
The wistful smiles that I have smiled,
And yet I, somehow, think she feels
The love of me—a lonely child.

A Heathen Ruler Won to Christ

By Rev. C. W. POSNETT, Medak, Nizam's Dominions, India

IAVE to report a great conquest for the Gospel f Christ up in the District of Nirmal, beyond the iver Godavery. Farther down the river, one red miles away in Asafabad, we have won nearly) converts in the last two years, but here in al, right from the first, the very powers of dark- themselves seemed to withstand our crossing. ave won village after village on this side, but the chief of nine villages just beyond the ford has the very beginning withstood us. Three years when we went to visit his village, every one in the ge fled away into the forest, and though we went village to village, we never could see any of the le and never once had the chance to preach the el. God, however, has shown us the road in his marvelous way.

ree hundred years ago, the Rajah of Nirmal d the Nizam of Hyderabad, and after long con- ed warfare, two dancing girls, with packets of on hidden in their clothes, were smuggled across iver, and, appearing before the Rajah during an ight feast with dancing and music, they man- to slip those fatal packets into his wine. That the enemy crossed the river and took possession e castle and the kingdom of Nirmal.

t by poison nor by violence was the triumph won of which I am now telling. Yet it was far more wonderful. For two years, the great chief of the village of Madapuram, just opposite the ford, has withstood the missionaries. He was taken very ill a year ago. The village barber, after cutting him with merciless cruelty under the name of surgery, at last told his people that the great chief must die. The big man had become a skeleton. Worms crept in and out of his wounds, and his son, in order that the noble house might not be defiled by a dead body, lifted him on a grass bed and carried him out to a shed to die.

Our doctor and evangelist, chancing to pass by, saw that the man was dying for the lack of antiseptic surgical treatment. As the case was given up by the barber, they allowed the doctor to try his modern methods. The wounds were washed and then bathed with carbolic lotion and soothing balms were applied. They gave the patient hot milk and coffee and watched with him all through the night. Soon the man who had cursed us and refused to allow our evangelists to preach in his villages was anxious to hold the hands of his benefactors, and with tears streaming down his face strove to thank them for their kindness. Within three days he was carried back into the house, with every promise of recovery.

Ten days later, when I arrived, he was brought on a bed to see me. When I wished to shake hands with him, he begged me to lay my hand upon his head and to bless him in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ.

My colleague and friend, Mr. Subrahmanyam, came with me to baptize the first converts. Both he and I were amazed by the splendid spiritual preparation. They knew the story of Christ from beginning to end. Before the service I asked the chief elder whether there were any idols in their houses, and he confessed at once that there was one large idol in the front of his house, where all the outcaste worship has been conducted. He willingly conducted me to the house, and with his own hands removed the ugly stone idol and gave it to me saying: "We need this no more, for now we trust in the Lord Yesu Swami."

After completing the examination of the people, Subrahmanyam and I baptized the first 200 converts. So we record tonight the first fortress conquered in this new District of Nirmal beyond the Godavery. Three hundred years ago they conquered by dancing girls, wine and poison. Today we have conquered by love and the Gospel.

THE DAILY MEDITATION

The Soul's Escape and Freedom

SUNDAY. Ps. 124 : 7. "Our soul is escaped as a bird out of the snare of the fowlers." Mr. Figgis, in the last of his books, tells us of a man who is not a Christian, but who regarded the whole meaning of religious experience as summed up in these words of the Psalmist. And most certainly these words do suggest the great redemptive facts of escape and freedom. The soul becomes enmeshed in the net of circumstances, the fettering tyranny of sin and guilt and worldliness, and it cannot get away. The more it struggles the more it is entangled, like a bird which is caught in the net. The only hope of deliverance is by some strong and gentle interposition which will lift us out of the net, and give to us the joy of winged freedom.

It is this entanglement which constitutes life's servile bondage. Our souls are so often caught in the net. Our feet are fast and we cannot use our wings. We are scarcely pedestrians, and we were intended to be the "birds of God." We are in worldly bondage though God purposed that we should "mount up with wings as eagles." And the trouble is, we think that by struggling with our bondage we shall gain our freedom. Yes, we say, "I really won't let things get such a hold on me!" Or we say, "I am going to hold things more at arm's length!" Or we say to ourselves, "I must deal strongly with that hand; I must show that I am the master." But we just go stumbling on, and the net is winding itself ever more desperately about our souls.

Let us listen to one who escaped. "Mine eyes are unto the Lord, for he shall pluck my feet out of the net." That is how we find our deliverance. It is not ours to do the plucking up, it is ours to do the looking up. God will look after our feet if we look after our eyes. The soul that turns to the Lord finds a sure escape.

I can imagine nothing better for us to do than to read all that is said in the Word of God about the glorious freedom which God purposes for his children. Let us read about the vast inheritance of the saints of light. Let us read about the height and depth and length and breadth of the love of God in which we are to live and move and have our being. What a heaven of a home for the soul to soar in! And then let us read about the things which God hath prepared for them that love him. And then let our eyes begin to wander over the unsearchable riches of Christ. And when we are getting some expanded sense of the freedom which is ours in Christ, let us look at the miserable nets in which we are entangled. Aye, let us look at them until we are ashamed of our shame. And then surely our eyes will be unto the Lord, and we shall cry for our salvation. And the Lord will lift our feet out of the nets, whether they be dirty nets of passion, or the seductive nets of vanity, or the small wiry nets of petty cares; he will lift us out of the nets. And when our feet are free we shall find we are provided with wings. J. H. J.

Companionships in Heaven

MONDAY. John 14 : 2. "I go to prepare a place for you." Heaven is a prepared place for a prepared people. From which we conclude that our associations in the future life will be determined by the company we prefer to keep here and now. What we call death is no calamity but merely an incident in life. The only reason why we face it with reluctance is because it ends probation; as it is written, "He that is unjust let him be unjust still, and he that is holy let him be holy still." It marks the parting of the ways where, "being let go" from the temporary conditions and limitations of this world, we seek our "own company." There are only two places where we can go: and it is for us to say which it shall be.

Where, my friend, do you want to go? To heaven? Its twelve gates are never closed, and whosoever will may enter in. But that "will" and that "want to" make it a moral impossibility for the unprepared to enter in. If your habits and associations here are such as to crystallize your character in wickedness, what would you have in common with "the spirits of just men made perfect?" Imagine yourself at one of those open gates, listening to the song "Worthy art thou who hast redeemed us by thy blood!" Could you sing it? And consider what they are doing there. "His servants do serve him—as ministering spirits, sent forth to minister unto them that are heirs of salvation." Would that be a congenial occupation for you? If not, "Let me go hence," you would cry; "this is no place for me!" D. J. B.

TUESDAY. Acts 1 : 14. "These all with one accord continued in prayer." Our Lord's way of launching his Church was not what we would have expected. After rising from the dead, he showed himself, as he does today, to the few only; and all his followers, when gathered to see him, only numbered about five hundred, and this on a single occasion. He did not desire a vague, casual, and shallow testimony to his miracles. "Be ye witnesses of Me" were his last words—of my Person, as greater than my works; and such witnesses were selected with infinite care from those who really knew him. With supreme wisdom he was ready that the world should see no beauty in him, provided that, for the moment, these few should see him clearly as the King in his beauty. This was his method, and we do well to note it.

Our harvest thanksgivings are celebrated when the last sheaf is gathered in —we walk by sight, not by faith—leaving little to what men call "chance." Pentecost was observed when the earliest little shoots—"the first-fruits" of the Father's goodness—rose above the ground skyward. It was the beginning only of that growth to harvest of which the final gathering would be when our Lord thrusts in his sickle for reaping and judgment. In the early Church the coming of the Spirit was not final and "once for all," but continuous. As converts at Jersusalem and again at Cæsarea were multiplied, so in more generous measure was the Spirit poured out on them. P. W. W.

Physician and Burden-bearer

WEDNESDAY. Mark 7 : 34. "And looking up to heaven, he sighed, and said unto him, Ephphatha, Be thou opened." Jesus groaned in prayer before performing the miracle; not with grief, but with the agony of desire to save and deliver mankind. A groan is the climax of a sigh. The deaf and dumb man being unable to hear the voice of Jesus, he touched his ears and tongue, exclaiming, "Be thou opened." At other times Christ prayed with strong crying and tears, in deepest sympathy with human suffering. He wept at the grave of Lazarus and over the sacred city of Jerusalem, which had rejected him. These were preliminary to the deeper agony of Gethsemane and Calvary. When he beheld a single person in great need, he thought of a whole world in similar sorrow, and of the infinite comfort he could give them if they would but receive him. He was troubled in spirit when he knew the purpose of Judas to betray him, and said, "Friend, why comest thou hither?"

Our Lord's mission was one of burden-bearing for a world, but much of his life was filled with delight. There was the joy set before him of final victory, and the rapture of infinite peace; but he knew that he must suffer that he might be touched with the feelings of our infirmities, and shed his blood without which there is no remission. He looked down through the ages to the end of time, and beheld multitudes hungry for life and truth. His soul ever cries out, "Give ye them to eat." Yea, of that Bread of Life which he was himself. He not only sighed and agonized, but he died to open the way to a life eternal, of perfect peace and happiness, where all tears are wiped away and sighs and sorrows never come. E. W. C.

The Reproachful Look

THURSDAY. Rom. 15 : 5. "The God of patience." The greatest of all God's miracles is his amazing patience. Are you a servant of his? If so, how is it that you were not discharged long ago for neglect of duty? Would any other employer bear so long with an employee like you? When Peter denied his Lord with a curse, his services, by all the analogy of human experience, should have been dispensed with then and there. But what did the Master do? He "turned and looked on him." But oh, that look! What tenderness of reproach, what cords of love were in it! Thus has he looked on you and me in the sad moments of our default: and still he bears with us.

But what shall be said of his patience toward those who persistently reject him? Listen to his word: "Behold, I stand at the door and knock. If any man will open unto me, I will come in and sup with him, and he with me." Is not this just like God? Is it not precisely what we should expect of a Father whose children wronged and offended him? But to keep on closing the door against him—this is the unpardonable sin.

What shall I render unto thee, O Lord, for all thy loving kindness? I will take of the cup of thy salvation and pay unto thee my solemn vows. To do more is impossible; to do less is base ingratitude. D. J. B.

Spiritual Awakenings

FRIDAY. Acts 2 : 4. "And they were all filled with the Holy Spirit." Let us suppose that on the Fourth of July or other holiday, there were to break out in this country a revival, originating on the steps of the Capitol at Washington, but opposed by the churches which, awakening them none the less, transformed the religions of the American Republic! Historians would look very closely into the circumstances of so remarkable an event. The Jewish name for what we call Whitsuntide is Pentecost; and the Battle of Gettysburg itself is not an event more definite than the gift of the Spirit which is recorded for that date in the calendar.

The feasts at Jerusalem were considered to be so significant that our Lord himself used to attend them. Paul traveled in haste hundreds of miles over sea and land in order to observe a certain later Pentecost at Jerusalem was it mere pedantry. These s recalled the old annals of the race these annals illustrated the struggles of the soul. It was no a history that Peter and Stephen an discussed the Exodus from Egyp as symbol, as the language of p experience; and if that languag on today, easily decipherable, it cause literature has not furnished centuries of genius, a deeper, tru ture of man's escape from deat life.

This was what the disciples thinking about, assembled in their room, when the Spirit came upon Their minds were as full of Pent traditions as are our minds full of tide traditions on Christmas Da P. W.

THE SALOONLESS NATION

By ERNEST A. PHILLIPS

THE first months of the great dry spell have elapsed and the evidence is coming in from all directions that the saloonless nation is promoting unheard-of thrift among the peo- Bankers report the number of account deposits lepositors increasing daily. Real estate men an- ce real estate transactions more numerous than before. Not only are more people purchasing s for themselves, but homes previously pur- d are being repaired, reconstructed and im- d. Grocers say people heretofore setting scant s are now living in comparative luxury.

thing save optimistic reports are being received every part of the nation. Glowing pride is being ayed in heretofore wet towns. Reports from va- points of the country fairly seethe with inter- g notices regarding the vast reduction in the ber of crimes committed, the number of arrests e, the number of wife desertions recorded, the ber of delinquent children reprimanded since ibition has been in effect.

e housewife is happy! The children are happy! onger do we hear so much of relief societies pro- g for starving children and destitute homes for h drinking fathers were responsible.

nd as the months pass it only becomes all the e evident that conditions will continue to im- e. We still have cases of arrests being made for kenness and disturbing the peace, but they are ually decreasing and will soon vanish. It will re- e a little time to entirely stamp out bootleggers.

ERHAPS a good way to illustrate just how much Prohibition has improved the country thus far is ffer statistics from various newspapers published ughout the country.

os Angeles, Calif., offers nothing but praise re- ling Prohibition.

o quote Mayor Snyder:

More groceries and more meat have been sold; k clearings have been larger; the cogs of business e operated more smoothly; and the whole tone of city is better."

o quote Chief of Police Home:

The number of arrests for drunkenness and other or offenses has been reduced to the lowest point he history of the department. During the month of July but 168 drunks were arrested, compared to 591 during June. Many of the July arrests, too, were results of sprees started in June."

To quote a leading merchant:

"This is the first July in eight years that has been better than June, and that, too, in spite of the high prices on groceries as a whole. I have no doubt that the man who formerly spent his wages for liquor now feeds his family wholesome and nourishing food."

And Los Angeles will be remembered as being one of the wettest towns along the Pacific Coast, trailing close to the city of San Francisco.

To wander a little up into the Northwest and read a report from Spokane, Wash.:

"The stream will trickle on for a while, but the fountain heads are dried up.

"But the big traffic will be no more. The saloon will be a furtive, hiding, trembling thing, a very different creature from the arrogant institution that flaunted itself so long before the deepening moral indignation of the nation, audaciously cracked the whip in politics, and rode rough-shod over the regulative laws of the land."

TO COME East and listen to reports circulated from the city of Philadelphia:

"Prohibition seems to have worked fairly well in this city. There was, according to police reports, less crime and nearly one-third less arrests than usual in the first two months, while the alcoholic ward of the Philadelphia Hospital, in which an average of one thousand cases of delirium tremens have been treated every month, has been out of business for want of patients."

A Baltimore report says:

"During July of last year arrests in Baltimore totaled 6,531, while for the corresponding month of this year the number was only 3,959, including arrests in newly annexed territory. Drunks totaled 2,848 in July, 1918, and but 1,463 for July, 1919."

An interesting report from Cleveland:

"Prohibition is continuing to have a good effect in Cleveland, according to two county officials. S. M. Young, first assistant county prosecutor, says that only three murder cases will come for trial before the September term of court, against thirteen last year." Chief Clerk Costello of the Juvenile Court says: "Prohibition means sober parents, and sober parents take care of their children. I have had 128 fewer cases of delinquent children this summer than last, when 586 cases were heard."

A few lines regarding Cincinnati:

"The steady decrease in the number of cases tried daily in the police court since Prohibition has become effective has been the talk of city officials. From 100 daily cases of fighting, cutting, shooting, stealing, drunkenness, etc., the docket has dropped to ten cases some days."

And this from Boston:

"There were but 21 cases in the Saturday session and the Domestic Relations session on August 9. There were only two fines, one of five dollars for profanity, and one of five dollars for traffic violation. No drunks."

THIS report from St. Paul deserves attention:

"Savings accounts have increased in number. Collections of bills by small stores easier. Fewer workers lay off after pay day. Arrests and drunkenness have decreased. The number of unemployed has not increased. Weekly pay checks are being cashed in stores and not in saloons."

From across the river at Minneapolis comes the following:

"There were 132 arrests for drunkenness compared with 398 in July a year ago, and 605 in the same month of 1917. There have been fewer accidents attributable to minds inflamed with liquor, smaller expenditures for relief for the poor, fewer complaints of family abandonment, less trouble over unpaid bills, more thrift, a greater volume of sound investments, and a higher level of labor efficiency."

And in the city of St. Louis during June, 229 persons, 12 of them women, were arrested for being intoxicated. This number was cut down to 75 men and one woman for the month of July.

NOW for New York: Perhaps the best method to describe New York's thrift after Prohibition is to illustrate or mention the recent waiters' strike. The waiters allege that sober people aren't so apt to tip as they are when intoxicated. Consequently they demand a larger wage.

Has Prohibition paid?

The Younger Colonel Has the Roosevelt Punch

LEUT.-COL. THEODORE ROOSEVELT is rapidly taking the place in the news held for so many years by his distinguished father. The inger Colonel is said to have some of the characistics of his father. He makes friends readily, he the same great handclasp and ready smile, the ne determined set to his teeth and much the same lity to write and speak effectively.

It is customary for a man who creates an organizan to accept as his due the primary position in its incils, but Mr. Roosevelt showed a rare quality of lgment and statesmanship in refusing the presiney of the American Legion. Welcomed as "Ted-'s son," Lieutenant-Colonel Roosevelt is fast mak- his own place in the regard of his countrymen. e eyes of the nation are on him.

At the celebration of the 143rd anniversary of the ttle of Long Island in Prospect Park, Brooklyn, Mr. osevelt revealed both the familiar striking power of father and his own ability to see clearly and speak cefully. The following paragraphs stand out parularly:

WHAT I want to talk about this afternoon are the by-products of the war, the by-products battle—what you will find grew out of the Battle Long Island, out of the battles of the Civil War, d what will grow out of this world war.

"The object of our going into war this time was to erthrow the brutal Prussian military caste. Now at it is finished what have we gotten out of the war?

"We have seen a standard of patriotism generated, t only among the military men, but among the en and women who stayed here. That impulsive atriotism has created and renewed our national soul d our national conscience. This we must preserve. o give you a summary as to just what the result is pon us I am going to talk under three headings.

"The first thing was the democratizing effect it had pon us. Through the private we got men from all alks of life—all stations—all put into the military rvice, and after they were in, so far as possible, they lvanced to a position of responsibility without regard to what they had been doing in civil life, merely ith regard to whether they were able to fill the position of responsibility they were selected for.

"Now that understanding, that sympathy, that ompanionship, we must preserve in this country.

"The next point: I have spoken of the service men nd women of this war. That is a fine term. I love it. Service men and women. Men and women who put something into the country. Before this war there was a great deal of talk around about what the country owed each individual. I have been guilty of thinking myself at times what the country owed me. During this war I think we all got a little something and I believe we are thinking in terms of what we owe to the country.

"Whether we were fortunate enough to serve in Europe or whether our duty kept us on this side during the war, we all put something into the United States. That has two effects. In the first place, it made us better people. In the second place, where any one has put something in he is willing to put something more in. Where we have given love and and sacrifice we are willing to give more love and sacrifice.

"THE third effect is Americanism. The Army, the Navy and the Marines. Great, strong nationalists. They are not weak nationalists, the men who went over there, the men who joined the Army and the Navy. Many of them, before the war, were German Americans, Italian Americans, Irish Americans, Greek Americans, etc. Now, coming back from the war they are Americans of German extraction, Irish extraction, Italian extraction, Greek extraction, and American is written in capital letters.

"What are we going to do in the future? Believe me, my friends, we have got as many battles to fight in this country in the next decade as we fought in the last two years. The first is the Bolsheviks, the I. W. W.'s, the red-flagged Socialists and their kindred Anarchists.

"To me this is simple. There is only one way I see to deal with them. They are criminals and should be treated as such.

"Now, the next thing is rioting. While the rioting is going on, no question should be debated—put down the rioting first. Put down the rioting; then, and not until then, discuss the rights and wrongs of the question.

"The third thing we have got to meet is class party. We must not have class party, but you and I, friends, must be able to strike hands with the capitalist and with the laborer when he stands for straight Americanism. We must not feel there has to be a capitalist party, a labor party, a woman's party. We are all Americans and we must not get into class parties of one sort or another."

WHAT USE DO I MAKE OF CHRIST?

A SERMON

By

REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.*

TEXT—John 6 : 26, 27. "Ye seek me, not because ye saw the miracles, but because ye did eat . . . Labor not for the meat which perisheth, but for that which endureth unto everlasting life."

"YE SEEK ME!" That is a most promising beginning. "Because ye did eat of the loaves." That is a most disappointing ending. Why do we seek Jesus? And what use do we make of him?

Thomas Carlyle launches a strong indictment against his countrymen, because of their degrading use of Robert Burns. He was in their midst with the rare and consummate gifts of a poet, and they used him as a common exciseman! It is not that humble toil is humiliating, but that there is something wanting when we use a man for a ministry other than his best. And, reverently I say it, it is even so with the Lord Jesus. Even when we use him, we so often use him for minor and secondary ends.

Here is the Lord, dwelling in the undimmed radiance of eternal holiness, enthroned in ineffable strength and beauty, hating sin with the antagonism of infinite hatred, full of grace as he is full of truth, yearningly pitiful, purposing the redemption of his children in order that he may lift them up into the burning bliss of his own unpolluted fellowship, stooping out of the eternities and bowing to the shame of the cross in order that from the lowest reaches of human woe and misery he might exalt us to sit with him on his throne! Now what use do I make of him? "Ye seek me because ye did eat of the loaves and were filled." So they used him as a mere purveyor of common bread.

NOW, let me say again, we do not degrade God by linking his power with our common needs. I am more and more persuaded that the growth of a Christian life can be measured by our increased willingness to bring the Divine to the commonplace, and to link the most ordinary want with the powers of his grace. But the pity is that so many people bring their merely material wants to the Lord, and they bring no higher craving. They seek the good, but are heedless about the better; or they seek the better and are unmindful of the best. It is like a man who is contented to get lead out of his mine, when silver is one of its hidden treasures.

But everybody knows how prone we are to be contented with seeking the things of lesser value in the treasury of God. We degrade our God when our conception of Providence has no wider significance than this. In our hymn-book our needs are arranged in their true perspective and proportion. At the end of the book, forming part of the volume, and yet placed at the remote extremity, there are appeals in time of famine, and in time of drought, and in time of pestilence. But the greater part of the book is concerned with the deeper needs of man and the greater glories of our God. It deals with the redemption of Christ, and the gifts of the Spirit, and the longing for holiness, and the ambition to be filled with His love, and appeals for mercy and help and grace. These are the things which are first sought, and the "loaves" come later. "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and all these things shall be added unto you."

"Labor not for the meat which perisheth." Do not put the strength of your religion into the transient, into the secondary things of the passing day. Let them by all means come within the circle of your religious life, but do not let them constitute the burden of its purpose. Let them be in the circle, but do not let them form the center. A word may be in a sentence and yet may not be emphatic. It may be requisite for the completeness of the meaning, and yet it may be almost effaced. Let the material cravings be in our religion as an unemphasized word in a sentence. "Labor not for the meat which perisheth, but for the meat which endureth unto everlasting life." Make search for the everlasting! Use the Lord for the best.

"My flesh is meat indeed." This is the meat that endures. "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man ye have not life in yourselves." I do not think there ought to be unusual mystery about the words. The metaphor employed by the Master is used elsewhere in the sacred Word, and we have no difficulty in the interpretation. In the Old Testament we read that the Lord spake unto Ezekiel and said, "Open thy mouth and eat that which I give thee. And when I looked, behold, a hand was put forth unto me; and lo, a roll of a book was therein, and He spread it before me . . . and He said unto me, Son of man, eat that thou findest."

We are in no doubt how these words should be expounded.

The prophet was bidden to appropriate and assimilate the spiritual significance of the roll, in order that he might incarnate it into his life. In a very familiar passage, Lord Bacon tells us that "some books are to be tasted, others to be swallowed, some few to be chewed and digeste It is the same figure of speech. To eat a book to abstract its essence, to make it part of possession and personality, to take its spirit essence, and to assimilate it into mind and hea

Why may we not carry the same method exposition into the words of our Lord? To his literal flesh and to drink his literal blo would not be the incorporation of Jesus. Jes was not flesh and blood; he was a quickeni Spirit, inhabiting a temple of flesh and bloo To eat the Master's flesh is to appropriate t spirit which used the flesh, which minister through it, which spake through it, which heal through it, and through it revealed the unspea ably gracious depths of his pitiful and redeemi life.

HOW, then, may I appropriate the Lord Jesu and so possess "the meat which endureth' "He that cometh to me shall never hunger, an he that believeth on me shall never thirst."

Let us dwell here for a moment. In order get the nourishing bread of my Lord's perso ality, it is needful that I do two things. Fir of all, I must come to him. And, secondly, must believe on him. And what is the signif cance of coming to Christ? I am to come to hi that I may ascertain his will. I do not come an equal, I come as a subject, to ascertain t will of my Lord.

This is the first step, a step which is too fr quently slurred over and hastily done. We ar to take time in ascertaining the will of Chri We are to think, and pray, and watch. We ar to regard our circumstances, and see the signi icance of their drift. We are to consult ou friends, and see if any divine light is reflecte from their mind into our own life. We are n to lie merely passive in the presence of th King, expecting that he will imprint our mind with the seal of his own good pleasure. Some times that may be our best course to take, bu ordinarily we have to be active in his presence consecrating all our powers to his service, and determining in every possible way to enter in the knowledge of his will.

And now, having come to Him, it is needfu that I believe on him. An ambassador receive his sovereign's will, and henceforth he has n will of his own except to enforce the higher w which he has received. And so he departs t execute it, believing that all the powers of th empire are pledged to his support. And I com to Christ, my Sovereign Lord. I take his will, I go forth to execute it, building on the sublim assumption that all the mystic ministries of th empire of God are pledged to my support.

Now, here is the evangel, that he who thu cometh and believeth will never hunger! He has eaten, and is eating, the Lord's flesh; h is appropriating the King's Spirit; he is momentarily nourished with all that the soul may need Such a man uses his Lord for the best ends, and the best is being continually communicated unto him.

We magnify our God when we seek for the magnificent. Therefore let us determine that our religion shall not be a mere expedient for the getting of loaves, or a temporary defense against a passing foe; let it become to us a means of grace for obtaining the nourishing energies of the eternal God.

MY PRAYER

By Mary Q. Ingram

I DO not ask the sun to shine
Alway upon this path of mine,
But rather that some sparkling ray
Of love divine would light my way.

I do not ask that flowers fair
Should waft to me their perfumes rare,
But rather that my hand might sow
Some goodly seed to live and grow.

I do not ask for wealth and fame,
In gilded halls of pomp to reign,
But rather that my words might cheer
Some one whose life seems dark and drear.

And when my race on earth is run
And I draw near life's setting sun,
May I bequeath to those I love
More faith in God and things above.

By Dr. Ralph M. Thompson

THE little things, which kith and kin
Appear, amid the day's loud din,
To disregard or lightly treat,
Are prone to make life doubly sweet,
Although of humble origin.

Disconsolation and chagrin
May be as poison to the skin
Of one who counts as bread and meat
The little things.

Why crave the fame that some may win,
The gold so often gained through sin,
The good opinion of the street?
You need not fear to dare defeat
Nor death if you are faithful in
The little things.

The Jack for Jill

Weed Chain-Jack

It works so easily that it's no trick at all for even the girls and children to operate it—Simply a few easy pulls on its chain lifts or lowers the heaviest car while you stand erect. Up or down—there's no labor.

To operate a Weed Chain-Jack it is not necessary to get down in a cramped, strained position and grovel in the mud, grease or dust under a car to work a "handle" that is apt to fly up with unpleasant results. To lift a car with the Weed Chain-Jack, simply give a few easy pulls on its endless chain while you stand erect—clear from spring, tire carriers and other projections. To lower a car pull the chain in opposite direction.

Never gets out of order. Quickly adjusted to any required height by lifting the screw and spinning the corrugated "collar" shown in the illustration. Try it yourself—you will never be satisfied with any other jack.

PRINTERS' STRIKE IMMINENT

PRINTERS threaten an immediate strike that will involve practically all of the periodicals published in New York. We are making every effort to meet the complex demands with fairness to all, but present adjustment seems to be beyond the power of the Christian Herald. Any temporary shrinkage in size, change in form or even failure to appear will be for this reason. We beg our readers to be forbearing.

THE GOSPEL TIDE RISING

NEARLY eleven months have elapsed since the armistice, and peace still lingers. We have been among those who cried, "Peace, Peace," when there was no peace. Unrest fills the world. Statesmen and governments and legislatures have been unable to give assurance of the future. Now, as never before, is the conviction settling deep in the minds of men that enduring, satisfying peace can only come from Him who has the disposal of all things, and to whom the world is now turning in its hour of supreme need. What is most to be desired in our own land is nation-wide prayer, that God may send a revival that will sweep over all the states, and transform the lives of our people. Nothing less than divine power can accomplish such a change.

For weeks and months the religious press has been looking forward with increasing hope for a revival. In all denominations this great need is felt, and earnest and eloquent voices have been raised in appeal for such a shower of spiritual power and blessing as will enable the followers of Christ to win victories in his name. The Church cannot command a revival. It can, however, put forth a united effort in prayer and supplication. There should be prayer-meetings throughout the land, and ministers, teachers, evangelists should get busy. Everywhere godly men and women are asking: Is there to be a new day? What will it demand of us? What have we to give to it? Is the Church ready for it? Is the Gospel adequate for it?

Yes, there is such a demand and it is nation-wide. We can give our whole soul and purpose to bring it about through prayer. The Church must make ready by prayer for the much-needed "showers of blessing." The Gospel is ample to give us all we need, if we ourselves sincerely desire it, pray for it, look for it.

In these reconstruction days, evangelism, both in and out of the Church, should have the right of way. In many churches the pastors prefer to be their own evangelists, calling to their aid those of their helpers who are godly and efficient. In the majority of cases, however, the trained evangelist, who is accustomed to dealing with the newly awakened spiritual need of the multitudes, can best do the work. The Interdenominational Association of Evangelists has for months past been preparing for the present emergency. Its workers have demonstrated their efficiency in many spiritual campaigns in the past, and are now prepared to answer calls from any church or group of churches in any part of the United States for evangelistic services.

Let our churches make a beginning. Preparatory work is necessary, in order that the community may enter into the battle for righteousness, consecrated and expectant. He is faithful who hath promised, and he will send a blessing to those who earnestly seek it, and show their faith by due preparation.

Any pastors or union committees who need the services of a consecrated evangelist in the near future should write to the Christian Herald, which will facilitate their wishes and put them in communication with the evangelistic organization, which we are assured will do all within its power to further their plans.

AN INVITATION ANSWERED

AS MANY new subscribers are joining our Family Circle at this season, it has been suggested that for their benefit as well as for the information of others who may be interested, an outline of the principles and activities of the Christian Herald would be timely and acceptable. To this invitation we gladly respond.

It has been said of the Christian Herald that "it is not only a leading record of Christian progress, but a leading force in it." This active quality, which has been a prominent characteristic of the Christian Herald in the past, will continue to be emphasized in future, having, however, a longer range and a wider circumference.

It has been a time of universal change, and the Christian Herald has found the scope of its activities enlarged in accord with the new surroundings. Its ministrations now literally reach throughout the globe. Today they include over forty different fields in many lands. Christian missions in all the Gospel areas have been materially helped and spiritually energized by the gifts of our nation-wide circle of Christian Herald friends here at home. From the Christian Herald pulpit there go out, week by week through the year, inspiring spiritual messages by the ablest preachers in all the leading denominations. In this way the Gospel has "free course" in its pages, reaching an audience of over a million readers every week throughout the year.

WE CANNOT be forgetful of the fact that the Christian Herald is largely the result of the united efforts and influence of its readers. They have chosen it as the channel of their far-reaching benevolences, their great missionary enterprises, and of Christlike humanities that have kindled whole communities into sympathetic cooperation. Never has it preached, and never will it preach, any other than the Gospel, holding fast to the fundamentals, and teaching the truth without prejudice or bias.

We believe that the real mission of this publication is to teach the practical application of the Christian religion in every-day life. Avoiding all that is purely controversial, it has led its readers into fields of Christian service which have expanded year after year. They utilize it as a channel through which they can come into contact, in a direct and familiar way, with spiritual and humanitarian work of many kinds in many lands. With its aid they have established orphanages, missions, schools, and churches in heathen countries. Many of those readers are now supporting missionaries, white or native, as their own personal substitutes at the front.

In the great war they accepted the Christian Herald as the channel through which they poured their liberal gifts to the suffering noncombatant multitudes, and thus became instrumental in saving countless lives. In this present year over 6,000 readers formed a legion of life-savers and sent over $60,000 to fight famine in India. Another and larger body of readers had been sending help through our relief committees in France, Belgium, Serbia, Poland, Turkey, Armenia, Palestine, and among destitute war refugees in Holland and London. They had been doing this for three years, but kept right on as long as the need existed. Still another battalion, over 7,000 strong, provides every year an outing for 3,000 children of the tenements at Mont-Lawn, where their gifts have created the beautiful "Children's Paradise." Yet another band has kept the Gospel fires burning at the Bowery Mission for these many years, one of the results of which is the creation of a body of converted men known as the Brotherhood, with 30,000 names on the rolls, all representing men who once were human derelicts, but who have been won to Christ and have become good, self-supporting citizens. Some of the Bowery Mission converts are now themselves superintendents of Gospel missions, and leading men to better lives.

IT IS this bond of practical Christian service that has knit together the readers of the paper as a great Gospel army of workers, in which every one has to do that which lies within reach, for the good of the community, the country and the world.

Now that Peace has come, there is still more important work to be done. We invite the cooperation of all who have the spiritual welfare not only of our own nation but of the world at heart, to unite with us in these greater tasks that now call us. Christianity stood the test of war. Now the Cross must be lifted in the sight of all men, at home as well as abroad. Let it be ours to help spread the glorious Gospel from nation to nation; to cultivate the international spirit of friendship and kindness, and to render service in every way whereby we may honor Christ and advance his kingdom on earth.

THE OUTLOOK IN KOREA

READING the rescript of the Japanese Emperor concerning Korea, it is difficult to understand whether it is likely to result in the introduction of genuine reforms in that unhappy country, or whether it be simply an official salve to wounded Japanese self-respect. In the rescript the imperial tone is one of benevolent consideration. "We have ever made it our aim to promote the security and welfare of our country of Korea," it says, "and to extend to the native population of that territory, as our beloved subjects, fair and impartial treatment in all respects, to the end that they may lead their lives in peace and contentment." It then goes on to state that the stage of development has arrived at wh certain administrative reforms are necessary, a directs that they be put in operation "to secure g and enlightened government . . . in order that benign rule may be assured to Korea and that t people may enjoy the blessings of peace."

Premier Hara, who is described as a broad-mind and progressive statesman, commenting on the situ tion, says: "No distinction or inequality should allowed to exist between them (Koreans and Japa ese) as loyal subjects of the same sovereign, wheth politically, socially or otherwise. . . . The gove ment is now deciding to carry out various refor in Korea and to forward the progress of the count in order that all differences between Korea and Jap may finally be obliterated." The Premier adds t the government is looking forward to adopting a sy tem of provincial and municipal administration Korea similar to that in Japan today.

There is not much cheer for the Korean people these assurances. Their note is one of assimilati and not altogether benevolent. Japan, if we may i terpret these utterances, means to stay in Korea a will strain every effort to make the absorption co plete with as little friction as possible, so as not shock the feelings of her Allies. We cannot believ however, notwithstanding Japan's desire, that Kor will permanently become a vassal state. The cry the blood of her martyrs, her fight for freedom, and h despairing calls to the Christian nations have be little heeded in the present disturbed condition world affairs; but Korea's day of opportunity will y come. Such sacrifices as she has undergone can nev be wholly in vain.

PEACE AND RIGHTEOUSNESS

PEACE, the "shalom" of the Hebrews, has much wider meaning than is usually attribute to it. It means health, prosperity, welfar Whether applied to an individual or a household, community or a nation, or to the world at large, it h the same proportionably wide interpretation, whi includes every good thing that is desirable to ma So we find throughout the Scriptures that the thing that make for peace are all of them commended an praised, while those that make for "confusion," or th absence of health, prosperity, welfare and order, a condemned. God is not the author of confusion, bu of peace, and all the blessings that come in its trai And there is a special promise of blessing to the peac makers—those who labor to bring about that happ condition which is the forerunner of a nation's healt progress and well-being, temporal and spiritual. Th one thing that makes for peace is righteousness, livin in conformity with the divine will and in recognitio of the divine sovereignty in all things here on eart Righteousness is simply the quality of being righ morally and spiritually. The fruit of the righteou is a tree of life, says the Scripture, while the u righteous are like trees whose leaves wither withou bearing fruit. It is righteousness in the individua the communities, the nations, that makes for worl peace, and the absence of it that makes for war an confusion.

One of the most beautiful passages in the Psalm (85 : 10) is that which describes the meeting of righ eousness and peace. When these two, which ma have been apparently widely separated, come togethe in harmony, all manner of blessings result. The worl is pondering these truths, and men are increasingl hopeful that the future may hold rich blessing, as th outcome of peace with righteousness.

THE WORLD NEWS OF THE WEE

The Bullitt Exposures

WHEN William C. Bullitt, reporter, war correspondent and peace mission attaché, spread before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee a mass of extremely confidential information on the methods of making peace and the state of mind of the peace-makers, the old-school diplomatists were simply dumfounded. Denials began crowding the cables from every direction. "I didn't say it, but if I did say it, I didn't mean it that way, and besides I have changed my mind." That was the burden of the messages.

William C. Bullitt

It will be remembered that President Wilson and Colonel House, with the approval or at least the knowledge of Mr. Lloyd George, sent Mr. Bullitt and Lincoln Steffens to Russia for a talk with Lenine and Trotzky. The messengers returned to Paris after a few weeks with an outline of the peace Lenine would consider, and the recommendation that the Allies agree to the Soviet terms. Mr. Wilson and Mr. Lloyd George heard the terms, and declined to entertain them.

Admittedly violating all the old canons of diplomacy, Mr. Bullitt told the Senate Committee all about his confidential mission and gave to it a copy of the report signed by Mr. Steffens and himself.

Furthermore, he quoted the Secretary of State, Mr. Lansing, as saying the League of Nations Covenant is "thoroughly bad," and that if the American people understood the Peace Treaty it was bound to fail of ratification. Thus far, Mr. Lansing has entered no denial, either flat or equivocal.

Much abuse has been heaped on Mr. Bullitt's head for disclosing confidential information or opinions expressed to him in confidence. He resigned from the peace mission as a protest against the treaty and the attitude of the conference toward Russia. As to his testimony in Washington, a nice question in ethics has been raised. Friends of the treaty denounce him as unscrupulous and untrustworthy. Its opponents justify his attitude by the statement that the good of the nation always should overweigh loyalty to any one official of the government. The discussion has brought up once again the rumor that Mr. Lansing's resignation is in the hands of the President for acceptance at the latter's pleasure.

Meantime, Mr. Wilson is ending his transcontinental tour in behalf of the treaty without perceptibly altering public sentiment. The correspondents who traveled with him tried in every way to test popular feeling, but the results were negative. There was interest in the President, but, except in spots, comparatively little in either the Treaty of Peace or the League of Nations

In the Senate the debate continues with no serious effort to bring about a vote on any point that would provide a real test of the attitude of the body.

The Economic Conference

THE great question which awaits the arrival of President Wilson in Washington is: "What shall be done about labor?" On October 6, in the White House, begins the important economic conference called by Mr. Wilson in his Labor Day message. Representatives of the public, organized labor, agricultural associations, bankers and manufacturers to the number of forty-four have been named to attend the conference. Of these, the President has named twenty-two, including John D. Rockefeller, Jr., Judge Elbert H. Gary, Dr. Charles W. Eliot, formerly president of Harvard, Charles Edward Russell and John Spargo, Socialist publicists, and other men who have been prominent in economic movements. The call, signed by the President, specifies as the purpose of the gathering discussion of "the labor situation in the country and the possibility of formulating plans for the development of a new relationship between Capital and Labor." At Mr. Wilson's request, a large number of strike orders have been held in abeyance until after the adjournment of this conference.

The Steel Strike

A LARGE part of the steel industry continues to be tied up by the strike of the workers of twenty-four international unions. Disorder has been growing, especially in the Pittsbur and Chicago districts, where the strike movement is strongest. Intense feeling has been aroused among the employees by what they declare are arbitrary repressive tactics on the part of the authorities. The steel companies are making no effort to operate their plants with strike-breakers, apparently having in mind the results of such attempts at Homestead. Instead, where walkouts occurred, fires were banked and work has ceased until the day of adjustment comes. Groups of independent plants already have agreed to meet the union demands and are reopening their furnaces, but the great organizations, notably the United States Steel Corporation, against which the strike is frankly directed, have declared unequivocally that it is a fight to the finish. They are prepared to remain closed for months, they say, rather than submit to the unionization of their works. The number of men actually involved in the strike remains a matter of doubt, but the most careful estimates place them at not less than 150,000.

Albania Disposed Of

ITALY gets a mandate, or a protectorate, over most of Albania under an agreement reached at the Peace Conference. The exact status is not determined. Her jurisdiction will cover all the country south to northern Epirus, which goes to Greece. Italian troops have been in occupation of parts of the territory since October, 1914, when they seized Avlona. Since the armistice the have been in complete control but in constant warfare with the Albanian tribesmen, who have been demanding an autonomous government. The rival claims of Greece and Italy have caused much unrest in Peace Conference circles for both have been persistently pressing their rights to Epirus, and their interests have conflicted in the Ægean and in the Eastern Mediterranean. The Albanian settlement is believed to precede an agreement on the other disputed questions.

The Anglo-Persian Treaty

THE text of the treaty giving to England protection over Persia—an agreement which caused an uproar in Paris—has been published. The document comprises six clauses, of which three are vital. These provide for the appointment of British expert advisers "for the several departments of the Persian administration"; the presence of a British mission to take charge of the rebuilding of the Persian army; and a loan secured by the Persian customs. While the size of this loan is not specified in the treaty, it is announced as $10,000,000 at seven per cent. England promises to aid in the opening of new communication routes and "to encourage Anglo-Persian enterprises." By the terms of the agreement, therefore, England takes over control of the Persian administration, finances and army.

KING ALBERT and Queen Elizabeth of Belgium with Crown Prince Leopold are here as the official guests of the American people; the first of the European royalties to return the visits of President Wilson to the capitals abroad. The United States is no strange country to the heroic Belgian ruler who passed nearly a year here in the days when he was twice removed from the throne. At that time he was studying American economics, industrial development, agriculture and transportation and, briefly, engaged in journalism. On this, his second trip, he and his queen have been received with marked enthusiasm at every appearance and they are very frankly enjoying their experience. ISAIAH 61 — The Mission of the Lord's Anointed One

The Redeemer Comes to Zion with Blessings.

THE [a] Spirit of the Lord GOD is upon me; because the LORD hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me [b] to bind up the brokenhearted, to proclaim [c] liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound; ★

2 To [d] proclaim the acceptable year of the LORD, and [e] the day of vengeance of our God; to [f] comfort all that mourn; ★

3 To appoint unto them that mourn in Zion, [g] to give unto them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness; that they might be called trees of righteousness, the [h] planting of the LORD, [i] that he might be glorified. ★

4 ¶ And they shall [j] build the old wastes, they shall raise up the former desolations, and they shall repair the waste cities, the desolations of many generations.

5 And [k] strangers shall stand and feed your flocks, and the sons of the alien shall be your plowmen and your vinedressers.

6 But [l] ye shall be named the Priests of the LORD: men shall call you the Ministers of our God: ye shall eat the riches of the Gentiles, and in their glory shall ye boast yourselves.

7 For [m] your shame ye shall have double; and for confusion they shall [n] rejoice in their portion: therefore in their land they shall possess the double: everlasting joy shall be unto them.

8 For I the LORD love judgment, I hate robbery for burnt offering; and I will direct their work in truth, [o] and I will make an everlasting covenant with them.

9 And their seed shall be known among the Gentiles, and their offspring among the people: all that see them shall acknowledge them, that they are the seed which the LORD hath blessed

10 I will greatly rejoice in the LORD, my soul shall be joyful in my God; for he hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as [o] a bridegroom decketh [1] himself with ornaments, and as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels.

11 For as the earth bringeth forth her bud, and as the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth; so the Lord GOD will cause [p] righteousness [q] and praise to spring forth before all the nations.

CHAPTER 62

The Redeemer Calls the Watchmen to Awake.

FOR Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest, until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth.

2 And the Gentiles shall see thy righteousness, and all kings thy glory: [a] and thou shalt be called by a new name, which the mouth of the LORD shall name.

3 Thou shalt also be a [b] crown of glory in the hand of the LORD, and a royal diadem in the hand of thy God.

4 Thou [c] shalt no more be termed Forsaken; neither shall thy land any more be termed [1] Desolate: but thou shalt be called [2] Hephzibah, and thy land [3] Beulah: for the LORD delighteth in thee, and thy land shall be married.

5 For as a young man marrieth a virgin, so shall thy sons marry thee: and [4] as the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee.

6 ¶ I [d] have set watchmen upon thy walls, O Jerusalem, which shall never hold their peace day nor night: [5] ye that make mention of the LORD, keep not silence,

7 And give him no [6] rest, till he establish, and till he make Jerusalem [e] a praise in the earth.

8 The LORD hath sworn by his right hand, and by the arm of his strength, [7] Surely I will no more give [f] thy corn to be meat for thine enemies; and the sons of the stranger shall not drink thy wine, for the which thou hast labored:

9 But they that have gathered it shall eat it, and praise the LORD; and they that have brought it to-

CHRISTIAN HERALD AMERICAN BIBLE PAPER RED LETTER BIBLE

Our Red Letter Bible Only Genuine Edition

The only genuine edition of the Red Letter Bible is the Authorized or King James' Version, unchanged save for the variation of the color in the type. Two colors (Red and Black) are employed, in accordance with the simple plan devised by the late Dr. Louis Klopsch, the Originator of the Red Letter principle applied to the Holy Scriptures.

What Is a Red Letter Bible?

1. In the Old Testament the passages quoted by our Lord, or directly related to incidents to which he referred, are Printed in Red.
2. In the New Testament, the words universally accepted as those of the Saviour are Printed in Red.
3. A Red Star (★) immediately following a verse in the Old Testament indicates that the verse embodies a prophetic reference to Christ as the coming Messiah.

D'Annunzio Still Holds Fiume

GABRIELE d'ANNUNZIO has captured Fiume from the Allies. The French, American and Brit- flags have been hauled down—at nnunzio's command—and the Peace ference, the Italian Government, Americans, Jugoslavs, French, Brit- and several other interested people trying to decide just what they had er do about it. As a matter of fact, he situation were not so serious it ld have all the characteristics of real fashioned opera bouffe. Imagine a tow setting his genius to work on a e depicting the temperamental pa- t marching into town at the head regiment of wildly exuberant and inous soldiers and meeting the com- nder of the garrison. The dialogue:

he General: "Thus you will ruin y!"

'Annunzio: "Rather will you ruin y if you oppose Fiume's destiny and port the infamous policy."

he General: "What then do you h?"

'Annunzio: "A free entry int me"

he General: "I must obey orders."

'Annunzio: "I understand you ld fire upon your brethren? Fire t on me! (Poet bares his chest.)

he General (with emotion): "I am py to meet you, brave soldier and nd poet! With you I cry: 'Viva me!'" horus of Soldiers: "Viva il Generale!"

D'Annunzio and soldiers enter the amid rejoicings and demonstra- ns.)

ut the big fact is that D'Annunzio, h some 3,000 soldiers who deserted ir units and flocked to his standard, k possession of Fiume, drove out the ied representatives and declared the t united to Italy in defiance of the lian Government and the nations of world which had its disposition ler their control. Since the day of coup other soldiers and sailors, esti- ted to number 25,000, have followed lead of their more impulsive brothers l have made their way into the city reinforce this irregular garrison.

NO FIGURE since Garibaldi has so stimulated the Italian national agination as has D'Annunzio in this ectacular exploit. But Signor Nitti, premier, has an even harder task ore him in smoothing over very prob- e international complications than Cavour when Garibaldi carried his r of liberation into Naples. Italy l is bound to abide by the decisions the Peace Conference. She still is e of the five "Allied and Associated wers" which took over the task of djusting Europe's boundaries on a sis of equity and justice. She has a finite responsibility in this connection which cannot be abrogated by anything less than the official action of the responsible government.

Unfortunately for Signor Nitti, there is every evidence that the country will not support official action which in any way repudiates the D'Annunzio expedition. For this reason the situation holds ominous possibilities. While the Peace Conference has closed its eyes against arbitrary seizures of territory by Rumania, Poland and Czechoslovakia, promising to adjust the issues at a time of more lesiure, these seizures were made by governments which the Conference can hold responsible. The seizure of Fiume was accomplished by one man—"the firebrand of Italy"—and in defiance of government. Now that government is being commanded by its people to give the official stamp of approval not only to the occupation of the port but incidentally to the acts of mutiny, desertion from the colors, insubordination, and insult to friendly nations which accompanied it.

Officially the Allied governments expect Italy to disavow D'Annunzio and to eject him from Fiume. Observers are asking, however: "If Italy does not dislodge him, who will."

MATTERS in Rome seem to be rapidly shaping toward the overthrow of the Nitti ministry. Nitti is compelled to repudiate the poet-patriot and institute military courts martial against him and his associates, if Italy is not to be branded among the great powers as faithless in her obligations. The honor of his country compels that course. Yet the moment he takes such a step, it is an almost absolute certainty that the whole nation will rise in denunciation of him, and demand his head. For D'Annunzio, just as he did in 1915 when he was the prophet who led his people into the war against Austria, has inflamed Italy from the Alps to Messina with his impassioned pleas for a unified Italia. Today he is the greatest man, the most loved man, and the most powerful in the country—this dilettante, capricious, exotic, temperamental poet and interdicted dramatist.

But, if Italy cannot recover Fiume for the Allies, who will? The Peace Conference, perturbed and impatient to adjourn, its leaders gone and half its work still to do? A conference with no powers but that of consultation and advice? Or will the Allied Powers feel equal to organizing an expedition and attempting by military force to eject the fair-sized army already gathered in the city and receiving constant additions to its strength? If they did take this decisive step, would they be willing to face the possibility of a war with Italy, enthusiastically supported by the whole Italian people?

the parties, whether it be Capital, Labor, or the Community, and in the development of its function into that of a responsible executive, concerned equally with all the interests of the necessary parties to industry, lies the hope of any ultimate solution of the industrial problem.

Referring to what is fundamentally right and just, may it not be asked: Is Labor not quite as much entitled to a voice in the control of industry as Capital? It is investment in industry which affords the right to share in corporate control. Capital and Management receive representation on this basis. If Capital and Management are so entitled, why not Labor also?

Industry is a joint venture, a venture of Labor as well as of Capital. The difference in the nature of the investment of Capital and Labor only serves to emphasize the fundamental justice of Labor's right to a share in control. The investment of Capital is in the nature of an investment of substances and dollars; the investment of Labor is an investment in the nature of skill and life. The one is a material, the other a human, investment; and of the two, the one involving life is the more precious.

The Community's right to representation in the control of industry and in the shaping of industrial policies is wholly similar to that of Labor. But for Community investment on a local, national and international scale, Capital, Labor, and Management would be obliged to make scant shrift under present-day conditions of world competition. But what of the Community's part in industry? Here, too is joint venture on the part of the Community just as much as on the part of Labor, Capital, or Management. What is 99 per cent. of the expenditure of government in normal times but outlays in the nature of investment in industry: investment in property and services of one kind or another, which alone makes possible the vast cooperation and coordination of effort which is the very life-blood of industry?

It is the Community which provides the natural resources and powers that underlie all production.

Without participation by the Community in the control of industry, there is nothing to prevent the emergency of a joint-profiteering scheme by the other parties, in which high wages and high profits are secured by charges which fall either immediately or ultimately upon consumers,

If to secure a just consideration of rights of all four parties to industry something in the nature of a partnership, involving community of control, is necessary, how, it will be asked, is that transition to be effected? Certainly it will never be brought about by violent upheavals or revolutionary methods, which serve only to disorganize industry and occasion loss to all its parties. It must be brought about in an evolutionary manner, here a little, there a little; line upon line, precept upon precept, all working toward the consummation of one ideal.

When the managers of industry become responsible to Labor, Capital, and the Community for the manner in in which their vast powers and opportunities are exercised, we shall have something in the government of industry closely resembling the responsible executive in the government of the State. Meanwhile, our duty would appear to be that of putting an end to autocracy and monopoly of control, no matter by which of the parties to industry it may be attempted or exercised, and to work out a system of joint control based upon representation of all the parties in the determination of industrial policy.

Protecting thirty million passengers against accident

The safest motor cars on America's busiest street

NO motor cars in America have to stop more frequently, or operate under more adverse traffic conditions than the Fifth Avenue (New York City) busses. These big motor cars carry 30,000,000 people a year through the densest traffic in the world. Fully loaded with 44 passengers, driver and conductor, they weigh eight tons.

They stop at almost every corner, and must be under perfect control at all times. It is estimated that they make over 80,000,000 stops per year, and each stop must be perfectly placed, smooth and easy.

The necessity for reliable brake lining

Naturally, to protect these millions of passengers, and to stand the wear and tear of these millions of stops, the Fifth Avenue Coach Company selects the most reliable brake lining it can find. This is unquestionably the most responsible brake lining job in America, and Thermoid Brake Lining has proven fully equal to the responsibility. The President of the Fifth Avenue Coach Company recently said: "We believe that the smooth and easy stopping which is characteristic of our busses is brought about by the use of Thermoid Brake Lining."

Why Thermoid is used

Thermoid has been selected for these busses because of its toughness and sure gripping power. It wears down more slowly than ordinary brake lining and so evenly that it always presents a full wearing surface. On bus No. 252, Thermoid gave 19,376 miles of service.

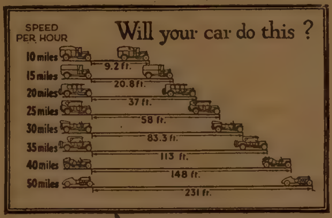
The photograph to the right shows the difference between Thermoid and ordinary woven lining. Ordinary brake lining is loosely woven. It has gripping power when new but wears quickly and unevenly. This uneven surface causes ordinary lining to slip, very often, just when perfect action is most needed.

Thermoid Brake Lining is safest and wears longest

In each square inch of Thermoid Brake Lining there is 40% more material than in ordinary woven lining. This additional body gives a closer texture which is made tight and compact by hydraulic compression under 2000 lbs. pressure. In addition to this, Thermoid is Grapnalized, an exclusive process in manufacture which enables it to resist moisture, oil and gasoline. The close, compact texture of Thermoid, made by this method, causes it to wear down more slowly and evenly than ordinary brake lining so that it maintains its gripping power even when worn to wafer thinness.

Ordinary Woven Lining
Notice the loosely woven texture
Wears down quickly and unevenly, losing its gripping power as it wears

Thermoid Hydraulic Compressed Brake Lining
Notice the compact texture
Wears down slowly Gives uniform gripping surface until worn wafer thin



This chart shows the distances in which a car should stop, at any given speed, if the brakes are efficient

Manufacturers of 50 of the leading passenger cars and trucks have chosen it as standard equipment.

Good brakes are the most important part of your car from the standpoint of safety. Go to your garage man and have them inspected today. If they need relining specify Thermoid. Every foot of Thermoid is backed by Our Guarantee: Thermoid will make good—or WE WILL.

in the oil land leasing bill which has passed the United States Senate after extended debate. In other words, an effort is being made both by Mexico and the United States to safeguard oil fuel supplies for the benefit of their nationals and to prevent such an immense club over national sovereignty falling into alien hands.

The passage by the Senate of the land-leasing measure and the very frank debate which preceded it has been followed by some change in the attitude of important oil interests. One of the largest American companies, it has been announced, agrees to operate in Mexican territory under the conditions imposed by the Carranza decrees, and there are indications that some of the other large producers will adopt the same policy. Mexico then will obtain a reasonable return from this one of her natural resources—a return which it is promised will go to the payment of her international obligations and the complete pacification of the country. Most of the oil interests, however, if they place themselves under Mexican control, will do so only tentatively, or until the Mexican Congress and Supreme Court come to a final decision on the laws which will govern the industry. Pending that time it is no secret that the agitation for intervention will be maintained for two reasons: its salutary effect on the deliberations of the Mexican authorities, and the force it will accumulate to definitely swing American sentiment in the event the decisions are not as favorable to alien interests as these interests are demanding.

OPPOSITION in this country to any form of intervention is growing rapidly among organizations which understand what such a move would mean to the cause of the Protestant Church in Mexico. For the first time Protestant missionaries are finding their work south of the Rio Grande meeting with real encouragement and enthusiasm on the part of the natives. The missions are expanding in size and influence, and their churches, schools and hospitals are acutely conscious of the dangers that would come with any interference by the United States. Patriotism is intense, and military activity on our part would send every Protestant Mexican as well as every Catholic and pagan Mexican into the field with the colors to repel what they regard as an aggressive, selfish, exploiting neighbor. This is the word that comes from the missionaries, and with it their opinion that in such an eventuality it would require years to recover the ground they would have lost.

There is growing in the United States, too, an important sentiment which is anxious to reject any tendency on our part to be the arbiters of the world's destiny. They cite our experiences in Costa Rica, Haiti, Santo Domingo, Nicaragua, Mexico, and, lastly, Russia, as proof of the futility of such a policy. With the possible exception of Haiti and Santo Domingo, our experiments have had unfortunate reactions. The Russian-Siberian expeditions, undertaken with what, it may be conceded, were laudable intentions, have resulted in an utter failure that has left America anathema in those vast regions. Costa Rica is in complete disorder. We are still compelled to maintain a company of marines in Nicaragua—a fact generally forgotten—to impress on the Nicaraguans that the United States is a big brother interested in their welfare. And no one will dispute the statement made recently in the House of Representatives that much of the troubles of Mexico are the outgrowth of our policy of dictation.

Around the missionary organizations and groups of liberal-minded Americans is being developed a very definite movement in favor of granting to Mexico that measure of self-determination promised to the world in a famous address embracing fourteen points, to let Mexicans decide for themselves what they shall do with their own wealth, and in general grant to them the same right of decision over national questions that we reserve for ourselves.

nerican Indians Not Complete Savages

Folklore Shows Elements of Great Literature, Religion and Philosophy

THAT a study of American Indian literature can lay the foundation for a science of mythology which wi throw light on many beginnings of n and Semitic thought now lost to ; the opinion of Mr. J. N. B. Hewitt, ex essed in the introduction to a col- on of myths and legends of the ca Indians collected by Jeremiah in, which accompanies the Thirty- d Annual Report of the Bureau of rican Ethnology, of the Smith- n Institution, recently issued. "In- tales reveal to us a whole system ligion, philosophy, and social pol- says Mr. Hewitt; "the whole tal and social life of the race to h they belong is evident in them."

maintenance of this theory, trans- ns of many Indian tales and legends given, together with their interpre- n. Much of the material was ob- d from noted chiefs of the Seneca , with whose language and customs Hewitt is thoroughly familiar. He ves that groups of tales taken from ous Indian tribes will, when con- ed together, form the creation h of the New World. As to the sub- ce and sense of these Indian tales, ys: "To begin with, they give an unt of how the present order of gs arose in the world, and are taken with the exploits, adventures, and ggles of various elements, animals, s, reptiles, insects, plants, rocks, and r objects before they became what are."

hat the building up of the creation h of the New World, with its vari- elements, is a work of the greatest value, forms the gist of Mr. Hewitt's theory. By it, he believes, we can bring order into mythology, and reconstruct, at least in outline, and provisionally, that early system of belief which was common to all races—a system which, though expressed in many languages and in endlessly varying details, has one meaning, and was, in the truest sense of the word, a religion truly universal; for it was believed in by all people, wherever resident, and believed in with a vividness of faith and a sincerity of attachment which no civilized man can even imagine, unless he has had long experiences of primitive races.

The report also contains a short history of the Seneca tribe, together with a description of their individual characteristics, and relates the work already done among them by other ethnologists of the Bureau of American Ethnology. During this investigation, other unrelated tribes of Indians were studied likewise, so as to compare the work and make it useful for general ethnological purposes.

The Bureau of American Ethnology, by its extensive work, is preserving much of value concerning the Indian tribes of North America—not only their language and customs, but also their habitations and other material remains. The Annual Report is enriched every year with the results of various investigations among the Indians, giving them an interest not only to scientists, but also to the average man interested in the story of this once powerful race, which is rapidly disappearing through being absorbed into the other races.

The First Code of Ethics

HERE is considerable said at present about the study of the Bible as literature, and in line with this ement the General Federation of nen's Clubs, now representing two on women, has taken an important forward in its resolution concerning a study of the Bible among women's s.

s majestic beauty of thought and ession, as embodied in the rhythmic y of the Psalms, the sweet story of devoted Ruth, the courage of the tiful Queen Esther, the panoramic of Joseph, the unique, tragic and ime depiction of Job, the masterly pel of Luke with its beautiful story Christ, are all unequaled.

he characters of the great Moses, brave Joshua, the kingly David, uel, Daniel and many others, ap- mightily to one in their historical dness. Yet there is another stand- t from which to view the Bible, far e important than either its literary istorical significance, and that is, as de of ethics as applied to the public ols of the country.

he immorality in many high schools id to be appalling. Many pap-fed almost spineless youths and maidens ive practically no restraint at home, not always is a high standard of ality placed before them at school. se, as well as others who happily e been more fortunate in the matter nheritance and training, might be to acquire a stronger moral vertebra ugh the assimilation of the princi- of correct living, if such were daily ed before them.

code of ethics evolved from the has ever equaled that of the Bible. loses drilled the people of Israel in rugged Ten Commandments for ly forty years; yet it was none too a time to make of them a na- worth while. Our Saviour illustrated beautiful Beatitudes and the com- ensive New Commandment in his here on earth to the wondering, fol- ing multitudes in his purity, right- ness, mercifulness, peaceableness, summed up in his practice of the d precepts; yet how slow the people in grasping their full meaning! bout 1900 years have intervened they were handed along with the Word to us. We should know them perfectly by this time. Yet our fathers learned them together with the Decalogue in the home, in the church, in the school, better than have we of the present generation. Is there not danger of the rising generation, amidst covetousness, Sabbath-breaking, and the divorce evil, swinging out and away from the highest ideals of living? Without the code of ethics which the Bible gives us, how many generations would it take to place us back where the Israelites stood when the tables of the Law were handed to them from Mount Sinai?

The early Decalogue with the later great commandment of our Saviour and the Beatitudes as a code of ethics might well be verbally taught, also framed and hung in the schoolrooms of the land. These, surely, in the land of our fathers should be learned, reverenced, and observed as the greatest of all ethical codes, and the supreme law of conduct. BELLE L. SANFORD.

Raising Orderly Girls

IN a recent Christian Herald I read Mrs. Sheldon's "Home With a Capital H," and enjoyed it very much, and feel that I must write a bit of thanks.

I know of a home of seven girls that would pass for sisters of the one she wrote of in he[illegible]hort story.

I am sure a[illegible]t of mothers would agree with her, too, but I feel that I must say a few words to those mothers. If they began to train their girls from children, the house would never be in the disorder that she stated. "Miss Nineteen's" mother has been following her footsteps for nineteen summers and winters putting things to rights, and probably with complaints, too, but she should have taught her as a child to put her playthings away. Now she will learn to her sorrow, in a few short years, there is only one pair of hands to put things to rights, when she moves to that home of her own making. If the mothers would only wake up to the fact that children can be taught to do things right when mere "toddlers" I think that there would be more happy homes and the divorce courts would be wiped out of existence. Salt Mackerel

Direct from the fishing boats to you

The Best Fish Meal Ever!

Try this fat, juicy mackerel AT MY EXPENSE

Folks, here's a real treat from Gloucester. A pail of fat, newly-packed mackerel especially selected for their color and flavor. You will surely relish these temptingly-good fish. These Davis' mackerel are yours to try, on request. Send no money—I'll forward the fish on approval and take all the risk myself.

Frank E. Davis.
President

It Takes a Fisherman to Pick Out Good Fish

For generations back my people were fish-folks—the early settlers of Gloucester. I used to go to sea in my father's vessel after the mackerel. Little did I think then that what I learned about fish was ever going to be of real value to my friends or to me in a business way. If I hadn't learned what I did at sea the "Davis Folks" all over America would not write me as they do today: "Mr. Davis, we cannot get mackerel anywhere like yours." I've built up business with 100,000 homes. It's a joy to do business with home folks and to hold their confidence and good-will.

Our Own Home Kind

In those fishing days, father naturally picked out the best mackerel to take home for winter. We picked out the plump ones. I came to know them at a glance. The meat when broiled is very tender and juicy. I sent friends some of my fish. And what they said about them made me realize how hard it is for people away from the seashore to get the right kind of fish. The secret is picking 'em out. The kind of mackerel father taught me to select for our winter's supply are the kind I will send to you. We clean and trim them of heads and tails and send full net weight of clear fish.

Fall Mackerel—Fat and Tender

Fall mackerel are the best eating fish. They're fat in the Fall, like a Turkey fattened for Thanksgiving. Most of the fish your dealer can buy are caught during the spring and summer when they are spawning and are, therefore, dry and tasteless. I have all I can do to supply my home customers without selling dealers. You can trade with me just as you do with your home grocer or butcher. And everything I send, delivered right to your door, by express or parcel post, is sent subject to your complete satisfaction or you do not pay for it. Is there any squarer way to do business than that? For 34 years this has been my steadfast policy.

Send No Cash—Try the Mackerel First

I want you to know before you pay that my fish will please you. If there is any possibility of a risk, I want it to be at my expense. Mail the coupon today and I'll ship at once a pail of my mackerel containing 10 lbs. net weight of the clear fish, each fish weighing from 1¼ lbs. to 1½ lbs., all charges prepaid, east of Kansas, so that your family will have a real Gloucester treat Sunday morning. Then, if my mackerel are not better than any you have ever tasted, send back the rest at my expense. If you are pleased with them, and I'm sure you will be, send me $4.90. At the same time ask for descriptive list of Davis' fish. Sold only direct—never to dealers. Mail the coupon now, with your business card, letterhead or reference.

The Vanishing Indian Girl

THE Indian girl of the days when the Indian roamed at will over the broad plains or into the heart of the woods, after the manner of his kind, and lived in tepees, is almost entirely a thing of the past. Gone are the tribal customs, weird and strange, some with a wonderful poetic charm in them. Gone are the sun dances and the other strange ways of expressing the Indian's idea of beauty and charm in motion. One hears but seldom of the Indian incantations, and the pipe of peace is smoked no more, because there is never likely to be another Indian uprising. The romantic, the picturesque, the mysterious life of the Indian will be known no more, and the war-whoop is silenced. The "blanket Indian" may still be seen, but the rising generation wears the garments of modern civilization, and follows the customs of the whites. The influence of a good many years of the education Uncle Sam has been giving the Indian finds expression in a kind of Indian life that is a far cry from that of a few years ago. The pure-bred Indian is becoming a vanishing race, and the time is not far distant when there will be no trace at all of the Indian life of a few generations ago. The Apaches not long ago held their last tribal meeting. White men not so very old in years can recall the time when the Apaches were a great tribe, and one that not only other Indian tribes but white men were not eager to meet on the field of battle. Fierce and fearless in battle, their war-whoops had thrilling notes of terror in them, and they were strong in numbers. Today there were but about six hundred of them left when they held their last tribal meeting at Escalera in Mexico. They harked back to the old life in their dress, which was wonderfully picturesque, as one may see from our illustration of two of the girls of the tribe in full Indian glory of beads and buckskin and fringe and embroidered and beaded moccasins. They are in strong contrast to the woman beside them in her simple dress of the white woman, which some of the Indian girls may wear with a secret longing for the brave days of old, of which she has no doubt heard her forebears tell, and of which she has read in Indian legend and song and story.

Making the Mission Field Attractive

WE REMEMBER as a child wondering where all the missionaries came from. Of all the attenders at our church few ever displayed inclination to go abroad in the service of God. Even those who attended the missionary classes with the expressed purpose of going out into the mission field seemed to divert into the channels of ordinary business life. We often wondered why.

It was not until we had traveled a little that we came to the conclusion that it was purely a matter of finance. While it may not seem appropriate that a minister of God should consider such a thing as money before his work, we are bound to admit that he is bound to think of it a little when, without it, or constantly having to worry about it, he is unable to work properly. Coming down to fact, religion is a business. That is to say, business enters into it as it does everything else. No man can live on air, no matter how good he is.

An editorial I read in a Shanghai newspaper suggested that the missionaries in China be asked to accept the responsibilities of commercial agencies until such time as efficient salesmen could be trained to take charge of the field. I thought nothing more about it until I came in contact with a missionary selling insurance. He told me that, owing to the decreased financial support from home during the war, it had to be done to keep things going. And why, thought I, should it not always be done?

Given that earnest purpose to further the teachings of Christ, and an ambition to support one's own position in life, a young man could succeed in the mission field as well as he could in any other place by adding to his work the selling of merchandise. He would, in addition, be giving further service to the people he was teaching by introducing them to the articles of civilization.

The manufacturers of America are putting forward their best efforts to make the commercial acquaintance of people hitherto strangers to them. And they are at a loss for the right kind of man to represent them. If the missionary colleges, aided by the missionaries themselves, would get their heads together with the manufacturers of the country, no doubt some feasible scheme would result. The missionary cause would become more or less self-supporting. And those who are aspiring to serve the cause would have a greater attraction before them when they saw that attached to their works was a good living and an opportunity to save for a rainy day.

The Liquor Traffic in Japan

REV. H. LOOMIS, a representative of the American Bible Society, Yokohama, Japan, writes: "The conditions of the liquor traffic in Japan are about as bad as they can be. The Japanese were much addicted to the use of a mild form of intoxicant, but the introduction of wine, beer, and the distilled liquors has increased intemperance beyond all bounds. The Germans introduced the manufacture and use of beer, which has now become general. And the example and influence of foreigners have been very largely in favor of the drinking habit. There are so many breweries in Japan already that there is no use for more. I presume there are plenty of distilleries also. One of the last steamers that reached here from the United States brought nearly a cargo of beer, wine and distilled liquors, which are being shipped abroad as the result of prohibition in the United States. There was too much here before."

Real Estate First Mortgage Bonds

NO OTHER year has witnessed such wild speculative activity as is characteristic of 1919.

Apparently heedless of the oft- nded warnings of the country's most -seeing financiers, people with little no investment experience continue risk their capital wherever the wild- promoter sets up his printing office. would be humorous were not the re- ts so sad.

Yet, despite all this speculative excite- nt, there is observable in many quar- s a very marked and growing trend ward sound investment. Among the rious securities which are admittedly ble and safe stands out the first mort- ge real estate bond. This type of in- stment is growing steadily in favor nong practically all classes of investors.

The real estate mortgage is the oldest rm of investment. It is, in fact, noth- g more or less than the written prom- to pay by the owner of property. nd this promise is made secure by a st mortgage on the property in ques- n. The time in which payment is to made is definite. The interest is at a ed and specific rate.

First mortgage real estate bonds are mply units of a first mortgage. The ason for converting a real estate first ortgage into a number of units such first mortgage real estate bonds is at this gives the investor with small ms to invest from time to time the pportunity to enjoy the same security dvantages as are participated in by the vestor who has money enough to take ver an entire first mortgage.

In a word, it enables the man of mited capital to put his money to work arning more money safely right along- de the money of a man of wealth and ave it invested with an equal degree of afety and a higher-grade security.

For the sake of clarity, let us assume hat a man owns a building site worth 50,000 at conservative and experienced ppraisal. He plans to erect a store uilding that will cost $100,000, making total of $150,000. He has some money f his own, but not enough. He desires o borrow.

He then goes to a first mortgage real state bond company and arranges to ive a first mortgage upon the land and uilding, in return for which the com- any agrees to advance him, say, $70,- 00. In reality, the man has placed a 70,000 mortgage upon his land and uilding.

It is a good mortgage from an invest- ment standpoint, because the $70,000 is secured by property which has a value of $150,000.

But how many investors have $70,000 idle with which to invest in this mortgage? Not many, of course.

How can the ordinary investor be enabled to share in such safe investment? There is only one way, and that is by converting the first mortgage into $70,000 worth of first mortgage real estate bonds.

The usual plan is to issue bonds in denominations of $50, $100, $500, $1,000 and $5,000. If you buy a $50 bond your money will earn at the same rate and enjoy the same safety as the man who buys $50,000 worth of bonds.

That, in skeletonized form, is the process that takes place.

Naturally there are certain very important features which are of intense interest to the investor.

First of all is the consideration of the company offering the bonds. As a matter of fact, if the company offering the bonds is a company soundly organized, alive, well financed, ably officered and of good name, you can be reasonably sure of the merits of the securities they offer.

Real estate first mortgage bond companies of recognized standing do not recommend bond issues about which they are not completely satisfied. The present and future of their business rests solely upon their ability to provide issues of such safety that their customers will always be protected.

The greatest protection to the investor is in selecting a house of standing and dealing with them. At the same time, as a matter of personal information, you ought to know this type of investment thoroughly. Any of the reputable companies will be glad to talk over with you your financial affairs and give you all the specific information you may desire, whether you wish to invest or not.

Another feature of many first mortgage bond issues is the serial reduction, which means that at certain specified dates the borrower will pay a specified amount toward the reduction of the obligation against his property. He is not allowed, however, to reduce his security. To see how this works out in practice, let us refer to the case of the man who has property worth $150,000 who has mortgaged it for $70,000. At the outset there is approximately $2.15 security behind each dollar of the mortgage. According to the serial reduction plan we will assume that the owner is required to pay $5,000 at the end of two years. At that time the mortgage would amount to $65,000, but there would be no reduction in the security, so that there would be approximately $2.30 in security behind every dollar of the mortgage.

Thus as time goes on the safety of the remaining bonds increases. The fact that the bonds are arranged to mature on successive dates is an added convenience to the investor, as it gives him a wide choice as to the length of time he wants to invest his money.

There are, of course, many other things the investor should know before he is to decide properly as to the merits of various real estate first mortgage bond issues.

There are mortgages and mortgages, but the best mortgage is what is known as an absolute closed first mortgage. The word "first" in reference to the mortgage means that it is the first obligation to pay of the property and must be taken care of by the borrower before any other obligation is made. The word "closed" in reference to the mortgage means that the transaction is fixed as stated and cannot be reopened. In a word, it means that the security cannot be lessened by increasing the amount of the loan.

Obviously, if the mortgage is not a closed first mortgage the investors in the bonds have no assurance that the number of bonds will not be increased and the security behind each bond thereby correspondingly reduced. So it is safe to say that the first thing to seek is the closed first mortgage.

Another important query that the investor should make is as to the ratio of the property value compared to the amount of the loan. In other words, is the value of the security larger than the amount of the loan by a comfortable and secure margin?

Next, before investing, find out the standing and the qualifications of the third parties making the appraisal as to the property value and find out who the lawyers are who certify as to the legality of title to the property.

It is also wise to find out whether the security is in the form of one building and the building site, or whether it consists of several buildings and parcels of land.

Naturally, one of the first thoughts that should be in an investor's mind is the question of the location of the property. Is it in a prosperous community and of advantageous position?

The investor should find out whether the property is clear of previous incumbrances.

Important among these other matters is also the matter of the earning power of the property. Will its income take care of expenses and provide a residue of fair profits? How is the income derived?

The investor should be sure that the loan matures serially, as this is not only a feature of convenience but adds to the safety of the bonds.

Be certain also that the property is insured against fire, and find out as to what provisions have been made for attending to the taxes and insurance.

In passing, it might be interesting to know that first mortgages secured by real estate are so highly regarded by life insurance companies that more of their funds are invested in them than in any

Millions of Germs

Breed in Tooth Film—Keep It Off

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

Film Wrecks the Teeth

That slimy film which you feel with your tongue causes most tooth troubles. The tooth brush does not end it. The ordinary tooth paste does not dissolve it. In crevices and elsewhere that film clings. That is why your brushing fails to keep teeth white, free from tartar, clean and safe.

That film is what discolors—not the teeth. It is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. So all these troubles have been increasing despite the wide use of the tooth brush.

Dental science, after years of search, has found a film combatant. Able authorities have amply proved this by careful clinical tests. Leading dentists everywhere now urge its daily use.

The method is embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And we offer a 10-Day Tube free now to everyone for home tests.

See the Results—Then Decide

The results of Pepsodent are quickly apparent. Some are instant. We ask you to see them—watch them ten days—then decide for yourself about them.

Pepsodent is based on Pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to constantly combat it.

Pepsin long seemed impossible. It must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. But science has discovered a harmless activating method. The inventor has been granted patents by five governments already. It is that invention which makes possible this efficient film combatant.

other class of security. The latest available figures show that approximately 35 per cent. of their entire investments are in this form.

Banks, estates, colleges, and men and women of great wealth also, esteem this type of security highly, and yearly invest more and more of their funds in first mortgage real estate bonds. This has, of course, contributed strongly toward their growing popularity.

It is a fact that of all types of security a well-constructed building depreciates the most slowly, and the land on which good buildings are located in most of the large cities in this country has been increasing in value steadily.

No charge is made to the holder of first mortgage real estate bonds for service rendered by the issuing company. As a matter of fact the issuing company regards the purchaser of its bonds as its client and represents his interest all the time.

If at any time a holder of a first mortgage real estate bond issued by a reputable house desires to borrow money on it, he can do so by taking the bond to the company.

Furthermore, all the houses of recognized standing undertake to maintain a market for all bonds they underwrite, thus giving their customers reasonable assurance of readily converting their bonds into cash.

Interest on the bonds is procured, in case the bonds are in coupon form, by sending the coupons to the issuing company or depositing them with the investor's bank.

So, far from being a technical transaction, the purchase of first mortgage real estate bonds is, in reality, a very simple transaction, and presents a very safe and secure field for the investor lacking wide experience.

Accidents at Road Crossings

DURING the past seven months, said Frank H. Shearer, General Claim Agent of the Pere Marquette Railroad, records show that there have been twelve automobile crossing accidents involving death and personal injury, five lives lost, and eighteen persons suffered personal injury.

Of course, there have been a number of automobiles struck by trains where no personal injury resulted, the occupants jumping before the collision or being fortunate enough to escape injury.

Some automobiles stall on the crossings, some run into the side of passing trains and some smash through the crossing gates that are lowered to protect them from oncoming trains and engines. In one case the automobilist ran down and injured the crossing flagman.

Many of the accidents occurred where there was a wide range of vision, and all of them at crossings protected either by warning signs, audible and visual signals, crossing gates, or flagmen.

How and why do these accidents occur, do you ask?

Drivers of automobiles probably do not realize that a train running a little over sixty miles an hour takes but one second to run about one hundred feet. There are few, if any, crossings where the driver has not an adequate range of vision, but if they run into the side of rapidly moving trains, break down crossing gates, run down flagmen, it would appear that visibility is by no means a paramount factor. Moreover, an analysis of accidents discloses that they occur proportionally as often at crossings where vision is unobstructed as where restricted.

Mistakes made in working levers due to excitement and confusion may account for some of the accidents. I believe, however, that the principal cause of most grade crossing accidents is either the desire to get across ahead of the approaching train, or indifference to danger. With trains running in different directions, day and night, no driver should attempt to cross a railroad track without first making sure that it may be done safely. He should stop, look, and listen.

A Saloon 300 Miles Long

BOOZE, which has been outlawed in the United States, is not dead, and don't you forget it. For the big booze dealers have already made plans to turn the Bahama Islands into a titanic saloon, and as these islands extend from Fort Pierce on the north to Key West on the south, it can readily be seen that there is soon to spring up a saloon almost 300 hundred miles long. And what is more, this titanic saloon is going to be operated by Americans, and not by English or Scotch. And besides having a saloon on every accessible cay, the whisky interests are going to turn many of these cays into titanic hostelries, like the Waldorf-Astoria, and install all manner of chance games, and make some of the now uninhabited cays like a veritable Monte Carlo. None of the near Bahama cays are more than four hours' journey from the Florida coast, and if one uses a fast boat or airplane he can get there in two hours with the boat, and ten minutes with a good airplane.

With these advantages it can readily be seen that the Bahama Islands are surely going to be the Mecca for the thirsty ones. Already Upper Cat Cay has been bought for the site of the biggest hotel in the world, and this hotel will probably cost many millions of dollars, and the syndicate intend to instal every manner of game and keep it open all winter long, and if it pays well they may run it during the summer.

Palm Beach has dug its inlet deeper, and soon there will be a cay furnished like Upper Cat Cay, and another titanic hotel established.

Moreover, it is the plan of these booze-dispensers to run boats just outside of American waters from these cays, and from these boats furnish liquor to all the thirsty ones who care to go just outside the three-mile limit and drink it.

Many fishermen are planning to get their booze in this manner, as they go outside, and a few miles more or less does not matter to them, and I have no doubt that these men will soon develop into clandestine booze-pedlers, and we shall see many an apparently innocent fisherman living in the lap of luxury in a few years, because he smuggled booze into the good old U. S. A. B. Y. H.

Does Prohibition Pay?

A New York town answers with increasing property values, better business, higher manhood and happier womanhood

MIDDLETOWN, N. Y., has been "dry" now for more than a year, the law having become effective on October 1, 1918. The results have been directly opposite to what the liquor people predicted. Every merchant in the city reports that his business has increased tremendously.

Stores dealing in women's and children's apparel particularly found their business growing steadily during the first few months the drinking-places were closed. The big refrigerator companies, handling meats, etc., reported enormous increases in their sales tonnage. The savings bank deposits increased thousands of dollars. This is readily believable when it is understood that the estimated revenue necessary to keep Middletown's thirty-two drinking-places going ran up to nearly two thousand dollars a year.

But the greatest effect has been upon property. Some of the big real estate men were favorable to the liquor cause because they feared that property values would decrease and there would be many vacant stores. What has happened? A vacant store cannot be had in Middletown for love or money. There is not a vacant house to be had. The stores which were formerly dingy, ill-smelling liquor places now shelter going enterprises which are a help instead of a detriment to the city. In one former hotel there is a glove factory which employs two hundred women at good pay. Another unsightly old building which housed a noisome gin-mill has been torn down and in its place there is going up a handsome brick building which will be occupied by one of our merchants as a shoe store, with office room and flats overhead. Another saloon was taken over by the Woman's Exchange. Another has been converted into a five- and ten-cent store that is doing a rushing business. A former saloon man has had his place remodeled and has opened a fine shoe store and is being liberally patronized by some of the drys who recognize the spirit which he is showing. There is not one of the thirty-two former liquor places which is unoccupied today.

These are only some of the results of Prohibition in Middletown. Others are less noticeable, but can be seen by those who know the city well. There are hundreds of young children whose pinched and starved faces and ill-clad bodies brought a pang to the heart in the old liquor-drinking days, who are now well fed and well clothed. There are hundreds of mothers, wives and sisters who know the peace and happiness of a comfortable and decent home who never knew it before. There are dozens of men with bright eyes and clear brains and their own self-respect regained who were before traveling the downward path and breaking the hearts of their loved ones.

There can be no question that the day Middletown went dry was the greatest day in its history. It is a busy, prosperous, happy, clean city—a desirable place in which to live and in which to bring up children. The church people who for once got together and "voted the way they prayed" and the ministers who led them on to this inspiring victory have found in what has happened ample justification of their faith.

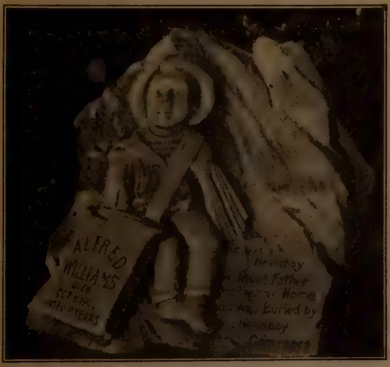
The Newsboy's Grave

By ALBERT SIDNEY GREGG

"He was a Newsboy without Father, Mother, or Home, and was Buried by His Newsboy Comrades."

IN THE old Erie Cemetery on East Ninth Street, Cleveland, Ohio, there is the grave of a little newsboy, which has become a sort of Mecca to hundreds of men, women, and boys. It is nothing uncommon for visitors from a distance to ask the superintendent to show them the newsboy's grave. One day a company of seventy-five boys of various nationalities and degrees of poverty begged admission and were allowed to stand around the little gravestone and gaze at it in silence for a few moments, and then marched out again.



ALFRED WILLIAMS
He was a Newsboy without Father Mother or Home and was Buried by his Newsboy Comrades

The monument to a newsboy

Alfred Williams, the newsboy in question, committed suicide on October 11, 1900, at the age of eleven years. The struggle was too much for him, and in a moment of despondency he bought some poison and killed himself. He was a typical boy of the streets, without a home and with very few friends. He slept anywhere he could find a place, but there came a time when sickness took the courage out of him and he decided to end it all.

As soon as his death became known, the newsboys scraped together enough pennies to buy him a lot in the old Erie graveyard. Then they went to Joseph Carabelli, the monument-builder, and begged him for a piece of marble to mark the head of the grave. Mr. Carabelli was so touched with the earnestness of the boys that in place of merely giving them the little marble slab they had asked for he carved a rude monument showing the figure of a newsboy sitting on a curbstone with the newspapers under his arm. On a tablet by his side is the following inscription: "He was a Newsboy without Father, Mother, or Home, and was Buried by his Newsboy Comrades."

On Decoration Day, after the graves of the old soldiers have been covered with flowers, a few bouquets and wreaths are placed on the grave of little Alfred Williams.

JELL-O
RASPBERRY

Not So Bad this Month

"Now, that's better! It's the first time the expense figures haven't given me a horrid feeling.

"If I'd only known sooner about Jell-O and some of the other money savers, I'm sure I'd have more dollars and not be so near wrinkles.

"What a lot of money and time I've wasted on things to eat, when

would have helped me out."

Every woman who wants to know how Jell-O can "help her out" will learn how in the recipes below and in the Jell-O Book, which will be sent free to all who send name and address.

So many delightful things are made of Jell-O that it is impossible for any woman to know about all of them. But every woman can possess the recipes for the newest and best of the special Jell-O dishes.

The recipes following are of this class. Take the Pineapple Bavarian Cream for example:

Marion Harland was one of the first of the great cooks to discover that Jell-O—whipped exactly as cream is whipped—forms the ideal base for all forms of Bavarian Creams. Almost any kind of fruit can be stirred into the whipped Jell-O, just as the pineapple is in the recipe below. With comparatively little effort and little expense any woman can make Bavarian Creams of Jell-O that she could never hope to equal in any other way. Berries, peaches, cherries and prunes can be used instead of the pineapple specified in the recipe.

No sugar, cream or eggs are used in these delightful dishes, but only whipped Jell-O and fruit juices (the fruit itself only when particularly desired.)

Pineapple Bavarian Cream

Dissolve a package of Lemon Jell-O in a half pint of boiling water and add a half pint of juice from a can of pineapple. When cold and still liquid whip to consistency of whipped cream. Add a cup of shredded pineapple if you wish. Serves from 9 to 12 persons. Whipped cream adds to the richness of the dessert, but it is not necessary.

Use a Dover egg beater for whipping Jell-O, and whip it just as you whip cream—only be sure you do not wait till Jell-O begins to set before you whip it.

Jappy Jell-O Compote

Pour a half cup or cup of peach juice into a pint measure; fill with water, let come to boiling point, and dissolve a package of Lemon or Orange Jell-O in it. Add one cup of cooked rice (cold). Pour half into a dish or individual moulds and set away to harden. Place six or seven halves of peaches on the jellied rice and cover with the remainder of the rice. Serve with meat course, or for dessert as you choose.

Olive Jell-O Salad

Dissolve a package of Lemon Jell-O in a half pint of boiling water. Add half-pint can of tomato soup, one cup finely chopped celery and twelve olives chopped. Salt to taste. Set away to harden.

Glorified Rice

Dissolve a package of Lemon Jell-O in a half pint of boiling water. Add one-half pint of canned pineapple juice or any fruit-juice. When a cold liquid, whip to the consistency of heavy whipped cream. Have two cups of cold boiled rice cooked dry. Fold the rice into the whipped Jell-O. Add one cup whipped cream, four tablespoonfuls sugar, and salt to taste. Set in a cold place to harden.

The whipped cream may be omitted and the Glorified Rice will still be a most delicious dish. Whipped Jell-O, alone or in combination with fruit, is so good that it is seldom necessary to add cream to it.

Imperial Salad

Dissolve a package of Lemon Jell-O in a pint of boiling water and one tablespoonful vinegar. Just as Jell-O begins to set, add one small can sliced pineapple, one-half can Spanish pimentos, shredded, and one sliced cucumber. Serve with cream salad dressing.

New Manhattan Salad

Dissolve a package of Lemon Jell-O in a pint of boiling water and one tablespoonful vinegar. When slightly stiffened add one cup each of chopped celery and apple, one cup English walnut meats broken in pieces and sprinkled with salt. Cool in individual moulds; serve on lettuce with mayonnaise or French dressing.

The New Jell-O Book

The Jell-O Book contains more new recipes than any has ever before and they are useful recipes. A copy of the book, beautifully illustrated, will be sent to you free if you will send us your name and address.

Jell-O is put up in six pure fruit flavors. Strawberry, Raspberry, Lemon, Orange, Cherry, Chocolate, and sells two for 25 cents.

Money in the Scrap Bag

THE Waste Material Department was born one day while the members of the Ladies' Aid Society were sewing carpet rags, later to be woven into rugs. Among the rags were many pieces of cretonne, silkoline, lawn and other materials. These were all new goods, brought from various piece-bags, too good to be used for carpet rags, and in fact not suitable for that purpose anyway. Some one raised a protest at such waste, calling attention to the number of useful and pretty articles which could be made from the pieces. A committee was appointed by the president to go through the rag-pile and select whatever could be used for other purposes, then to make up the articles and place them on sale at the bazaar for which the society was then preparing.

This was to be called the Waste Material Department, and no material of any sort was to be purchased to go with the scraps; everything used was to be "waste material" which some one had on hand. At every meeting donations would be received by the committee, and if at any time something was needed to finish an article, the society was informed of the need, and in nearly every case the required material, or a substitute, would be found in some workbox or piece-bag.

Without much effort over a hundred articles were made and placed in what was called the Bargain Booth, and the actual cash outlay for material used in their manufacture was less than one dollar. While at first it was the intention of the committee to get along without buying anything, it was found that a few things, such as bone rings, narrow ribbon, elastic, etc., had not been donated, and these were really necessary t finish some article. Some of the thing made were silver cases of silkoline, lined with flannelette, dainty dusting caps o figured lawns, little aprons of lawn, fancy bags of every sort—about thirty in all—pin-cases, dresser scarfs, pin-cushion covers, shoe and pattern bags toilet table-mats, kettle-holders, handkerchief pressers and cases, combing jackets, sachets, sofa pillow covers, etc These were made by combining material from different sources.

Two sets of toilet table-mats wer made from pieces of heavy white material left from a waist, with a crochete edge of knitting cotton, also donated A handsome dresser scarf was mad from a remnant of fine curtain scrim hemstitched and finished with a heavy lace edging. Pretty workbags wer easy to manufacture by combining materials. Shoe and pattern bags cam from strips of cretonne and figure denim, bound with bias bands of som contrasting shade. The odds and end were made into duster bags, with som pieces of cheese-cloth featherstitched i colored silkoline added for dusters.

One dainty dresser set of three pieces scarf, cushion and handkerchief bag came out of a roll of pieces of yellow flowered organdy left from a summe dress. They were lined with yellow sateen—more scraps—and trimmed with lace edge, the lace being that which som one had at one time intended to use o curtains, but changed her mind and s turned over the roll as waste material

Under the direction of an efficien committee such a booth ought to clea for the society anywhere from $20 up according to the number of things made

Why Men Stay Single

"IT TAKES a lot of nerve for a young fellow to get married nowadays, the girls dress so extravagantly," declared a young man recently in reply to a laughing query as to why he did not marry.

He was a young man of good habits, getting a fair salary, of the proper age to marry, and not averse to the society of womankind. He worked in a large establishment where many women as well as men were employed in office work and had noted both their every-day apparel and their gala attire. The gala attire was particularly noticeable on Saturday morning when many girls came gaily dressed for the matinee or other afternoon function.

Frequently these girls, receiving good salaries, came from poor homes where it was a struggle for the family to get enough to eat. Yet apparently the girls did not realize the inconsistency in wearing things so much finer than the other members of the family, or the unsuitability of it. The young man also had noted the dress of those who were n office girls but home girls, and in the own home, as luxurious.

Reasonably the inference result that it would be out of the question for young man on an ordinary salary marry and keep up the pace; the pa that carries in its train dresses of silk a Georgette and crêpe de Chine, and coa of fur and velvet, silk underwea silk hosiery, cosmetics and other lu uries.

There is always the innate femini desire for pretty clothing to please one self and others, and this is as it shou be. Yet the glance of a young man one's superfine raiment should not a ways be taken for that of admiratio A less expensive, though none the le tasteful, mode of dressing with a ne bank account, a judicious investmen or the helping of one's family if neede would redound more to one's credit tha the homely but significant phrase, "S puts everything on her back."

IT is the pure coconut milk in the Baker Can that makes this homemade candy richer and more flavory than other coconut candy.

Coconut milk, you know, is the only successful means of retaining this rich flavor of the fresh nut. It keeps the meat in the Baker Can moist and tender. Baker's alone has this supreme flavor of the newly-picked nut, for Baker's is the only coconut canned in its own milk.

FREE—Our New Recipe Booklet, illustrated in colors, tells you how to make many other coconut dishes—all perfectly delicious—will be sent you and your friends on request.

A COAT or two of Effecto Auto Finishes will make the old barge look as alluring as a movie vampire and as full o' pep as a bull pup! More truth than poetry in that.

Effecto AUTO FINISHES

Listen! The Thomaston Express, of December 6th, 1918, a newspaper in Thomaston, Conn., ran this news item: "Dr. Kane has purchased a Grant touring car." The fact is, the only thing the doctor purchased was a small can of Effecto Auto Black Enamel, which was applied to his old Grant car, in an unheated barn. Why not "purchase" a new (?) car this way yourself?

Effecto Auto Finishes are made in nine live enamel colors, Finishing (clear varnish) and Top & Seat Dressing. It requires but a few hours of interesting work, a few dollars' worth of Effecto and 24 to 48 hours for drying, to transform the old weather-beaten car into a real automobile that you needn't be ashamed of. Your friends won't know the old boat.

Do not be persuaded that there is a substitute for Effecto. Effecto Auto Enamel is the original, genuine, high-luster auto enamel; easy-working, self-leveling and quick-drying; not a wax, polish or paint, but an enamel finish that will last longer than the finish on most new cars.

Top & Seat Dressing renews and waterproofs all kinds of tops, seats and upholstery. Dries in fifteen minutes.

A can of Effecto Auto Black Enamel will save you many dollars, if you keep it handy in the garage for touching up banged fenders and rusty spots.

If you can't find Effecto Auto Finishes at local paint, hardware or accessory stores,

Send us $1.70 for a Quart of Black Enamel enough for the average car, which will be sent you transportation charges prepaid.

Color card showing complete line of colors, and names of local dealers sent on request.

Hulled-Corn Festival

WE HAD racked our brains for weeks trying to think of some new and interesting way to raise some money at the church. Grandmother was visiting us at the time, and one day I went to her in despair. "Grandmother dear," I said, "surely you used to have church fairs in your day. Can't you suggest something that no one has ever had in town, that will make people want to spend their money? It is too late for a berry festval; besides, every church in town has had one, and suppers are too much trouble just now."

And then grandmother told us about the "hulled-corn festivals" that used to be so popular when she was a girl, and we decided to have one if she would tell us how to get the corn ready. And it seemed a particularly appropriate time to have such a festival, as it was now late fall.

And the affair was certainly a success. The church parlors were decorated as for a harvest home. The children gave a little entertainment, and there were the hulled-corn booths, three of them, all doing a rushing business, for every one wanted two or three bowls of the delicious dish, and every one wanted some to carry home. Indeed, so popular did the new dish become in our town that two or three of the women made it ever Friday for those who had placed their order through the week, and we kept on making money all winter.

The corn isn't hard to make, as grandmother taught us. We simply made the lye by using a heaping tablespoonful of concentrated lye to every gallon of water, and boiling the corn in it until the hulls slipped off easily. Then wash it thoroughly in several waters, cold, and when the lye has all been washed out, rub it briskly between the palms until all the hulls are off. Then it is ready to cook. Cover with cold water and boil until it is very tender. Grandmother tested it by mashing it between her fingers. It takes four or five hours, and it can be cooked in the fireless.

Eight quarts of the corn after it has been shelled is about the easiest big lot we could do, we discovered. Three or four women would volunteer each week to make that much apiece.

At the festival we had two punch-bowls full of the yellow kernels on each table, and dipped it out into bowls, pouring rich milk over it, or, for ten cents extra, cream. When we found out how good it was we ordered it each week for our Saturday or Sunday night suppers, and that is how it became a regular institution in our church affairs. One has only to taste it once to acquire the habit. NELLIE RYDER GATES.

W. S. S. Will Be Permanent

SALES of War Savings and Thrift Stamps, it has been announced by Carter Glass, Secretary of the Treasury, will be continued as part of the Government's National Thrift Campaign. In the Second Federal Reserve District there are approximately 900,000 regularly enrolled investors in these securities. The net cash receipts of the U. S. Treasury from stamp sales up to June 30 was approximately $956,000,000. Discontinuance of stamp sales was opposed by many organizations and industrial concerns whose members and employees are strong advocates of thrift and saving. George D. Strayer, president of the National Education Association, Teachers' College, Columbia University, New York City, urged that stamp sales be made permanent in view of the regular savings habits developed among schools throughout the country. Secretary Glass was asked to make Thrift and War Savings Stamps permanently available to schools and other volunteer agencies.

The reply of Secretary Glass was as follows: "It is the intention of the Treasury to continue and make permanent the War Savings movement and to continue the sale of Thrift and War Savings Stamps and Certificates. I am greatly pleased and encouraged to know of the interest of the National Education Association in this movement, and very greatly appreciate its hearty and effective cooperation."

t always in church or school does t call for our allegiance and sum- us to decision, though to many as come in the sanctuary, as to h under the old covenant, at the -bench sometimes, and sometimes n the summer fields, he calls. There always be those who shall leave chosen tasks and spend their whole avor on the things that pertain ially to the Kingdom. Others, in r numbers, must stay at work, but e it in service as a part of their contion to the bringing in of God's on earth. Preachers of the Word of , missionaries and teachers we must , and they must lay aside their nary vocations. Your boys and must heed the call; yet ofttimes need some Christian friend to sel and determine with them the command of the Father. In class home there must be guidance, if the en leaders of the Kingdom entere are to be supplied and trained for r special work.

as it not a difficult thing that Peter John were asked to do? They left e and labor and friends on a risky ture that the world might have ght foolhardy. Whence were to their food and shelter? Did not warn the overzealous that "the of Man had not where to lay his head?" We can but wonder what the neighbors of these fishermen thought and said. As for their father, Zebedee, how did he take it? We do not know, yet we are sure that they did not leave him poor and helpless. He was successful and had hired servants, but did he ever come to appreciate that Jesus gave his boys a better chance than anything he could offer? Then, as now, the decision was hard on loved ones in many a case. Hundreds of mothers in America today have sons and daughters who have followed Jesus to Africa and India and the far islands of the sea. Verily they shall in no wise lose their reward.

"Come ye after me" is the cry of Jesus still. Eager young hearts are hearing it now. The college lad with the world before him decides to put his life where it will most serve, regardless of the profit apparent to himself. The farmer boy goes to the distant academy, hungry for knowledge, that he may preach effectively to the needy world. The business girl, likely as not, wonders what she ought to do, as she hears a young woman little older than herself tell the mission circle of the ministry to the womanhood of the Orient

"I will make you." Jesus is the great builder of personality. Remember what he made of these Galileans! It is the making of any man to put his life into the pierced hands of the Saviour. He has taken some rather unpromising material and produced saints and heroes.

Are we seeing to it that those whom we are reaching receive the great message and understand, at least in part, what he is able to do with a soul?

"I will make you fishers of men." How rich is the analogy and how much it must have meant to the experienced boatmen of Capernaum! Men are hard to enlist in unselfish causes, until one masters the Lord's secret. They have to be lured into the highest enterprises for human good, captured for the cause that is right. There are various methods of securing them, too. Sometimes one can appeal to the multitude for a noble ideal, and recruit hundreds, like the drawing of a mighty seine. Again one patiently waits and guides a small group, such as a class of boys, until the moment is ripe for the teacher to "land the whole bunch," like swinging a hand net. But there are others who are never taken by netting at all, boys as well as men and women who must be persistently angled for with rod and line, not letting them know what you are doing at all!

Not long since, a lad came to his pastor and said: "You want me to join the church, though you never have said much." The minister answered, "Of course! I've had an eye on you for a year." "Well," he responded, "I'm ready to do it, and do you know, I have a feeling that it's now or never with me."

How hard it is to tell just when to draw the net, to sign up your recruit for the Church of God! We need to become better fishers, studying the habits of our precious quarry, finding out the ways by which, unharmed, unspoiled, they may be found in the hands of the Lord, who commissioned us to "go out into the world."

A Bicycle Famine

A BICYCLE famine is coming, according to inside information from bicycle manufacturers. Practically all of the big manufacturers of bicycles cooperated with Uncle Sam by devoting their plants to the production of munitions—airship parts and military bicycles of a special pattern that very materially cut down the normal output of regular models. The lost production on account of war work and inability to get steel have already caused a serious shortage. More time will be lost while the factories are changing their equipment back to a bicycle basis. There is also a tremendous export demand for bicycles.

It's the Woman's Pencil, Too

Another distinctive thing about Eversharp is that it has jumped into immediate favor as the woman's pencil, just as it has won its way into the good graces of a million men writers.

Women admire Eversharp for its wondrous beauty, the result of jeweler artisanship. They appreciate the new writing comfort afforded by the always-sharp writing point. They like the handy sizes so easily carried in bag or on chain.

The economy also appeals. Eversharp carries enough lead for a quarter million words—ten thousand words one cent—and a point for every word.

No other pencil combines so generously such beauty, convenience, writing comfort, and lasting economy.

For men, Eversharp comes in regular size, as well as in small-pocket size, with or without ring for chain. There's an Eversharp style for all who write, and prices start as low as $1.

Don't forget Eversharp when next you plan to please someone's heart and hand. Eversharp will be a lifelong reminder of a writing gift well chosen. If you do not already own Eversharp, buy one now. You'll experience a totally new writing comfort.

If your dealer is not supplied, write for descriptive literature to aid in selection direct.

What 15c Will Bring You from the Nation's Capital

Washington, the home of the Pathfinder, has become the World's Capital and reading the Pathfinder will be like sitting in the inner council with those who will mold the world's destiny for the next generation

The little matter of 15c in stamps or coin will bring you the Pathfinder 13 weeks on trial. The Pathfinder is an illustrated weekly, published at the Nation's center, for the Nation; a paper that prints all the news of the world and tells the truth and only the truth; now in its 27th year. This paper fills the bill without emptying the purse; it costs but $1 a year. If you want to keep posted on what is going on in the world, at the least expense of time or money, this is your means. If you want a paper in your home which is sincere, reliable, entertaining, wholesome, the Pathfinder is yours. If you appreciate a paper which puts everything clearly, fairly, briefly—here it is. Send 15c to show that you might like such a paper and we will send the Pathfinder 13 weeks. The 15c does not repay us; we are glad to invest in new friends. Pathfinder, Box 70, Washington, D. C.

Teaching the Children How to Help Others

IF ANY mother who happens to be reading this were asked, "What is the fault in your children which it seems hardest to overcome?" there is little doubt that she would reply, "Selfishness. John and Mary seem so often to think that every one in the home should dance attendance upon them. Each one of them acts, when there is a clash, as if his or her interests should prevail."

Well, it is not surprising that mothers find selfishness so common in their children, not to speak of the children of others. It seems necessary that we should be overloaded with self-centeredness at the start in order that we may make a "go" of life. What God is trying to do with us, however, by all the education of life is to help us to overcome our selfishness, and to replace self-interest by a desire to be of service to others.

In this divine purpose it is the privilege of mothers to help God. How shall they go about it? How shall John and Mary be taught to help each other, and all of the other members of the family, as well as other individuals, younger or older, with whom they may come in contact?

Doubtless reproof of selfishness when it appears in flagrant form will help some. Probably exhortations to be thoughtful of others are not devoid of value. Undoubtedly there is a real stimulus to unselfishness in stories, within the range of the children's comprehension, of those who have helped others. If a story is told with a hero whom Johnny admires for his strength and bravery, and who uses his strength and displays his courage in unselfish deeds, Johnny will feel the impulse himself to be unselfish. In like manner Mary will feel like imitating her unselfish heroines.

When all is said, however, the best way to help the children to be unselfish is to see that in the home circle and in the circle of their child friends they actually do things for others. It is a great mistake to have a home so organized that neither in the house or in the garden is there anything which John and Mary can do for some one besides themselves.

It is for the mother to be always on the alert to suggest little things which the children can do to help. Mary may help set the table, and help dust, even if mother dusts after her, and go upstairs after a book mother was reading, or get grandpa's spectacles for him. John can help feed the dog, dig weeds from the garden under father's supervision, get kindling wood if the fire goes out, and carry a bunch of flowers from mother to a sick neighbor. John and Mary together may fill a surprise box to be sent to a sick child in the neighborhood. They will enjoy wrapping up the surprises, little toys and trinkets which they have donated, into packages which the sick child will open joyously.

It is an axiom that we learn to do by doing, and this axiom is just as true of doing deeds of kindness as of any other kind of doing. The home circle should be made a laboratory in unselfishness, where the boys and girls, and their elders too, for no one is too old to learn more, learn by experiment what they can do to help others, and learn also the joy which unselfishness brings.

J. E. RUSSELL.

Pressing Needs Care

ANY housewife can do a good job of pressing woolen garments if she will take pains and heed a few simple suggestions.

Use a moderately hot iron.

Use a pressing cloth which has been wrung as dry as possible.

Place the pressing cloth on the right side of the garment and press until the cloth is dry. When the cloth is removed, the material being pressed should look soft and fluffy, but should not be entirely dry.

The material should now be turned over and pressed on the wrong side until it is dry. If pressed on the right side the nap will be flattened down and the surface will appear shiny.

The Mother's Job

By EDWARD LEIGH PELL

A GENERATION or two ago the problem of teaching a child the fundamental truths of life was a y simple one. Mothers had their ries then as now, but the question vhat to teach was not one of them; they had to do was to recall what y had been taught in their own child- d and teach that. If much of their ruction would not bear inspection, often happened to be the case, it was a very serious matter: in those simple s the average child would grow up l go through life without ever coming light where he would have a chance inspect it.

But those simple days have passed, l with them all our simple problems; l in their place we have—the modern icism! And that, so far as the prob- before us is concerned, has changed rything. Today when a boy goes to lege he finds himself in the fierce re of a new light—a most unsancti- l, persistent light that searches him ough and through and does not balk en at the most sacred recesses of his l. And in that light he makes the st appalling discovery of his life. He covers that his mother—bless her rt!—has been teaching him things t were not true. She has lovingly ght him ideas of God that are as ab- rd as the wildest fancies of mythology. e has taught him with the best inten- ns, ideas of prayer that look as if ey had floated over from pagan India. that fierce light some of her teachings pear so foolish that he blushes at the ought of being caught with them, and almost falls over himself in his fever- haste to get rid of them.

It would not be so bad but for the ct that haste is always bad. In his ver to cast out the chaff John over- oks the wheat that is scattered through , and when it is all over it will be a mir- le if the boy's mind is not found to be empty of all religious truth as it is ely to be of such kindred essentials reverence and common sense.

Thousands of boys and girls at college day are casting away their religious ith, not because the light that shines the modern college shows the teach- gs of Christ to be untrue, but simply ecause their mothers did not teach em the truth. Modern criticism has et to affect a single teaching of Christ, ut it is merciless in revealing the ab- rdity of some things that are taught the name of Christ, and it is the sud- en exposure of these things to the light f criticism at college, more than any- hing else, that is playing such havoc ith the religious faith of our young people of today. The boy who has the privilege of going to college fortified with the fundamental truths of Christianity, sanely taught by an intelligent mother who was too conscientious to teach him wrong the first time under promise to herself to teach him better when he should be old enough to understand better—the boy who has this rare privilege may not, and in all probability will not, go through college without a struggle with doubt, but he is likely to bring back home with his sheepskin every fundamental religious truth that his mother taught him. He will come back not believing some things which other religious teachers have taught him, but that is another matter.

We are often told nowadays that the only hope for Christianity in America is a revival of moral courage that will make the Church brave enough to run its creed through a sifter. The Church must separate the wheat from the chaff and bravely set a match to the chaff! But the real trouble lies deeper. The real trouble is not in the creed of the Church, which few people ever think about, but in the religious instruction which our children are getting at home.

Mothers who would never think of setting a dinner before anybody's little child without carefully inspecting it, are still setting before their own children the teachings which they received in their own childhood, without so much as glancing at them. They are still teaching John about a God who loves little boys only when they are good. They are still teaching him that if he wants anything all he has to do is to ask God for it in Jesus' name and believe that he is going to get it. They teach such things, not because they believe them, but partly because they are not clear as to just what is the truth, and partly because they expect to teach them better when they are old enough to understand better. And nurses, as everybody knows, are still holding up terrifying heathenish pictures of God before little children to make them behave.

The one pressing need of American Christianity today is not a church brave enough to run its creed through a sifter, but Christian mothers who will take the time to sift out the religious ideas which they have brought up from their childhood, and separate what Christ actually taught from the vast mass of chaff that has come to them, partly from their heathen ancestors of a thousand years ago, partly from half-heathen nurses, and partly from teachers who were handicapped by a little pagan inheritance.

An Eight-Hour Day for Clergy

AN EIGHT-HOUR day for clergy is being advocated in the Protestant Episcopal Church by the ight Rev. Frank Hale Touret, Bishop f Western Colorado, who declares that f the ministers of all churches worked ight hours a day there would soon be o basis for the observation of cynics hat the world is divided into three lasses—men, women and clergymen.

Bishop Touret made his unusual ecommendation in his annual address before the Western Colorado Missionary District Convention. His remarks, which have caused much discussion in the Protestant Episcopal Church and some criticism from a few conservative clergymen, were as follows:

"I propose an eight-hour day for every clergyman in the Missionary District of Western Colorado. I understand that in some of the dangerous occupations like mining, six hours a day is being considered a full day's work. But until we begin to live underground, I think eight hours not exhaustive. I wonder how many of you really put in eight hours a day on your job? If not, there is little wonder that there is often disappointment in your work. Your neighbor works as hard as this. He wonders why you do not. I am not surprised that the hard-working physician, lawyer or business man becomes impatient with clergymen who expect to live in a world of special privilege.

"An eight-hour day would produce certain results. It would mean more study. An eight-hour day would mean more calls, would mean a closer relationship with your people. An eight-hour day would mean more Sunday school teachers' meetings.

"Finally, an eight-hour day would mean more self-respect. You would be more proud of yourselves if you worked as hard as other men in other fields of labor."

Mexico Is Building

THE Own-Your-Own-Home campaign, after extending to all parts of this country, has crossed the border into Mexico. The government program for encouraging building has attracted the attention of progressive business men in the city of Mexico, where ambitious plans for construction are being considered.

Arturo M. Martinez, one of the foremost contractors in Mexico, after receiving reports from the United States Department of Labor concerning projects which are now under way in various cities, has notified the Department's Division of Public Works and Construction, Development, Information and Education Service, that he will visit the places in the United States where the greatest building activity is in progress.

Men of 45

Need Better Baked Beans

IN boyhood one could digest beans badly baked. And any hearty food was enjoyable.

But beans for indoor men must be fitted to digest. And they must be made inviting, like Van Camp's.

To get a zestful sauce our scientific cooks tested 856 recipes

A Four-Year Dish

In the Van Camp kitchens, college-trained cooks spent four years to perfect baked beans. They compared 856 blends to get the ideal sauce.

Now each lot of beans is analyzed. The water used is freed from minerals to insure a tender skin.

The baking is done in modern steam ovens, so high heat cannot crisp or burst beans. They are baked for hours there, until every granule is fitted to digest. They are also baked after sealing so that the flavor can't escape.

The sauce is baked with them, so every atom shares its inviting zest.

Let Men Try Them

Hotels and restaurants all over America are buying Van Camp's to please men. Let the man in your home enjoy them.

He will get beans mellow, nutty and whole. He will get a delicious tang. And the beans will not tax the stomach.

You will save work and fuel. You will have a dish of meat-like nutrition to serve at a moment's notice. You will cut down meat bills by making beans more popular.

Order a few cans now.

Different from all others—the NEW BENJAMIN AIR RIFLE

shoots harder and farther than any other. Made on a new principle. Is really a strong air-pump, compressing air in the air-chamber to any degree of power desired. Each stroke gives increased power, one to six strokes being sufficient.

Works like air-drills and air-hammers—with this difference:

You control shooting force. This block of hardwood shows penetrating power of each charge. No other air rifle can duplicate this feat.

The Benjamin is safe, because you control the power. Never loses shooting force—has no springs to get out of order.

Write for interesting folder about this wonderful gun.

At all dealers, $3.75. Ask your dealer for demonstration.

To the Boy Who Is in College

By HENRY W. MAHAN, Jr., A.B.

NOWADAYS, when a college education is almost a prerequisite to a successful career in business, the g man who is ambitious to succeed ts to pick out the right path, choose ollege, and then fight to win.

hile you cannot be certain that the g you start to study is going to be life's work, you can be anxious to ahead and learn all that your choice s. Be willing to commence at the om of the ladder in your college se as well as in anything else. In g this you will find that you are king with a big group who are some going to be the boss along with you. 't be satisfied to stand back and pt a mediocre rank among your w classmen; push out and demand r right position. You do not have to loud or noisy about it—remember t the biggest men use the fewest ds, and that actions compel notice. athlete or student who is able to h at the top of the list and at the e time neither smoke nor drink is aired, respected and encouraged. n if you have to change your course ttle later on, decide at the outset to ster the studies that you undertake learn, and in doing this you will fit rself for any and all lessons you de- mine to study later.

aving chosen the college that you nk is going to give you what you want, do not stop there. You are not going to get any more out of it than you put into it. Some of the brightest men have been graduated from the smallest institutions, while some of the biggest failures have been sent to the leading universities. You should say to yourself now—I will put my best in, and in doing that I will get the best it offers. It is far better for you to get the best a small college offers than to get little or nothing from a "big name" institution. Remember, too, that the boy who helps himself to buy his education is a boy that the whole college is proud to point out. One of the big bankers of the East today is a man who worked his way to his degree by shoveling coal. The boy who learns the value of the dollar that is assisting him to acquire the necessary equipment of mind and body is the boy who will later occupy the easy-chair and dictate with a confident voice. But if you do not have to earn your way you can be equally as well respected by making your monthly stipend meet all your expenses and perhaps save some money besides. Whoever you are, bear in mind the one sure rule that the Lord helps him who helps himself.

When you have these points well in mind there is one big job left for you—and that is, fight to win. You are only going to college once; study, work, strive, be honest, and you will succeed.

The Horse Dentist

Scientific care is now given to the teeth of animals

HERE is something more an mere senti- nt in the way in ich the law of man kindness in relation to dumb imals is prac- ed today. The mane societies ve been moved by e highest Chris- an principles in all eir far-reaching manitarian work, d if the dumb eatures in the animal world could be ven the gift of ngues a mighty st of them could e and speak grate- lly because of all their human friends ve done for them.

The idea of a dentist for horses would ave been scoffed at a few years ago, ut it is certain that a horse can suffer much pain from decaying and ulcer- ted teeth as a man can feel from the me cause, and the law of human kind- ess demands that animals should be lieved of pain when it is possible.

Dr. T. C. Downs of the Brookline district of Boston has for years given his time to a clientele found in the animal kingdom, and he has made a specialty of serving as a dentist to horses. The greater part of his life has been spent in this work. Every day he has a call to go to some suffering horse patient in Boston.

In telling of his method of work Dr. Downs says he backs a patient into its stall with a horse hitched on either side of it. Then he talks to the patient in a kindly and soothing tone and accomplishes more by this method than he could accomplish with any amount of mere physical force. He never fills the teeth of horses, but often files away irregularities. Many of his dumb patients seem to understand that the work of Dr. Downs is for their relief, and they seem to "grin and bear it" when it cannot be avoided.

J. L. H.

As Solemn as a Judge

AS SOLEMN as a judge" can well be applied to these little yellow aces, for they are almost "playless" hildren.

Childhood nd unhap- iness are ynony- nous in hina. apan has een justly lescribed s the "par- adise of chil- lren," China the reverse.

Though not entirely without plays and games, the children are so bound down by customs and traditions that the time for such things is limited. Most of their play consists of riddles and conundrums, but with the exception of a few active games their little lives are serious.

Homes differ as much in China as in other lands. Some are palaces, some are huts, some cut in cliffs, and some, boats upon rivers. Life for the young varies according to environment. Girls brought up in wealthy families are seldom seen out of doors, but poorer children, at an early age, have to do something to help earn their own living, from nursing the baby, cooking, and sewing.

Do You Believe in the SUPERNATURAL?

IF you offer your Sunday-school class anything less than the supernatural, your Sunday-school work will be a failure. For this reason The Sunday School Times offers you, every week,

—a supernatural Bible: a book which in every syllable is God's very Word: God-breathed, unique, authoritative, infallible.

—a supernatural Christ: a Saviour who is God, supernaturally born of a virgin, working miracles of love and omnipotence, dying as our Substitute, His body miraculously raised from the dead, able to save to the uttermost, and coming back to reign over His earth.

—a supernatural Life for every believer: Christ Himself living in victory in you, winning others to Himself through you, and making your service for Him a thrilling adventure of testimony and results.

With all this, the Sunday School Times also offers you the most successful methods of natural efficiency in Sunday-school and church work; a corps of a dozen trained specialists writing for you every week on the International Improved Uniform Lessons, and so many other remarkable features that it will take a whole series of advertisements to tell about them.

You Ask - - Is Your House the Right Kind for Kelsey Health Heat

Perhaps our best answer is to tell you the kind of houses it is now successfully heating.

In California, it is making Bungalow owners happy.

In Ohio, it is saving coal for farmers.

In Georgia, it is giving comfort to those fine old Plantation residences.

In New England, it is heating the Colonial houses of the Pilgrim Fathers' descendants.

On Long Island, it is giving Palm Beach temperatures to hundreds of those cosy new houses.

At Newport, Lenox, Tuxedo and Stockbridge, it is driving out the chill of autumn and the zero of winter from palatial country houses.

In the Philadelphia suburbs, it is taking the place of unsatisfactory furnaces and temper testing radiator heats.

All of which it not only heats, but ventilates and humidifies as well—a three in one system.

Looks like you will have to "look further" into the Kelsey Health Heat. Our booklet called "Some Saving Sense on Heating" is a good thing to start with.

Heathen Terror at an Eclipse

By Rev. and Mrs. W. B. WILLIAMS

"DOWY Konyo! Do wy, Konyo!" ("Good morning, Lord!") sobbed Cofa Kye, Kru Methodist, her arms clasped around the missionary woman's neck, her body trembling like a leaf. Prone on the ground lay Cofa Siah, choir leader, clutching the missionary man's ankles while she shook and prayed aloud. Close by stood the king's wife, old Juah, stiff with terror. Up the hill to the mission other women came running from their farms, singing, praying, quivering with fear. The mission children clustered around us with staring eyes and awed faces. The sun was passing through an eclipse and Kruland was in abject terror.

The noonday darkness deepened and the flames of the burning farm near by shone redly against the gloom. Suddenly our Bethany bell rang out and there was borne to our ears a great outburst of singing and prayer from that Christian town. In the heathen village the old chiefs ran to and fro, shouting, "God, you see me! I do you plenty wrong! But don't kill me this time!" To our church people they appealed, "God has taken the world away from us. What must we do?"

A few minutes later the light returned, radiant and bright. But in every town where the mission has established churches, our Kru people remained in prayer all night. This May watchnight service was God's seal to a revival which for two full years we had longed for, prayed for, labored for. Prayer brought down upon the solemnized Krus the convicting, converting power of the Holy Spirit. And before the revival closed, more than a hundred converts were to declare that God had indeed "taken the world away" from them, giving them that glorious substitute of Hebrews 11 : 16 and 12 : 22-24.

Word was soon brought to us that we must burn the Nana Kru ju-ju house. This was the biggest center of devil-worship, under the biggest devil doctor on the Kru Coast. To this place people continually brought human heads and hands for sacrifices. We have counted scores of them passing this mission. Hundreds of cows have been sacrificed to this same fetich, and their blood poured out upon it. The devil doctor is dead, but all the idols and the house holding them remained in Nana Kru. Wednesday, June 4, 1919, when we burned this monument to heathen superstition and crime, must ever stand forth in our history as Victory Day at Nana Kru Mission, Victory Day for God!

A hundred Kru Christians, led by the missionary and the Nana Kru second chief, passed singing through the town and encircled the ju-ju house, where they knelt in prayer, after short but searching preaching and testimony. Rising from their knees, they advanced to the attack. Opinion among the masses of onlookers was divided. Many believed our fire had no power to injure the fetiches. Rushing inside the house, our Christians began to knock the idols about, challenging them to save themselves. The brass bell was brought out, and then fire was applied—bamboo, thatch and ju-jus being consumed in a magnificent blaze. On the exact site of the ju-ju house a Methodist church will be built.

Leaving the smouldering embers our workers turned to the interior plantation settlements, preaching in twenty villages to hundreds of people, who, despite the famine, beat out rice and killed goats to feed their preacher "strangers," who, true to Scripture, "lacked nothing." Through them the Holy Spirit separated thirty-three souls for God. To the missionary's exceeding joy, every unconverted boy on the mission was brought to Christ. One lad, whose testimony is typical of all, said: "My father was a devil doctor and had a big ju-ju. My mother was a devil woman and had so many ju-jus no one man fit to tote them all. They taught me to walk in their road. But God showed me a better road—and I thank him."

China's Young Frances Willard

Miss Frances Wang, who intends to become the Frances Willard of China

A SLIGHT, slender, pretty and highly intelligent Chinese girl will immortalize the name of Frances Willard throughout China. She is now completing her preparations for an early start on that mission.

Frances Willard Wang is the name of this wonderful little Oriental, who has just turned twenty-one years old and is destined to become the Frances Willard of China. Even now plans are being made in China for her to be the Chinese Republic s Woman's Christian Temperance Union president.

Miss Wang was adopted thirteen years ago while in China, through a missionary society, by Mrs. Frances Willard, of Haddon Heights, N. J., who named the girl after herself and took her into her own home as her daughter three years ago. It was then that Miss Wang came to America to complete her education, having studied through a Methodist Episcopal mission while growing up in China. She is now completing her three-year course in the Northwestern University, and in April she will accompany Miss Gordon, the American W. C. T. U. president, to the World's W. C. T. U. Convention to be held in London, England, where she is on the program for an address. Following this Miss Wang will start for the Far East, where she will immediately commence her work.

Miss Wang carried away the oratorical prize last year at the American-Chinese Students' convention, the first woman ever to get that award, and this year she captured the first prize again at the convention held in Columbus, Ohio, September 8.

"China's greatest need is America's help in the fight against American breweries locating in China, on which many millions of dollars are being spent, with the anticipated results by the owners of reaping untold millions through the traffic," says Miss Wang. "We have a great fight on our hands in that country, and I am going over there in a few months with America behind me to fight the fight and keep on fighting.

"I want to congratulate the American W. C. T. U. and the people as a whole for their Prohibition victory, but they must feel that their work is not done yet, for China looks to America as its great mother for years of help of such magnitude that it cannot be realized at this time. China has recently won its first great battle against evil, that of the opium habit and traffic, which for so many years was a curse to the land. Now, surely, if we won such a great victory over there, and America won the great Prohibition victory here, what and where are the worldly strongholds that can withstand the combined efforts of America and China to drive evil from that Oriental country?"

"I wonder if he's going to be ill"

REMEMBER—it is a fact that thousands upon thousands of men and women, weakened through the stress and strain of work and worry, have regained vitality and working power, by using Sanatogen.

When Sir Gilbert Parker writes: "Sanatogen is a true food-tonic, feeding the nerves and giving fresh vigor to the over-worked body and mind," he but expresses the conviction of multitudes of others.

That thousands of physicians have endorsed Sanatogen in writing; that many physicians, including famous nerve specialists, use Sanatogen in their own families—these facts speak for themselves.

And thus you may be sure you can find no more trustworthy safeguard for your health at such times than Sanatogen.

Sanatogen is sold by good druggists everywhere, in three sizes, $1.00 up.

Questions and Answers

A FRIEND in Virginia sends us this little reminder of personal responsibility, personal religion and personal work, which he believes may be helpful to others. We gladly give it in the Mail-Bag.

"Are you going to do something for Christ some day? You fully intend, do you not, when you are in a little better position, 'better fixed for it,' to carry out or start something worth while—to do some real work for God? But do you know that you will be spared another year or day or month? Do you know that the bugle-call that closes earthly opportunity is practically never expected, always a surprise? 'If I had only known; if I had had the least idea that God was going to call me,' you will say. Don't wait, don't even wait for that special work you had planned.

"You probably see many people every day. You are so used to seeing them that you do not realize that they are material in God's vineyard that needs your attention. 'Oh,' you say, 'these are, most of them, professed Christians.' No; I will tell you what they most likely are: luke-warm Christians, half-hearted Christians; and some not even Christians at all.

"As you have opportunity, discuss with them the Lord's work with the same zeal that you would if talking of civic improvements or a local political issue. The 'King's Business' is the most important of all. Your love for Christ will be catching; it will be imitated unconsciously.

"Are you serving God and his Son that way? By all means enter into that special work for him when you have the first opportunity; but in the meantime you may be doing work for him of untold value in this way. 'Lord, what is it today that I can do? Show me, give me the opportunity, and I'll try. If my zeal lags, give me a new supply—let me be faithful.'

"'The toil of the road will seem nothing
When we get to the end of the way.'"

J. K., Zanesville, Ohio. Before the war, the United States had in industry 86 men to 14 women. England had 75 men to 25 women, while Germany's ratio was 80 to 20. Toward the close of the war the United States had ten million women and girls in gainful occupations. In France women were saving the country as absolutely as the men. Four hundred and fifty thousand were making munitions, and carrying on agriculture and viticulture as well as factory and shop work. Seventy thousand were with the Red Cross, of whom sixty thousand served in the firing zone. Women have been great sufferers from the war. And on the whole they are as patriotic as the men, if not more so. And in many cases their patriotism far surpasses that of their husbands, sons, fathers, brothers and sweethearts.

In the great work of reconstruction, there will be ample opportunity for women's work. There are still populations to be fed, ruined cities and villages to be restored, desolated homes to be rebuilt, industries to be revived, orphans to be cared for, and a hundred other tasks in which feminine sympathy can find opportunity for service. Though unrepresented at the Peace table, yet their work has contributed in a very large measure to the successful issue of the war, and this is universally recognized.

A Brooklyn reader sends us this suggestive note: "There are two problems in which a big majority of our people are just now vitally interested. The first is the wage question, with its costly concomitant of strikes and the widespread disturbance it is causing in business of all kinds. The second, and even more vexatious and difficult, is the problem of high food prices. Congress has been invoked and the entire legal machinery, federal, state and municipal, is now busily engaged in an effort to settle it by licenses, 'Fair Price' club organizations, government food depots and groceries in the big centers, selling at cost to the consumers, and last but not least, drastic measures looking to the prosecuti and punishment of the big and little profitee With all these agencies at work to compel fi prices for food and other necessaries, the c of living must of course ultimately come do considerably. But it will never again dr to the old level, at least not in a generatic The good old dollar will not again in our ti buy as much as it would five years ago. T two problems, wages and food prices, a really one, but the second must be dealt wi first. Lower prices brought down will put t necessaries of life again within the reach of t worker. Higher cost of living makes high wages imperative. Bring food prices down the point where interests meet, and lab strikes will cease and the wage question w adjust itself automatically."

THE CHURCH SPEAKS ON THE QUESTION OF LABOR

The Industrial Relations Conference of the Interchurch World Movement, Representing 25,000,000 Protestant Communicants, Adopts a Program of Constructive Activities

By ARTHUR H. HOWLAND

OU cannot have the world safe for the Kingdom of God as long as you have industrial despotism."

These words may be said to sum up the nt of the members of the Industrial Relations nce of the Interchurch World Movement—a ce representing some twenty-five million n members of Protestant churches. They oken by Julius M. Hecker of the International tee of the Y. M. C. A. during the recent two- ion of the conference in New York City where s were present from denominational and rvice bodies in every section of the country. ugh there was an intense spiritual atmosphere out the sessions, each of which was begun ayer and song, the conference from first to a matter of business—the Master's business, ity's business.

esults of the conference were summed up in uments, one the official report of the Findings ttee, composed of twenty-five members, many men of nation-wide prominence as the heads home missions and social service bureaus of spective denominations; the other, a sharp, c address by Bishop Francis J. McConnell, n of the conference, which was later endorsed tirety by the conference, and accepted as part plan and program of the Industrial Relations nent of the Interchurch World Movement.

NG the principles and plans of action adopted the conference, some of them occurring in the of the Findings Committee, others in the 's address, were the following: ediate investigation of the steel strike by the ial Relations department of the Interchurch Movement and the extension of its good offices fort to bring about a settlement; recognition ight of collective bargaining; the right of labor in the control of industry and in its profits; tion of the principle that labor's right to be s fundamentally greater than that of capital; nation of the exploitation of Negro labor for gain; the abolition of economic discrimination and exploitation of immigrant aliens and -born citizens; the extension of the co-opera- ovement in both the production and distribu- commodities; equal pay for women and men al work; refusal to be a party to any interna- arrangements which recognize a distinction n more favored and backward nations.

op McConnell, in his address, outlined four deas as a tentative program for the Interchurch nent: first, recognition of labor's right to a r voice in industry; second, investment of funds in businesses conducted with broad vision; third, recognition of labor by the es as employers; fourth, a firm stand against ploitation of so-called "backward" nations.

think we have come to understand," said the in reference to his first point, "that labor has of a right to be heard and be considered than we call capital. I have seen Raymond Robins before audiences time and time again and make uotation: 'Labor is prior to capital and is en- o superior consideration as against capital.' en he would ask the audience whose words are. A great many would say Karl Marx, and would say some one else; but he would point them that it is an utterance of Abraham in his first message to Congress back in 1861.

"THE point is just this—there are certain immediate needs, and how are we going to deal with them in the light of fundamental Christian principles? We have to bring them back to the thought of the ideal of industry as service, to the thought of the idea of the sacredness of the human personality, and above all, that great democratic principle of so organizing social conditions that each man can make the most of himself, and get all the help possible from society itself."

In discussing the Church as an investor, Dr. McConnell said:

"I do not think I am going to preach anything at all radical when I say this: that more important than any message the Church proclaims, is the practice of the Church itself when it comes in active relationship with the working world. The practice of the Church is what we are judged by, fully as much as by what we say.

"In these days in all the churches we have come to the place where the Church has, or is to have, control of large sums of money. The least figure I have heard suggested is three hundred millions of dollars in the next five years, and I have heard some of the more optimistic put it far beyond that. Now, don't misunderstand. We have got to recognize that when you place hundreds of millions of dollars in the hands of a church, you tie that church up to an existing economic system.

"NOW since that is true, there are certain rules that we have to lay down for our practice, and it seems to me the first should be this: If we are going to get $300,000,000 or more, there should be some guarantee that this money, in part at least, is to be used for a purpose the idea of which is to look out upon the world not merely from the standpoint of the individualistic relationship, but from the standpoint of the larger social relationships. If we are going to have sums of money of this kind, it should have exact scrutiny as to the way the money is spent from the standpoint of the larger social purpose.

"Now, we cannot separate the church and the economic situation, but it seems to me that we can insist upon this—that in the investment of its moneys, the church keep in mind that the existing economic system is under attack today, and it will be under attack for years to come, at the point of rents and of interests, and of profits and things of that kind. The Church then must be under the obligation to give these invested funds the closest scrutiny.

"Now, in the next place, let us remember this," he said in emphasizing his third point, "the Church is now, and will become more and more, an employer of labor. We have enterprises of various kinds by which the Church comes directly into the field as an employer of labor. How much good is it going to do us to get together in meetings of this kind and vote resolutions and all that sort of thing about the recognition of the labor movement and then show an absolute unwillingness to deal with these particular situations as they arise within our own scope and in our own sphere?"

THE international situation was touched on in these words:

"In this Interchurch movement, as we look out to the nations of the earth, we may just as well remember this, that the great problem in the present day is not merely the problem of labor in our country but the problem of the relation between the so-called more favored nations and the so-called backward nations. And the Christian Church has to stand as a protest and has to stand as a corrective in the work that it does, to various exploiting schemes in foreign fields. This is about as bad a situation as anything you can find in these days. It may be that I speak with peculiar feeling about this because I have had for seven years something to do with Mexico.

"The sins of Mexico, the real sins that Mexico has committed have been these: she possesses oil and she possesses silver, she possesses copper and she possesses possibilities of rubber.

"The Christian Church, having back of it now immense sums of money, must go in as a corrective. And I deplore any kind of financial enterprise in the foreign field that has any tinge of exploitation about it whatsoever because it hinders our work.

"When you send into foreign fields missionaries who have the point of view of a capitalistic enterprise you hinder insomuch this real spread of the Kingdom that we are talking about. The Interchurch Movement, if it has any connection with that kind of thing, should absolutely cut loose from it and get the contributions for the carrying on of the work direct from the heart of the Church itself. That is the only way that we can make good in our program.

"WHATEVER we do, we must keep alive in the Church the spirit of prophetic radicalism. I can't see that this is a time to silence a man when he speaks out the truth concerning social situations as he sees them. All sorts of pressure sometimes is put on him, but he had better say one thousand wild things if in the end he can get some good truth uttered so as to accomplish some purpose. If you think harm is going to be done, why you just ought to realize, as I get a chance to realize, the sheer inertia on the part of bodies of Christian laymen to the reception of truth of that kind. They are not going to be hurt, but we need to keep alive the spirit of prophetic radicalism.

"I think the Christian conscience and the Christian Church can stand a good many shocks. We need to keep alive the spirit of daring to speak out even if mistakes are made, and not everlastingly get the world so balanced and exact that nobody pays any attention to it."

The matter of the steel strike found its way into the deliberations of the conference repeatedly, and there was an insistent demand that the gathering take some definite stand on it. Strong effort was made by some groups of delegates to commit the conference definitely to the side of the strikers. After adopting a preliminary report of the Findings Committee calling for a prompt and thorough investigation of the strike, the conference, upon a suggestion of J. H. Walker, President of the Illinois Federation of Labor and delegate to the gathering, voted to extend its good offices toward bringing about a settlement.

Throughout the conference the belief was urged that the Church is having what may be its last chance to get the confidence of the laboring men. This thought was expressed by Glenn H. Plumb, author of the Plumb plan for railroad ownership, in an interview at the close of the conference, when he said:

"If the Church is going to retain its leadership under present economic conditions it must remember the advice of Moses to Joshua: 'Only be thou strong and very courageous.' If it does it will be another leader which will be privileged to conduct the people into the Promised Land."

as T. P. O'Connor who satisfied my curiosity and ne facts. By 1918 there were 400,000 Pelmanists, g in every walk and condition of life. Lords and of high degree, clerks and cooks, members of Par- it, laborers, clergymen and actors, farmers, lawyers, s, coal miners, soldiers and sailors, even generals dmirals, were all Pelmanizing and heads of great ss houses were actually enrolling their entire staffs interest of larger efficiency.

Baden-Powell Enthusiastic

HE famous General Sir F. Maurice, describing it as a "system of mind drill based on scientific principles," urged its adoption by the army. General Sir Robert -Powell and Admiral Lord Beresford indorsed it. nce, Flanders and Italy over 100,000 soldiers of the e were taking Pelmanism in order to fit themselves urn to civil life, and many members of the American litionary Force were following this example.

ll-known writers like Jerome K. Jerome, Sir Arthur r-Couch, Max Pemberton, the Baroness Orezy and Benson were writing columns in interpretation of nism. Great editors like Sir William Robertson and educators such as Sir James Yoxall were going as to suggest its inclusion in the British educational a matter of fact, the thing had all the force and of a religion. It went deep into life, far down be- all surface emotions, and bedded its roots in the centers of individual being. It was an astonishing omenon, virtually compelling my interest, and I d gladly when certain members of Parliament offered ke me to Pelman House. A growing enthusiasm led study the plan in detail, and it is out of the deepest iction that I make these flat statements:

lmanism can, and does, develop and strengthen such ties as will power, concentration, ambition, self- nce, judgment and memory.

lmanism can, and does, substitute "I will" for "I " by curing mind-wandering and wool-gathering.

is, and I say it advisedly, an important and necessary tion to American education, for its takes fundamental s out of the back water and brings them back into life and every-day use.

ewed historically, Pelmanism is a study in intelligent th. Twenty years ago it was a simple memory train- ystem. Time has broadened it. Today it does not ne itself to the training of just this one function of uman mind, but scientifically exercises and develops f the mental powers.

he founder of Pelmanism had an idea. He went to eading psychologists of England and also to those of rica and said: "I have a good memory system. I k I may say that it is the best. But it occurs to me there is small point in memory unless there's a mind nd it. You gentlemen teach the science of the mind. you teach it only to those who come to you. And come, for psychology is looked upon as 'highbrow.' y can't we popularize it? Why can't we make people n their minds just as they train their bodies? Why 't you put all that you have to teach into a series of ple, understandable lessons that can be grasped by average man with an average education?"

Not a Mere Memory System

ND the eminent professors did it! Pelmanism today is the one known course in applied psychology, the one course that builds mind as a physical instructor lds muscle. There is nothing really new in it. All of truths are as old as the hills. But it reduces these ths to practical use. It puts them into harness for the g of the day's work.

GEORGE CREEL
President, Pelman Institute of America

It teaches how to develop personality, how to build character, how to strengthen individuality. Instead of training memory alone, or will-power alone, or reasoning power alone, it recognizes the absolute interdependency of these powers and trains them together.

It is not, however, an educational machine for grinding out standardized brains, for it realizes that there are wide differences in the minds and problems of men. It develops individual mentality to its highest power.

The course comes in twelve lessons—twelve "Little Gray Books." They are sent one at a time and the student fills out work sheets that are gone over, with pen and ink by a staff of trained instructors. There is nothing arduous about the course, and it offers no great difficulties, but it does require application. Pelmanism has got to be worked at.

There is no "magic" or "mystery" about it. It is not "learned in an evening." Brains are not evolved by miracles. Just as the arms stay weak, or grow flabby, when not used, so does an unexercised mind stay weak or grow flabby.

You can take a pill for a sluggish liver but all the patent medicines in the world can't help a sluggish mind. Pelmanism is not a "pill" system. It proceeds upon the scientific theory that there is no law in nature that condemns the human mind to permanent limitations. It develops the mental faculties by regular exercise, just as the athlete develops his muscles. It gives the mind a gymnasium to work in; it prescribes the work scientifically and skilled educators superintend the work.

The "Little Gray Books" are intellectual dumbbells.

Pelmanism is going to advertise in America just as it advertised in England. I believe in advertising. As much as any other one thing, it helped to win the war. The bang of the Salvation Army drum did not cheapen religion but aided it. Advertising is the one direct method, and the quicker Pelmanism reaches the men and women of America the better it will be for the country.

The Science of "Get There"

IT is the science of Get There—getting there quickly. surely, finely! Not for men alone, but for women as well. Women in commercial pursuits have the same problems to overcome as men. Women in the home are operating a business, a highly specialized, complex business, requiring every ounce of judgment, energy, self-reliance and quick decision that it is possible to develop.

I say deliberately, and with the deepest conviction, that Pelmanism will do what it promises to do. Followed honestly, it will give greater power of self-realization and self-expression in word, thought and action. It will stop wool-gathering and mind-wandering. It will develop mind, character, personality, giving ambition, energy, concentration and self-reliance.

Americans need it as much as England needed it. There are too many men who are "old at forty"; too many people who complain about their "luck" when they fail; too many people without ambition or who have "lost their nerve"; too many "job cowards" living under the daily fear of being "fired."

Original thinking is almost a lost art. We look at games instead of playing them. The less the mental demand the more popular the play. There is music in restaurants because it is too much trouble to talk intelligently. Life is cut to pieces by deep ruts, with the people in them never looking over the sides. Greater driving force and higher powers of concentration will add to the nation's assets.

There is nothing more true than that success and failure are next-door neighbors. The success of today may be the failure of tomorrow, and the inefficient can rise to efficiency when he wills it. No one can mark time in modern life, much less stand still. We go forward or drop back.

Increased Incomes

TALK of quick and large salary raises suggests quackery, but I saw bundles of letters telling how Pelmanism had increased earning capacities from 20 to 200 per cent. With my own ears I heard the testimony of employers to this effect. Why not? Increased efficiency is worth more money. Aroused ambition, heightened energies refuse to let a man rest content with "well enough." Business demands ever-increasing efficiency and employers are quick to recognize it and reward it.

But Pelmanism is bigger than that. There's more to it than the making of money. It makes for a richer and more wholesome and more interesting life.

Too many people are mentally lopsided, knowing just the one thing or taking interest in only one thing. Of all living creatures they are the most deadly. I have seen eminent scholars who were the dullest of talkers; successful business men who knew nothing of literature, art or music; people of achievement sitting tongue-tied in a crowd while some fool held the floor; masters of industry ignorant of every social value; workers whose lives were drab because they did not know how to put color in them, and I have heard men and women of real intelligence forced to rely on anecdotes to keep up a conversation.

The emphasis of Pelmanism is on a complete personality. It does away with lopsided developments. It points the way to cultural values as well as to material success. It opens the windows of the mind to the voices of the world; it puts the stored wealth of memory at the service of the tongue; it burns away stupid diffidences by developing self-realization and self-expression; it makes unnecessary the stereotyped in speech and thought and action.

Pelmanism, in effect, teaches how to spend the gold that is in the purse of life, not merely the copper coins. It considers life as a rich and expansive whole, not as a collection of unrelated fragments from which the individual must make his choice.

One may utilize Pelmanism as a means of achieving some immediate purpose—financial, social, educational or cultural—but the advantages of the training touch life and living at every point.

NOTE:—As Mr. Creel has pointed out, Pelmanism is neither an experiment nor a theory. It has stood the test of twenty years. Its students are in every country in the world. Its benefits are attested by hundreds of thousands of men and women in all walks and conditions of life.

In bringing Pelmanism to America, the needs of the United States have been considered at every point. Plan, methods and principles remain the same, but American psychologists have Americanized the lessons and American instructors, carefully trained in the course, will pass upon every work sheet.

Pelmanism is taught entirely by correspondence. There are twelve lessons—twelve "Little Gray Books." The course can be completed in three to twelve months, depending entirely upon the amount of time devoted to study. Half an hour daily will enable the student to finish in three months.

As there is no royal road to learning, neither is there any short cut to the truths taught by Pelmanism. An ordinary school education is necessary, but of prime importance are sincerity of purpose and willingness to work. Its rewards are rich, permanent and of steadily increasing value, but they are won by application.

How to Become a Pelmanist

"MIND AND MEMORY" is the name of the booklet which describes Pelmanism down to the last detail. It is fascinating in itself with its wealth of original thought and incisive observation. It has benefits of its own that will make the reader keep it. Every reader of this page should send for "Mind and Memory"—Now.

The book, "Mind and Memory," is free. Use the coupon or a postcard and send for it—NOW—TODAY.

Mr. Charles F. Haanel,
Saint Louis, Mo.
Dear Mr. Haanel:

As I am nearing the end of your delightful series of instruction, I desire to express a word of commendation. In these days of apostasy from the orthodox faith, there are so many "isms" and "ologies" that one scarcely knows what is safe reading; and I always approach the new ideas with something of trepidation; for I do not want to be led astray from the way of the Truth and the Life.

I was delighted to find you teaching individual dependence upon Omnipotence; that thought power is the conduit by which the Omnipotent could become recognizable.

Any person who has a wish, desire or affirmation unfulfilled should get these instructions. All things are possible to him who believeth.

Faith is a substance—not a shadow—nor is it blind, when we see the way and understand the rules and regulations, so carefully explained.

The seven steps to manifest so sanely and explicitly described and explained as attention, intention, consciousness, visualization, concentration and recognition, are clear and concise.

The science of correct thinking goes hand in hand with Paul's "Christ" in you, the hope of glory.

All teachers previous to Jesus Christ taught that religion was a matter of restriction, restraint and prohibition, for it was a narrowing down, and lopping off process. But Jesus said, "I am come that they may have life and have it abundantly." Liberty is the fullest opportunity for men to be and do the very best possible. It is not "I must believe;" but "I may believe."

Jesus recognized as followers those whom the priests and high church people would not recognize. He came to free man from bondage. "If the Son, therefore, made you free, you should be free, indeed." It is the abundant life, the life free from limitation, the life hid with Christ in God that Christ taught; and I find the teaching of the Master Key System teaches the same truths. It is the A B C's of practical recognition of the Divinity and entirely free from dogmatic or impious teachings that might seem contrary to old-fashioned orthodoxy.

Yours,
C. H. Gibbons, Sr.

EMEMBER JERUSALEM

The Fate of David's City and the Causes of Its Fall

An Analogy, and a Lesson to the American City of Today

By M. FRANK MODDER

A FEW days before his death, Jesus of Nazareth entered the mighty city of Jerusalem. The record states that "When he was come nigh even now at the descent of the mount of ve. he beheld the city, and wept over it." As looks across the valley, in the distance he ancient city of Jerusalem situated on the hill, with its glittering courts and magnificent and sumptuous palaces—the city of a thou- emories, the city of his people, the city of his d!

a glimpse of such a city is at all times affect- d many a Jewish and Gentile traveller would horse at this spot to gaze upon the scene in too deep for speech. Now full of happiness have been the heart of Jesus of Nazareth as he upon the city of his ancestors. But, there was e, no patriotic feeling, no exultation. Instead, sight of the City of David, with its imperial of proud towers, all the pity that was within ermastered his human spirit, and only wept, but broke out into ation!

n Jesus wept over Jerusalem, he was much interested in its buildings. vas his chief concern? The people. reflective mind might well have irred by the thought of the masses and women gathered in that city. vas actually assembled the Jewish , coming from all parts of the coun- the great annual feast. Here was eat Pilgrim center!

does Jesus weep over Jerusalem?

ERE were four conditions existing in usalem which were not in any way l to the best interests of the city. four conditions helped to pull down y and destroy it.

t of all, there were the Rulers of lem. Who were they? The proud rrogant Herods and Pilates. How ey rule? By force of arms, by cruelty xercise of authority, backed by the of Rome. What was their sin? They were in- nt to the welfare of the people. Men were ill- d, women were abused, children were neg- . What did they care? Human suffering was of their business. They laughed and feasted in ace of human misery and the ills of society. gathered the taxes, took bribes, and were per- indifferent to the needs of the city.

w, such a condition is destructive. Any city leaders are careless, indifferent, or immoral, sooner or later come to grief.

en there were the second class: the Religious rs. Who were they? The High Priest, the es, the Pharisees, and that crowd. What did do? Why, they were supposed to help the e in a spiritual way. Did they help the people? could they? When it is remembered that a see regarded himself as "separate," sacred, and holy, one is able to realize the deep gulf that d between the religious leaders and the masses. Pharisee would not join the Publicans and sin- He would not be seen on the same side of the t with a Samaritan. The Pharisee was proud. was conceited, unteachable, hypocritical. He not sincere. He was like a whited sepulchre: f dead men's bones!

ch was the religious leadership of Jerusalem at ime. Any city whose religious leaders are proud, cere, and full of deceit, that city must surely fall!

HO represented the third condition? The Rich folk of Jerusalem. In the days of Jesus, were many wealthy men who had made their nes by trading with the people of Damascus, t, and other cities of the Eastern Mediter- an. The attitude of the rich men in those days st illustrated by the story told by Jesus: The nd of a certain rich man brought forth plenti- . And he said within himself: What shall I do, use I have no room where to bestow my goods? he said: This will I do: I will pull down my s and build greater, and there will I bestow all ruits and my goods; and I will say to my soul: l, thou hast much goods laid up for many years, thine ease, eat, drink and be merry."

hat was the attitude of the rich of Jerusalem. y had more than they needed. Still, they were selfish. They cared not for others. The poor erusalem hadn't enough to eat, they starved in streets, they shivered naked in the cold, they d their crusts with the dogs in the streets, like arus at the rich man's gate.

It is an established fact in history that a city whose people are selfish materialists, and avaricious, and who care not for human life: that city is doomed to destruction!

The fourth and last condition is represented by the masses. Who were they? The common people. They were like sheep without a shepherd. What was their peculiar sin? They were ignorant!

The common people were illiterate: they had no ideas of their own. They went withersoever the wind blew. Today they would cry out "Hosannah!" Tomorrow they would shriek out in a louder voice: "Crucify him, crucify him!"

This crowd is fickle. It is emotional, easily moved. It can be tricked and imposed upon by the politician and the cunning shark. It is ignorant of the actual conditions.

FOUR conditions were largely responsible for the decline and fall of Jerusalem of old: bad government, lack of proper religious leadership, selfishness and irresponsibility on the part of the people of wealth, and illiteracy on the part of the great mass of the population.

These four factors in civic life are just as vital today as they were when Christ last looked down on the Holy City from the Mount of Calvary. Their influence on the American city is just as definite, just as far-reaching. The future of the cities and the future of the nation depends on honest administration of public affairs, inspired direction of the churches, a full comprehension of the responsibility property entails, and the promotion of education until illiteracy is represented by 0.

Now, any city that has a large crowd of illiterate men and women on its streets is faced by a grave danger. This danger can lead to sure destruction.

These are the four conditions that dragged the mighty city of Jerusalem to its ruin. The years rolled on, and Jerusalem fell with a crash...........

* * * *

WE look upon our cities today. Like Jerusalem, they are fair to look upon. They have many magnificent structures: stately mansions, elegant churches, schools, art museums, colleges, and universities. The streets are lighted by gas and electricity. There are a hundred and one different conveniences for the use of the rate-payer. Jerusalem in all its glory was never equipped with so any useful inventions as the least of our modern cities. Theatres, post offices, telephones, telegraphs, stores, etc.

But, what of the people in the cities? Has human nature changed very materially during the last two thousand years?

Jesus of Nazareth wept over the indifference of the rulers, the pride of the religious leaders, the selfishness of the rich, and the ignorance of the masses.

Are these four conditions to be found in our modern cities? Are there any men of the Herod and Pilate type in our cities today? Are there any tyrants, cruel men in places of authority? Are there Governors, Mayors, Captains of Industry, persons in positions of trust, who are indifferent to the needs of the people?

We met a person the other day who told us that the manager of a certain well-known store was like a tiger! He would snarl and growl and scold all the time. The way he abused his clerks and stenographers recalled the methods used by the Herods andPilates of Jerusalem.

Are there not men in responsible positions who are more concerned about keeping their jobs, than about the welfare of the community they are supposed to serve?

There are men who are in possession of great hoards of food who are perfectly indifferent to the cries of the masses!

It is well to remember Jerusalem. The man who has power, and abuses it, is a blot on the honor of his city.

JOHN SPARGO, in a recent statement, makes this observation: "The surest way to promote Bolshevism is to permit the continuance and development of unjust and oppressive political and economic conditions. Czarism produced Bolshevism in Russia, not because it was hereditary, nor because it was imperial, nor because it was based on a theory of government long since discarded. It was none of these which gave rise to Bolshevism, but the fact that the system resulted in political and economic injustice and inequality. Where men are oppressed, where toil brings not comfort, leisure, happiness but poverty and increasing anxiety: where they have no effective voice in the government but are filled with political despair; there, inevitably, the toxin of Bolshevism is engendered."

Is there any pride in our cities, the kind of pride that scorns and prepares the way for bitter feelings?

After a great war, there is usually a great measure of pride of conquest. The victorious parties are naturally proud of the part they played. Some nations, like individuals, are even likely to become somewhat "chesty!" There is a tendency to gloat over the spoils of war. At the present time, one reads of the controversy that is being encouraged by certain unscrupulous agencies, as to "Who Won the War?" The British, through their Commander in Chief, Sir Douglas Haig, have lost no time in stating that the British won the war. Of course, this honor cannot be conceded by the other Allies! What of the work done by the Belgians, the French and the American soldiers? Did they not help in the overthrow of the enemy?

The pride of victory is a dangerous evil to trifle with. It is apt to strain relationships. Put pride away. Remember Jerusalem!

THE greatest among men is the servant of all. The only condition worth talking about is Service. Take pride in being of service. All other pride is not worthy of consideration.

The selfishness of the rich: Do we find any such condition in our modern cities?

A short while ago, a man in New York entertained a party of friends. The supper cost a little over $500. In the same street, it was reported, a poor young mother was dying of hunger! All she needed was a crust of bread, and she could not get it.

Have you not seen the families of the poor struggling along? The mother takes in washing, the boy works overtime and attends night school, the girl brings a few dollars home on Saturday from her work in the mills. It is a hard struggle. And, still, in the same city, perhaps a few blocks away, one finds a wealthy woman lavishing all her time and bags of money on a comparatively worthless pet-dog!

Do we, with all our public schools and colleges, see ignorance parading our streets? Listen: the number of illiterates in the United States is reported to be a little more than eight millions! In certain industries, as high as 85% of foreign born helpers are employed; one-fourth of these cannot read or write. In the army of this country, 100 men out of every 1,000 could not read or write!

IGNORANCE of the masses: what does this mean? Simply this: A population composed of illiterate people is dangerous. Such a mass is easily led, easily deceived and imposed upon. Such a crowd would vote on anything and everything. Most of the men and women who cheered the Bolshevist propagandists were of alien birth, who could not read or write, and did not speak English. Many of them were unnaturalized and all of them were "unassimilated" to American national life. "Eighty per cent of those who work in our plant are foreign born," said a Bridgeport, Conn., manufacturer to John Spargo. "Forty-six languages are spoken by them. They neither comprehend nor love America!"

That is a startling condition of affairs in any city.

These conditions compel thought. They come as a challenge to the best in the land. It is the duty of every self-respecting citizen to face these facts, and do all in his power to meet the issue.

How can we help? The best way, it seems to us, is to start with ourselves.

There is hardly any man or woman who is not in some position of trust or responsibility. In his particular sphere, whether at home or at work, each person wields some influence. Is that position to be abused or used in the interest of others? Are we to be indifferent to the needs of others or are we prepared to give a helping hand?

Members of churches and religious organizations are spiritual leaders, and, each in his particular way, can render a service. Are we so spiritually-minded, so lofty-souled that we cannot lift up the fallen and help those who need counsel and assistance?

PREVENTS ACCUMULATION OF CARBON

YOU can keep your motor snappy and full of "pep" by preventing the accumulation of carbo Don't wait until your engine is choked and caked with it. Use Johnson's Carbon Remov every 500 miles, then the carbon is removed while it is soft and powdery, eliminating the fr quent grinding of valves and keeping the motor always clean. No experience or labor required you can easily do it yourself in ten minutes—and the cost is trifling.

JOHNSON'S CARBON REMOVER

Johnson's Carbon Remover is a perfectly harmless liquid to be poured or squirted into the cylinders. Millions of cans have been used with satisfaction. It simply softens the carbon, then the heat from the engine pulverizes it and it is blown out the exhaust. Johnson's Carbon Remover contains no acids and does not affect lubrication.

It is the easiest, cleanest, safest and most satisfactory remedy for carb It will save you from $3.00 or $5.00 over any other method with laying up your car. A dose of Johnson's Carbon Remover— engine laxative—will stop that knock—quiet the motor, and give maximum power with the minimum amount of fuel.

THE SUPREMACY OF JESUS

A SERMON By

: Philippians 2, 9-11: "Wherefore also God exalted him, and gave unto him the name which every name; that at the name of Jesus every knee bow."

NO thoughtful person can read these verses for the first or for the hundredth time without being arrested in his attention. The impulse is to reread, to ponder carefully every n this statement, one of the boldest and most able ever written concerning the Man of . The meaning is unmistakable—the su y of Jesus above all other personages hout all time is emphatically declared, and claim we would direct attention. For, after understanding and acceptance of this great y men, by denominations and by society, es the only solvent for their problems and s, be they theological, doctrinal or ecclesi , ethical, social or industrial. The accept f this statement of Paul's is the sine qua non continuance and progress of Christianity.

often have the disciples of Christ acted as if elieved that the power of Christianity depended an infallible church, or an infallible book, as an accepted Christ as supreme over thought e and action is the determining factor. Both dual salvation and the progress of Christianity ghout the world depend upon what men think us, what they do with Jesus. Paul says Jesus be supreme in the individual's confession, wor- and life, for the simple reason that he is The me One. In what ways, then, we may well ask ves, is Jesus supreme?

RST: There is supremacy in the power of his ame. His is "the name above every name," he apostle. But what is there in a name? at is the magnetic power which in normal , and during the period of a twelve-month, draws 0 pilgrims to the little village of Grasmere, as to Stoke Pogis, while 20,000 wind their way to tsford, 40,000 to Stratford-on-Avon, and no han 70,000 to the town of Ayr? Need I mention ly the names of Wordsworth, Thomas Gray and , of Shakespeare and Robert Burns! We go out r way to visit Delft; we stand with uncovered by the copper plate in the piazza pavement, in nce; we do not leave our Capital City without to Mount Vernon, nor New York without a trip e tomb on Riverside Drive, for in the respective nces we would do honor to the names of the e of Orange, Savonarola, Washington and Grant. e names are magic in their power to draw world- pilgrims to the shrines where thousands annually er in respectful reverence.

ere is attractiveness and power in these and reds of other names that might be mentioned; possess an authority and a majesty among the of thousands who acknowledge their immortal h. But what shall we say of the name Jesus, h commands the respect, the love, the reverence, worship of the millions from every corner of the ? True, the millions do not flock to Bethlehem, alvary or Olivet to do him homage! That were ssible. But a greater tribute is paid that Name h Paul says is above every name. In every city town and hamlet and countryside throughout the d where the name of Jesus is known the multi s turn their steps from Sabbath to Sabbath to r appointed places of worship that they may do or to his name, that they may sit at his feet, that may learn more of him of whom it has been ten:

Jesus, thy name I love,
All other names above,
Jesus, my Lord!

ore widely known than any other that has ever sed human lips the name of Jesus today, through- the world, is unquestionably the supreme name he hearts and minds, in the affections and rever e of mankind!

ECOND: The supremacy of Jesus evidences itself in his teachings. One author gives us this strik- comparison: "All other teachers are profoundly scious that they are but pointing to the truth; n they efface themselves. Jesus always spoke with hority. The scribes taught as though they had rned the scripture. Christ spoke as though his rds were scripture. He never quoted any other hority. When he used the words, 'as is written,' was simply to show that prophecy had been ful ed. He never argued. He never tried to prove statements. He simply announced great truths. never speculated in theories. He did not deal non-essentials. He taught only those great doc nes which are fundamental and which make aracter; and yet the simplicity of his message was ch that the common people heard him gladly, while critics, the doctors of the law, were baffled by his sdom."

And this message never grows old. To each suc- eding generation it is as perennial and fresh as the returning spring. It carries the authority and majestic sweep of the centuries, as applicable and pertinent to the needs of the individual and society in this twentieth century as to those in the days in which it was spoken. Indeed, the world in no generation has ever come up to the teaching of Jesus. And in no time in all the Christian era has this fact been more profoundly impressed upon us than during the past five years—the period of the world war. Though a hasty and unbalanced criticism said at the beginning of this awful war, "Christianity has failed," the sober second judgment of practically all men whose opinion is worth consideration, fully agreed that the failure was not with Christianity, but with mankind in not living up to the teaching of Christ, especially those nations who, nominally Christian, had actually denied the teachings of Christ a place in their life, their ideals and their conduct. And the war, with its devastation and death, swept over the world because those who were loudest in their proclamation of Christ and his teachings, who even claimed best to understand and interpret those teachings, ruthlessly trampled them underfoot. And on every hand today men are appreciating the fact that unless and until the teachings of Christ find a larger place in the hearts of men and in the councils of nations, we shall not be safe from another world war, however much a Peace League among the nations may help in its abolition.

Wu Ting Fang, the one-time brilliant Chinese ambassador at Washington, in an address during his incumbency here, unwittingly paid the teachings of Christ one of the finest of compliments when he said, "The objection one may justly feel toward Christianity is that the ideals set forth by its founder are so high that man may never hope to attain unto them." Therein did this disciple of Confucius openly acknowledge the supremacy of the teachings of Jesus in as clear a way as one may hope to hear. This criticism of Wu Ting Fang does, in truth, give one real reason why the teachings of Jesus tower above the teachings of Judaism, why in China they supplant the teachings of Confucius, in Japan and India the Vedas, and in other parts of the Mohammedan world the teachings of the Koran.

THERE was a day when the civilized world turned to Epictetus and Marcus Aurelius, or to Socrates and Plato to settle great moral and ethical questions. But this is no longer true. More and more is Jesus becoming the world's court of last appeal, for there is a fast-growing feeling abroad that if a clear statement can be had from the teachings of Christ on any ethical, moral or religious question at issue, that question is finally settled. His word is the last word. However much some may question his divinity, they do not openly question his wisdom, his authority or his right.

It is a noteworthy fact that every order of social reformer, from the Utopian communist to the radical socialist; from the spiritual idealist to the preacher of industrialism, is doubly glad if he finds in the Gospel records any word or message attributed to the Man of Galilee upon which his appeals may be based. Though many such will deny their need of Jesus as a Saviour, they gladly appropriate his name and teachings in the belief and hope that such will further their ends. Unquestionably, the teachings of the Master give him supremacy among the teachers of mankind.

Christ is supreme, in the third place, in the universality of his appeal to the Nations of the earth. In him, as in none other, the world has ever known all men find a meeting place.

Moses was a Hebrew, Socrates a Greek, Dante a Roman, Confucius a Chinaman, Buddha a Hindu, Mohammed an Arab—but what shall we say of Jesus? Was he a Jew only? Listen! The Welshman believes him to have been a Welshman, the Chinaman thinks of him only as an Oriental, the Choctaw refers to him as the Great Chieftain, the Italian pictures him an Italian. As Anglo-Saxons do we ever think of him in our heart of hearts as a Jew? No! No more than does the Welshman, the Chinaman, the Indian, the Italian, or any other Nationality where he is known. To one and all be becomes the "Elder Brother" at the hearthstones of the respective nations.

But his appeal is more than national; it is personal. Jesus appeals to men of all conditions, rich and poor, high and low, learned and ignorant, moralist and profligate. All turn to him and find the One who satisfies. Such a master mind as Lord Kelvin, such an intellectual genius as Gladstone, such a cultured moralist as Everett Hale, Jr., the debauchee, the most blood-thirsty desperado, even the abject heathen, all come to him in their need and find their peace, their joy, their abundant life. Is this not unto the glory of Him whose Name is above every name?

Indeed, can there be any surprise with us that Paul wrote as he did in our text? That John the Baptist should have introduced him to the world in those memorable words, "Behold, the Lamb of God!" That Thomas should have cried out, "My Lord, and my God!" That Pilate should have said, "I find in him no fault at all!" That even the critical Renan should have written, "He has plowed his name into the life of the human race"? And that Richter should have proclaimed him the "holiest among the mighty, the mightiest among the holy, who, with pierced hands, hath lifted empires from their hinges, turned the stream of centuries from its channel, and still doth govern the ages!"

Let us now ask ourselves, what is the significance of the supremacy of Jesus to the present time? What lesson should it bear, in this day of the solution of problems that are staggering, to the consciousness of a torn world? It undoubtedly means that the spirit and teachings of Jesus must be increasingly accepted and applied to life in all its relations, personal, social, corporate and national, if the future is to be marked by justice, righteousness and peace. For the individual disciple it means that Jesus must be more and more supreme in all the conduct of his life, that he must exemplify before the world the spirit and teachings of Him in whom the world's hope rests.

For the Church, it means that she must faithfully and with new resolve proclaim Jesus as the world's Redeemer and Adjudicator of her sufferings and wrongs.

For those Nations whose God is the Lord (at least, in their professions) it means that they must begin, with downright sincerity of effort, to incorporate the spirit and social teachings of Jesus into their life, so far as it is possible without violating the principle of the state. It means—if states and nations are to endure—that the supremacy of Christ which is proclaimed in the text must more and more be recognized.

"Thou Hast Put Gladness In My Heart."
BY MINNIE LEONA UPTON.

"Thou hast put gladness in my heart!"
    Lord of the silver and the gold,
The cattle on a thousand hills,
        And all earth's wealth untold,
I thank Thee that instead of these--
    Instead of riches of the mart,
Or any prize my hands can hold--
    "Thou hast put gladness in my heart!"

"Thou hast put gladness in my heart!"
    And only Thou canst take away,
And only I can give to Thee
        Cause why it may not stay!
Lord, help me keep my heart for Thee,
    So that this guest may ne'er depart,
So that I still unshamed may sing,
    "Thou hast put gladness in my heart!"

The Christian Herald Bible Study Course
Many Applying for Enrollment

FROM all parts of the country, letters continue to come from subscribers who send in their names for enrollment in the Christian Herald Bible Study Course. Many are from men and women who have been regular readers of this journal for years. Many others come from new subscribers, who are eager to grasp the opportunity to enter as students under the direction of teachers so experienced as Dean Gray, and his four associate professors of the Moody Bible Institute.

There is every promise of a good-sized class at the beginning. We would urge all who can join this opening class to do so without delay. The only fee is $1.00 in addition to the regular subscription to the Christian Herald.

The lessons will appear in the Christian Herald in successive weeks. We have read the first four lessons in advance of publication, through the courtesy of Dr. Gray, and have been struck most favorably with their simplicity and comprehensiveness. They are such as can be studied by any average man or woman of ordinary intelligence.

Many of our readers in their letters concerning the Course, have asked information as to its scope and method. In reply to these friends, we cannot do better than quote from Dr. Gray's concise outline:

"The course will run during six months. It will consist of 24 lessons, subdivided as follows:

"8 Lessons on the Pentateuch and the early historical books of the Bible;

"8 Lessons in the Prophets, and

"8 Lessons in the Gospels and Book of Acts.

"All student work is to be submitted to and passed upon by the Faculty of the Moody Bible Institute. At the end of the Course, certificates will be awarded to those students who have shown proficiency and made the necessary averages in their studies, as certified to by the Moody Bible Institute."

The Jack for Jill

It works so easily that it's no trick at all for even the girls and children to operate it—Simply a few easy pulls on its chain lifts or lowers the heaviest car while you stand erect. Up or down—there's no labor.

To operate a Weed Chain-Jack it is not necessary to get down in a cramped, strained position and grovel in the mud, grease or dust under a car to work a "handle" that is apt to fly up with unpleasant results. To lift a car with the Weed Chain-Jack, simply give a few easy pulls on its endless chain while you stand erect—clear from spring, tire carriers and other projections. To lower a car pull the chain in opposite direction.

Never gets out of order. Quickly adjusted to any required height by lifting the screw and spinning the corrugated "collar" shown in the illustration. Try it yourself—you will never be satisfied with any other jack.

Memory Feeding Hope

UNDAY. II. Cor. 4 : 1. "Having received mercy, we faint not." I like the vital connection in the words. The apostle records the Lord's mercy toward him, and in the ection it is as though he brought oil to his ring lamp, and it burns again with cheery . "I have received mercy, and therefore I do ose hope." He cannot lose hope of anybody he thinks of what the Lord has done for him. akes a turn along the miracles of grace in his life, and it changes all his impossibles into in-g hopes. "If the Lord did this and that for what cannot he do for thee?"

The tle always approached the needs of others along road of his own stupendous miracles, and his t was filled with radiant assurance. And this is y the confidence of every inspired evangelist, and ed of anyone who tells with power the good news deeming grace. There is a background of big vital experience, and it charges the spirit with a velous confidence, and it makes every word the um of a quenchless hope. Men and women faint in their labors if they are devoid of a great rience. Difficult cases daunt them. Repeated t bores them, and they soon become wearied in t and turn away.

If I Were Different

ONDAY. James 1 : 24. "Forgetting what manner of man he was." How many a strug-g soul looks on the noble lives of others and ex-ns, "Oh, if I were only like him!" Deacon rtsease or Sister Bornright lead such lovely lives they seem never to have a sinful thought. But , we are ever falling into temptation, and ever idering into false positions. Such observations be healthful when not emphasized too strongly; the desire to be good without effort leads in the ng direction. "He that overcometh" is one who had opposition; and the enemy in one's own iral disposition is the greatest on earth. Happy is the soldier crossed the sea and was wounded o Man's Land, while his equally ve and patriotic comrade was ered to stay at home and pack visions. Men prayed to God and aded with officials for permission o overseas and be placed in the t in order that they might be nted in the list of overcomers. To orn great is no credit to any on; but to achieve greatness is orable to the fullest extent.

he millionaire goes into his fac- and tells the foreman to build hundred locomotives, and then ves out in the country to play f. But a poor man studies hard, es his pennies, works early and , and wins the prize in the World's position where engineers compete. we must be thankful we are what are, and envy no man his nat-l advantages. We should stand off l look ourselves over carefully, l without egotism or self-condem-tion see "what manner of man" we , and make our fight with what have, remembering that the less we have to begin with, the greater the glory of the victory. The dear Lord honors his servants always by giving them more to do.

Growth in Faith

TUESDAY. Rom. 5 : 1. "Being therefore justified by faith." In conversation with a friend whose life has been largely spent in psychological study, he ventured the statement that reason is the differentiating fact between man and the lower orders of life. I disagreed with him because, as I said, I have a dog that calculates the width of a brook which he wishes to leap more accurately than I can. "Wherein, then," asked my friend, "is a man better than the beasts that perish?" The answer is clear. We have five physical senses in common with all the lower orders, but we have in addition to these a sixth sense, by which we can apprehend spiritual things.

If we refuse or neglect to exercise this faculty of faith it will become atrophied by disuse; and in this case we continue to live within the narrow environment of the five carnal senses. But if we exercise and cultivate this faculty we pass on "from faith to faith" into an ever-increasing acquaintance with the great verities which lie beyond the horizons of our physical life.

The exercise of faith begins with the personal and practical acceptance of Christ, in whom God has manifested himself for us men and our salvation. After that, the illimitable field of Truth, which lies beyond the narrow horizon of the seen and temporal, opens up before us.

Taking Away Fear of Death

WEDNESDAY. I. Cor. 15 : 55. "O death, where is thy sting?" The fear of death is instinctive; it is a bondage from which the fulness of Christ's resurrection power alone delivers the soul. Even the most pure and sure of immortal blessedness draw back from the last grapple with the monster. It seems natural that others in age and illness should die, but for ourselves it is a vast personal struggle, an untried and unknown adventure, a wonderful culmination of life's journey, a separation from all the tried and true, and an entrance upon all that is to be taken by faith.

Though we fully believe Christ's words of the heavenly mansions, we tremble at the embrace of death. To leave the body for the spirit's flight, what a momentous event! We enter a new life, unmeasured by years, uninterrupted by death, changeless as the Divine. But it is not doubting our Lord when we momentarily shrink back from the king of terrors.

Rev. Dr. Watkinson tells us that Darwin used to go into the London Zoological Gardens and, standing by the glass case containing the cobra, put his forehead against the glass, while the great reptile struck out at him. Though convinced of the inability of the snake to harm, yet whenever the venomous thing struck out toward the glass, the scientist dodged. The instinct was stronger than will and reason.

Being startled at the fangs of death does not mean distrust of God. It is only a shudder at the power of sin, death and hell striking out at the soul, but making the Christian cling closer to his Saviour and Redeemer.

What We Live By

THURSDAY. Isa. 38 : 16. "O Lord, by these things men live, and in all these things is the life of my spirit." The prophet has been sick unto death, and has been restored. No wonder he feels grateful. Back from the gates of death he has come, resolved to do with his might what his hands find to do during the remainder of his days. As a matter of fact, however, the prophet's life is no more God's gift to him after his recovery than before, but he has been made to see his stewardship of time. It is a good thing for us to have our eyes opened to that fact by one means or another. Do we not all know that every minute of our time belongs to God? The things we live by, in the prophet's words, are the things which remind us of God. And what are they? Well, suffering, for one thing. Anything which re-establishes that unity of communication with God is essentially religious. Suffering is such an experience, but it is not the only such experience by any means. Joy may be as effective in some lives as suffering is in others. Joy may be sacramental. So may friendship, beauty, music, or any other art.

It is by such things that men live. That is to say, by things which contribute to the life of the spirit. The spirit does not live by bread alone. The spirit has no appetite for lobster and champagne. The spirit does not call for satins and ermine. The spirit is not content with millinery and upholstery. By what is the life of the spirit maintained? Jesus said, "Man's life consisteth not in the abundance of things which he possesseth." He probably emphasized the word "things" in the sense of chattels. The spirit lives by qualities, not quantities. By courage, by conflict, by victories achieved in contest with the forces that challenge the supremacy of the spirit, "by admiration and by love," by mercy and by grace—it is by such things we live. The only way to be sure of immortality is to seek to be worthy of it.

Overcoming the World

FRIDAY. Heb. 11 : 16. "They desire a better country, that is an heavenly." No wonder that the early Christians yearned for God's Kingdom to be set up on earth, here and now. They were Utopians before Sir Thomas More—Socialists before Estlin Carpenter—Internationalists before President Wilson.

John tells us that this world, with its lusts, or desires, passeth away—it cannot last—and he saw in his vision a perfect City, holy, in which God reigns. But in the meantime, each of us must, as he puts it, overcome the world that now is—there must be wars and tumults, vials of wrath.

It was amid darkness that Christ's altruists shone as lights. Slavery should be suppressed; but, as a slave, Uncle Tom must be comforted. War must end; but, in the dugout, the soldier needs the peace that passeth understanding. Slums should be rebuilt; but, even an unsanitary tenement has been transformed by what the Rescue Missioner, in his old-fashioned way, calls, and rightly calls, salvation—the "salving" of men and women who are on the rocks. When Paul asked the Philippians to rejoice always, they—remembering what had been his shameful treatment in their town—had to acknowledge that he knew what he was talking about.

Fruits of Righteousness

SATURDAY. Matt. 7 : 20. "Wherefore by their fruits ye shall know them." Our Lord put himself to the test when he said, "If ye will not believe my words, yet believe me for the very works' sake." Present utility and usefulness are the great tests of the Church of Christ, of the Y. M. C. A., of the Salvation Army, as well as of all personal Christian life. It is not by our creeds, our anitiquities, our liturgies,our theories or legacies from the past. The present age demands more than these. It says: Does Christianity Christianize? Does the religion of Jesus work? When the vine has more than leaves, then it is vindicated. Heathen religions will not stand this test. Their principle is not to minister or to be serviceable to others. Our infallibility is in fruits; our proof is in the doing as well as the being.

Precepts and principles on paper are true words if they stand the test of practice. Holy lives are Bibles in action.

BETTY HOPE

GRACE LIVINGSTON HILL

A Serial Story in Sev

Installments

Illustrated by

B. N. SALG

THE crowd gave way and the car glided smoothly up to the curb at the canopied entrance to the church. The blackness of the wet November night was upon the street. It had rained at intervals all day.

The pavements shone wetly like new paint in the glimmer of the street lights, and rude shadows gloomed in every cranny of the great stone building.

Betty, alone in the midst of her bridal finery, shrank back from the gaze of the curious onlookers, seeming very small like a thing of the air caught in a mesh of the earth.

She had longed all day for this brief respite from every one, but it had passed before she could concentrate her thoughts. She started forward, a flame of rose for an instant in her white cheeks, but gone as quickly. Her eyes reminded one of the stars among the far-away clouds on a night of fitful storm, with only glimpses of their beauty in breaks of the overcast sky. Her small hands gripped one another excitedly, and the sweet lips were quivering.

A white-gloved hand reached out to open the car door, and other hands caught and cared for the billow of satin and costly lace with which she was surrounded, as if it, and not she, were the important one.

They led her up the curtained way, where envious eyes peeped through a furtive rip in the canvas, or craned around an opening to catch a better glimpse of her loveliness, one little dark-eyed foreigner even reaching out a grimy, wondering finger to the silver whiteness of her train; but she, all unknowing, trod the carpeted path as in a dream.

The wedding march was just beginning. She caught the distant notes, felt the hush as she approached the audience, and wondered why the ordeal seemed so much greater now that she was actually come to the moment. If she had known it would be like this —! Oh, why had she given in!

THE guests had risen and were stretching their necks for the first vision of her. The chaplet of costly blossoms sat upon her brow and bound her wedding veil floating mistily behind, but the lovely head was bowed, not lifted proudly as a bride's should be, and the little white glove that rested on the arm of the large florid cousin trembled visibly. The cousin was almost unknown until a few hours before. His importance overpowered her. She drooped her eyes and tried not to wish for the quiet, gray-haired cousin of her own mother. It was so strange for him to have failed her at the last moment, when he had promised long ago to let nothing hinder him from giving her away if she should ever be married. His telegram, "Unavoidably detained," had been received but an hour before. He seemed the only one of her kind, and now she was all alone. All the rest were like enemies, although they professed deep concern for her welfare; for they were leagued together against all her dearest wishes, until she had grown weary in the combat.

She gave a frightened glance behind as if some intangible thing were following her. Was it a hounding dread that after all she would not be free after marriage?

With measured tread she passed the long white-ribboned way, under arches that she never noticed, through a sea of faces that she never saw, to the altar smothered in flowers and tropical ferns. It seemed interminable. Would it never end? And then they paused at last, and with one frightened glance she lifted her eyes to the florid cousin, and then to the face of her bridegroom.

It was a breathless moment, and but for the deep tones of the organ now hushing for the ceremony, one of almost audible silence. No lovlier bride had trod those aisles in many a long year; so exquisite, so small, so young — and so exceeding rich! The guests were entranced, and every eye was greedily upon her as the white-robed minister advanced with his open book.

"Beloved, we are met together tonight to join this man ——!"

AT that word they saw the bride suddenly, softly sink before them, a little white heap at the altar, with the white face turned upward, the white eyelids closed, the long dark lashes sweeping the pretty cheek, the wedding veil trailing mistily about her down the aisle, and her big bouquet of white roses and maidenhair ferns clasped listlessly in the white-gloved hands.

For a moment no one stirred, so sudden, so unexpected it was. It all seemed an astonishing part of the charming spectacle. The gaping throng with startled faces stood and stared. Above the huddled little bride stood the bridegroom, tall and dark and frowning, and angry red surging through his handsome face. The white-haired minister, with two red spots on his fine scholarly cheeks, stood grave with troubled dignity, as though somehow he meant to hold the little still bride responsible for this unseemly break in his beautiful service. The organ died away with a soft crash of the keys and pedals as if they leaped up to see; and the scent of the lilies swept sickeningly up in a great wave on the top of the silence

In a moment all was confusion. The minister stooped; the best man sprang into the aisle and lifted the flower-like head. Some one produced a fan, and one of the ushers hurried for a glass of water. A physician struggled from his pew across the sittings of three stout dowagers, and knelt, with practiced finger on the little fluttering pulse. The bride's stepmother roused to solicitous and anxious attention. The organ came smartly up again in a hopeless tangle of chords and modulations, trying to get its poise once more. People climbed upon their seats to see, or crowded out in the aisle, curiously and unwisely kind, and in the way. Then the minister asked the congregation to be seated, and amid the rustle of wedding finery into seats suddenly grown too narrow and too low, the ushers gathered up the little inert bride and carried her behind the palms across a hall and into the vestry room. The stepmother and a group of friends hurried after, and the minister requested the people to remain quietly seated for a few minutes. The organ by this time had recovered its poise and was playing soft tender melodies, but the excited audience were not listening:

"I THOUGHT she looked ghastly when she came in," declared the mother of three frowsy daughters. "It's strange she didn't put on some rouge."

"Um-mm! What a pity! I suppose she isn't strong! What did her own mother die of?" murmured another speculatively, preparing to put forth a theory before any one else got ahead of her.

"Oh! The poor child!" sympathized a romantic friend. "They've been letting her do too much! Didn't they make a handsome couple? I'm crazy to see them come marching down the aisle. They surely wouldn't put off the wedding just for a faint, would they?"

And all over the church some woman began to tell how her sister's child, or her brother's niece, or her nephew's aunt had fainted just before her wedding or during it, till it began to seem quite a common performance, and one furnishing a unique and interesting part of the program for a wedding ceremony.

Meanwhile on a couch in the big gloomy vestry room lay Betty with a group of attendants about her. Her eyes were closed, and she made no move. She swallowed the aromatic ammonia that some one produced, and she drew her breath a little less feebly, but she did not open her eyes, nor respond when they spoke to her.

Her stepmother stooped over finally and spoke in her ear:

"Elizabeth Stanhope! sit up and control yourself!" she said sharply in a low tone. "You are making a spectacle of yourself that you can never get over. Your father would be ashamed of you if he were here!"

It was the one argument that had been held like a successful lash over her poor little quivering heart for the last five years, and Betty flashed open her sorrowful eyes and looked around on them with a troubled concentration as if she was just taking in what had happened:

"I'm so tired!" she said in a little weary voice. "Won't you just let me get my breath a minute?"

THE physician nodded emphatically t

stooped and studied the gate latch, then lifted softly. Yes, it was a spring lock, and had no it. Had it been left on or not? Stealthily she t and found to her relief that it swung open. She d around it and peered out. The gateway was ore than a hundred feet from the brightly lighted of the main avenue where rows of automobiles ined up waiting for the wedding ceremony to be She could see the chauffeurs walking back and and chatting together. She could hear the ory wandering of the organ, too, from the partly window near by. A faint sickening waft of lily ness swept out, mingled with a dash of drops he maple tree on the sidewalk. In a panic she d forth and drew back again, suddenly realizing e first time what it would be to go forth into the s clad in her wedding garments! How could it and get away? It could not be done!

wn the street, with a backward, wistful glance at hurch, hurried a large woman with a market t. Her curious eyes shone in the evening light larkness of the street. There was something her face that made Betty know instantly that voman would love to tell how she had seen her, gather a crowd in no time and pursue her. She k farther back, and then waited in awful fear and to listen again. Was that a rattling at the glass She must get away no matter what happened! e? Was there an alleyway or anything across ock? Could she hope to cross the street between hadows unnoticed?

e looked out fearfully once more. A girl of her ge was approaching around the corner, paddling in rubbers, and a long coat. She was chewing Betty could see the outline of a strong good-ed jaw working contentedly as she was sil-tted against the light. She had her hands in her ets, and a little dark hat worn boyishly on the of her head, and she was humming a popular Betty had slipped behind the half open gate and was watching her approach, her desperation ng her to thoughts that never would have entered mind at another time. Suddenly, as the girl d directly in front of the gate, Betty leaned for- and plucked at her sleeve:

Vait!" she said sharply; and then, with a pitiful ling in her voice, "Won't you help me just a ite, please?"

CHAPTER II

IE girl came to a standstill abruptly and faced bout, drawing away just a hair's-breadth from detaining hand, and surveyed her steadily, oyish expression in her eyes changing to a cool ilation such as one would fancy a cowboy held up is native plains by a stray lamb might have worn.

What's the little old idea!" asked the girl coldly, eyes narrowing as she studied the other girl in il and attempted to classify her into the known unknown quantities of her world. Her face was lutely expressionless as far as any sign of interest ympathy was concerned. It was like a house the door still closed and a well-trained butler in ndance.

I've got to get away from here at once before any- sees me," whispered Betty excitedly, with a ful glance behind her.

Do you want me to call a cab for you?" sneered girl on the sidewalk, with an envious glance at the e satin slippers.

Oh, no! Never!" cried Betty, wringing her ds in desperation. "I want you to show me ewhere to go out of sight, and if you will I'd like to walk a block or so with me so I won't be so—so spicuous! I'm so frightened I don't know which to go."

What do you want to go at all for?" asked the girl tly, with the look of an inquisitor, and the intol-ice of the young for its contemporary of another al class etty dashed out of the gate and would have started the street but that a strong young arm came out a flash and a firm young fist gripped her arm like e. The girl's keen ears had caught a sound of ing key and excited voices, and her quick eyes ced the darkness of the narrow court and meas-d the distance back.

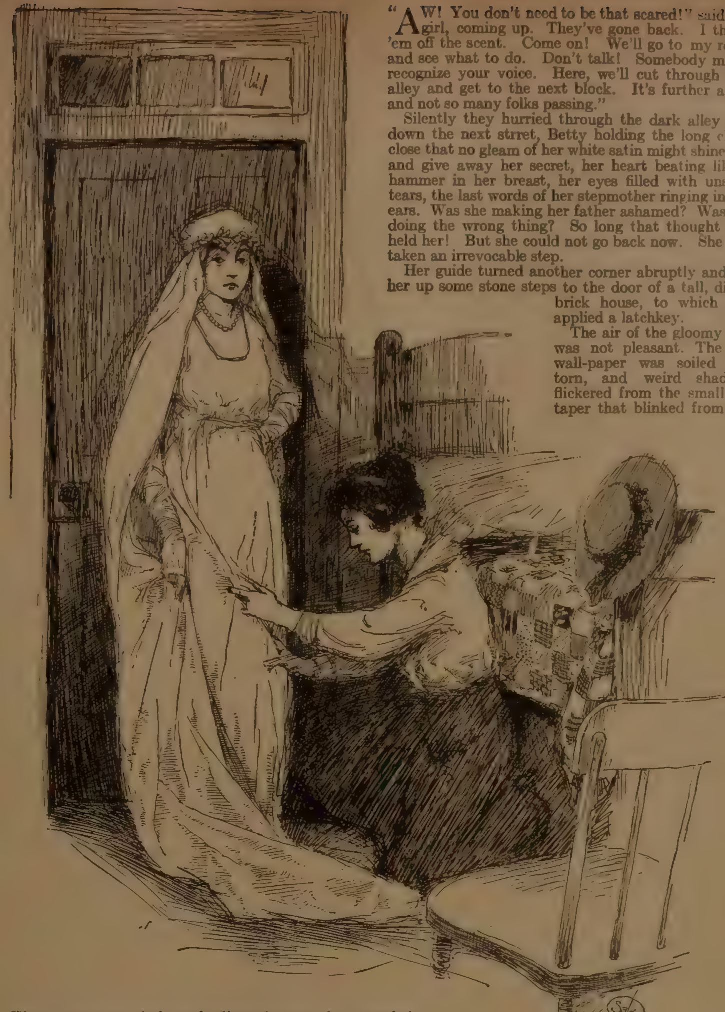
ERE! You can't go togged out like that!" she ordered in quite a different tone. She g off her own long coat and threw it around the inking little white figure, then knelt and deftly ed up the long satin draperies out of sight and d them firmly with a pin extracted from some- about her person. Quickly she stood up and ed off her rubbers, her eye on the long dark pas-way whence came now the decided sound of an ing door and footsteps.

'Put these on, quick!" she whispered, lifting first slippered foot and then the other and supporting the trembling Betty in her strong young arms, while she snapped on the rubbers.



When all was orderly and adjusted about the crumpled bride; the girl stood back as far as the limits of the tiny room allowed and surveyed the finished picture.

Lastly she jerked the rakish hat from her own head, crammed it down hard over the orange-wreathed brow and gave her strange protégée a hasty shove.

"Now beat it around that corner and wait till I come!" she whispered, and turning planted herself in an idle attitude just under the church window, craning her neck and apparently listening to the music. A second later an excited usher preceded by the janitor came clattering down the passageway.

"Have you seen any one go out of this gate recently?" asked the usher.

The girl, hatless and coatless in the chill November night, turned nonchalantly at the question, surveyed the usher coolly from the point of his patent leather shoes to the white gardenia in his buttonhole, gave his features a cursory glance, and then shook her head.

"There might have been an old woman come out a while back. Dressed in black, was she? I wasn't paying much attention. I think she went down the avenoo," she said, and stretched her neck again, standing on her tiptoes to view the wedding guests. Her interest suddenly became real, for she spied a young man standing in the church, in full view of the window, back against the wall with his arms folded, a fine handsome young man with pleasant eyes and a head like that of a young nobleman, and she wanted to make sure of his identity. He looked very much like the young lawyer whose office boy was her "gentleman friend." Just to make sure she gave a little spring from the sidewalk that brought her eyes almost on a level with the window and gave her a brief glimpse, enough to see his face quite clearly; then she turned with satisfaction to see that the janitor and the usher had gone back up the passageway, having slammed the gate shut. Without more ado the girl wheeled and hurried down the street toward the corner where Betty crouched behind a tree trunk, watching fearfully for her coming.

"AW! You don't need to be that scared!" said the girl, coming up. They've gone back. I threw 'em off the scent. Come on! We'll go to my room and see what to do. Don't talk! Somebody might recognize your voice. Here, we'll cut through this alley and get to the next block. It's further away and not so many folks passing."

Silently they hurried through the dark alley and down the next strret, Betty holding the long cloak close that no gleam of her white satin might shine out and give away her secret, her heart beating like a hammer in her breast, her eyes filled with unshed tears, the last words of her stepmother ringing in her ears. Was she making her father ashamed? Was she doing the wrong thing? So long that thought had held her! But she could not go back now. She had taken an irrevocable step.

Her guide turned another corner abruptly and led her up some stone steps to the door of a tall, dingy brick house, to which she applied a latchkey.

The air of the gloomy hall was not pleasant. The red wall-paper was soiled and torn, and weird shadows flickered from the small gas taper that blinked from the ceiling. There were suggestions of old dinners, stale fried potatoes and pork in all the corners, and one moving toward the stairs seemed to stir them up and set them going again like old memories.

The stairs were bare and worn by many feet, and not particularly clean. Betty paused in dismay, then hurried on after her hostess, who was mounting up, one, two, three flights, to a tiny hall bedroom at the back. A fleeting fear that perhaps the place was not respectable shot through her heart, but her other troubles were so great that it found no lodgment. Panting and trembling she arrived at the top and stood looking about her in the dark while the other girl found a match and lighted another wicked little flickering gas-burner.

THEN her hostess drew her into the room and closed and locked the door. As a further precaution she climbed upon a chair and pushed the transom shut.

"Now," she said with a sigh of evident relief, "we're safe! No one can hear you here, and you can say what you please. But first we'll get this coat and hat off and see what's the damage."

As gently as if she were undressing a baby the girl removed the hat and coat from her guest, and shook out the wonderful shining folds of satin. It would have been a study for an artist to have watched her face as she worked, smoothing out wrinkles, shaking the lace down and uncrushing it, straightening a bruised orange-blossom, and putting everything in place. It was as if she herself were an artist restoring a great masterpiece, so silently and absorbedly she worked, her eyes full of a glad wonder that it had come to her once to be near and handle anything so rare and costly. The very touch of the lace and satin evidently thrilled her; the breath of the exotic blossoms was nectar as she drew it in.

Betty was still panting from her climb, still trem-

The Church's Soul in Action

IT was in a mezzanine music room, in one of New York's tallest hotels, that it found expression. It was not the music of the dance that was heard, but the songs of the uplifted spirits of men and women, in strains such as might usher in a new and joyous enterprise. These were the peace-makers of the Church and their allies, who were about to begin the great venture of bringing harmony out of discord in the social and industrial world. In their faces glowed hope and high resolve, lending a strange new light to the sunny chamber.

The gathering was the National Industrial Conference of the Interchurch World Federation, representing some seventy-five religious denominations and allied bodies. Among the delegates were distinguished churchmen, hard-working, earnest ministers, able laymen, and men in touch with big problems in social and industrial fields. Throughout the meetings, the discussions were marked by the utmost freedom of expression. One of the leaders in the International Labor Congress, who was present at the Conference, after listening to the addresses, pronounced the event as signalizing "the awakening of the American Conscience." It was clearly in the mind of all the speakers that the time had come for the Church to step out of her exclusiveness and become an active force in aiding in the solution of the difficult social and industrial problems that are now troubling the country. The Church must lift her voice and use her influence for the common welfare, impressing upon men the fact that the world is not drifting rudderless, but that the great Helmsman is still at his post. This was the spirit which dominated the Conference, which was the pioneer of its kind.

The program took a wide range. It opened by affirming the principles taught and lived by the Church's Founder, and declared that these must be the ruling force in the adjustment of industrial relations. It condemned all conditions that restrain human liberty and social advance, advocated mutual understanding and co-operation in the spirit of love and justice, and pleaded for united action by the Churches and other religious bodies. It took broad ground in favor of co-operation at home and abroad, in plans for home ownership, in a proper adjustment of the immigration question, and in the necessity of training for good citizenship.

NONE of the speakers were of the commonplace order. They spoke from personal experience and accurate knowledge. Occasionally they would flash with humor, and again they were full of earnest appeal, or bristling with startling statement. Elijah A. Halford warned the delegates that neither capital nor labor should control. "All must be lifted up together or all will inevitably go down together." The Church should have the courage to sound the needed note.

Some of the statements were of the kind that set men to thinking deeply. Dr. Hecker, of the Y. M. C. A., who spent three years in Russia, told the Conference that Lenine had triumphed in the great struggle. The Churches in Europe had delayed intervention too long. Bolshevism has got a foothold here and is spreading, but the opportunity is still open for timely action by our Churches. President John H. Walker, of the Illinois Federation of Labor, told them that it was a false philosophy that no one had the right to dictate to a man or a corporation how it should run its business, when the welfare, and even the lives, of half a million men and their dependents may hang upon the decision whether that business be run rightly or wrongly, justly or unjustly.

A BIG and genial figure in the Conference—a veritable Greatheart—was Bishop J. F. McConnell, of Denver, who had come to tell these Christian pilgrims that before the Church could exert her maximum influence she must learn that "her own practice is more important than her preaching." The Church should be a wise spender. Three huge church funds, totaling $300,000,000, are now tied up owing to our existing economic tangle. Religious industry should not be operated for private profit alone.

There was considerable discussion over the Steel Strike and a Committee was named to make a thorough investigation, not in a hostile spirit, but in the interest of fair play and for the purpose of harmonizing differences through arbitration. In the Declaration of Principles, which was adopted after hours of discussion, the deep concern of the Church and God's people everywhere in the industrial and economic situation, is set forth. The present system has inflicted hardship upon the workers of the country and the world, aroused the spirit of covetousness and lust for oppressive power. Our industrial system is on trial. Appeal was made to apply the principles of religion that social and economic righteousness may prevail for the sake of national character and human happiness.

THESE were the outstanding features of the work accomplished, although there were many related points dealt with. The one great thought which dominated the Conference was the application of Gospel principles to all the problems under consideration. The Church must not only stand for Christian democracy, in the broadest sense, but in her new relationship to present conditions, she must grapple with the great problems and use her means and influence unsparingly in establishing a better understanding between the opposing forces in the struggle. While the Church herself may not arbitrate, she can be advocate, counselor and guide.

The way is open. The Church has taken an important step in the right direction, and good people everywhere will watch with interest for the outcome.

Notice to Our Readers

The Christian Herald, in common with most of the other periodicals published in New York, has been held up by the printers' strike. It is a most unfortunate condition over which the publishers themselves have no control whatever. The strike is not directly against the periodicals, but against the big printing firms with which we have printing contracts, which contracts they at present are unable to carry out for us. The demands of the striking printers are so excessive that their employers cannot grant them without running at heavy loss. At the same time the strikers' own union has declared this strike a "violation of contract" and has "outlawed" the strikers. Meanwhile, The Christian Herald and many other periodicals are innocent, helpless sufferers

The present edition is issued under the greatest difficulties. It will be followed as regularly as possible. At this moment I can definitely promise nothing except to do the very best I can. Of course, the trouble at worst can only be temporary. In a little while your Christian Herald will be coming regularly on time, bigger and in every way better than before.

All issues missed will be added at the end of your subscription period.

I beg your patience until this difficult, complex matter can be adjusted in fairness to all.

GRAHAM PATTERSON,
Publisher.

Which Procession?

"WE have had a number of big parades and processions lately," said a friend of the Bowery Mission a few days ago, "but I think the multitude of men who have been redeemed through the work of this Mission would make one of the most interesting of them all."

And there is truth in what he said. In the Bowery Mission of New York, one may learn of a vast amount of human material which, if lined up, would form a procession that could give no pleasure to any onlooker. Their march through a city would evoke no admiration or enthusiasm. They are men who have become the wrecks of manhood, the prematurely decrepit, the criminal, the down-and-out. Can you imagine such a procession, full 30,000 strong, limping, shuffling, slouching down the main thoroughfare of any American city? Would they not be regarded as a menace and an infliction?

Yet, look what has actually happened. In these twenty years of self-denying, Christian effort among this startlingly numerous class of men, who through yielding to sin and lawlessness, had dropped to the lowest level—in these two decades and among this class, the Bowery Mission has effected a wonderful transformation! It has cleaned them up physically and morally, it has brought them into the light and freedom of the Gospel, it has led them to a Saviour who heals both soul and body. It is one of the greatest of modern miracles. These former wrecks of men, homeless, hopeless, penniless, showing the taints of sin and the marks of their long bondage to vice and crime, have been completely changed, both in the inner and outer man. Divine grace, which lifted them from the burden and slavery of sin, renewed the whole man and made them self-respecting, supporting, honest and trustworthy citizens in e way, deserving the confidence and approval of fellowmen.

There are more than 30,000 of these "Twice men" who constitute the Brotherhood of the Mis They walk erect, with firm step and clear eyes, ing the world squarely in the face. These many past they have lived their lives as God would, them live, as good, loyal Americans. The para such a legion, with its whole history known t onlookers, would be worth seeing. It would b marching-by of a victorious "army with banne

And is not the Mission itself, as the means has been used to bring about so marvelous a formation in these men's lives—creating good cit out of material which society has spurned as wort and even dangerous—is it not justly titled to the confidence and suppor good Americans everywhere? We pu case squarely to our readers. The s of the Brotherhood—the mere outli which we have given—is one that sh win for the Mission a ready respons its appeal to the generosity of our pe especially at this time when the maki good citizens is a matter that is vit the nation. Help the Bowery Missi sending a liberal contribution to enat to carry on its work successfully d the coming Winter.

Ohio's Liquor Referendu

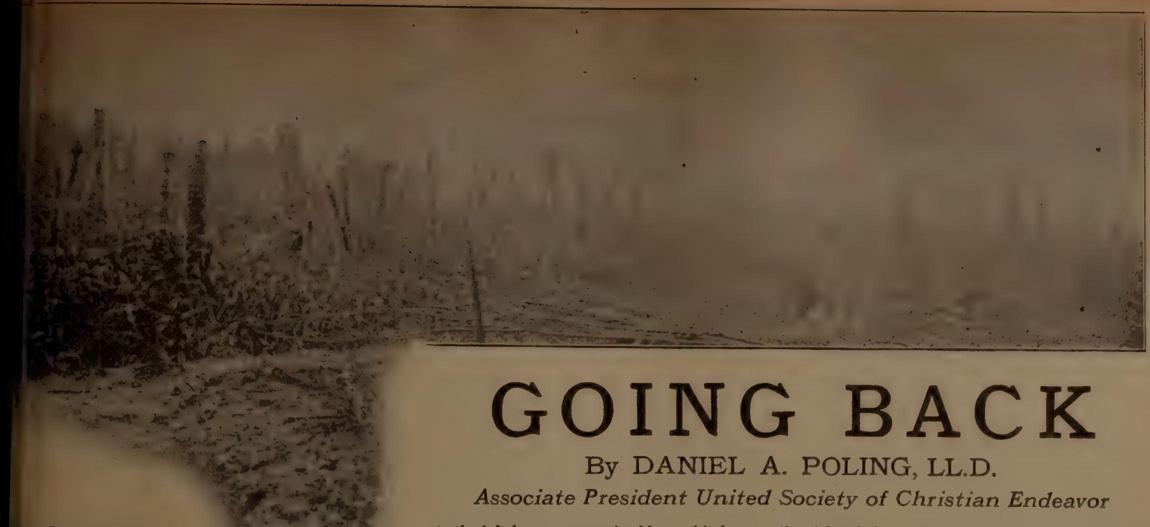
IF we may judge from the news comes from Ohio, John Barleycorn prove not to be dead, but only in a of coma. There is a stir of renewed acti among the anti-prohibitionists, over action of the Supreme Court of Ohi sustaining the demand for a referen vote in the state on the legislative rati tion of the prohibition amendment. course, the Federal Supreme Court reverse the Ohio Court; but until happens, the liquor advocates say it w be quite premature to put on mournin John Barleycorn, and anyway, the aut should be deferred.

But while a mere handful of the trumpeters of the liquor interests in Western state are laboring in a despe effort to revive the spark of life in remains, it is quite evident that expectations are not shared in other st Forty-five out of forty-eight states, among the number, voted for cons tional prohibition, and it goes into e January 1, 1920. Just how a reversal by referen in Ohio, can affect federal prohibition, is a ques which will be thrashed out in November. A w wind campaign by the "drys" is planned throug the state, and there are lively times ahead.

The Promised Relief in Food Pri

UP to the present time, little if any substa reduction in exorbitant food prices has resu from the effort made under federal or state ausp With abundant food in the country, our people paying more for the actual necessaries of life they did in wartime, when millions of tons of staples were being exported. It is true that exp continue, but in a reduced degree. It is also true labor strikes have seriously hampered transporta But neither of these reasons is sufficient to justify continuance of the unprecedentedly high price today, and all the arguments advanced in the e to justify them sound to the average man like pi evasions. A few profiteers, big and little, have disciplined; but the thoroughgoing reform that pledged and fully expected has not materialized.

While food prices here are still averaging 100 cent above pre-war averages—and in many case in excess of that figure—New Zealand is supplyin people with eggs at 35 to 40 cents a dozen, beef 1 15 cents a pound, bread 10½ cents per 2-pound sugar 4½ to 5 cents per pound, milk 7 to 9 cen quart, and other necessaries at rates which ave 25 to 28 per cent higher than before the war. Can with all its industrial turmoil, is doing better b people than we are and profiteering has been firmly handled. England too has her work wel hand as far as food regulation is concerned, and p in the main are lower than with us. We are was precious time and using too much red tape in investigations. When the evidence of extortio clearly in sight the last man "caught with the go should be dealt with, instead of being permitted t on plundering at leisure until the whole string of accomplices is tracked down. The people, who the sufferers, had a right to look for some measu relief from the food pirates ere this.



GOING BACK

By DANIEL A. POLING, LL.D.

Associate President United Society of Christian Endeavor

WE left Toul at noon, February 10th, 1919. The sun shone from clouded winter sky the snow-festooned ll of the ancient fort- ity as we drove h the northern gate. ght or nine kilometers we followed the narrow- military railroad, or until we reached Menil- r, where for four years divisional headquarters en located, first for the French and later for us. ve dropped down the hill that is the southern ch to the town, I saw at the left the great holes mained from an air-raid with which I had been d on a former visit a year before; at the right he eloquent, silent crosses marking the graves e of our first heroes who fell in action.

as in Menil-le-Tour that my line-pass had been out in February, 1918; here, too, I received my ask and helmet, with brief but pointed instruc- s to the use of the former.

n the First Division—the famous "Fighting ' of the regular army, brought to war footing e addition of thousands of enlisted men—held oul sector. Only a few days before it had "gone After weeks of training with the French, this historic organization had taken over the first given to the new American army, and, sand- d between French divisions, it faced the foe en Metz and Toul in the shadow of Mt. Sec on . Mihiel salient.

ose days in the early weeks of 1918 were mo- ous ones. In them the officers and men and the aries of welfare organizations met for the first the stern problems of modernized warfare; February lost itself in March, American rs had experienced their first great gas attack their first general raid; and before the flowers pril blossomed, the battle of Seicheprey was t.

I came again into the little square of the now quiet and almost deserted village, thoughts dormant stirred within my mind. Menil-le-Tour een just at the edge of the zone of shell-fire, but ically every twenty-four hours night attacks the air harrassed it. Once I thought that it was lly battered town—that was before I knew the to the north of it!

e drove straight through, by the silent . C. A. huts, on into the country beyond, where road led under the bare boughs of great trees still carried the remnants of their camouflage ings—canvas and interlaced branches which ded the battle highway from the keen-eyed y observers, and gave protection to ammunition , provision trucks, and marching men.

w we were where the booming of the guns had me a vast and continuous sound. Soon wept through Ansauville, where I had d the Rev. Dr. Jenkins, formerly presi- of the Minnesota Christian Endeavor n, superintending a Y. M. C. A. hut ministered to several hundred "mule ners";—the rough building still stood ng the trees but its walls were silent.

y Grosrouvres we drove toward Man- . In the former place a company of red "pioneers" were quartered,—they clearing the roadways. Not since il-le-Tour was left behind had we found llage with occupants.

Mandras we shut off the engine. lve months before it had been just one from the front-line and under constant vy shelling. Leaving the car I came on to the left by a company's old mess kitchen, and presently stood in front of the hut where for several days I had served as a "Y" secretary. A great hole which had torn through the doorway and carried off the corner of the building, told of a direct hit. Nothing remained but bare walls. Windows and tables, counters and rude furnishings were all gone.

EARLY on the morning of March 1st, 1918, we had been roused from our sleep in the rear of that place, by the gas post. Adjusting our masks we had waited in our roll-ups. I rather think that I stayed in bed because I did not care to have anyone see my knees in action! (I generally had black and blue knees while I was in the line) We were located in the midst of batteries there,—75's to the right and left, with 155's behind us. They had increased the fire that morning until the vibrations from the great guns tumbled the cans from our shelves. And the death messengers from Germany had broken closer and closer as the enemy artillery searched for the location of his tormentors.

A shrapnel broke high above us and rained its iron upon our thin roof, and then another crashed lower down, driving its balls into our frail refuge and lifting a cloud of dust about our heads. To add to the general confusion, while high explosives crashed on all sides, a twelve-foot section of the ceiling over the main room came tumbling down,—we were sure a ten-inch had gone clear through us. Later we thanked God the men were in their billets instead of under the timbers.

At the height of the bombardment a ten-inch did let go in our little back yard, and a livid fragment of it tore out a window and went screaming through the hut a few feet from our heads.

Vividly the morning returned to me as I stood again in the frozen street. I broke a knot from a shattered board and turned toward the car. A group of soldiers stood in front of a sadly battered house beside the ancient church, and told us of six men who had been killed in their billet there by one shell. I gave them additional details for their story, for just a year before I had helped carry several of those broken bodies from the loft into the room below.

Hard by Mandras is a battle graveyard where the first captain of American infantry to be killed in action, Hoover of Co. I, the 18th Infantry, is buried. He fell at the head of his men on that same eventful morning of which I have written, while leading the successful counter-attack that forced the raiding enemy to annihilation in our perfectly placed barrage. In the same cemetery rest many of the 26th Division who met their brave end at Seicheprey.

ON from Mandras just a mile we drove to Boumont. At the edge of Boumont we brought our car to a stop in "Dead Man's Curve." I got down and went through the old battery location to the right of the road, and inspected the spot where an ammunition dump used to be, at the left. Shell holes that once were so deep and close together had already begun to close; the ground under the healing touch of rain and frost was rising up and flowing back. The road itself which at that point went scarcely an hour without direct hits from enemy artillery, and where I had never before walked without wading in bloody mud, was now clean and perfectly graded,—American engineers had worked quickly and well.

At Boumont we reached the great highway that at the back of the front line paralleled for their entire length and far beyond, the most advanced positions held by the First Division in the winter and spring of 1918. We drove on to the left toward St. Mihiel and Verdun, for a kilometer and a half, until we reached Rambecourt. Here I had known the most vivid physical terrors of my whole life. Rambecourt was directly in front of Mt. Sec. The old cellar in which the Y. M. C. A. canteen was first located was at one time the most advanced Y. M. C. A. station in the service. It was forty yards in front of our last 75's. When our double gas curtains were raised we could hear the officer of the battery shout "Get range—ready—fire!" and almost simultaneously with the last word of the command the guns would let go.

I have described the dugout as the finest bomb-proof on the salient,—and it was. I have heard three-inch shells smash into it, and six-inch shells crash above it, without even cracking the ceiling of it. I have the nose of a three-inch shrapnel—a fine paperweight it makes now!—that broke directly above the entrance; the nose itself fell into the entrance and smashed the bottom step. The cellar was located directly beneath the private chapel of the glorious old chateau that now stands in hopeless ruins. The central room contained the canteen,—a one-man station where I went to relieve Rev. William Hints,—"Bill Hints," if you please, a Methodist Episcopal minister from Iowa, and as courageous and brave a man as ever wore a welfare uniform. At the right of the canteen was a first-aid dressing station. Here, by the way, Captain "Archie" Roosevelt was given attention and held until the ambulance arrived that carried him back to the base hospital at Menil-le-Tour. There were also billets for forty-seven men in the place, and an advanced signal-corps station.

I HAVE said that it was the finest bomb-proof on the salient—and it was—but one day a ten-inch shell arrived from Germany and went clear through it, killing eight men in it; and so on the spot where I used to stand, I found heaps of stone and tons of debris. I groped my way through the entrance and sat on a great rock. The light filtered through the jagged scar in the roof. In a far corner where the semi-private room had been in which I had flung my blanket-roll, I saw the piece of tin that I had nailed over a rat hole. I tore it off to bring back:—it was no longer needed there, for even the rats were gone.

Out of that corner I had leaped in a frenzy of fright (it was my first experience with gas) early on the morning of February 26, 1918, at the cry of the gas post. There I had stood with sweat pouring from my armpits through that first general gas attack that came over our lines. Our position, which was high, did not suffer much, but Co. K had been desperately hit in the low ground by Seicheprey, and of course we had no way of knowing then, that we were to escape with such good fortune.

One experience of that morning I have not trusted to my pen before this time.

Perhaps I have feared that it would be misunderstood, but distance from an event sometimes gives courage, and I am daring now to tell the story.

After the "all clear" sounded, I went back to my blankets, and without realizing what I was doing dropped to my knees by my bed in the prayer posture I learned with the first prayer that I ever prayed. After I had settled myself and my mind had relaxed and quieted, I came in thought on down through the experience immediately behind me. With a shock I realized that as I had knelt in the dirt by my roll-up I had prayed in the simple words of my childhood, the verse that I learned in a humble Oregon home, with my face buried in the calico that covered the holy knees of my mother:—

> "Now I lay me down to sleep,
> I pray thee Lord my soul to keep;
> If I should die before I wake
> I pray thee Lord my soul to take;
> And this I ask for Jesus' sake.
> Amen."

AS I lay there in the crowded dark, with the angry noises all about, I knew that no other prayer could have expressed more, or reached farther. I mused, too, with new understanding, upon the word of the Wisest Man, who said:

"Except ye become as a little child, ye shall in no wise enter the Kingdom of Heaven."

Now that my eye had become accustomed to the ruins, I began to pick out the spots,—some of them under the debris, to be sure, but nevertheless well remembered,—that held associations of those vivid days. I thought of the men I left in the rough, dark place, and wondered whether I should meet them when I reached the First Division in Germany. Also I met few of them! The "bird-man"—he of the fair skin and clear eye, who was attached to the signal corps, and who had charge of the carrier pigeons, and in whose southern home I had been entertained before the war when he was a rollicking boy, "went west" at Soissons. Every man of my detail of five husky fellows, who worked far into the night to help me arrange things for worn and hungry men in the morning, had paid with his life the price of this world redemption.

There was a youth from Virginia, too, that I have reason to believe lived to return. He had stood for a long time searching my face with his eyes before he ventured to question me. Then we discovered that we had met at a State Christian Endeavor Convention. Quite unabashed he was, as he told me of his church and his pastor, and with a certain fine loyalty he expressed his determination to hold himself true to his ideals and the vows of his Christian decision. Not a man broke into the conversation (the cellar was well filled at the time) but every khaki-clad youth listened in tense silence, and it seemed to me with hungry eagerness.

Ah! those hours were rich in testimony and simple faith! Never have I found men more willing to be led up the trail to God. The opportunities to "preach" were not many—the formalities of religion were very largely set aside. But chances to render a spiritual service were ever by a man. Indeed, they seemed to become alive and with violent, importunate hands to lay hold upon you. Let us have done with the debate that argues for a new message in the church. New messengers, new methods, will always find fruitful fields, but the message itself remains essentially without change. It is Jesus, Jesus the sufficient Saviour, men would be introduced to,—Jesus the comforting Lord, the understanding friend, the man among men and the very Son of God, that the soldier of war and of peace, when faced with the fact of His presence and power, finds himself hungry without. He does not change; nor do men in their soul quests and hungerings.

BUT one man of them all, there in the old dugout, I remembered, as I rested upon the rock,—Simeon Adams of Montana. The afternoon that we met there, he said:

"So you know Montana, eh? Well, I've got a claim back from Missoula, high and rolling—a quarter section that I've wasted the finest cuss-words of the American language upon, and as clean a bit of grazing land as cattle ever browsed. Say, I've seen times when I wouldn't have given it to my worst enemy; I used to think that if a fellow would offer me two setting hens for the property and I would accept his proposition, I would sure feel like a New York gunman,—that is, like a self-respecting citizen thinks a New York gunman ought to feel. But, fellow, I haven't seen a house in France that looks as good to me as my clapboard shack by the cottonwood, and when 'Uncle' finishes this little job, I know one prodigal who is going home,—and when he arrives, calf or no calf, his wandering days are over."

Twelve months is a long time to remember a conversation, but in words not unlike these, Simeon Adams, a "high private" of the old First Division, introduced himself to me in Rambecourt, hard by Mt. Sec. He spoke in a shout, for the great guns were going and as we hurried from the little pool within the ruined formal garden of the wrecked chateau toward the dugout entrance, he continued the conversation. Underground in the Y. M. C. A. canteen I served him hot chocolate and crackers, and while he refreshed himself he talked on.

One afternoon a few days later, he leaned in great weariness against the canteen counter and said,

"Say, did you ever hear the story of the Statue of Liberty?" and I replied,

"Which one?"

He tipped his helmet forward, mocked me with a deep bow, and said:

"This one: A fellow had been started toward Davy Jones's locker three times by 'subs.' Finally he got a tub that made through connections, and as he came up the harbor of 'little ol' Broadway' he saw the 'Lady' standing there and looking out through the mist, holding the lamp up to the window for him, and saying, 'Hello, kid! Welcome home!' and he swallowed his Adam's apple, stood at attention, saluted, and said, 'Thank you, madam; I'm mighty glad to see you. But if you ever see me again, you'll have to turn around!' "

HE didn't wait for a laugh. He knew that the tale had "whiskers," and that many a man now old had "kicked the slats out of his cradle" in protesting against its resurrection. He hadn't told it to amuse me, but to "spill himself." But I laughed just the same, for it was richly done.

I watched the artist of the story as he proceeded to unlimber "Jenny," the fifteen-dollar talking-machine that stood in the far corner of the cellar in which this particular Y. M. C. A. canteen was located. No corner of that cellar was as far as thirty feet from any other corner. It was not more than 1,600 yards from our most advanced position, and directly in front of a great battery which just then was exc "calls" with the enemy. It sounded like Fourth of Julys outside, with cannon-crack bombs not excluded.

The story-teller fingered through the recor he found the one his mood called for; then he re his helmet to ease his weary head, —regulations him to uncover while underground,—sat dow biscuit-box directly in front of the sound-ch and, with his unshaven chin in his dirty, hand, waited, close up, for the first word. Th that old cellar, under a ruined French chat heard Alma Gluck sing

"Little gray home in the west."

She has sung it to vast multitudes in grea and to distinguished people in quiet parlors; s set the world a-weeping with the exquisite p her song. But she never sang more effectivel she sang that night, among the noisome odor dark dugout of the front line, with shrapnel an explosives for an accompaniment, and a ho lad from Montana for her audience.

SIMEON ADAMS did not linger long. He "runner" on his way back to regimental quarters. As he passed me on his way out (been kicking the pans about behind the stov wiping my eyes on the back of my hand) his fi was glorious under the grime that could not s the fires beneath it. His jaws were set to the t his task,—the task of his country,—and I knev had the trail turned homeward for him as he cl the dugout stairway, he would not have tak I knew, too, that as he went swinging down the highway, by tumbled walls, by ravished field desecrated hearths and with memories of thin speakable troubling him, he was saying with stride,

"I'm here to keep this from my land. I fi France, so that there shall be no horror of shr no stench of death in America. I fight in Fra keep from my mother and sister and sweethea terror of this and of the worse-than-this. I'll back until the job is finished, until the work is

I never saw Simeon Adams again, but I have thought of him and I shall not forget him. H a "regular fellow," and as true a soldier as eve ship for France. Perhaps I felt a special warm him,—well, because he was from Montana an great west my boyhood knew. Sometimes I smiled at the remembrance of the stories he tol often I have said to myself,

"God speed the day when his eyes shall see the sunlight streaming through the cotton along the river that winds by the high ground his cattle graze."

Well, I am sure he sees it all now, for in the that came into my hands a few weeks befo armistice was signed, under the heading, "Ki action," I read,

"Simeon Adams, Montana."

(The second and final installment of D Poling's excellent narrative will appear i an early number of the Christian Hera In it he carries us across the St. Mihiel ba tlefield, up to the outskirts of Metz and ba to the River Meuse where he finds "The Sp of Verdun." You will agree it is one of th most inspiring stories of the post-war season.

Young Men in the Sunday School

THE time has gone when young fellows went through the process of "dropping out" of the Sunday school at the razor and long trousers age, because they felt the Sunday school had nothing to offer them in the days of their budding manhood. It certainly did not have anything like as much to offer them a few years ago before the organized class came into existence and the Sunday school took such long strides forward in the scope of its work. Today it appeals to the adult as never before, and the claim that it is a place for women and children cannot be sustained. It never could be sustained, for the matter of that, for the time never was when there were not consecrated men in the Sunday school. Today they comprise a great army, and a class can not seldom be found having a thousand men in it. The very flower of the young men of the day are to be found in some of our Sunday schools, and they have added a great deal of practical Christian effort to the study of the Bible. They are giving practical demonstrations of the meaning of the term "applied Christianity" and in some places the Young Men's Bible Class is a leading force in the things that are most helpful to the town.

The triumph of the great cause of temperance was due in no small degree to the help of the Men's Bible Classes all over the land, and when the war came there were Bible classes that had as many a hundred stars each on their service flags.

The Oakwood M. E. Sunday School of Colu Ohio, affords a good illustration of a Bible the great majority of whose members are youn The class is so organized that every man in the opportunity of doing some kind of Ch work "between Sundays" and a serious study Bible is made every Sunday. The call to the Christian manhood of the land was never more and appealing than now, and thousands of men are training for Christian service throug medium of organized Bible classes.

SOMETHING TO BE PROUD OF

PATCH-WORK

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

ONCE when she was a very little girl Mary had dropped a treasured blue pitcher upon the kitchen floor. She remembered her feeling of despair as she had gazed, her little hands clenched tight to her heart, upon lmost unrecognizable fragments of it. The r had been such a beautiful pitcher! And she ot meant to break it.

ry was no longer a little girl. But, with her two hands clenched above her equally empty she was experiencing the same feeling—the same feeling that she had known upon seeing ue pitcher smash into fragments. She wondered er a life would be as impossible to mend as a pitcher. She fancied rather dully that it would.
lovin' hurts like this," she heard her own voice g stupidly, "why does God let us love?"
the floor at her feet lay the crumpled wedding uncement that told in baldly conventional ices that certain parents were announcing the age of a certain girl—what was her name?—to mmy. It came to her with a curious, quivery that the Jimmy was her Jimmy. The empty beat impotently upon the empty heart, and—'ain't fair," she sobbed, "'tain't fair! He hadn't to have kissed me. He hadn't ought to have he cared. He hadn't ought to have made me—ar'"

he next room her mother was calling querulous-. With a sudden, spasmodic movement Mary's s dropped to her sides. When she spoke in er she was surprised rather to hear how matter-t her voice sounded.
omin', dearie," she answered. And with a pled bit of handkerchief she started to wipe her tears before she realized that there had no tears.
r mother was sitting up in bed, fingering with ous hands the patch-work quilt that covered her.
idn't th' postman bring nothin'?" she ques-d. And then, as Mary shook her head, "seems we're cut off, here on th' mounting, from every-! An' when there's no letters—" her hands thed the patch-work quilt—seeming almost to warmth from the bright colors of it. "Wasn't," questioned suddenly, "wasn't there no news o' y? It's a long time since he's wrote to you."

ARY half turned away from the bed. She did not answer. It would be hard to tell her mother, er mother thought that Jimmy was coming back, as she had thought Jimmy was coming back. had not reckoned on the girls of the city with city frocks and their city ways and their engraved city announcements.

"No, ma," she answered at last, "there wasn't no word from Jimmy."

The woman on the bed was stroking the patch work quilt as if it were something alive.

"My grandmother taught me t' put th' pieces together," she said at last and irrelevantly. "I pieced my first one a-sittin' on a stool at her feet. She had a way o' sayin' as she sewed, 'Patch-work ain't perhaps th' finest—but it helps t' keep a body warm!, I pieced some real pretty quilts in my time. It's nice work. An' it's makin' somethin' out o'—scraps."

MARY heard her mother's voice dazedly. She was concentrating upon keeping her mouth steady. After a moment she walked to the window and stood looking out upon the white road that wound down the side of the mountain. It was down that same road that Jimmy had gone, pausing half way to the bottom to wave a hand. She had watched him until his body was a speck in the distance; until the speck itself had become lost in the shadows of the road. She had watched him out of sight, forgetting the old superstition of bad luck.

Her mother was interrupting.

"It's funny Jimmy don't write," said her mother. "I hope nothin's happened to him. What you lookin' for, Mary? Is anyone comin' up th' mounting?"

Mary, her gaze almost unseeing, started to answer. But before she could speak a denial she realized that the road was not an empty road. Somebody was coming up the mountain—toiling wearily up. Her voice held a trace of excitement as she turned toward her mother.

"Yes'm," she said, "somebody is a-comin'."

The woman on the bed tried to lean forward—fell back against the pillows.

"I can't see," she half sobbed. "I ain't strong enough to sit straight. Is it a man, Mary, or a woming?"

The girl at the window was leaning forward—every line of her figure was an intense line. The tension seemed to relax as she answered her mother.

"It's—it's a woman, ma," she said.

There on the white road the moving spot was indeed taking the shape of a woman. Mary realized as the spot grew larger that the woman was doubtless a young woman. She realized also that the woman was unbelievably tired. She ran to the door of the cabin, forgetting for the moment the crumpled announcement that lay on the floor.

"She's comin' nearer, ma," she called back from the doorway, "an' she's dressed in black. An' she's walkin' kinder droopy. She don't look like nobody I ever seen before."

"But," the mother's voice was eager, "she must be a-comin' to see us, jus' th' same. There's no one else, Mary, on th' mounting top. Put on th' tea kettle—she's tired, pore thing. An' set th' table near my bed fer three."

THE table was set and the kettle had long been bubbling merrily when the woman in black gained the cabin door. She was a young looking woman, despite the cloud of silvery hair that curled around her face, and her pale lips smiled warmly as Mary greeted her after the manner of the mountain folk.

"I wonder," she questioned a bit breathlessly, "if I may come inside for awhile and rest? It's steep, walking up the hill."

With covert eyes Mary was appraising the smart black hat, the cut of the black walking dress. It was her mother's voice from inside the cabin that answered the stranger.

"Yes, come in," invited the voice, "come in an' set awhile."

With a gesture that she tried to keep from being awkward Mary swung wide the door. The visitor walked slowly into the cabin and following the sound of the old woman's voice gained the inner room. Mary walked after her.

The old woman was speaking again.

"My, but it's good t' look on a new face!" she exclaimed warmly. "We seen you as you come up, an' we've been waitin' tea. Was you lookin' for anyone?"

The woman in black answered.

"No," she said slowly, "I wasn't looking for anyone. I was just—" she laughed tremulously, "just getting away from someone!"

Mary leaned forward. She scented a mystery. But she was too shy to ask a direct question. It was her mother who spoke.

"From who?" she asked, her old voice breathless, "from who was you gettin' away?"

The woman in black lifted haunted eyes to the older woman's face. Her voice broke in a sob.

"From myself!" she said simply.

Mary, with a sudden light of understanding in her unhappy eyes, moved nearer to the woman in black. She knew what it was to want to get away from one self. But her mother was asking another question.

"You've had a sorrer?" she questioned softly.

ALL at once the woman in black was kneeling beside the bed. All at once she was sobbing. For a long moment she did not move, while the old woman's rheumatism-gnarled hand patted her shaking shoulders. But when she raised her head at last something seemed to have burned itself out of her eyes.

"Yes," she said in a mere wisp of a voice. "Yes, I've known sorrow! He—he died. And I—didn't die. Living, sometimes, is harder than dying. I—I know! Living, sometimes, is just waiting to die. That's how it seemed to me. My life was broken into little bits—there wasn't anything left. . . ."

Mary, her eyes fixed upon the road, that was glimmering less whitely through the dusk, nodded a vague assent. She did not know that she was nodding. The woman in black spoke on.

"For awhile I was in a daze, I think," she said slowly, "and then I began to notice, all about me, that there were other folk who had loved—and lost. My cross wasn't the only cross—my sorrow wasn't the only sorrow. I began to realize that to get away from my own heartache I must help ease other heartaches."

She paused, and her fingers picked at the gay squares of the patch-work quilt.

The old woman, who lay under the quilt, was speaking.

"A life," she said suddenly, "is like patch-work. . . . . There ain't any life that hasn't at one time or another been broke apart. But there ain't no life that's been broke in so many pieces that it can't be put together again. My grandmother—she taught me t' piece quilts—uster say, Patch-work may not be th' finest—but it helps t' keep a body warm!"

The hand of the woman in black had reached out across the bed to clasp the hand of the old woman.

"I know—I know!" she said, "Life is only patch-work. But this afternoon I was doubting. I felt that I couldn't keep on any longer. Helping folk didn't go far enough. So I—"

"So—," strangely the old woman seemed to understand, "so you came out by yourself an' walked up here—?"

The woman in black was looking into the eyes of the old woman on the bed.

"There's a verse in the psalms," she said, "that reads like this—'I will lift mine eyes unto the hills from whence cometh my help.' I got to thinking of that this afternoon. Something seemed to be calling me—calling me up. It seemed as if there was some reason why I must come. So I climbed to you. And I found comfort."

MARY, standing statue-like at the foot of the bed, heard the words of the old psalm with a curious sense of shock. Half unconsciously her eyes lifted toward the clouds that were piled mountain-like in the sky. Suddenly as she watched them they were split asunder with a radiant flash of rose and a glow of gold. It was the sunset time. The road that led down to cities was only a blur in the darkness of a bad dream. It was the sunset time, and God had painted the world in the colors of hope!

Her mother, drooping back among the pillows, glanced at her across the head of the woman in black. Mary returned the glance with gallant eyes. And then she spoke, as one does at a big moment, of something little and unimportant.

"The tea's all got cold, ma," she said gently, "I reckon I'd best be putting on new water to boil."

With tender fingers she smoothed the patch-work quilt across the tired old body. And then she went through the door and into the outer room. There was a crumpled bit of paper lying on the floor—a crumpled bit of paper that she picked up almost absently and stuffed into the stove.

Then she put the kettle, filled with fresh water, over the singing little blaze that it made.

THE WORLD'S NEWS OF THE WEE

First Votes on the Treaty

SENATOR LODGE'S amendment to the Peace Treaty, the effect of which would be to restore the province of Shantung directly to China, was defeated by a vote of 55 to 35. The Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee made a hard fight for his amendment and on its defeat served notice he would bring up the same matter at a later time in a motion to strike from the treaty the clauses referring to Shantung.

While the amendment was lost it seems very probable that more than enough votes will be assured to attach a reservation to the ratification resolution expressly declaring that the United States will not be bound by the provisions of the treaty as it refers to Shantung. Several members who voted against the amendment said in the course of the debate they would support such reservations on the assumption that while amendments would require re-submission of the treaty to the powers represented in the peace conference, reservations would not call for conference action.

The fate of the Lodge amendment was taken as an indication of what will happen to the remaining amendments not yet voted upon. The feeling is growing in the senate, based on able legal opinion, that the rights of the United States can be protected by reservations almost as effectually as by textual changes in the treaty and without the danger of having to send the whole document back for international conference. With this feeling, there is an increasing demand for a larger series of reservations than the Foreign Relations Committee proposed. The Johnson amendment, equalizing the votes in the League of Nations of Britain and the United States, which probably will be voted down, will then be introduced in a milder form as a protest or an expression of dissatisfaction on the part of the United States over the "6 to 1" provision in the League covenant.

The longer the debate on the treaty continues the less is partisanship an active element. Party lines are being broken to an extent that is surprising official Washington, but what support one party loses among its own members it gains from the opposition so that the final vote is not expected to vary much from the margin of two to four in favor of reservations which was forecast early in the autumn. This final vote probably will be taken during the first week in November. The illness of the president has placed all the responsibility of conducting the fight for the treaty on the shoulders of Senators Hitchcock and Swanson.

"Red" Leaders Arrested

Regular army troops under the command of Major General Leonard Wood are in charge of Gary, Ind., where steel strikers have caused much disturbance. With the co-operation of the government secret service, the military has made a large number of arrests of radical agitators. Evidence has been discovered which connects some of the men under arrest with the wide-spread bomb plots of last summer, which had as their purpose the death of the government's law-enforcing officers. The bomb which wrecked Attorney General Palmer's home in Washington, it is asserted, was made in Gary. General Wood has taken a very determined stand against radical agitation and he has the authority of the war department to put it down with an iron hand.

Miners Call A Strike

The government, through Secretary of Labor Wilson, is making every effort to avert a strike of the bituminous coal miners which has been called for November 1. The strike order was issued when sessions of the Joint Wage Conference of miners and operators failed to reach an agreement. The demands of the miners include increased pay and fewer hours, in addition to reforms in operation of the mines. The operators have expressed a willingness to make concessions, but they decline to meet the full demands. The Secretary of Labor has called a joint meeting of the wage committees representing the two sides to the controversy and under his chairmanship he hopes some common ground for a resumption of negotiations can be found.

Failure to adjust the differences will mean a tremendous blow to the industry of the nation.

KEEPING the FAMILY TOGETHER

IT takes more than three meals a day and a roof to hold a family together. That's only cupboard love!

No, the real cementing influence, as many parents have found, is for the family to enjoy itself together, as it does at the motion picture theatre.

Son will chip in on the party as well as daughter and the youngsters, when it comes to seeing with the old folks the first-class motion picture plays of Paramount-Artcraft.

And there's no pretense about it either—not "just once to please the children"—but they all go because the fascination of Paramount-Artcraft gets them!

The fascination of the finest creative genius of the screen—that's Paramount-Artcraft!

The fascination of superb directing—that's Paramount-Artcraft!

The fascination of clean motion pictures, conceived and constructed with the fire of genius and the passion of art—that's Paramount-Artcraft and its whole title to leadership!

Not So Bad this Month

"Now, that's better! It's the first time the expense figures haven't given me a horrid feeling.

"If I'd only known sooner about Jell-O and some of the other money savers, I'm sure I'd have more dollars and not be so near wrinkles.

"What a lot of money and time I've wasted on things to eat when

would have helped me out."

Every woman who wants to know how Jell-O can "help her out" will learn how in the recipes below and in the Jell-O Book, which will be sent free to all who send name and address.

So many delightful things are made of Jell-O that it is impossible for any woman to know about all of them. But every woman can possess the recipes for the newest and best of the special Jell-O dishes.

The recipes following are of this class. Take the Pineapple Bavarian Cream for example:

Marion Harland was one of the first of the great cooks to discover that Jell-O—whipped exactly as cream is whipped—forms the ideal base for all forms of Bavarian Creams. Almost any kind of fruit can be stirred into the whipped Jell-O just as the pineapple is in the recipe below. With comparatively little effort and little expense any woman can make Bavarian Creams of Jell-O that she could never hope to equal in any other way. Berries, peaches, cherries and prunes can be used instead of the pineapple specified in the recipe.

No sugar, cream or eggs are used in these delightful dishes, but only whipped Jell-O and fruit juices (the fruit itself only when particularly desired).

Pineapple Bavarian Cream

Dissolve a package of Lemon Jell-O in a half-pint of boiling water and add a half-pint of juice from a can of pineapple. When cold and still liquid whip to consistency of whipped cream. Add a cup of shredded pineapple if you wish. Serves from 9 to 12 persons. Whipped cream adds to the richness of the dessert, but it is not necessary.

Use a Dover egg beater for whipping Jell-O and whip it just as you whip cream—only be sure you do not wait till Jell-O begins to set before you whip it.

Jappy Jell-O Compote

Pour a half-cup or cup of peach juice into a pint measure; fill with water, let come to boiling point, and dissolve a package of Lemon or Orange Jell-O in it. Add one cup of cooked rice (cold). Pour half into a dish or individual moulds and set away to harden. Place six or seven halves of peaches on the jellied rice and cover with the remainder of the rice. Serve with meat course, or for dessert as you choose.

Olive Jell-O Salad

Dissolve a package of Lemon Jell-O in a half-pint of boiling water. Add half-pint can of tomato soup, one cup finely chopped celery and twelve olives chopped. Salt to taste. Set away to harden.

Glorified Rice

Dissolve a package of Lemon Jell-O in a half-pint of boiling water. Add one-half pint of canned pineapple juice or any fruit-juice. When a cold liquid, whip to the consistency of heavy whipped cream. Have two cups of cold boiled rice cooked dry. Fold the rice in the whipped Jell-O. Add one cup whipped cream, four tablespoonfuls sugar, and salt to taste. Set in a cold place to harden.

The whipped cream may be omitted and the Glorified Rice will still be a most delicious dish. Whipped Jell-O, alone or in combination with fruit, is so good that it is seldom necessary to add cream to it.

Imperial Salad

Dissolve a package of Lemon Jell-O in a pint of boiling water and one tablespoonful vinegar. Just as Jell-O begins to set, add one small can sliced pineapple, one-half can Spanish pimentos, shredded, and one sliced cucumber. Serve with cream salad dressing.

New Manhattan Salad

Dissolve a package of Lemon Jell-O in a pint of boiling water and one tablespoonful vinegar. When slightly stiffened add one cup each of chopped celery and apple, one cup English walnut meats broken in pieces and sprinkled with salt. Cool in individual moulds; serve on lettuce with mayonnaise or French dressing.

The New Jell-O Book

The Jell-O Book contains more new recipes than any has ever before and they are useful recipes. A copy of the book, beautifully illustrated, will be sent to you free if you will send us your name and address.

Jell-O is put up in six pure fruit flavors. Strawberry, Raspberry, Lemon, Orange, Cherry, Chocolate, and sells two for 25 cents.

A Simple Yule-tide Program for Church Service Combining the Gospel Message with Familiar Songs

As Arranged

By Grace Treat Holmes

IT is important that the reader have a good voice. If the reader and singers are partly screened from the audience by the decorations the effect is more impressive.)

OH, praise the Lord, all ye, nations! Praise Him, all ye people!

Oh, praise the name of God with song, and magnify it with thanksgiving!

"For God so loved the world that He gave his only-begotten Son to bring light to them that sit in darkness and guide their feet into the way of peace, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

Song—(Choir). "Holy, Holy, Holy." (Reverently.)

"Now it came to pass that in the days of Herod the king there came wise men from the East unto Jerusalem, saying, 'Where is He that is born King of the Jews? for we have seen His star in the East, and have come to worship Him.' The prophet of the Lord hath spoken, saying, 'Behold, a virgin shall bring forth a child, and they shall call his name Jesus, and He shall save his people from their sins.' And lo, the star which they saw in the East went before them until it came and stood over the place where the young child lay, even into Judea, into the city of David which is called Bethlehem."

Song—"O Little Town of Bethlehem." (Girls' voices.)

"And the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us, and we beheld His glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth. And Mary brought forth her first-born Son, and wrapped Him in swaddling-clothes, and laid Him in the m ger, for there was no room for in the inn."

Song—"Dear Little Stran Born in a Manger." (Childr voices.)

"And when they were come saw the young Child with Mary mother, they fell down and w shipped Him; and when they ope their treasures they presented Him gifts, gold, and frankince and myrrh; and they rejoiced w exceeding great joy."

"And there were in the s country shepherds abiding in fields, keeping watch over t flocks by night."

A "White" Christmas Social

THIS year why not try giving a different sort of a social, instead of a regular Christmas entertainment?

For mid-winter, when the outdoor coldness is apt to make one chilly toward their acquaintances, I have found a real social is an excellent way of melting the frosty cordiality of church members one toward the other. First of all get the right people on the right committees. If your church is equipped for socials have it there. If not, have it in a home.

On the invitations ask each guest to bring a gift, wrapped in white, that will bring Christmas cheer to some unfortunate person. Use any convenient Christmas decorations, but have the central feature a white Christmas tree, lighted with colored candles. Place the wrapped packages at the foot of the tree until the close when a committee shall distribute them to needy families in the community.

For the program have a number of pretty Christmas carols, and at least one appropriate special musical number. Then have a good story teller give Dr. Van Dyke's "The Other Wise Man."

After the program play some informal games, such as "find the ring" and "pillow race."

The refreshments can be carried out in the "white" idea. Ice cream, angel food cake and hot cocoa with marshmallow on will be easy to serve and pleasin almost every one.

Try these suggestions for foundation for your party, u your originality to make them s able for your own community see if you do not find it a novel of making the Yuletide a ha season.

Protestantism at the Sword's Point

An Illustration of How Liberal Spain is Aiding the American and British Missions.

A BAD mixture of politics and religion made it necessary for the authorities of Barcelona to call out five hundred gendarmes to guard the hall when Dr Clark addressed a great gathering of Endeavorers in that liberal Spanish city in 1914. He pictures dramatically in this article scenes of the meeting and something of the fight Protestantism is making for recognition in the rock-ribbed citadel of Catholicism—a fight the Endeavor Society typifies—also is outlined by the leader of the powerful young people's organization. Against all the influences of the state church, despite individual bigotry that would not stop at assassination, the missionaries of the Protestant churches are pushing steadily ahead their work of evangelization.

IN the year 1914 I was invited by the National Christian Endeavor Union of Spain to attend a large public meeting which it was proposed to hold in Barcelona. I willingly agreed to go, since I had been in that metropolis before and knew the strength of the movement there, and the cordial spirit of pastors, missionaries and young people.

When I reached Barcelona I found that preparations were made on a far larger scale than I supposed was possible, and that the largest hall in the city, the Palace of Fine Arts, holding three thousand people, had been engaged for the occasion.

I found, too, that much excitement prevailed, for the Protestants had never before dared to do such an audacious thing as to have a mass meeting of such size and, importance in Spain. The Archbishop had pleaded with the Mayor of the city and with the Governor of Catalonia, not to allow such a meeting. His pleadings and protests being unavailing, he threatened that he could not be held responsible if serious riots occurred.

But the authorities held firm. They said the Protestants had fairly engaged the hall, had obtained permission for the meeting conforming to the law of the land, and they could not go back on their agreement.

Probably Barcelona was the only city in Spain where such a meeting could have been held, but Catalonia has always been the most progressive province in Spain, with decided republican leanings. It was told to me, though I cannot vouch for the story, that when on one occasion the King sent word that he wished to visit Barcelona in three months, the Mayor replied that he could not receive the King as he expected to be ill and in bed at that time.

It must be remembered that, until recently, the laws against Protestants and their churches have been very drastic in Spain. For centuries such churches were forbidden; then, when more liberal laws allowed their formation, they were required to hold their meetings on back streets, and even now if I am not mistaken, no steeple or conspicuous ecclesiastical sign is allowed upon them.

BUT the influence of Protestant missions, American and British, has leavened and liberalized public opinion. Prominent among these influences has been the International Institute for Girls established by an American missionary, Mrs. Alice Gordon Gulick, of blessed memory. In this school, in its early days, under her direction the girls not only attained a high degree of scholarship, so as to be able to pass the most severe tests of the National University, but, better than all, with scarcely an exception, they became earnest Christians. Almost all became members of the school Endeavor Society, and the members of class after class went out to form such societies in their home towns and villages. Through their influence and through the efforts of Dr. W. H. Gulick of the American Board mission, and Dr. Franklyn Smith of the English Wesleyan mission, the society grew strong and has become one of the chief evangelistic agencies of the Kingdom.

But to return to Barcelona and to the proposed Endeavor rally in 1914. Excitement increased, and violence was threatened by the Carlists, the followers of the pretender Don Carlos who though long dead still gives his name to a party. They were particularly rabid, since they are the most bigoted of all Catholics. They hate the Protestants only less than they do the devil, and the present government of Spain.

Mrs. Clark and I were staying at the fine American girls' school, the outcome of Mrs. Gulick's work, some five miles from the center of the city, and there were grave doubts whether the young ladies should be allowed to go lest the expected riots should endanger their lives.

However it was determined to let them run the risk, as they were anxious to attend. Of course Mrs. Clark and I were bound to go, in any event, and, as we approached the great hall, it can be imagined that there was considerable anxiety about the result. We were reassured, however, by seeing that some five hundred police and gendarmes were guarding all the cross streets and approaches to the hall within half a mile. Some were on foot and some were mounted. It looked indeed like a formidable display of the military to guard a simple and peacefully inclined Endeavor convention.

HOWEVER, it was all needed. At the doors of the hall policemen were posted who searched every suspected person. They took from these forty-eight pistols and other deadly weapons, and arrested a hundred or more Carlists who were herded into a small park surrounded by a high spiked iron fence, where they had to stay in the broiling sun until the meeting was over. About twenty suspected Carlists had managed to slip into the hall, and to each one of these, the chief of police assigned an officer who sat with him to the end.

The gathering was splendidly advertised by all these excitements and rumors, and a great crowd thronged the building, the Endeavorers, of course, being given the right of way. The meeting went off without a hitch. Six hundred Juniors sang their songs of praise. Many beautiful silken banners from different societies and unions made the hall gay with color, for Spanish Endeavorers excel in such

BOYS are hard on clothes! Mothers know boys will play ball and leap frog, slide down cellar doors and banisters, vault fences and run foot races — and every jump and slide and strain tears and wears the fabrics, pulls apart the seams, rips off buttons. Heretofore, boys' suits quickly went to pieces. You will find the remedy in such clothes as Boyville, a new kind of suit for your boy, is designed to stand the strains. It is a suit made of a specially woven all wool fabric—a suit with new strength to withstand the wear and tear at more than twenty points of strain.

This new kind of suit is designed to save you the trouble of sewing up seams, save you from constantly sewing on buttons, sewing up sleeve linings, tacking on belt loops and endless patching and fixing.

A New Standard of Value

Boyville pockets are held permanently in place by canvas stays. Seams are double stitched and taped. Sleeve linings are backstitched to stand months of pulling and tugging. Even the buttons are reamed so that they will not cut the thread.

And you will have no more regrets that your boy is not better dressed. Even in style the Boyville is different. It is really two suits in one.

Never before has a boys' suit been made with such wear resisting materials and sold for so little. Boyville sets a new standard of values. The Boyville with its more than twenty special features of strength, its specially woven all wool cloth—costs only $12.85.

Boyville clothes will look better and last longer per dollar of expenditure than any other clothes for boys.

Backed by Our Guarantee

Into every Boyville suit goes the resources of one of America's largest merchandising institutions, now serving, in its 27th year, about one-quarter of all the families in the United States.

There is no better illustration of the advantage of dealing with Sears, Roebuck and Co. than in the perfection of detail and value found in Boyville clothes. Boyville suits, as well as everything that Sears, Roebuck and Co. sell, are backed by this guarantee of satisfaction:

Children Who Outgrow Paren

The Power of the Mother Who Always Remains the Guide, the Counsellor and the Teacher

A DAUGHTER returning from a visit said to her mother:

"Mother, my friends are all anxious to see you."

She laughingly went on to relate how her friends declared that she must have a wonderful mother because she was always bolstering up her assertions by saying, "Mother knows this to be true," and "Mother had an experience once just like that."

Glancing at the mother's face as she listened to her daughter, one could see the heart-glow of loving content brighten her eyes. The question came, "Will such a daughter out-grow this mother?"

I think most fathers are pretty safe so long as children do not outgrow mother. So, the chief concern rests with the mother.

A mother with all her gentleness and devotion must maintain a power, a certain position, that her children must never think of encroaching upon. She must ever remain the teacher. And she must have that charity that "thinketh no evil." She must hold and practice high ideals before her children. Otherwise they will learn them elsewhere and she will be left behind in their esteem and reverence, if not their love.

In this generation of fortunes made in a day, instances are countless where the daughter with greater advantages grows up superior to the mother in many ways. It is a condition that cannot be helped. But it rests with the mother whether she will hold her daughter's respect. A normal child will always love his parents. But honor and respect are not involuntary. Parents keep or lose the honor and respect of their children.

I was once visiting a friend who is the daughter of well-to-do parents. It chanced during my stay I lost a small piece of jewelry. The Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

In these days of world unsettlement, and with serious disturbances in all the countries, there is need of prayer among the nations—prayer for peace and for the restoration of trust in God for all things.

The World Evangelical Alliance for the last seventy-three years has issued a call for an annual Universal Week of Prayer. This year the call is addressed to all lands and nationalities and to Christian believers of every denomination, and appeals to God's people to unite in their homes, their churches, and at every opportunity, in prayer for the revival of religion in the Church, for peace on earth, for larger faith and deeper conviction in the vital facts of the Gospel, for the inspiration and strengthening of many witnesses to work together for the advancement of Christ's Kingdom, and for the unity of the faithful everywhere.

We commend to all the members of the Prayer League and to our readers generally the need of frequent and intensified prayer in these troubled times, that peace and happiness may come back to our land, and that God may overrule all the present disturbances for ultimate good.

During the week the following requests have been submitted: eighteen ask prayers for bodily healing of others; thirteen for blessing in worldly affairs; eleve spiritual blessing; four ask fo restoration and reconciliatio relatives or friends; two ask pr for the conversion of their brot two for the conversion of their bands; one for the conversion wife; one for the conversion son; one for the conversion family, and seven for the conve of friends.

Two ask prayers for the gra of desires known only to God, one to be delivered from b harm. Four ask prayers that eyesight may be preserved; asks prayers for the restorati hearing, and three ask prayer the restoration of health. daughter asks that her fa health may be restored and they may be able to keep their h another daughter asks prayers her father may be cured of ca if it be God's will, and also th may be converted. Enrollments Are Coming in Quickly

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD BIBLE COURSE

Now Open to Its Subscribers (Old and New)

The Christian Herald is glad to announce to its readers that the organization and enrollment in The Christian Herald Bible Course, to be conducted by mail and correspondence, are progressing rapidly.

THERE are Colleges and Colleges, and this is the season of the year when many young men and women, and a big sprinkling of older folks, too, are casting about with the purpose f taking up some Course that will help them to become broader ntellectually and better equipped for the battle of life. The pportunity comes to such by enrolling in the Christian Herald Bible Course.

Dwight L. Moody, the famous Evangelist, was an ardent Bible student. He spent a large part of his long life in reading the Book of books, comparing one passage with another, and digging down deep to get at the true meaning. Mr. Moody used to say that Bible study was his chief source of inspiration. He could not be constantly giving out unless he had some source of replenishment. His personal study Bible was a remarkable book in its way. Interleaved at almost every other page, marginal notes in ink and pencil on nearly every page, underscorings for special passages and still heavier underscorings for those that he esteemed the greatest.

It was one of the foremost ideas of his life to put within the reach of the people a means through which they could attain to a right knowledge of the Word of God.

"What the Christian people of this day" he said "need more than anything else, is time to study the Bible." There are evangelists and ministers who have made shipwreck of their calling because they did not find time to study, and they soon ran out of ammunition. Any Christian work that is not based on a right understanding of the Bible, through the study of it, Mr. Moody often said, "is not worth a snap of the finger!" His declaration applies with greater force than ever to present-day conditions. Our nation is spiritually at the cross-roads.

Send in your name for enrollment as a student in the Bible Course today. See terms below.

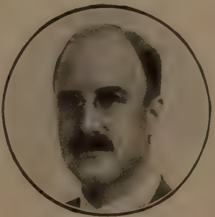
You do not need to leave your home. You do not need to neglect your home duties, but you can acquire valuable knowledge by a system that will prove a pleasant recreation.

Rev. P. B. Fitzwater, D.D.

Rev. J. H. Ralston, D.D.

Rev. James M. Gray, D.D.

Rev. J. C. Page



Rev. L. W. Gosnell

Rev. James M. Gray, D.D., Dean of the Moody Bible Institute, of Chicago, is the head of the faculty of the Christian Herald Bible Course. He has as his chief assistants, Rev. J. R. Ralston, D.D., head of the large Correspondence Department of the Moody Institute, Rev. P. B. Fitzwater, D.D., Registrar of the Faculty and Professor of Bible Analysis, Psychology and Ethics, Rev. L. W. Gosnell, Assistant Dean and Professor of Bible Synthesis, and the Rev. J. C. Page, Professor of Christian Doctrine and Pastoral Theology. The last three named, like Dr. Gray himself, have all been teachers of large, popular Bible Classes and know from years of experience how to present the Scriptures to the people. The teachers represent different evangelical denominations. Dr. Gray's name is a guarantee of scholarship and thoroughness. All of the instructors are distinguished in Bible knowledge.

The course will be under the direction of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago, but enrollments must first be sent to the Christian Herald as per blank below.

The whole Bible Course will be so simplified by Dr. Gray and his associates of the faculty that the lessons can be easily comprehended and mastered from the leaflets which will go to all members from time to time.

This is an opportunity which we strongly urge every reader to make his or her own. Send in your renewal of subscription, together with your name for enrollment in the Bible Course, without delay, accompanied by the extra dollar for membership fee. At the same time we would ask our readers to do a little missionary work in informing their friends and acquaintances of this opportunity. Thus, your friend on your recommendation will share the benefits of the Course with other members of the Circle. It is a great privilege, and we hope it will be freely availed of.

THE MEMBERSHIP INCLUDES:

Full printed instructions to each student. Regular supply of printed matter, such as leaflets, question blanks, etc., for the six months' course of 24 lessons.

The Course is one for which any subscriber of the Christian Herald is eligible. It will run through six months, in weekly lesson papers. A full outline of the Course will be furnished to members at stated periods as it progresses, with full printed instructions to every student. The membership fee will pay for all printed matter, such as leaflets, question blanks, etc., postpaid. Students, however, in corresponding with the faculty, will enclose postage stamps for reply to their letters, as with thousands of members, the small fee could not cover that expenditure in the aggregate, and yet it will be a trifling expense to each student when asking special questions of the faculty.

Ordinarily, such a Course as is now offered would involve an expenditure to the student of many times the nominal fee of $1.00 which we have fixed as the cost to each member when a regular paid subscriber to the Christian Herald.

Fill and sign this enrollment blank, if you are now a subscriber, and send in your renewal, together with your enrollment fee. By sending in the name of a new subscriber, who desires to join the Bible Course, you will be helping the project to success and doing a real service to the newcomer besides.

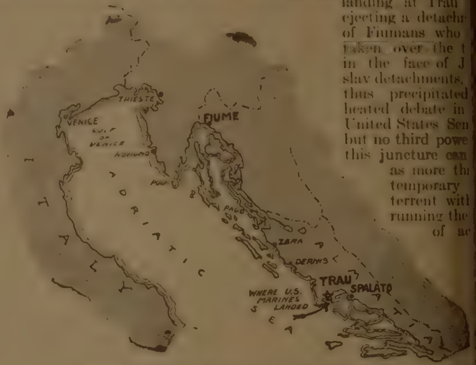
The Fire-Brand of Fium

D'Annunzio Declares himself at war with Jugoslavia and thereby invites a new Balkan conflagration

THERE is the grave possibility that before these lines issue from the press a new war will have begun in the Balkans. If hostilities eventuate the danger scarcely be exaggerated in view of the complexity of interests involved—interests that overlap from the Adriatic to the Black Sea, and from the Mediterranean to the Dniester.

Gabriele d'Annunzio has formally declared himself, as the supreme commander of Fiume, in a state of war with Jugoslavia. D'Annunzio has anywhere from 20,000 to 30,000 well trained and disciplined troops with him. More than that though, he has the ardent support of the militarist element in Italy, which has applauded his coup d'état in Fiume and promised him whole-hearted assistance in his program to annex Fiume to Italy even if they are compelled to go to the extent of instituting a military dictatorship of Italy.



THE DANGER SPOT OF THE ADRIATIC.

It is certain that acts of belligerency on the part of either d'Annunzio's army or the Jugoslavs will bring about a crisis in Italian affairs of even greater significance than the Giolitti conspiracy in 1915. The Nitti ministry has survived thus far, but only by dissolving parliament and calling for an election on November 16. Italian official circles hope the situation can be maintained in statu quo until the date of the election, which, in the circumstances can be nothing less than an election to determine peace or war; whether Italy will officially support d'Annunzio's actions in Fiume. Since the military element now seems to have popular sentiment with it, little doubt can exist as to the result. The militarists are willing to let the issue go to a vote if there are no striking developments in the meantime. If, before November 16, d'Annunzio needs aid, they are frankly prepared to institute a dictatorship. There is no question but the army and navy are with them to whatever extent they decide to go.

GABRIELE d'ANNUNZIO

To meet d'Annunzio clamation o the Jug government massed a number of tr —two divi at least — a the armi line in Daln where they facing the Fiuman outposts. Cl es between small parties have curred frequently, but nothing occurred that could be dignifie a battle. The tinder and powder are in such close p imity, however, that the further incident may b about the explosion. Amer marines stamped out one dange landing at Trau ejecting a detachr of Fiumans who taken over the t in the face of J slav detachments, thus precipitated heated debate in United States Sen but no third powe this juncture can as more th temporary terrent wit running the of ac intervention in Italy. This Great Powers are trying hard avoid.

Unfortunately, the volatile d' nunzio daily makes the task of n intervention more difficult. He determin now, he s not only complete t annexation Fiume but clear all Ist and carry along wi Fiume, in Italy. Mo and suppl as well as re forcemen are constan reaching h in spite of announc blockade the Dalmat and Istri coast.

War betw d'Annun which is c tain to m Italy and Ju slavia is pected to the signal a general B kan war. The Peace Conference fu recognizes the seriousness of the s uation, but for the moment, at lea it is marking time. The disputes the Conference over the division the spoils in the Near East prov abundant ground for endl hostilities.

Literally, the peace of Eurc rests in the hands of this one man Lieutenant Colonel Gabriele d'A nunzio, firebrand poet, amate soldier and idol of Italy.

In the meantime Austria is a proaching nearer and nearer starvation, for most of the rel supplies allotted to her have be entering through the Adriatic a thence over railway lines controll partly by Italy and partly by Jug slavia. Transportation over the lines now is indefinitely suspende

In Honor of His Eminence—
RDINAL MERCIER, OF BELGIUM

By Margaret E. Sangster

as at a luncheon at the Hotel mmodore—a luncheon given The Clergy Club of New or in honor of His Eminence, al Mercier of Malines—that for the first time in my life, solutely perfect example of ian Unity. For at the lunch- n saw clergymen of all de- ations gathered together to nor to a man of an alien —a man who, for the sake of nanity and justice, had done a deed.

world today thrills to the of Cardinal Mercier. The recognizes the valour of the who stood between his people n invading army. In some not stant day little children will from their school books the that the Cardinal spoke to spotic enemy who could crush ould not conquer his heroic Cardinal Mercier will be his- then. But now he is some- more vivid than history, some- more vital than a printed er or an illuminated photo- can ever make him. Today a breathing, living reality— he guest of our land.

made a dramatic figure at the heon—did Cardinal Mercier of nes. He was dressed in a long ct coat which fell in rich folds the sombre black of his gown, he wore upon his head a small et skull cap. A scarlet ribbon ing to his waist held suspended at glittering cross of gold and, one of his slim hands, he wore assive gold ring. Yes, he was atic; colorful; picturesque. He l out, a bit of the old world, e great gathering of American sters, in their black and gray , who represented a new world. it was not because of his pic- que appearance that the Amer- clergymen were doing him r. It was almost in spite of dramatic quality that they wel- ed him.

he Rev. Henry Van Dyke gave keynote to the situation in his ress of greeting to the cardinal. nall, gray man is Dr. Van Dyke man who seems ultra-modest almost retiring, despite the ors that have been heaped upon , as American Minister to the ue and Moderator of the Pres- rian Church in the United es. As he stood by the Car- l's side, he seemed almost drab, st commonplace. But when spoke one realized that he did need scarlet robes and glittering sses.

R. VAN DYKE gave the key-note to the situation. For it as a man—a brave man and a ristian man—that he greeted Cardinal Mercier. His short talk was not of church opinions and church differences. It was filled with the spirit of brotherhood, and was reverent with the great tribute that one strong man pays to another—no matter what that other man's creed may be. In the name of the protestant clergymen of America and in the name of America itself, Dr. Van Dyke thanked the cardinal for the stand that he had taken—for that which he had dared accomplish.

And then, in response to Dr. Van Dyke's greeting, the Cardinal rose. A tall man, he seemed to tower above the table as he stood. But his height commands confidence rather than awe, and when a smile plays across his lean, gentle face one sees the soul of the man. And one knows that children must love him and that stray dogs would not run away if he called to them.

The cardinal spoke. And he spoke neither as a priest nor as a man who has done any deed of which he is proud. He spoke humbly in a voice made slightly hesitant by his accent.

First of all he thanked America for the part she had played in the saving of Belgium. And then he thanked America for the part that she had played in saving the world. Of himself he said nothing at all until the conclusion of his talk. And then:—

"The world," he said haltingly, "has called me brave—has praised me. But I have done nothing. I am like a tree that draws its sap from the ground and because of that sap can bring forth fruit. My courage rose from the heart of my country and it was because of that valiant heart that brave words came from my lips. It was only the spirit of Belgium speaking through me!"

WHEN the cardinal had again seated himself four men gave four short talks. The Rev. Captain J. Madison Hare, pastor of the Scotch Plains Baptist Church and senior chaplain of the 29th division in France, thanked the cardinal in the name of our soldiers; and the Rev. Frank Mason North, who is secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions, of the Methodist-Episcopal Church, and President of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, added a word for the assembled clergymen. Then the Rev. Demetrios Callemahos, Rector of the Greek Catholic Church of St. Constantine in Brooklyn, gave an address in French, and the Rev. Alexander Llyons, Rabbi of the Eighth Avenue temple in Brooklyn, added the old Hebrew blessing in the name of his people.

The Rebirth of Belgium

HOSE thousands of our readers who contributed so generously the relief of devastated Belgium 1914 will be glad to know that ial statistics received by the aranty Trust Company of New rk from its office in Brussels licate that Belgium is rapidly overing from the effects of the r and its industries are returning a normal condition.

These figures show that 1,700 lroad trains are moving daily, rrying 1,720,000 tons of freight. trackage removed by the rmans has been relaid and 95 per t of the bridges and viaducts e been restored. All main lines in full operation. Returns from h passenger and freight traffic the month of August this year ow a greater revenue than for the nth of August, 1913, when per- tly normal conditions existed.

At the time of the armistice there were 800,000 unemployed iron workers. This number had been reduced in June to 200,000. In the first six months of 1919, Belgium glass works exported 3,772 tons of window glass valued at 5,600,000f. The present production is up to 40 per cent of the pre-war production.

The spinning and weaving factories in Flanders are virtually in full operation. The machinery received from Germany since April is valued at 2,900,000,000f. The crops this year are in splendid condition. It must be considered that less than 1 per cent of the area of Belgium was devastated, and that a large part of this already is under cultivation. Sugar production in July and August was 6 per cent higher than in the corresponding months of 1913, before the war.

If You Were Mexican

By Carl Schurz Lowden

If you were a native of Mexico you might be Indian, Spanish or real Mexican, which is really a mixture of the other two races. Your type of civilization would depend largely upon the amount of Spanish blood in your veins.

The peasants or poor Mexicans are called peons. It has been said that the only flower that will not bloom in the warm moist climate of our southern neighbor, is the peony; for the lot of the peon is indeed pitiable. Although living in a land brilliant with flowers and rich with fruits, the children are bowed down from birth in dust and poverty.

That the Mexican appears dirty must be due to the scarcity of water. One must either buy water from the carrier or depend upon the ditches and public fountains. Since many Mexicans are more or less averse to work, they prefer to remain unwashed rather than carry water so far.

Laundry work is done on the banks of streams and ditches. The clothes, having been soaked for a day or two in jars, are taken to the water's edge and pounded with stones or rubbed over the rough rocks. Fine linen would not stand this treatment very long but the few clothes of the natives are woven of coarse material.

It is the ambition of every Mexican boy to own a fine sombrero, or broad-brimmed hat with its ice-cream-cone crown. After he has made enough money to buy one (and some of the best sort cost all the way from twenty-five to one hundred dollars) he cares for little else than to eat and sleep and go to the bull-fights.

Besides tortillas, Mexican children eat melons, beans with very hot sauce, and sugar-cane, which is plentiful. The tortillas, or corn cakes, constitute the staple and almost unvaried diet of the Mexican poor. They are dry, flat, almost tasteless cakes, made of water and corn flour, and baked on hot bricks. Preparing these tortillas becomes the tiresome job of the women and and girls; and they must be millers as well as bakers.

Mexican boys are not fond of play. Much of their time, when they are not compelled to work, is spent lounging against the adobe walls of their bare, cheerless homes, or walking aimlessly around in the hot dusty streets.

Tending the game-cocks becomes the boys' special job in Mexico. Sometimes the lads carry their charges to school and during recess plan battles between champion fighters.

Cock fighting as well as bull fighting is a popular Mexican amusement. The places where cock fights take place are known as cock pits. The roosters being placed in the center of a ring, the owners and spectators gather about and watch the battle with the greatest interest. There is much gambling among the peons on the outcome.

Besides the cock, Mexican boys have two other pets—the burro and the snake. Although the burro carries the family's burdens, he is often mistreated by his owner. Snakes serve as special pets which the boys delight in smuggling to school in order to lighten the hours of forced study.

Maybe a picture enters your mind what fun it would be while all is still in the schoolroom. Still? Then you you were never near a Mexican school, for a humming, buzzing noise can be heard a block away. The children are studying, and they do it out loud.

The din continues from seven o'clock in the morning until night. Some of the children sit in chairs, others sprawl over the floor. They learn to use a picture language which is a remnant of the Indian days.

King Corn's Carnival

By Ella Shannon Bowles

Money in the treasury of the Ladies Aid Society was lacking and the need of raising it was pressing. People were tired of the usual church suppers, so the committee decided to hold a Corn Carnival.

Simple pictures of ears of corn were painted in the upper left corners of the posters, and plainly printed in India ink were notices of the time, place and price of admission for the supper and entertainment. Tickets were made in the shape of ears of corn and many of them were sold before the day arrived.

The hall was decorated with tall corn stalks and festoons of red and yellow ears of corn. The electric light bulbs were covered with yellow crepe paper and from various places in the ceiling corn balls were hung. On one side of the room were arranged two booths ornamented with green and yellow crepe paper and strings of popped corn. The attendants were dressed in white, and wore yellow aprons and sunbonnets. At one booth sugared popped corn, cornflake macaroons, and cornballs were sold. Wooden skewers were placed in the corn balls to hold them while being eaten. Buttered popcorn was not sold, as a man had been engaged to bring his corn popper and booth from the street and give a per cent of his sales to the society. The other table was devoted to the sale of unpopped corn on the ear and in packages; cornflakes, corn syrup, and canned corn.

The tables in the supper-room were decorated with green and yellow and the centerpieces were mounds of yellow corn and chrysanthemums. Candles in brass sticks furnished the lights and the menus were written on thin paper and rolled inside corn husks tied with yellow ribbons. They bore the following bill of fare:

Corn Chowder
Sliced cold corned beef
Corn oysters
Mashed potatoes
Hot corn bread Butter or syrup
Pumpkin pie
Indian Pudding with Vanilla Ice cream
Coffee

After supper, the Sunday school sang a harvest song, a young lady recited Whittier's "Corn Song"; a drill, "Scare Crow a 'Roamin'" was presented by one of the boy's classes, and the program was completed by the play, "The Old Fashioned Husking Bee."

To Reclaim Eighty Million Acres

Eighty million acres of wet and overflowed lands, located in various parts of the country, could be quickly and economically reclaimed by drainage or by levee protection, according to John A. Fox of Chicago, who is arranging for the annual convention of the national drainage congress to be held at St. Louis November 11, 12, and 13.

Cabinet members, governors, bankers and engineers from many states have been invited to attend the congress, which plans for the opening of millions of acres of new and extremely productive lands for settlement and development.

BAKER'S
FRESH GRATED COCONUT

1 cupful Baker's Canned Coconut (being sure that the milk has been pressed out according to directions on the can)
2 cupfuls brown sugar*
4 or 5 tablespoonfuls grated chocolate or cocoa added to sugar.
½ cupful Coconut milk
Butter, size of walnut
Double quantities for full portion.

Put sugar, chocolate and milk in saucepan, boil 12 or 15 minutes, stirring constantly. Before removing from fire, add Coconut and butter and beat until cool. Pour in buttered tin and cut into squares before it hardens.

For Plain Fudge omit chocolate.

For Seafoam boil 10 minutes only, stirring in well-beaten egg whites as it cools.

Granulated sugar may be used*

It is the pure coconut milk in the Baker Can that makes this home-made candy richer and more flavory than other coconut candy.

Coconut milk, you know, is the only successful means of retaining this rich flavor of the fresh nut. It keeps the meat in the Baker Can moist and tender. Baker's alone has this supreme flavor of the newly-picked nut, for Baker's is the only coconut canned in its own milk.

FREE—Our New Recipe Booklet, illustrated in colors, tells you how to make many other coconut dishes—all perfectly delicious—will be sent you and your friends on request.

If Baker's Coconut is not obtainable at your dealer's, send 15c in stamps for full-size can. Please give grocer's name.

Thus 919 consumption is about dou- at of 1900, although the popu- n meantime has increased only er cent. The average per a consumption in 1919 was 83 ds against 77 pounds per a in 1918, 78 in 1910, 59 in 1900, n 1890; 40 in 1880, and 33 ds per capita in 1870. In fact, 100,000,000 people, although ing about 6 per cent of the d's population, consumed last nearly 25 per cent of the d's sugar production.

he sums paid for sugar by our le in 1919 were far in excess of e of any earlier year. The age import price for the raw luct brought in from foreign tries averaged a little more 5 cents per pound (exclusive uty) as against an average of 2 per pound in 1914, and the s paid by the consumers for all sugar purchased during the year will approximate $1,000,000,000 as against a little more than one-third of that sum in the year prior to the war.

About one-fourth of the nearly 9,000,000,000 pounds consumed in the fiscal year 1919 was produced in the United States, another one-fourth was produced in our islands and the remainder drawn from foreign countries, chiefly Cuba. About three-fourths of the quantity produced in our own fields was from beets, and only one-fourth from cane, while all of that brought in from our islands or from foreign countries was produced from cane. The average import price paid for the raw sugar coming from Cuba was 5.04 cents per pound (exclusive of tariff) as against 2 cents per pound in 1914; the average price paid for that entering the country from Hawaii in the fiscal year 1919 was 6.1 cents per pound and from Porto Rico 6.8 cents per pound, these figures being in all cases those of the raw product, which is refined in the United States before entering consumption.

The exact figures of consumption, basing the aggregate upon production at home, quantities brought from our islands, imports from foreign countries, minus the quantity exported after refinement, was 8,850,000,000 pounds; the import value, exclusive of duties $435,000,000, and the quantity exported in the refined state 1,116,000,000 pounds, and in the refined state about 3,000,000 pounds. Of the 1919 exports about one-third went to Great Britain, one-third to France, and the remainder chiefly to Belgium, the Netherlands, Spain and Switzerland, with smaller quantities to Argentina and certain other South American countries.

Gospel Automobiling

The Church on Wheels in Maine

WHEN the Gospel Ship careened into port along the st of Maine during the height of summer season, the four- eeler drew a great deal of atten- . For the Gospel Ship was a sty type of automobile, with her me lettered boldly against the ow, her forecastle and after-deck corated with Bible verses and the ebuoy—in the form of the extra e at the rear—similarly used for text.

With the running-board for a lpit, a portable organ set up in e rear loft and the choir assembled nong the members of the touring party, here was a whole church on wheels. Whenever a congregation offered attention, or music could draw a crowd in the pine groves of Maine camp-meetings or on the sandy beach, the Gospel Ship carried the good tidings. Even though its message was not always to be heard, something of the Truth could be seen, by reading the Scriptural legends with which it was adorned. For it never failed to attract attention.

Unique in character, convenient and comfortable for transportation, the Gospel Ship has proved its worth.

To Add Four Square Miles to New York City

Mr. T. Kenard Thomson, an pert on engineering work, has esented to the Mayor a plan of lling in the shallows of Upper Bay New York.

This plan aims to create a water rontage of almost 10 miles and 4 square miles of valuable lower Manhattan real estate.

This plan has the backing of a group of New York business men who will for certain franchise rights undertake to do the work of filling in.

"I wonder if he's going to be ill"

REMEMBER—it is a fact that thousands upon thousands of men and women, weakened through the stress and strain of work and worry, have regained vitality and working power by using Sanatogen.

When Sir Gilbert Parker writes: "Sanatogen is a true food-tonic, feeding the nerves and giving fresh vigor to the over-worked body and mind," he but expresses the conviction of multitudes of others.

That thousands of physicians have endorsed Sanatogen in writing; that many physicians, including famous nerve specialists, use Sanatogen in their own families—these facts speak for themselves.

And thus you may be sure you can find no more trustworthy safeguard for your health at such times than Sanatogen.

Sanatogen is sold by good druggists everywhere, in three sizes, $1.00 up.

The student of little means and even of no means is given an opportunity for training.

The Institute stands for the full inspiration of Scripture; the full Godhead; the Deity of our Lord; the blood Atonement; the necessity of regeneration, and the work of the Holy Spirit.

It differs from most Bible Institutes in its teaching on the ages. Send for some of its free sermons and tracts.

A New Use for a Brewery

Where Vats of Beer Were Stored A Few Months Ago a Delicious Table Delicacy Is Being Grown for the Market

WHEN it became certain that national prohibition was sure to come there was a great alarm over the thousands of men who would be thrown out of employment and the fact that millions of dollars worth of buildings used by the liquor interests would be empty and idle. Although national prohibition has been in force for but a short time, it has been demonstrated that men who want work can get it, and hundreds of the buildings once used by the liquor men are already being used for much better purposes while the arrests for crime all over the United States are not half what they were during the reign of Alcohol.

While so many of the brewe and other buildings used in manufacture and sale of intoxica are already used by other indust few indeed are used in the way which a huge brewery in the cit Washington is being utilized. dark, cool cellars and vaults devoted to the cultivation of mu rooms for the market, and the sult has been very profitable. mushroom is becoming more more popular as a table delica It is very easily grown and ther always a good market for it. must, however, be wise in regard the mushroom before using it an edible since some varieties deadly poisonous. A Desert Sunday School

AMONG the Sunday Schools in the United States and Canada, the Adams Street Mission, of Tucson, Arizona, is a bright little light in the desert alone of its kind. First, it is made up of children whose parents, mother or father, and in some instances both, are sufferers from the great white plague. Or as in some cases it is a brother or sister. They are all in Tucson for their health and Sabbath after Sabbath they gather at the little desert Sunday school and study God's word. Second, it is, so far as know, the only Sunday school th has a flag raising every Sabba morning wh the childr come to att tion, salute t Colors, a sing Ameri before they into their cl ses. The Sunday Morning Flag Raising

Turning White from Fright

THE face turns white, when we are frightened because the blood almost leaves the face entirely. Under normal conditions, the red blood which is flowing through the arteries gives the face a reddish tinge. It is quite singular, but when we are really frightened, whatever the cause may be, the human system receives such a shock that the heart just about stops beating altogether. When the heart stops beating of course the flow of the blood from the heart stops, and then there is no supply of fresh red blood coming through the arteries under the skin of the face. Therefore we look white—the color the face would be if no blood ever flowed through the arteri and veins. Some people have fac so white they look as though th were scared all the time. This not because they have no blo flowing through the veins a arteries in their faces, but becau their supply of blood is less th other people's, and sometimes b cause the walls of their arteri and veins are so much thicker th the average that the color of t blood does not show through. The are also many people who have much blood in their systems all t time, and the walls of whose a teries are so thin, that they lo at all times as though they mig be blushing.

NEW
SIXES

Not for Today

But for the Years to Come

OUR VICTORY MODEL

NEW IN 100 WAYS

The new Mitchell Six was not designed to meet today's requirements. The object is to give to Mitchell the future first place in its class.

Late in 1916—after 14 years of car building—we started to revise completely all standards in Light Sixes.

This new Mitchell is the result. Because of the war, it took two years to complete it. There are 100 notable changes. Most of them mean more endurance, more lasting satisfaction.

There are many larger parts. Then new heat treatments and better materials give much added strength.

New Ideas Scores of new specialists have been added to our staff. Our inspection system has been radically revised.

We are saving wear, upkeep and fuel in many important ways. Cylinders are ground. Pistons are perfectly fitted. Crankshafts are twice balanced on two new-type machines. A thermostat controls the temperature of liquids, air and gas.

There is a new body, built extra-staunch. The steel frame below it is 1½ inches deeper. The top is a grade that stays new. Extra finish gives a lasting luster.

Added Betterments There is a new clutch, a ball-bearing steering gear. Brake efficiency is increased by new design. Long cantilever rear springs give unique riding comfort. And ample tests have proved these springs unbreakable in use.

This new Mitchell has won a remarkable following among men who are good judges of value. But there are many more who should know the facts. Visit a Mitchell dealer or write for catalog.

A Ministry of Kindness

MRS. VICTORIA WELLMAN, of Downer's Grove, Ill., near Chicago, won her greatest triumph in her two month's vacation in New York when she spoke at the Bowery Mission Sunday morning, August 31. The meeting showed that her eloquence, motherliness, power and results are equally in evidence at the extremes of society and all along the scale, as she had previously won favor in eight addresses at six churches, prominent among them being Calvary Baptist Church, and covering Baptist, Methodist and Presbyterian churches. She had also scored a remarkable victory at the Russian evangelistic street meeting on the East Side. Marked at first as a target for flying pieces of corn-cob, cabbage stumps, and even a stone, though not speaking, she calmly held her ground, smiled, caught the attention of the children, picked up a piece of cob as a souvenir, and turned the unfriendliness of the crowd into actual love and interest, so that at the next meeting the auditors were increased by two hundred, while inquirers for literature appeared, and many of the children arranged to send her letters.

Mrs. Wellman arrived at the Bowery Mission in time to speak personally to many of the men who were to form her congregation, giving them slips of paper and pencils in order that they might leave with her their names and addresses, so that she might write them afterwards. This action destroyed the stiffness which sometimes appears at the beginning of a meeting, and placed her en rapport with the men immediately. Her address, delivered with great sweetness and power, was simply the story of her early conversion and the devotion of her life to God. But almost at every turn, there came a chance for speaking a word of hope and encouragement to men who were just in need of such things. The address was full of testimony to the value of prayer. The impression made by the recital of her act in consecrating an hour of her busy life every day to Prayer, and the dedication of a certain room for that purpose, called her "Victory Room," made a very deep impression. Many were led to see that if a busy woman, the mother of eight children, could devote that amount of time daily to prayer, there was no excuse for neglecting this duty on the part of any of them. Tears stood in the eyes of many of the men as the simple story was told.

Immediately on closing her address Mrs. Wellman stepped down into the audience, shook hands with every one, and collected the address slips she had given out at the beginning. This gave her the chance of many a kind personal word to men who were hungering for such attention. Over twenty men publicly gave themselves to God, and will never forget this beautiful hour spent with a concecrated sister in Christ.

The Conversion of a Buddhist Nun

By Rev. Z. Charles Beals, Hochou, China

IN early missionary days it was not easy to reach the men of China with the Gospel. Every man, woman and child was anti-foreign. One could hear yang-kuei-tze and yang geo-tze (foreign devil and foreign dog) called out on every side, and a rock or a broken piece of brick was flung at one whenever they thought they could get away safely.

This antagonism was stimulated to a marked degree in 1894 when China went to war with Japan. Then everybody, in Chinese eyes, was Japanese, and nothing was bad enough for them to do to the foreigner. There were many riots in those days and quite a number of missionaries were killed.

During this time it was almost impossible to get a woman or child to come to the meetings, as such wild stories were circulated of how the missionaries "took out the the children's eyes for medicine," etc. After the Japanese war a better feeling was fostered, and the women began to come to the meetings held for them only. At one of these meetings a Buddhist nun was noticed sitting on a back seat. As the service went on and the speaker told of the love of God and how Christ came to save us and prepare for us an everlasting home, the nun came nearer and nearer to the speaker and listened very attentively.

The missionary lady told the old, old story over and over again until she was weary and then closed the meeting. The nun arose and went to the front seat and said: "Chea shi ding hao ting; tsing giang dao li" (this is very good to hear; please preach some more).

The missionary went on for some time longer and then stopped again. The nun arose and took the lady by the hand and said; "Tsing giang, O-yao dong dao li" (please preach, I must know this doctrine).

Before the meeting broke up, light came in and she found Jesus.

In giving her testimony afterward she said: "When I was a girl the people told me that if I became a nun I would have peace and joy, but none came. Then the other nuns told me joy could not come until I became a vegetarian, so I gave up eating meat for twenty years; but no peace came." She had been hunting for a doctrine that would bring peace to her heart. Now she found peace, and she went forth rejoicing, and later on she was used in teaching others "the Way."

We find from time to time those whose hearts God has prepared, who accept the truth of salvation about the first time they hear the Gospel. It encourages us in our work, but as a rule it is "line upon line and precept upon precept, here a little and there a little."

I wrote last time about the advanced work Mr. Liu was doing at Han Shan. He has accomplished a grand work and we had the joy of baptizing thirty persons there in June as the result of his ministry. We thank the Christian Herald readers for their help in supporting Mr. Liu as our evangelist in that needy field. Substitute evangelists can be working for you when you are asleep, and their salary is only from $10 to $15 per month. We are opening up another unoccupied field this autumn and there are more needy towns and villages around us.

The River Jordan Quarantined

"NO more baptisms in the River Jordan," say health authorities in Palestine. Bathing in the consecrated stream, famous in sacred history, has been forbidden as a result of the discovery by American physicians that its waters carry dangerous disease germs.

One of the first steps taken by the American Red Cross in the relief work in that region was an analysis of the river water. It was found laden with the germs of skin diseases and other contagious maladies.

Because of the sacred traditions connected with bathing in the Jordan restrictions have never been placed on the practice. At certain seasons of the year, thousands of natives journey great distances to bathe in the river, believing that they will receive spiritual uplift and be made pure. The ban on unrestricted bathing probably will continue until the epidemic of typhus in eastern countries is checked.

America 50 Per Cent Underfed.

he bureau of labor statistics of United States department of or, in its country-wide investi- on of the cost of living in 1918- 9, secured itemized budgets from roximately 13,000 families. ecial intensive studies of each of major items of expense in the ily budget have been or are be- made. Considerable data show- the relationship between the ily budget and the health of the ily are already available.

Detailed dietary analysis of the d of 983 families, selected at ran- m from eleven representative es, indicates that 21.2 per cent of se families purchase less than 00 calories of food per man per y; 49 per cent of these families than 3,000 calories, and 74.5 per nt less than 3,500 calories.

Allowing for considerable varia- n from the recognized standard ,500 calories purchased per man day, these figures point to the fact that approximately 20 per cent of the families are purchasing food entirely insufficient for the maintenance of health, 30 per cent are on the border line between sufficient and insufficient nourishment, and 50 per cent are in all probability well nourished.

A study of the total yearly income in relation to the food budget also bears out these conclusions, 44.6 per cent of the total number of white families included in the investigation were receiving annual incomes of $1,500 or more, and were probably getting an adequate and reasonably balanced diet, 22.7 per cent of the families were receiving annual incomes of less than $1,200, which is wholly inadequate to permit of the purchase of sufficient food for a family of average size, leaving 32.7 per cent of the families in the income group of $1,200 to $1,500, where the food necessary for an average family would be subject to serious curtailment.

ng from her flight, and she stood dient and meek while the other pulled and shook and brushed patted her into shape again. en all was orderly and adjusted ut the crumpled bride, the girl od back as far as the limits of tiny room allowed and surveyed finished picture.

There now! You certainly do k great! That there band of vers round your forehead makes look like some queen. 'Cor-t'—ain't that what they call I read that once in a story at the blic Library. Say! Just to think hould pick that up in the street! od night! I'm glad I came along t then instead o' somebody else! is certainly is some picnic! ell, now, give us your dope. It ust 've been pretty stiff to make u cut and run from a show like one they got up for you! me, tune up and let's hear the le. I rather guess I'm entitled to ow before the curtain goes up ain on this little old stage!"

HE two tears that had been struggling with Betty for a ng time suddenly appeared in her es and drowned them out, and dismay she brought out a faint tle sorry giggle of apology and nusement and dropped on the y bed, which filled up a good o-thirds of the room.

"Good night!" exclaimed the stess in alarm, springing to catch r. "Don't drop down that way those glad rags. You'll finish m! Come, stand up and we'll t 'em off. You look all in. I'd ghtta known you would be!" e lifted Betty tenderly and began remove her veil and unfasten the onderful gown. It seemed to her uch like helping an angel remove r wings for a nap. Her eyes one with genuine pleasure as she ndled the hooks deftly.

"But I've nothing else to put on!" rgled Betty helplessly.

"I have!" said the other girl.

"Oh!" said Betty with a sudden ought. "I wonder! Would you willing to exchange clothes? ave you perhaps got some things u don't need that I could have, d I'll give you mine for them? don't suppose perhaps a wedding ess would be very useful unless u're thinking of getting married on, but you could make it over d use it for the foundation of an ening dress ——"

The other girl was carefully lding the white satin skirt at the oment, but she stopped with it in r arms and sat down weakly on e foot of the bed with it all spread t in her lap and looked at her uest in wonder:

"You don't mean you wantta ive it up!" she said in an awed ne. "You don't mean you would e willing to take some of my old gs for it?"

"I certainly would!" cried Betty agerly. "I never want to see these hings again! I hate them! And esides, I want to get away somewhere. I can't go in white satin! ou know that! But I don't like take anything of yours that ou might need. Do you think hese things would be worth anything to you? You weren't thinking f getting married yourself some ime soon, were you?"

"WELL, I might," said the other girl, looking self-conscious. "I got a gentleman riend. But I wasn't expectin' to et in on any trooso like this!" he let her finger move softly over he satin hem as if she had been ffered a plume of the angel's ing. "Sure, I'll take it off you if e got anything you're satisfied have in exchange. I wouldn't ind havin' it to keep jest to look t now and then and know it's ine. It'd be somethin' to live for, jest to know you had that dress in the house!"

Suddenly Betty, without any warning even to herself, dropped upon her knees beside the diminutive bed and began to weep. It seemed somehow so touching that a thing like a mere dress could make a girl glad like that. All the troubles of the days that were past went over her in a great wave of agony, and overwhelmed her soul. In soft silk and lace petticoat and camisole with her pretty white arms and shoulders shaking with great sobs she buried her face in the old patchwork quilt that her hostess had brought from her village home, and gave way to a grief that had been long in growing. The other girl now thoroughly alarmed, laid the satin on a chair and went over to the little stranger, gathering her up in a strong embrace, and gradually lifting her to the bed.

"You poor little Kid, you! I oughtta known better! You're just all in! You ben gettin' ready to be married, and something big's been troubling you, and I bet they never gave you any lunch—er else you wouldn't eat it,—and you're jest natcheraly all in. Now you lie right here an' I'll make you some supper. My name's Jane Carson, and I've got a good mother out to Ohio, and a nice home if I'd had sense enough to stay in it; only I got a chanct to make big money in a fact'ry. But I know what 'tis to be lonesome, an' I ain't hard-hearted, if I do know how to take care of misself. There! There!"

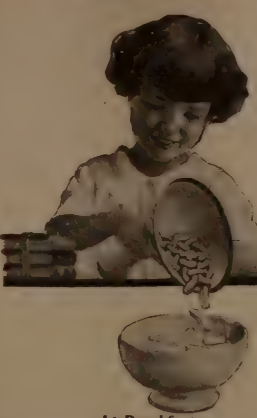
THE smoothed back the lovely hair that curled in golden tendrils where the tears had wet it.

"Say, now, you needn't be afraid! Nobody'll getcha here! I know how to bluff 'em. Even if a policeman should come after yeh, I'd get around him somehow, and I don't care what you've done or ain't done, I'll stand by yeh. I'm not one to turn against anybody in distress. My mother always taught me that. After you've et a bite and had a cup of my nice tea with cream and sugar in it you'll feel better, and we'll have a real chin-fest and hear all about it. Now, you just shut your eyes and wait till I make that tea."

Jane Carson shifted the little flower-head to the pillow, and thumped it up scientifically to make as many of its feathers as possible, and then she hurried to her small washstand and took a little iron contrivance from the drawer, fastening it on the sickly gas-jet. She filled a tiny kettle with water from a faucet in the hall and set it to boil. From behind a curtain in a little box nailed to the wall she drew a loaf of bread, a paper of tea and a sugar-bowl. A cup and saucer and other dishes appeared from a pasteboard box under the washstand. A little shelf outside the tiny window yielded a plate of butter, a pint bottle of milk, and two eggs. She drew a chair up to the bed, spread a clean handkerchief on it, and spread forth her table. In a few minutes the fragrance of tea and toast pervaded the small room, and water was bubbling happily for the eggs. As cosily as if she had a chum to dine with her she sat down on the edge of the bed and invited her guest to supper. As she poured the tea she wondered what her co-laborers at the factory would think if they knew she had a real society lady visiting her. It wasn't every working girl that had a white satin bride thrust upon her suddenly this way. It was like a fairy story, having a strange bride lying on her bed, and everything a perfect mystery about her. She eyed the white silk ankles and dainty slippers with satisfaction. Think of wearing underclothes made of silk and real lace!

What They Love Best

Is Some Bubble Grain



At Breakfast

These dainty grains with cream and sugar or mixed with any fruit. Flimsy, nut-like morsels.

At Playtime

Corn Puffs crisped and buttered to eat like salted peanuts. They are food confections.

At Night

Puffed Wheat in milk. A whole-wheat dish so flaky and flavory that children revel in it.

You mothers know that.

The most welcome cereal dish—the most delightful—is a Puffed Grain served in some way.

Millions of children—every day and all day long—are reveling in these dainties.

Puffed by Steam.

Here are whole grains of Wheat and Rice puffed to bubbles, 8 times normal size.

In a hundred million food cells the tiny bit of moisture is turned to steam.

Then the grains are shot from guns. The steam explodes, and the millions of explosions make these airy, flimsy tidbits.

Every Atom Feeds

This is Prof. Anderson's process. The purpose is to break every food cell, for easy, complete digestion.

Puffed Grains do not tax the stomach. Every element of the whole grain feeds.

So these are ideal foods for all hours—for bedtime and between meals in particular.

Like Nut Meats

The taste is like toasted nut meats. The texture—thin and fragile—makes them seem like fairy foods.

Girls use Puffed Rice in candy making and as garnish on ice cream.

They eat Corn Puffs like bonbons after school.

But the greatest dish is airy Puffed Wheat floated in bowls of milk. It makes the milk dish a delight.

And whole wheat with milk, as you know, combines all foods in one.

It seemed to Betty as if never before in all her life had she tasted anything so delicious as that tea and toast and soft boiled egg cooked by this wonderful girl on a gaslight and served on a chair. She wanted to cry again over her gladness at being here. It didn't seem real after all the trouble she had been through. It couldn't last! Oh, of course it couldn't last!

THIS thought came as she swallowed the last bite of toast, and she sat up suddenly!

"I ought to be doing something quick!" she said in sudden panic. "It is getting late and I must get away. They'll be watching the trains, perhaps. I ought to have gone at once. But I don't know where I can go. Give me some old things, please. I must get dressed at once."

"Lie down first and tell me who you are and what it's all about. I can't do a thing for you till I know. I've got to go into this thing with my eyes open or I won't stir one step," she declared stubbornly.

Betty looked at her with wide eyes of trouble and doubt. Then the doubt suddenly cleared away, and trust broke through.

"I can trust you, I'm sure! You've been so good to me! But it seems dreadful to tell things about my family, even to one who has been so kind. My father would be so hurt——"

"Your father? Where is your father? Why didn't he take care of you and keep you from getting into such big trouble, I'd like to know?"

The blue eyes clouded with tears again.

"My father died five years ago," she said, "but I've always tried to do as he would want to have me do. Only—this—I couldn't."

"H'm!" said Jane Carson. "Then he prob'ly wouldn't of wanted you to. Suppose you take the rest of those togs off. I'll find you a warm nightgown and we'll get to bed. It's turning cold here. They take the heat off somewhere about six o'clock in the evening, and it gets like ice up here sometimes."

Jane shivered and went to her small trunk, from which she produced a coarse but clean flannelette nightgown, and Betty, who had never worn anything but a dainty lingerie one before in all her life, crept into it thankfully and cuddled down with a warm feeling that she had found a real friend. It was curious why she did not shrink from this poor girl, but she did not, and everything looked clean and nice. Besides, this was a wonderful haven of refuge in her dire necessity.

AND so, in the darkness and chill of a little third-story hall bedroom, Betty whispered her story to a strange girl whom she had picked up in the street. Then with a sigh of utter weariness she gave herself up to the overpowering sleep that had dropped down upon her.

Jane Carson with her eye open lay staring into the da and thinking it all over. S did not waste much time ma over the wonder that it h happened to her. That wo for afterward when there w thing else to be done ab Now there must be some plans and she was the one to make It was quite plain that the derful and beautiful Eli Stanhope, the plans for wedding had been blazoned papers for days beforehand not at present capable of m or carrying out anything effe Jane was. A Link for Women's Clubs

THE Women's National Economic Committee has been organized to provide a link between the many specialized groups of women's organizations and to serve as a clearing house through which definite information concerning any matter of importance to the economic interest of the country may be had. It is a committee as its name implies, working through and largely with established women's organizations.

At present, because the paramount interest is in the food question, it is furnishing basic information on interesting conditions. It will also furnish at a pinch a trained speaker capable of coping with national economic questions. Representative women have been enlisted to promote the work in their respective states and to direct the requests for information on all topics pertai to women which are already be ning to pour into the office of committee.

"We find women deeply aro to a sense of their share of the res sibility in the economic probl which confront us all today," Miss Helen Varick Boswell, acting chairman. "The commi will deal intelligently with all e omic questions which effect wo whether in business or in the ho Hundreds of queries have com to us from various organizat who are eager to know just w public policies are good for the h as well as the public and what icies may be detrimental to h economic interest. I believe t the women of our nation will st together firmly for or against s policies."

Our Religious Papers, After Reading

By Rev. H. G. Mendenhall, Moderator, N. Y. Presbytery

WHAT shall be done with them? Throw them into the ash can? Give them he waste-paper collector? Use n as fire starters? Yes, one and of these experiments have been d, but with a condemning con- nce. Let me tell you a better and one so simple that why it not discovered earlier in my ministry still remains a mys-. It was suggested by pass- The Christian Herald to a t-in on the lower West Side of v York—one of those modern ines who with her sister was ing and moiling to keep the home burning for the comfort of her d Scotch father. The pleasure ught to the home by the Herald ed the question: Why might all of the other papers and mag- es now awaiting disposal be d in the same way?

As an experiment, a table was ced inside of the entrance doors the church; on this table were the religious papers and secular gazines; a Literary Committee the Christian Endeavor Society made custodian of this depart- nt of church work. The young ple kept the papers in order and the close of the service aided in distribution. As an additional raction, a card with the words nted on it—"Take One"—was ced in a conspicuous place above table.

On the first Sunday of the trial weekly calendar had this an- ncement: "Our young people ve placed magazines and religious pers on a table at the front door. ese are for free distribution. lp yourself and after reading ss on the good news to others." e result at the end of that Sun- y's services was a clean table—erything had been taken away. e interest aroused brought out m church members other peri- icals from hidden receptacles, and more than a year the papers thus vided found a growing interest ong many for that kind of liter- ure who had never read a religious per, and the reports that came m homes were of the wholesome ect produced upon the families o were interested in receiving e papers.

This idea was carried out in urches in other sections of the y, with the same good results. Each of these parishes had a different population, but the desire to obtain these papers was as great in one place as in the other. In one of these churches there was a Mother's Club which met weekly to sew. It was made up of humble people to the number of at least one hundred persons—women of all creeds and many nationalities; but they were as eager to get this literature as the church members.

To counteract the growing heresies against both Church and State, no better or easier method can be found than the one suggested. It will have a tendency to correct wrong impressions of the Church and counteract the effect of papers and magazines which are doing so much to lower morals and breed anarchy; and will inspire instead a patriotic sentiment for the flag and a love for the Church. Our religious papers are of a high order; their tone is healthful and uplifting; it is loyal to God and country and its circulation in homes that know only the partisan press and the class journal will bring a different atmosphere and create a more sympathetic feeling for those things that make for our safety as a nation and success as a church.

Our summers are passed in the Litchfield Hills, and to our post office come the journals which are our delight in the city. What shall be done with them here, after they have been read? That is answered by the rolls of papers taken with us as we use the automobile and which are handed to children we meet on the unfrequented roads, or dropped in yards, or laid on rural delivery boxes; and everywhere these papers have been gladly received. The railroad watchman at the dangerous crossing welcomes our coming, for he knows we have a paper or magazine which will relieve his monotony; the black boy in the cabin on the mountain side recognizes us as he shouts, "Any papers?" and the girl eagerly inspects them as she carries them into the house. True, it may be seed sown at the wayside and derided; or it may fall on stony places and leave no results; but here and there the good ground is surely found and a fruitage brought forth which may not only bless the individual, but through him bring countless blessings to others.

The Man Who Came Back

OVER twenty years ago, I was an out-and-out park bench habitue, dozing in Madison or nion Squares at night until a liceman would wake me up by tting me over the soles of my feet ith his club, telling me to move . I searched garbage-cans and ash rrels for scraps to keep body and ul together, and many times ashing spittons out in Bowery or st side saloons to keep my in- tiable thirst for liquor in some easure appeased. Working Res- e Missions under professions of nversion, while in reality only eking the loaves and fishes, I was soul adrift, flung hither and ither on life's tideway, a dis- antled derelict at the mercy of ery wind and current of desire.

One cold winter night, I stood utside the Bowery Mission. On he windows were the words, Bowery Mssion, Welcome."

I had often seen these words efore, but on this night of nights, hey shone out like characters of hining living gold. I went in and, id a rum-ruined, ragged, dirty d lawless crowd, slunk into a at.

The place was crowded, clerks, yers, doctors, opium smokers, caine snuffers, whiskey fiends, all sperate through sin, and I with rum-burned stomach, the worst of them all.

I listened to the testimonies of men redeemed. The superintendent told his story, how God for Christ's sake had pardoned and set him free from the thrall of liquor. He said "any man in a hole can get out if he lay hold of the Gospel rope."

Then and there the blinding scales fell from my spiritual eyes. In a flash I saw my appalling need and the glorious remedy. I sprang to my feet and rushed forward, where, on bended knees, "my chains fell off, my heart was free! I rose redeemed to follow Thee." Kindly hands were outstretched to aid me. That night I began a new life.

At the Bowery Mission they believe that the best sort of a tract that can be put into the hands of a hungry man is a good, thick meat sandwich. I thank God for the help received from the Mission, which enabled me to build up a broken constitution.

After a four years' theological course, I was ordained to the Gospel ministry and for the past seventeen years have been a member of the Illinois Conference. I am pastor of a community church, among a fine people, telling the story of Jesus Christ and His power to save.

Millions of Germs

Breed in Tooth Film—Keep It Off

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

Film Wrecks the Teeth

That slimy film which you feel with your tongue causes most tooth troubles. The tooth brush does not end it. The ordinary tooth paste does not dissolve it. In crevices and elsewhere that film clings. That is why your brushing fails to keep the teeth white, free from tartar, clean and safe.

That film is what discolors—not the teeth. It is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. So all these troubles have been increasing despite the wide use of the tooth brush.

Dental science, after years of search, has found a film combatant. Able authorities have amply proved this by careful clinical tests. Leading dentists everywhere now urge its daily use.

The method is embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And we offer a 10-Day Tube free now to everyone for home tests.

See the Results—Then Decide

The results of Pepsodent are quickly apparent. Some are instant. We ask you to see them—watch them ten days—then decide for yourself about them.

Pepsodent is based on Pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to disolve it, then to constantly combat it.

Pepsin long seemed impossible. It must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. But science has discovered a harmless activating method. The inventor has been granted patents by five governments already. It is that invention which makes possible this efficient film combatant.

"By the Blessing of God

I ascribe to Bible study the help and strength which I have had from God to pass in peace through deeper trials in various ways than I had ever had before; and after having now above fourteen years tried this way, I can most fully, in the fear of God, commend it. * * * A man has deprived himself of the best there is in the world who has deprived himself of intimate knowledge of the Bible."

—Woodrow Wilson.

Systematic, Prayerful Bible Study gives that knowledge of God and man without which real success in life is never attainable. It gives uplift, inspiration, refreshment, strength, courage, wisdom, breadth of vision, spiritual enthusiasm, and power with God and men.

Don't allow anything to cheat you of your wonderful privilege of systematically studying the one Book which outweighs in value all other books in all the world. Dig in it as for gold and you will secure treasure of value and extent beyond any calculation.

Start at once by enrolling for a

Moody Bible Institute Correspondence Course

Many thousands the world over have studied one or more of our courses. They include people of all ages, from a boy of 14 to a woman past 80; ministers, missionaries, evangelists, busy teachers, physicians, students, shut-in people; mothers ambitious to train their children in the Word; farmers, mechanics, soldiers in the camps and in service, etc.

Perhaps never in all history was there so great a need and demand for trained Christian workers, able to "rightly divide the Word of Truth."

If you are not already enrolled as a Correspondence student there is no better time to start than now. Fill in and mail the accompanying coupon and full particulars concerning all our courses will be sent to you. The prices are very low — much below cost, and the instruction is unsurpassed. You will be a personal pupil; time, place and amount of study under your own control.

"I often mention in my sermons," says a letter recently received from a Methodist minister, "that a Correspondence Course from the Moody Bible Institute has been of far greater value to me than all my Bible and theological work in college."

Another correspondent writes: "A lady last evening told me that she and her husband were both saved by the Christian Evidences Course and that a friend of hers had also been saved by same."

Another says: "What marvelous light I am receiving through these lessons! (Scofield Course). Long, long years I have puzzled over things in the precious Book that now I understand."

FILMING THE BIBLE

An Opportunity for Study of The Scriptures Presented in A Proposal to Put Biblical Scenes and Incidents on the Screen

By Ernest A. Phillips

THE recent announcement made by a large Los Angeles motion picture corporation that it intended to soon commence the gigantic task of reproducing the Holy Bible for the screen met with quick approval from persons of a substantial Christian character who are able to see how such a production would greatly increase nation-wide interest in religious work.

According to the statements issued by the directors and producers who have the plan under consideration it will require approximately two whole years to complete the film and during the course of its production more players will be required to participate in the scenes than have ever before appeared on the screen. The cost for such a production will far surpass that expended on any other masterpiece thus far filmed. The ancient costumes, the special types of people required for particular scenes; the expenses incurred for transportation to the deserts, for appropriate atmosphere and almost innumerable other expenses motion picture concerns encounter while producing such a massive film will result in a huge expenditure, but the natural benefits that the human race will ultimately secure from such an interesting film will more than counterbalance dollars and cents.

Present indications are that the film will be released practically as fast as it is completed, and in two-reel lessons at a time. These may be displayed and taught at Sunday school, church services, revival meetings, prayer meetings or on other occasions when a congregation assembles to study the Gospel.

Unity in Michigan

I HAVE read the Christian Herald for over forty years and have ever enjoyed it for its beautiful spirit of generosity and unselfishness and the large-heartedness of its undertakings for every one in trouble and in need of help.

And then when the call came for our help, no matter how small the mite of the "little ones" of the family, the gift was always honored as surely as the great ones, and that is, I think, wherein lies the power of the Christian Herald. It has the very spirit of the Master himself.

The bigger, higher, more spiritual things which are now arousing the world have been coming all through the terrible years of the war, and our hearts have all been touched and made ready to receive the help of the Almighty and to acknowledge it. I have always made it a habit in my life to speak fully of my trust and my faith in God and to acknowledge Him in all my ways. In years gone by I have often met the uplifted brow, or shrug of the shoulder, or the unkind sneer—even a flat denial that such a faith and trust were necessary—but gradually, as the horror of this war grew and our utter helplessnesss was felt, there came a change. As you say "the whole human family was drawn closer together" in a common bond of suffering. Any crumb of comfort was eagerly grasped and the God of all Grace, who hears the faintest cry of the humblest heart, strengthened the desire and made us all more eager to know more of the Power that holds the world in His hands.

Now the lifted brow or the sneer, when the name of the Master is mentioned, is exceptional, and the

The “Black Jews” of Abyssinia

The Falasha, lost for 2,500 years and found again, are among the sufferers from the Great War

By Martin Keet

OW Christian missionaries in ar interior Abyssinia tified the sha, as the ck Jews” their wor- ping the of Abra- , Isaac and Jacob, has been re- d by Dr. Jacques Paitlovitch, of faculty of Geneva University, zerland, in the United States to al for medical aid for the sur- rs of this tribe of Israel that been lost for more than 2500 s. The story of the Falasha, their immediate needs to them from extinction, is one e strange developments of the y-sided Great War. For the ck Jews” of Abyssinia are suffer- rom the world catastrophe just uly as the millions of homeless, ving wanderers who are being d by the relief organizations oad.

olated for years, and found n only within the last decade, e people are again cut off from outside world by the impenetra- silence of the “lack of commun- ions with the interior,” war's ial reason for forgetting nations peoples in their hour of need. ast reports, famines and plagues e working havoc with the Falasha. Paitlovitch has appealed to the t Distribution Committee, the agency for handling the funds ed by the American Jewish ief Committee, and similiar or- izations. The urgent need y, of the “black Jews” of yssinia is not food and clothing, medicines and medicinal supplies h which to fight the “flu” and er diseases that were ravaging the ntry at last reports. The Geneva lorer has asked for $10,000 with ich to equip a medical expedition he Abyssinian hinterland.

he “black Jews,” declares, Dr. tlovitch, are descended from that t of ancient Jewry which left lestine about the time of the truction of the first temple in usalem. Whether these wander- went into Africa in the train of Queen of Sheba following that narch's visit to King Solomon, or whether they first drifted into Arabia and were later taken into Egypt as war prisoners by the Abyssinians in the sixth century, is not very clear. That they did pass through Egypt is certain, however, as the tracery on ancient bits of pottery unearthed at Assuan, on the upper Nile, testifies. Now and then through the .years, rumors of a strange people who lived far in the interior of Abyssinia filtered through to the seaport towns. The missionaries discovered among the native Abyssinians a type of people that bore all the physical characteristics of Jews, but whose skin was black as the natives. That these people really were Jews was learned when efforts were made to convert them to Christianity. Then, it was found, they held very decided religious beliefs. Unlike the natives, they never worshiped but one God and they bowed to no image; they observed the Mosaic law and the principal feast days of the Jews. But while they contended that their faith was the faith of their fathers, they had absolutely no knowledge of Hebrew. Their version of the Bible and all their religious literature was in the Gheez tongue, the classical language of the Abyssinians.

As a people, the Falasha are distinct from other natives not only because of their higher mentality, but because of their habits of thrift and industry. For years they have been the artisans of the country, and even the persecution of warring tribes could not wholly efface their characteristic hold on the economic structure of the land in which they dwell.

It is known that at one time the Falasha numbered a quarter of a million. Attacks by savage tribes reduced the numbers so that in 1913, when Dr. Paitlovitch visited them, they numbered scarcely a hundred thousand. As soon as an expedition can be fitted out, Dr. Paitlovitch will return to Abyssinia in an effort to save the survivors of this people.

The Salary of the Pastors

By One of Them

YOUR editorial on this matter is very much to the point. The pastor cannot strike, probably uld not if he could, and possibly cause of a natural hesitation to oclaim his needs publicly, stands day in a very difficult situation. No man enters the ministry for e purpose of making money, but e ministry ought to be such that y man of worth will obtain suffi- ht to live upon in reasonable com- rt and, I do not hesitate to add, at should include enough to enable m to lay by something for trou- ous times. Some churches are pro- ding pensions, but in few instances e the amounts promised likely to be sufficient by themselves. In least one case the man with the all salary will receive the small nsion, and the one with the rge salary will receive the large nsion! This is unjust to say the ast. Not that I am particularly love with the pension idea. I annot help feeling that a proper ipend now, enabling a man to save nough to provide for himself in old e, would be much better. But I resume that is incapable of accom- lishment.

Various statistics are published om time to time, but possibly the gures of actual experience should ave more weight. My wife and I ve alone in a house provided by my ngregation. It does not matter what my stipend is, but for the year October 1. 1918, — September 30, 1919, I kept sufficiently close accounts to be able to say that our expenditure reached a total in round figures of $1400, without making any provision for saving at all. We did not “live well”. In a clothing way we went short of a number of things that were really necessary. Various house renewals had to be postponed. My wife is a splendid manager, and I have learned economy from experience.

Without particularizing too closely, of that $1400, about $600 went for heat, light, telephone, insurance and benevolences (I am a “tither”.) That left $800 upon which to provide food, clothing, additions and renewals to household goods, newspapers, books, periodicals, car fares, vacation, and the hundred and one odds and ends that arise in every household.

We are placed where we have to do a good deal of entertaining. Taking everything into consideration I am heartily sick of having to cut expenses so low; and yet I doubt not some fare much worse than I do, even though I live in one of the most expensive localities in the middle West—more expensive even than Chicago. Not so long ago $1200 and a house was looked upon almost as luxury for the preacher; today it means practically starvation in some parts. Two bond issues came during that year.

Do You Believe in the SUPERNATURAL?

IF you offer your Sunday-School class anything less than the supernatural, your Sunday-school work will be a failure. For this reason The Sunday School Times offers you, every week,

- —a supernatural Bible: a book which in every syllable is God's very Word: God-breathed, unique, authoritative, infallible.
- —a supernatural Christ: a Saviour who is God, supernaturally born of a virgin, working miracles of love and omnipotence, dying as our Substitute, His body miraculously raised from the dead, able to save to the uttermost, and coming back to reign over His earth.
- —a supernatural Life for every believer: Christ Himself living in victory in you, winning others to Himself through you, and making your service for Him a thrilling adventure of testimony and results.

With all this, the Sunday School Times also offers you the most successful methods of natural efficiency in Sunday-school and church work; a corps of a dozen trained specialists writing for you every week on the International Improved Uniform Lessons, and so many other remarkable features that it will take a whole series of advertisements to tell about them.

For the First Time in History it is Now Possible to Duplicate a SULPHUR SPRING in Your Own Bathtub for Millions of men and women of all races, and in all climates, have proved—over and over again—that certain forms of baths have power to relieve physical disorders and ailments. And so, from earliest recorded time, people have availed themselves of the remedial effects of these baths.

Rheumatism

They did not know just what it was that made them whole and sound again; that took the pain and swelling out of their limbs, assuaged the fever and banished their disorders.

They Only Knew That The Baths Healed Them

They only knew they were ill—and that, through the healing influence of the bath, they were restored to health.

And so, to this day, people from all parts of the world journey to these miracle-working springs. Many travel thousands of miles to get the benefit of these wonderful waters. And they come back home cleansed of their infirmities, and filled with fresh vigor and sound health. These are facts that have been proven millions of times.

Hardly a person in the civilized world but knows someone who has gone to the famous European resort in Bath, England; the Spa, Belgium; Aix les Bains, France; or to the Hot Springs, Arkansas; Hot Springs, Virginia; White Sulphur Springs, West Virginia; Mt. Clemens, Michigan;—almost cripple, to come back with a new lease of life.

It Isn't the Spring Itself—It's The Sulphur in the Spring that Works The Miracle

It is the healing minerals held in solution in these particular waters that neutralize the poisons in the body, and help remove them from the system.

Of all these minerals, the most potent is sulphur, recognized by the medical profession as one of the greatest of all remedial agents. It is this powerful, yet absolutely harmless product that removes the cause of many of the most painful disorders that afflict human beings.

The heat of the water opens the millions of pores of the body, through which the sulphur passes into the tissues, and thence into the blood stream. Thus the most deep-seated and chronic of rheumatic and kindred disorders are reached and the pain-poisons that cause the suffering are eliminated.

It is by use of this wonderful natural remedy that chronic rheumatism, neuritis, sciatica and lumbago are overcome.

Skin eruptions of the most aggravated type—that resist practically every other form of treatment—are relieved. Acne, pimples and skin blemishes of all kinds disappear, sometimes in a very few days after commencing the treatment. This is common knowledge.

What is not generally known, however, is that through a marvelous medical discovery, without any expense for travel and hotel accommodations, and without any loss of time from business or household duties.

The Same Results Can Now Be Secured in Your Own Home

Nature's secret has finally been wrested from her. Scientists have at last found the way of dissolving sulphur and holding it in permanent solution. They have discovered a process whereby all the remedial virtues of the famous sulphur springs can be bottled up and made available anywhere. To this discovery they have given the name SULFLUID.

The Proof of Genuineness

SULFLUID is the only preparation in the world that contains more than 20 per cent of Sulphur, soluble in water, as is proved by the statement of Henry J. Masson, A. M., M. Sc., of the Department of Chemical Engineering, Columbia University, New York City. Standard samples submitted to Dr. Masson, after complete analysis, were reported by him as follows:

"The sample of SULFLUID submitted to me for examination contains 21.1 per cent. of total sulphur, carried in a harmless solution.

(Signed)
H. J. Masson."

This authoritative statement, from one of the leading chemists in America, should convince anyone beyond the shadow of a doubt of the absolutely harmless nature of SULFLUID. Being identically the same in every respect as found in the waters of the most celebrated healing Sulphur Springs in the world, it is only reasonable to believe that you will derive the same benefits from SULFLUID at home as you would by going to the Springs.

Even the Worst Cases are Helped

No matter how painful or of how long standing your rheumatism, neuritis or lumbago may be, a course of SULFLUID baths will help you. If your muscles are sore and stiff, if your joints are swollen and inflamed, if you suffer from any form of skin eruption, you will derive grateful relief from SULFLUID.

Try It at Our Expense

We have proved what the SULFLUID baths will do in hundreds of cases—we know what they will do for you. Therefore, we will send you enough SULFLUID for a course of twenty-one baths—the course prescribed at the best known Springs, and let you take a week's treatment of these baths. When you see the results in your own case, decide whether or not you wish to continue the full course of treatment.

Why You Need Send No Money

We insist that you send no money. We do not even ask you to pay the transportation charges. Merely send your name on the coupon and we will ship you the full course of baths. Take the week's treatment at our expense and learn for yourself its miraculous powers. Experience the relief from your chronic suffering. Then decide. If you have not been relieved, if you have not been convinced, return the remainder of the treatment at our expense and you will owe us nothing. If you are benefited, as we know you will be, else we could not make this offer—you may then pay for the entire treatment the price of which is only $9.00—no more than the cost of a single day's treatment at the Sulphur Springs. Send us the coupon NOW.

UNITED LIQUID SULPHUR CO., Inc., Dept. 27, 103 East 125th St., New York City

I accept your offer and will try three Sulfluid baths sent express prepaid, without obligation on my part. If I find that the baths are not beneficial, I will return the balance of the treatment at your expense and I will owe you nothing. If the week's treatment has relieved me and I decide to continue with the treatment, I will send you $9 within a week after receiving Sulfluid, for the entire treatment of 21 baths.

One Day in a Missionary's Lif

A few mornings ago I woke up with a heavy sense of impending disaster. After feeding the baby, dressing the children, and showing the sewing-woman how to put a foreign sleeve into a foreign garment in a foreign way, I descended to the typewriter. On the way thither I met the news that the wash woman had fever, and at once ascended to the servants' quarters with thermometer and quinine, knowing there would be need of both. The woman was burning hot, with temperature 104.6, but not too sick to marvel that her mistress should take the trouble to come and see her.

Two women suddenly arrived from a nearby village. One explained that the other forced her to come to see the wonders of the house. Particularly did they want to see the upstairs and the attic and the "foreign baby." In vain I explained that the baby was asleep; that I had no time just then. They contentedly settled down to wait until the baby woke up, and inspected the living-room, the study, the dining-room, the dishes, the mirror, the stereoscopic views, which delighted them greatly, and later, when the teacher had bowed himself off and dinner was served, they came and watched us eat—the biggest show of all!

Later, after taking accounts with the cook, etc., the mistress wrote a letter to her grocer in Hongkong, 300 miles and about 10 days distant, complaining that his last delivery of prunes was wormy and his butter liquid oil, which had to be poured from the cream pitcher. Another to the forwarding agent in Hoihow stated that the baskets containing fifty pounds of sugar had been set down in water while the carriers rested on the road, and that natural laws had in no degree been suspended as concerning the ultimate result. This being accomplished to the writer's satisfaction, she had intentions of sending a thrilling missionary message via the Hainan News, but sud remembering that the sev woman had probably sewed u trousers' legs for her small so wrong way, she visited her found her suspicions correct. T while she was hunting for things for the carpenter, can woman from the market and manded to be taken to the a that she might get a handker which she had placed there s weeks before for safe-keeping, gether with her other clo fearing the soldiers would e her home and carry off her po sions.

About this time the eldest came and accusingly said, "Mot you haven't played kinderga with me today." Accordingly took the whole family to sta prayers, and afterward, in b carriage, velocipede, and exp wagon, perambulated down the road in front of the compound the edification of the pas villagers, to whom anything wheels was a seven days' won

This inspection over, we turned, and after winding up infant machinery to last until time, our lady prepared to d for a dinner party at her one only married neighbor's. A search for clothes revealed the that the summer, plus the roaches, plus age, had reduced to nothing but Chinese garme In desperation she thought of wedding dress, pulled it forth its hiding-place, and got into it find that a silver fish had cut trimming, and that the little h ants had eaten the lining. H ever, there was nothing the ma with the dinner, and, that harmoniously concluded, we home. The thought mill, howe refused to grind, and the typew was unable to spell correctly, after my husband was in bed asleep, in perfect peace and qui successfully turned the heel of first Red Cross sock.

Community Work a Christianizing Forc

THAT community organization can be made a Christianizing influence, actually increasing Church attendance and Church cooperation, was interestingly brought out in a conference which Rev. Charles Stelzle recently had with the Clergyman's Council of the Cincinnati Social Unit, according to a report of the conference in the Cincinnati Commercial Tribune. The Social Unit is a plan for community organization which is being tested out in a section of Cincinnati as a sort of "social laboratory" for the nation.

Two and a half years of the three years set apart for the experiment having elapsed, the work is now being studied by twelve national committees representing Church work, public health, muincipal administration, neighborhood organization, etc., each of which is preparing recommendations for a future program for this unique organization. Mr. Stelzle was in Cincinnati for the Committee on Church organization, and conferred there with the ministers of the Mohawk-Brighton district, the Social Unit Section. These ministers are organized as a special council in the community administration, which consists of a group organization elected from professional, business and trade groups, to make plans, and a block organization to carry the program to 100 per cent of the people.

"The spirit of neighborliness and unselfish cooperation engendered through the operation of the Social Unit has had such a marked effect upon the people that the congregations of the three Presbyterian Churches in the district are seriously considering a movemen unite as one congregation," the Tribune report According to Rev. Julius Brochnau, pastor of West Liberty Street Presbyte Church, his congregation and th of the Popular Street and Moh Presbyterian have opened neg ations with a view to uniting.

"The Social Unit has helped churches get together," decla Rev. Mr. Brochnau. "It taught unity and along the line practical Christianity it is do wonderful things."

Rev. Joseph Ardelean, the pa of a Baptist Church whose wor among Rumanians, said: " organization of the community not only helped churches get gether but it has helped individ congregations to get together. T community has been bound gether in a new cooperative sp and the effect is to increase ch attendance. The native bl workers visiting foreign fami have been very helpful. It bound the community together made for better living."

Rev. Carleton Atwater, pastor the Lincoln Park Baptist Chur declared that the Social Unit Christianizing the whole communi "I also find that it is making own congregation realize the need improving their methods of work he said.

"Mr Stelzle," says the ne papers, "will submit to leadi churchmen of all faiths the findi of his investigation and will s their cooperation in an effect extension of the plan of commu organization."

ISS M. Berryman, Dorchester, Mass., sends the suggestion that the League of Nations should find a parallel in Christian Unity movement, which be called the "League of Denomins."

W., a young Christian worker of Island, Ill., writes: "The joy of my to see men move toward my Master. long have you been a Christian?' d a young lad who worked near me. not a Christian,' he smiled in answer. lked about the Billy Sunday revival . 'My mother is a believer,' he 'I suppose I will be one some day.' ent over to hear the singing and the n. 'Will you make up your mind ?' I asked. 'Start to be a Christian now.' 'That would be doing it right e reel,' he answered. 'Now is the time,' I urged. 'I guess I may as lo it now,' he said at last. He wrote ame on a convert's card and as we d he added, 'Mother will be satisfied I will go and look her up.' 'All , Walter,' I said, 'Now we can line ome of the other fellows.'" Our g friend seems to have the tact and as well as some of the other qualities go to make up a good evangelist.

s. Clara M. Hearne, Atkins, La., l be grateful to any reader of the stian Herald who can send her a copy e poem or song, of which the first are these:

. B. S., Rahway, N. J. The moral spiritual outcome of the great war ot yet be fully estimated. While people everywhere hope that it may t in winning the world to Christ, there be a long travail before it can even be that the globe is fully evangelized by world-wide presentation of the Gospel. . Dr. Scofield, in one of his recent s, tells of the hopes that are cherished he hearts of God's people looking ard a purer and better world. He ts out that the Golden Age is made by the divine covenants and pro-s, although as the result of sin, there yet come wars, famines, persecutions, false religions. But while world ation is in God's hands, we have our k to do as His helpers meanwhile in ading the Gospel and illustrating its hings in our own lives. To be earnest workers is our appointed task, leaving lts wholly with Him who will bring things to pass in His own good time. s we regard as sound advice and emitly practical.

Reader, Chesley, Ont., Can. A husband cannot be the keeper of his wife's conscience, nor she of his, and neither should stand in the other's way in the performance of what either may regard as a religious duty. Latitude should be allowed by each toward the other in such matters. If the wife wishes to devote a portion of her allowance to religious purposes, she should be at liberty to do so, and a similar privilege should be granted to the husband also.

Subscriber, Neville, Pa. We have submitted to an experienced lawyer, your inquiry as to property rights, when a husband dies leaving a widow and no children. He replies as follows:

"Under the laws of Pennsylvania, the decision in such a case may depend upon whether or not the man left any parents or any brothers or sisters or any nephews or nieces. If there are any persons classified as 'collateral heirs or other kindred' and no children, the wife would get one-half of the real estate if alive, and one-half of the personalty outright. If there are no known heirs or kindred competent to take within the statute, the widow would take the whole of the real property and the personal property. In the event there were no such persons known to exist, she could file her petition a year after the date of death and after administration papers had been issued."

Subscriber, Ohio. 1. In Eph. 5 : 11, 12, Paul was speaking of the works of darkness (evil deeds hidden from the light), not in detail, but in general terms. The Corinthians, as we gather from the chapter, were given to secret wickedness of various kinds. It applies to any form of secret dissipation in social coteries, but without mentioning them specifically. 2 and 3. If your conscience makes you hesitate about any habit or any doubtful companionships, the best course is to avoid them altogether. If you can see no good in them but the possibility of evil, let them alone.

E. J. C., Portland, Ore. 1. Yes, there are doubtless many good Christian people who have been true believers almost from childhood and who have grown up in the faith, who, if asked, could not indicate the date of conversion. 2. The familiar passage in I. Cor. 15 : 29 has been translated "over the dead," or "immediately upon the dead," meaning those who will be gathered to the dead immediately after baptism. Many in the ancient Church put off baptism till near death. The passage probably referred to some symbolical rite of baptism, or dedication of themselves to follow the dead even to death. Another view held by some commentators is that it was a custom to baptize certain persons with the names of the dead, in the hope that they might inherit their spirit and carry on their work.

S. S., Peninsula, Ohio. The poem you quote is not in our collection.

W. A. W., Oakland, Me. In the passage in Acts 2:19 the apostle is quoting from Joel 2:28–30. Compare the two passages and read the last five verses of the chapter in Joel, and you will see that the apostle is explaining the prophecy and applying it to conditions in his own time.

Mrs. L. C., Big Lake, Texas. In the passage in Isa. 58:14 Judea is referred to. It was a land of many hills. See also Gen. 27:28,29 and Gen. 28:13–15.

My Refuge and My Fortress

By Robert Cashman

was waiting half an hour in my hotel room in St. Louis before ing to the train. I saw a Gideon ble on the table, and turned to the ety-first Psalm. It was so autiful to me that I read it again, d then in the time at my disposal, memorized the first three verses.

It was a pleasant evening, and I lked to the station with my bag— out a mile. I had gone perhaps o blocks when I was joined by a anger, a large man weighing arly 200 pounds. He seemed to bound for no particular place, d I felt just a little uncomfortable to just what he might want. His st proposition was an insult; he idently wanted to get me off the reet. I answered as best I could, d continued on my way. He llowed me.

A considerable load of anxiety ll from my shoulders as I reached e station, and was in sight of one of the depot guards. I still had a few minutes at my disposal, and then I turned to the man, and talked with him aggressively about the things worth while for men in these days of unlimited opportunity.

Finally it was time to board my train, and he said, "Do you know, I was going to rob you to-night, but I just couldn't do it." I stood on the back platform in deep meditation, and the voice of God seemed to be speaking to me in the words that I had memorized:

"He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High Shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty.
I will say of the Lord, He is my refuge and my fortress;
My God, in whom I trust.
For He shall deliver thee from the snare of the fowler,
And from the noisome pestilence."

Durable-DURHAM Hosiery is a product of industrial democracy—never of Child Labor. We have no strikes or lockouts.

True value in hosiery is measured by the extra wear it gives

It is one thing to get good looking hosiery—and quite another to get hosiery with long-wearing value. You get both when you buy Durable-DURHAM.

To know the true value of this serviceable hosiery is to save on your stocking expense. Not only money saved with fewer new pairs to buy—but the time and trouble of darning is avoided.

Millions of housewives have learned that Durable-DURHAM is the right hosiery for every member of the family. It wears longer because it is made stronger. The Durham dyes do not fade and the stockings keep a long lasting good appearance.

Best of all, Durable-DURHAM is reasonably priced.

DURABLE
DURHAM HOSIERY

Made Strongest Where the Wear is Hardest

Ask your dealer to show you the styles for every member of the family. The children's stockings are strongly doubly reinforced. Styles for men and women include all fashionable colors and come in all weights from the lightest lisle to the thick, warm, fleecy lined hosiery for winter wear.

Every pair of Durable-DURHAM Hosiery is extra strongly reinforced. The legs are full length, tops wide and elastic, soles and toes are smooth, seamless and even. And the sizes are accurately marked.

Look for the trade mark ticket attached to each pair. You should be able to buy Durable-DURHAM Hosiery at any dealer's. If you do not find it, please write our sales office, 88 Leonard Street, New York, giving us the name of your dealer.

Ten Years’ Promotion In One

Dr. Iglehart’s Life of Roosevelt.

“THEODORE ROOSEVELT, The Man As I Knew Him,” by Ferdinand C. Iglehart, D. D., a book just off the Christian Herald press, has immediately taken its place in the front rank of the biographies of Roosevelt. It has called forth the commendation of some of the finest literary critics, and metropolitan journals, in the country.

The author, who was one of the closest personal friends Col. Roosevelt ever had, has given us at close range a vivid description of the mental, moral and religious characteristics of his hero, and has dug down into the very depths of the heart of his friend, and has revealed secrets of an important character, told to no one else outside of his own family.

Aside from this personal estimate of a dear friend, the book is an ideal biography containing every important event in Mr. Roosevelt’s life from his birth till his death.

The first chapter is a comparison between Washington, Lincoln and Roosevelt. In it the author says: “These three national heroes, dissimilar as they were in earthly circumstances and intellectual characteristics, were similar in all those basic elements so necessary in the building up of individual character and a healthy state. The three were the greatest hearted men the nation ever had. If their intellect was a huge mountain losing itself in the clouds, their affections were a deep blue boundless sea. The three were superlative in their truth and honesty. Washington’s hatchet will cut its way down the centuries; Honest Abe will for ages be a title more honorable than any king ever wore; Roosevelt, ‘clean as a hound’s tooth,’ will be known to generations to come. Theodore Roosevelt was intensely religious. He did not hesitate on all proper occasions to announce publicly his faith in the fundamental doctrines of Christianity. He was a devoted member of the Dutch Reformed Church. He told me that his firm faith in God and his actual knowledge of Him had been the chief motive in his individual character and public service.”

In the chapter, “As Police Commissioner,” the author tells of his first meeting with Mr. Roosevelt, of their two years’ fight for good government in New York City, and quotes a letter from the Commissioner, dated July 2, 1895, which reveals the moral courage of the Roosevelt of history. The letter is as follows: “My dear Dr. Iglehart: I thank you for the slip you sent me, and I thank you still more cordially for what you said in your sermon. As I told you, it is with me a simple question of observing my oath of office. Nothing that either the saloon keepers or the politicians say, will alter in any way my position. Sincerely yours, Theodore Roosevelt.”

In the chapter, “Heart Secrets Told,” the author says, “Recently Colonel Roosevelt said to me: ‘You remember the walk we had from the church to the White House a dozen years ago, when I turned my heart inside out to you, and told you I believed God had raised me up to lead the nation in its desperate fight for its life against the illegal despotism of combined wealth in collusion with corrupt municipal, state and federal office holders, and that my daily prayer was that God would spare my life long enough to see this menace to the republic removed. He did spare me and I thank Him. But I thank Him most for sparing me to take a part in the settlement of the great world-war. No Hebrew prophet was ever called up to cry out against the danger confronting his nation, or the moral evils that curse the world, more truly than I have been called upon to plead for ideal Americanism, and also to fight to the death absolute despotism. I thank God that I have lived to see the victory which places the United States in the forefront of the free peoples of the world which means universal democracy, with its liberty, love, righteousness and peace forever.”

There is a classical thread running through two chapters in the parallel between Roosevelt and Hercules, the greatest character in mythology, in which the modern Hercules is accurately portrayed as naturalist, author, hunter, explorer, statesman and warrior; showing that in his miraculous achievements he was superior to the “Twelve Labors of Hercules.” The gentle, loving side of the modern hero is presented in another chapter in a parallel between him and the “Great Heart” of Bunyan, in which his fondness for women and children and devotion to them is recorded.

Theodore Roosevelt, the Man, is the idea that permeates the whole book—the Man which is greater than the warrior or President.

Two chapters are devoted to Home which had so much to do in making Roosevelt the Man; the one of his boyhood, an earthly paradise; and the one he founded on Sagamore Hill, a heaven on earth to him. The author closes the chapter on this home with these words: “I looked up to the room where our dear friend died and the window out of which he flew that cold winter morning, and I wondered, whether Quentin did not come with his aeroplane for him to take him home.”

A chapter is devoted to Colonel Roosevelt’s sons, all four of whom volunteered at the beginning of the war, two of whom were dangerously wounded and one of whom made the supreme sacrifice.

In the above quotations we have only taken here and there a jewel from the rich treasure house of truth the volume contains. The value of the book is enhanced by the estimates of distinguished men in memorial messages and addresses; including President Wilson, Senator Lodge, Charles E. Hughes, Bishop Wilson, Chauncey Depew, Lyman Abbott, General Wood, Rev. J. R. Day, Secretary F. K. Lane, Will H. Hays, Gifford Pinchot and others.

In the authenticity of the biographical data, in the keenness of vision into the deeper, the better life of the hero by one who knew him so well, in the literary style, in the high moral motive of the volume, and in its inspirational value on the better life of the individual and the nation, the book promises to be a permanent one. The literary editor of the New York World, of a recent date, says so, and Dr. Shaw in the Review of Reviews says it will be a force on the next generation as well as this.

Laymen to Study the World’s Unrest

CHRISTIAN laymen are everywhere taking a deep interest in a better understanding of the spiritual decline, social unrest and economic world disorder of the time. They hold that such understanding is dependent upon a more intimate knowledge of the Scriptures. Don. O. Protestantism at the Sword's Point

These declared that the object of pected riot was to introduce ate Carlists into the gallery n the floor, who should fire and left into the audience, ng a panic in which the chief ins might escape while they t the Protestants a lesson they would never forget.

it was, their machinations completely foiled, and the ng gave a great impetus to stantism and the cause of ous freedom. No such meeting e interests of a free religion een held, I was told, by his- l scholars, since the days of Visigoths, and that was a long ago.

E matter was brought up in e Imperial Diet at Madrid, it was said King Alfonso and leading statesmen denounced hreatened iniquity.

at same afternoon the Metho- mission church in another part e city was set on fire, but the agration was put out by dly neighbors.

hen the reports of these out- s reached America, the Pilot other papers denied the seri- ess of the whole affair, and de- ced me as an hysterical liar. ever, I could appeal to the ish papers, and if necessary e Chief of Police of Barcelona onfirm the truth of these re- s.

my Catholic friends did but it, I have never cherished grudge for this incident, and always defended the Catholics whole from having had any or lot in the matter. It was a small and peculiarly bigoted y that was involved, and I am to bear testimony to the ing liberality and toleration public opinion in Spain as in t other lands.

Vhen attending an earlier Endeavor convention in Saragoza, some twenty years ago, the delegates did not dare to sing on the first day of the meetings lest a riot ensue, for some rabid papers had denounced the Endeavor movement as the "latest spawn of Protestantism," and urged that the meetings be suppressed. Some of the delegates were actually stoned by the small boys on their way to their obscure meeting place. The second day, when the expected riot did not materialize and the populace seemed in no wise excited, the convention singing was indulged in more heartily for its previous suppression.

An incident somewhat similar, though without any threatened tragedy, occurred when I was in Rio de Janeiro a few years since. I had come up the east coast of South America from Buenos Aires to Rio, and as we entered the harbor I saw two government steam launches coming out to meet our ship. As they drew near, I was surprised to see that they were crowded with Brazilian Endeavorers, and I learned that the use of these government launches had been given to them free of charge. This unexampled generosity was afterwards explained when I learned that a certain intensely rabid Catholic paper had been making a bitter attack on me and the cause I had come to advocate,—among other things, that a simple letter of introduction from President Roosevelt, which I was known to have, showed that I was an American spy, bent on a political propaganda, camouflaged by religion only that useful word had not then come into vogue.

The government, knowing the charges to be false and absurd, and being none too friendly to these reactionaries, wished to show them and the people at large that they took no stock in the charges. Moreover, when a few days later some two hundred Endeavorers wished to go to Sao Paulo, where the chief convention was to be held, free passes were given to them all over the government railway, a journey of over two hundred miles if I remember correctly.

Thus did our enemies overreach themselves once more. When I went to thank the authorities for their courtesy, they assured me that there was no reason in law or precedent why such courtesy should not be extended to a worthy organization.

Again I would say that I have never charged the Catholic church as a whole with any of these machinations. I realize that there are many godly men in that communion in high places and low, who would in these days never countenance anything that savored of persecution, but another element sometimes comes to the front that recalls the bigotry and intolerance of the Middle Ages.

That nothing can be gained in the twentieth century by such a policy pursued by any faith, these incidents go far to prove.

The Best Fish Meal Ever!

Try this fat, juicy mackerel AT MY EXPENSE

Folks, here's a real treat from Gloucester. A pail of fat, newly-packed mackerel especially selected for their color and flavor. You will surely relish these temptingly-good fish. These Davis' mackerel are yours to try, on request. Send no money—I'll forward the fish on approval and take all the risk myself.

Frank E. Davis.
President

It Takes a Fisherman to Pick Out Good Fish

For generations back my people were fish-folks—the early settlers of Gloucester. I used to go to sea in my father's vessel after the mackerel. Little did I think then that what I learned about fish was ever going to be of real value to my friends or to me in a business way. If I hadn't learned what I did at sea the "Davis Folks" all over America would not write me as they do today: "Mr. Davis, we cannot get mackerel anywhere like yours." I've built up business with 100,000 homes. It's a joy to do business with home folks and to hold their confidence and good-will.

Our Own Home Kind

In those fishing days, father naturally picked out the best mackerel to take home for winter. We picked out the plump ones. I came to know them at a glance. The meat when broiled is very tender and juicy. I sent friends some of my fish. And what they said about them made me realize how hard it is for people away from the seashore to get the right kind of fish. The secret is picking 'em out. The kind of mackerel father taught me to select for our winter's supply are the kind I will send to you. We clean and trim them of heads and tails and send full net weight of clear fish.

Fall Mackerel—Fat and Tender

Fall mackerel are the best eating fish. They're fat in the Fall, like a Turkey fattened for Thanksgiving. Most of the fish your dealer can buy are caught during the spring and summer when they are spawning and are, therefore, dry and tasteless. I have all I can do to supply my home customers without selling dealers. You can trade with me just as you do with your home grocer or butcher. And everything I send, delivered right to your door, by express or parcel post, is sent subject to your complete satisfaction or you do not pay for it. Is there any squarer way to do business than that? For 34 years this has been my steadfast policy.

Send No Cash—Try the Mackerel First

I want you to know before you pay that my fish will please you. If there is any possibility of a risk, I want it to be at my expense. Mail the coupon today and I'll ship at once a pail of my mackerel containing 10 lbs. net weight of the clear fish, each fish weighing from 1¼ lbs. to 1½ lbs., all charges prepaid, east of Kansas, so that your family will have a real Gloucester treat Sunday morning. Then, if my mackerel are not better than any you have ever tasted, send back the rest at my expense. If you are pleased with them, and I'm sure you will be, send me $4.90. At the same time ask for descriptive list of Davis' fish. Sold only direct—never to dealers. Mail the coupon now, with your business card, letterhead or reference.

If after trying a fish, I don't care for them, I'll return the rest at your expense and not owe you anything. Otherwise I'll send you $4.90 in 10 days.

Qualities I Want my Child to Have

By Jeanne Kirkland

1. HEALTH is the corner stone on which hinges the ability to perform, the willingness to serve, and the optimistic outlook so essential to making the world a pleasant place to live in.

2. HONESTY. Unless a child tells the truth, whatever he is or does is so much waste. It is not possible to have character without an innate sense of truth.

3. OPTIMISM OR CONTENTMENT. Without happy dispositions we could not have a Christian world. One has to be content with what he has, or optimistic as to his future. Success in life depends on outlook—the whiner knows no success.

4. THE DESIRE TO LEARN,—not only the desire to know but a keen enjoyment in the act of learning new things, whether from books or life. There is no graduation; there should never be a time in life when we sit back contented, when we consider ourselves too old to become more useful than we are. A child that has to have things forced on him is in the beginning handicapped.

5. ADAPTABILITY is readiness to adjust oneself to one's environment, to the tools life furnishes. I would not want a child without ambition but I should hope it would be his ambition to fit into the work at hand and to adjust to the people conditions put about him. I believe in finding out in things and people the hopeful qualities.

6. INGENUITY, or the ability to get from one's environment all it has to offer. Adaptability prompts him to use the tools at hand while ingenuity is the ability to do resourceful things with whatever is at hand. It is this power which directs our permanent reforms. This does not mean that a child should use tools and people for his own ends—but that he should have a constructive turn.

7. SYMPATHY. Sympathy is the key note on which the best deeds in the world rest; it is the ability to see the needs of others as well as the desire to help. But heavens deliver me from a child with sympathy and without judgment!

8. UNSELFISHNESS. The greatest sin to-day is selfishness; the rarest quality among both educated and illiterate to-day is unselfishness, yet unselfishness is the gem of Christianity.

9. A SENSE OF FAIR PLAY, or justice. A child needs a strong conviction of right and wrong. He should be willing to suffer when punishment is fair—but if he were mine, I would want him to be willing to fight for his convictions when things seemed unjust.

10. FAITH, a belief in something greater than himself and his world, a reverence for all things sacred. All men at some time in their lives have faith, but the happiest must be those who never lose their faith, either in friends, loved ones, or God.

The Challenge of the Church

By Wayne B. Wheeler, LL. D.

(General Counsel, Anti-Saloon League of America)

THE best way to make prohibition permanent in the United States is to help make the world dry. The peace treaty, with the proposed reservations which will doubtless be adopted, makes this nation a part of the new world league. If liquor dominates the other nations in this league, we will be discriminated against because of our position on prohibition. This method has already been used by one of the signatories to prevent another European nation from adopting advanced prohibition measures. A traffic which is disloyal to the nation of which it is a part and unpatriotic in its activities as the liquor dealers have been here, will not hesitate to insist upon this weapon to save itself.

The foundations of democracy are the same everywhere. They are intelligence, morality and religion. The liquor traffic is an enemy to all of these. It must be eliminated or the essentials of a democracy are constantly in jeopardy. Universal democracy and universal sobriety must go hand in hand if the new world program is to succeed.

We owe it to the backward nations which we have debauched with our liquor trade for years to help them now. From Boston port there has been sent as high as one million, five hundred thousand (1,500,000) gallons of strong liquor to Africa.

Bishop McConnell recently said at a meeting in Columbus:

"I am of the conviction that the English speaking races up to the present have done greater harm to the world through the liquor traffic and the opium trade than their missionaries have done good."

The best investment the church can make today is to put at least ten million dollars a year into the drive for a liquorless world.

Many nations like China, Egypt and others are helpless if we do not carry out this program. The extra territorial privileges in the treaties of these nations prevent them from securing national prohibition for themselves until the nations that have these privileges release them. The United States, we hope, will soon set the example and prohibit every American citizen in China from engaging in the liquor traffic in China and in other nations where our treaty relations permit.

The outlook is bright for world-wide prohibition in the next decade. Finland adopted national prohibition a few weeks ago. Norway in a referendum against strong liquor favored prohibition almost two to one. Permits to buy beer are issued by the government and if any person becomes drunk his permit is revoked. Sweden will doubtless adopt prohibition next year. The majority of the legislative districts are dry. New Zealand votes in the near future with strong hopes for victory. Scotland will vote by local units on prohibition next year and a large part of the country will vote dry. Bulgaria is pleading for help and promises an early victory. Two states in Mexico are dry, two others partly dry and there is a chance that the whole republic will be dry in less than a year and a half. If New Zealand votes dry, Australia will follow her example without question.

As Colonel House recently said: "With the United States under prohibition it will eventually influence all Europe to vote dry because it cannot compete industrially with sober America. The United States, alert and responsive to this new opportunity, will be the religious, moral and economic leader of the world."

Not enough can be accomplished by earted, hesitating reforms. Our must arouse everyone. It must side by side with the League of ons, and with reconstruction as one great projects of the times.

The time for half-way measures is — it never existed. Our reforms completely and thoroughly raise the peoples of this world. I am pleading totally different vigor in social reform. reforms must be so thorough and so me that they will rank with any re- ever carried out by mankind. They awaken everyone. They must form f the momentous events of all times. would suggest then that you would r a great service to mankind by ing the interest of our government, of Church, of social reformers, and of y as a whole to the crying need of ing comfort, education. and finally of morality to everyone upon this globe. You would render great service to humanity by impressing the government and the public with its duty to cease half-way reforms and to begin thorough and extensive ones.

Reform should not be limited to our own country. The people of the whole world should be awakened. Picture the conditions in Constantinople, Cairo, or Canton and then decide if it is not our sacred duty to completely alter this.

Reformers must cooperate. This is far too important a subject to allow differences of opinion to interfere with the general result. And reforms should begin at once. It is almost criminal to allow preventable crime to continue. The government should be petitioned to take action at once. The people should be awakened upon this vitally important subject.

I realize that much has been done, but why should reform have any restriction in area or any limitation in spirit? Reform must be carried out with an unprecedented spirit and with a tremendous vigor.

I am only a boy. I have made no study of social reform. But the action I am pleading for seems so immediately necessary that I have felt justified, compelled, to write you at once.

And why can't poverty be abolished? Why can't a far better system of education be established? A system which will elevate as well as teach? Thoroughly educated people are always far better in other respects. Why can't the state tear down the wretched dwellings of the poor and replace them by decent homes? Why can't industrial experts be sent to the countries which are so industrially backward? Why can't the church send her best clergymen to those who need them most? Why can't the slum dwellers all over the world be Christian in fact as well as in name? In short, why can't vigorous, thorough reform be carried out which will lift the poor of all the world to a far, far higher position? There are difficulties, but difficulties accompany any noble project.

I hope I have given to you the ardor I feel. To me it is a Christian duty to thoroughly better the comfort, the intelligence, and the standards of morality of the poor all over the world—to make this our paramount object, for which everything else must be collateralized.

Men of 45

Need Better Baked Beans

IN boyhood one could digest beans badly baked. And any hearty food was enjoyable.

But beans for indoor men must be fitted to digest. And they must be made inviting, like Van Camp's.

To get a zestful sauce our scientific cooks tested 856 recipes

A Four-Year Dish

In the Van Camp kitchens, college-trained cooks spent four years to perfect baked beans. They compared 856 blends to get the ideal sauce.

Now each lot of beans is analyzed. The water used is freed from minerals to insure a tender skin.

The baking is done in modern steam ovens, so high heat cannot crisp or burst beans. They are baked for hours there, until every granule is fitted to digest. They are also baked after sealing so that the flavor can't escape.

The sauce is baked with them, so every atom shares its inviting zest.

Let Men Try Them

Hotels and restaurants all over America are buying Van Camp's to please men. Let the man in your home enjoy them.

He will get beans mellow, nutty and whole. He will get a delicious tang. And the beans will not tax the stomach.

You will save work and fuel. You will have a dish of meat-like nutrition to serve at a moment's notice. You will cut down meat bills by making beans more popular.

Order a few cans now.

Francis Holley, Altruist

THE Bureau of Commercial Economics, one of the most important unofficial adjuncts of the federal government which has made its influence felt in every community in the country, was born of the gratitude of Francis Holley, lawyer, civil engineer, traveler and educator. Because Holley was saved from blindness, he decided to devote the remainder of his life to the work of bringing to persons of less means or less opportunity the wonders of the world he had seen in nine years of persistent traveling into the way places of his own land, Europe and the Orient.

Holley is the Bureau of Commercial Economics. When it started, five years ago, he was its complete staff. He was such a tirelessly energetic staff, however, that all the government departments, the foreign embassies and legations and the great industrial captains of the country quickly heard of it and became interested. The result was he had to check out $150,000 of his own funds to keep pace with its growth before anyone outside a limited group of public and semi-public institutions ever heard of it.

The Bureau of Commercial Economics is purely educative. As one of its announcements says, it is "an altruistic association using the facilities and instrumentalities of governments, manufacturers and educational institutions in the disseminating of useful information by the graphic method of motion pictures displayed invariably to audiences admitted free. The scope of the bureau is international."

That sufficiently expresses its purposes, but it fails to tell the story, which is Francis Holley.

Holley was afflicted with the wanderlust when he was a boy of thirteen, in Chicago. That was forty-two years ago. He attempted to gratify it by joining as a messenger an engineering corps which was going out into the wilds to lay down a route for the Northern Pacific railway. He liked engineering, and when the Northern Pacific work was completed, he went across the border to help the Canadian Pacific find a way through the mountains to the coast. His work brought him recognition and he won an important place in the northwest as a civil engineer. Then he decided to be a lawyer, so he went to school, studied hard, and as his reward, was admitted to the bar in Minnesota and Illinois.

Somewhere along this line money in large pieces began coming to him. The wanderlust, too, had never been effectually cured. It seemed to call for immediate treatment, so he cut away from business nearly twenty years ago and began his travels which lasted for nine years and ended only with the loss of his eye sight. He had seen many and strange things; he had filled his mind and his heart with the wonders of the earth and then without warning came almost total blindness.

The long and discouraging fight for his eyes began. It ended six years ago when extremely heroic treatment which left him partly paralyzed from the hips down restored sixty per cent of his sight. In this period of darkness, Holley canvassed his situation. He had been able to gratify the keenest of his life-long desires, to travel and to know the world in all its moods and all its parts. Thousands of other men and women, however, were not so fortunate. Their outlook was circumscribed by their economic condition. If they were to see what was going on in the world, the world would have to be brought to them.

On that hypothesis, Holley began to work as soon as the medical men got through with him. He established himself in Washington and opened an office. He got in touch with the Bureau of Education of the Interior Department and the other educative officers of the government and told them what he wanted to do. They may have been a trifle sceptical but they promised him cooperation and the use of motion picture films showing public works. He went to the largest industrial concerns and asked them for the privilege of taking motion pictures of their plants that the people might see industry in operation. He interested the diplomatists of the foreign powers represented in Washington and they aided him obtaining films showing all types of life and activity in their countries.

Not all this came at once, of course, because Holley had to find some place in which to exhibit the pictures when he had obtained them. He canvassed universities, colleges, state granges, chambers of commerce, social settlement houses, boards of education, community institutes, churches, welfare organizations, from one end of the country to the other, and promised to send them reels of travel and educative film if they would take charge of the exhibition. The only serious condition he imposed was that there should be no charge for admission in any form. The exhibitions must be absolutely free.

The responses almost overwhelmed him. Everybody, it seemed, wanted to see the world through the Holley eyes. His enthusiasm and the obvious field for the work he had undertaken drew reel after reel of film to him that money could not buy. It was not long before he had a film exchange rivalling in size the largest of the commercial exchanges. His programmes were in constant circulation from Maine to California and from Minnesota to Florida. In the third year—and that was two years ago—ten million persons were being entertained and instructed by them. Other men offered to help him take care of the immense financial burden and through this offer he was able to expand the work he was doing.

Hundreds of communities in the less accessible parts of the country had no facilities for the projection of motion pictures, so he transferred many of the programmes to steroptican slides. Three hundred complete sets of slides, each a two-hour entertainment, are in circulation now. A logical development followed.

Some places—the mountain regions of the Blue Ridges, in Kentucky, Tennessee, North and South Carolina and Georgia—had no fit buildings for any sort of exhibition. So self-contained motion picture outfits were built into motor trucks and the trucks were sent out to carry the story of the world into the most remote districts. The trucks carried their own electric power plant to operate the projecting machine and provide current for a big battery of flood lights which could make a ten-acre field as light as day. They carried an electrically operated talking machine of great volume so that the entertainments would not be without the influences of good music. With such an outfit and a collapsible frame for the screen, outdoors was the theatre.

These trucks have not been confined to the country. One even appeared in New York during the Fourth Liberty Loan campaign and was set up every evening to tell the tale of American and Allied war activities on a screen in front of the great Public Library.

Mr. Holley is the only man who has been permitted to establish a motion picture theatre in the capital. When congress declared war several Senators and Representatives came to him and suggested that the Congress needed something that would keep them in visual touch with war developments. The outcome was that the Senate Com-

LESSON I. THE HISTORY OF CREATION.

Read Genesis Chapters 1 & 2

HE Christian Herald Bible ourse begins with this i, the opening Lesson being n below. The Course, which Special one exclusively for readers of this journal, is er the direction of Dr. Gray, n of the Moody Bible Insti-, Chicago, associated with in the work being the Rev. J. Ralston, D.D., head of the Cor-ondence Department of the ody Institute, Rev. P. B. water, D.D., Registrar of the ulty and Professor of Bible alysis, Psychology and Ethics, r. L. W. Gosnell, Assistant n and Professor of Bible thesis, and the Rev. J. C. e, Professor of Christian Doc-e and Pastoral Theology, con-uting a strong body of ex-ienced Bible teachers. The sons will run 24 weeks, with s of test questions at regular ervals. These questions will mailed direct by the teachers Chicago to the students, the wers are to be mailed by the dents direct to the Christian rald Bible Course, Moody titute, Chicago. Certificates l be granted at the close of the urse to those students who ve received the necessary alification marks from the Ex-ining Board. The Course is en to all Christian Herald sub-ibers on payment of a nominal trance fee of One Dollar to ver printing and mailing.

HE students in this Course will be greatly pleased and blessed by it, if they will con-tiously follow the instruction eir teachers.

e first thing they are asked to mber is that the object of the e is primarily to put them in ssion of the great outline facts e Bible.

is a great mistake to set ab-tions before students, until have become acquainted with acts which give rise to them. erefore, in the lessons of the nt series, do not expect much e way of explanation or inter-ation. That will come later; ust now let us be patient, as in stematic and scientific way we he foundations broad and deep high and stately superstruchat your teachers ask now is you read the Scripture text of lesson, Genesis 1 & 2. It will week until the next lesson, efore read the chapters at least a day for the seven days. is our first rule.

ou need not memorize the chap-, but, each time, please read them tinuously. That is, pursue the ing to the end without inter-tion if possible, and without erving the divisions of chapters verses. Master this principle cultivate this habit now at the start, and it will bear rich fruit as you proceed. This is our second rule.

Let the reading be sufficiently slow and careful to enable you to grasp in the process the great outline facts or contents. This you may not be able to do on the first or even second reading; but the third will show progress, and the fourth more, and so on, until your sense of acquisition will be so exhilarating as to raise a question as to whether you really need a teacher!

Keep away from commentaries and Bible helps of all kinds for the present. They have their place, but at the beginning they are apt to divert us from our main objective. Obey this third rule very scrupulously.

Remember that the Holy Spirit is the real Author of the Bible (2 Peter 1: 21), and that it is His office to lead and guide us into all truth (John xv. 13). Therefore trust Him as your real teacher, and show your trust in Him by earnest prayer for His illumination and guidance in every lesson. This is our fourth rule.

COMING now to the text of the lesson, after you have read it a few times you may be struck by the fact that verse 1 seems like a general preface, or introduction, or title to that which follows.

Then naturally, each day's record in Chapter 1 will constitute a kind of sub-division. As the reading progresses you will be noting almost unconsciously the main features, or the most interesting things in each sub-division.

Chapter 2 may not divide itself to your mind quite as easily; but try your best to break it up into its great facts, and next week we will help you with a few suggestions before beginning the new lesson.

We advise you to use the text of the King James Version of the Bible, and we recommend what is known as the Two-Version Bible (Oxford), giving the revised text in the margin.

This is all with which we will tax you in this first lesson, but by-and-by we will follow it up through the mail, with a question leaflet, on which you will write and send your answers to the Moody Bible Institute.

These answers will be examined carefully, marked and returned to you, and at the conclusion of the Course, the Christian Herald will issue certificates to all who have attained a certain grade, and of this certificate they will have reason to feel justly proud.

Sunday School Lesson

THE STORY OF THE RECHABITES.

International Sunday School Lesson for November 2, 1919

Jer. 35: 1—19

nterrupting our course of study concerning the lives of Peter and John, we turn aside on rld's Temperance Sunday to e a lesson from the ancient book Jeremiah teaching self-control l obedience to right principles of

While Jeremiah was preaching l teaching in Jerusalem, and oring with the fickle and dis-edient people, a strange company desert tribesmen entered the city es and obtained permission to ch their tents in an open space thin the walls. Like many ers flocking into the town, they re refugees fleeing from the cruel mies of Nebuchadnezzar, whose rauders were everywhere through- the Holy Land. Unlike the , however, they had some very ct and unusual principles of estic and tribal life. These mads were called Rechabites, and were the descendants of the ancient Kenites, who had companied with Israel on the wilderness journey under Moses and Hobab. More particularly they traced their ancestry from Jonadab, the son of Rechab, who was an ally of King Jehu in ruthlessly exterminating the Baal-worshippers, (II Kings 10:15-23). Jonadab was undoubtedly influenced by the teachings of Elijah. Seeing the corruptions of Northern Israel, the drunkenness and luxury and dishonesty, he made his sons take a vow to avoid the contaminations of city life, to live in the open country, to live in tents rather than houses, and especially to avoid intoxicating drink.

Two hundred and fifty years afterward, their descendants were still loyally keeping the vow of the Rechabites! When Jeremiah saw these sturdy, healthy Puritans encamped near the Temple, his heart was stirred to think of the folly of Israel in breaking the great covenant with Jehovah, for the effeminacy and idolatry and indulgence of the times. He determined to use these Rechabites as an object-lesson to the leaders of the nation.

So he prepared a most solemn and elaborate test of these desert tribesmen. He summoned them to meet him in the Temple of Jehovah, in the apartments of a guild of prophets called the Sons of Hanan the Man of God. The officers of the Temple and leading princes were undoubtedly present. When the Rechabite chiefs had made their salaams and been greeted, the great bowls of wine were brought in by servants and cups were presented to each of them. The prophet Jeremiah said, "Drink ye wine." But the bluff and sturdy Kenites refused absolutely. "We will drink no wine; for Jonadab the son of Rechab our father, commanded us saying, Ye shall drink no wine, neither ye, nor your sons for ever". Then they went on to tell of his other rules for the health and happiness of his children and their descendants. "We have obeyed the voice of Jonadab, the son of Rechab, our father, in all that he charged us, to drink no wine all our days, we, our wives, our sons and our daughters," was their calm and resolute explanation of their refusal.

What a splendid thing it is when people simply and wholeheartedly live up to the highest standards and meet temptation with serene confidence of strength to resist. For centuries these men had met every temptation to break their racial pledge with prompt refusal. Now, not even a prophet and the priests could influence them so much as to taste wine even in the Temple itself, where it was a part of the ritual! Thus is moral character perfected by steadfastness.

Inspired by this scene and filled with the spirit of God, Jeremiah thundered forth his denunciation of the "men of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem." The words of Jonadab the son of Rechab had been performed, but the words of Jehovah to the Jews had been ignored and his will flouted. The strict and difficult commands of their ancestor had been literally obeyed by the Rechabites, so that they would not even sow seed or live in a house; but the far lighter and more liberal provisions of Jehovah for his chosen people had been disobeyed and mocked. Therefore the Rechabites had endured and maintained strength and vigor, but Israel had decayed and within a few short years should be swept away.

he safest motor cars on America's busiest street

O motor cars in America have to stop more frequently, or operate under more adverse traffic conditions than Fifth Avenue (New York City) busses. se big motor cars carry 30,000,000 ple a year through the densest traffic he world. Fully loaded with 44 passen-, driver and conductor, they weigh t tons.

y stop at almost every corner, and must under perfect control at all times. It timated that they make over 80,000,000 s per year, and each stop must be per-ly placed, smooth and easy.

necessity for reliable brake lining urally, to protect these millions of passers, and to stand the wear and tear of e millions of stops, the Fifth Avenue ch Company selects the most reliable e lining it can find. This is unques-ably the most responsible brake lining in America, and Thermoid Brake Lining proven fully equal to the responsibility. President of the Fifth Avenue Coach npany recently said: "We believe that smooth and easy stopping which is racteristic of our busses is brought about the use of Thermoid Brake Lining."

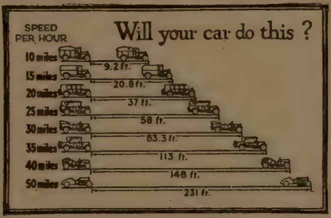
ermoid has been selected for these busses ause of its toughness and sure gripping er. It wears down more slowly than inary brake lining and so evenly that always presents a full wearing surface. bus No. 252, Thermoid gave 19,376 es of service.

The photograph to the right shows the difference between Thermoid and ordinary woven lining. Ordinary brake lining is loosely woven. It has gripping power when new but wears down quickly and unevenly. This uneven surface causes ordinary lining to slip, very often just when perfect action is most needed.

Thermoid Brake Lining is safest and wears longest

In each square inch of Thermoid Brake Lining there is 40% more material than in ordinary woven lining. This additional body gives a closer texture which is made tight and compact by hydraulic compression under 2000 lbs. pressure. In addition to this, Thermoid is Grapnalized, an exclusive process in manufacture which enables it to resist moisture, oil and gasoline. The close, compact texture of Thermoid, made by this method, causes it to wear down more slowly and evenly than ordinary brake lining so that it maintains its gripping power even when worn to wafer thinness.



This chart shows the distances in which a car should stop, at any given speed, if the brakes are efficient

WHILE INDUSTRY WAITS

Labor Troubles Loom Large In World News of the Week

n Ultimatum to Coal Miners

RESIDENT WILSON, through a communication to the United Mine Workers of America has served notice on American labor that there must be no more that violate the rights of the people as a

The whole machinery of the government, means the armed forces of the country, if any will be called on to assure the uninter- l operation of essential industries. At the this letter was made public, the government hed the text of the recent speech by the ary of War in which he quoted orders given e department commanders to respond to all sts for help from state officials without reference e request to the War Department.

other words, the army machinery s ready to be set in motion with the num of delay to preserve order, or ep mines and railways running.

e crisis in the labor situation came the refusal of the United Mine ers of America to submit their de- s on the operators to arbitration at equest of the president, and their ence on carrying into effect a strike for November 1. The issue is one ving 450,000 miners in the bitumi- fields. Their demands include a per cent increase in wages, a six hour and a five day week. The statisti- estimate that to grant the demands d add $1,000,000,000 annually to the try's fuel bill.

e miners, on the other hand, declare since the armistice they have been ing on an average of less than five a week, six hours a day, and that wages have averaged less than $75 a th. A thirty-hour week, they say, d keep all the union membership ing and the sixty per cent raise in s would no more than give them gh to live on at cost of living now prevailing.

r. Wilson's notice that he will call all the forces overnment to prevent the closing of the mines evoked the approval of the governors of the s without regard to politics. Governor Frank owden of Illinois, candidate for the Republican ination for the Presidency, expressed the general ude of the governors when he said that every one em will stand back of the President.

The statement of the President makes the issue n. When a special interest conflicts with the est of the people as a whole the former must way."

Industrial Conference Fails

HE National Industrial Conference called by President Wilson to "discuss fundamental ns of bettering the whole relationship of tal and labor, and putting the whole question bor upon another footing" was wrecked on the k of collective bargaining. Capital denied to worker the right to organize and be represented e settlement of disputes by agents of his own osing. The worker made the recognition of that the sole condition on which he would continue cussion of the country's industrial problems. pital stood firm in its refusal to subscribe to the ciple which is the broad basis of the labor ement and the labor delegation walked out of conference chamber.

he break came only after several days of tension ing which nothing but the feverish efforts of the up of delegates representing the public held the y together. The attitude of both the main fac- s in industry was clearly set forth soon after the anization of the conference when a resolution ntly prepared by two members of the public up, Charles Edward Russell, publicist and sociol- ist, and H. B. Endicott, wealthy manufacturer, introduced as a basis for debate and negotiation. is resolution recognized the right of labor to bine for the purpose of dealing with employers. erous substitutes were proposed by individ- s which took the form of compromise phrases. But they were regularly defeated either in group meetings or sessions of the full conference. The crisis became acute when Elbert H. Gary, Chairman of the Board of the United States Steel Corporation but sitting as a member of the public group, unequivocally refused to accede to a request by the labor group to submit the controversy in the steel plants to inquiry and possible compromise by the conference.

Prohibition Enforcement Law

PRESIDENT WILSON, by vetoing the prohibition enforcement act sprung a surprise on the country and precipitated a lively session in the House of Representatives where within two hours it was repassed over his veto by a vote of 176 to 55. The Senate followed the lead of the house the next day.

The liquor interests were all prepared to close their saloons within twenty-four hours when word of the President's action reached them over the wires. There was great rejoicing, which quickly turned to gloom when the news came almost immediately after of the action in the House.

Wilson's reasons for his veto may be summed up in a sentence. The war is over, he says, and there is no further need for war time prohibition.

Leaders in both houses of congress, however, many of whom are to be classified as of "wet" sympathy, were disinclined to return to "wet" conditions in view of the prevalence of strikes and general unrest. Liquor, they insisted, would simply aggravate the potential dangers of the situation.

New Episcopal Church Head

THE Triennial General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal church ended its sessions in Detroit by electing as chairman of the new Executive Council of the church Bishop Thomas F. Gailor of Tennessee. He will be the executive head of the church for the three years beginning January 1.

The convention is regarded by the delegates as the most momentous in the history of the denomination. They cite the following action as marking progress along four general lines in the effort to place the communion on a broadened plane in the eyes of the whole Christian world:

First, the almost complete reorganization of the Church through the creation of an executive council, and the granting of increased powers to provincial synods.

Second, the broadening of the Church's outlook on social matters, industrial questions and international affairs.

Third, the general approval of the movement toward Church unity by amendment to the Church constitution to make possible the proposed concordat with the Congregational Church whereby ministers of that church may be ordained in the Episcopal faith, these amendments also making possible similar agreements with other denominations.

Fourth, the broadening of the worship of the Church by the revision and enrichment of the Book of Common Prayer.

The proposal of the Board of Missions that it be authorized to co-operate with the Inter-Church World Movement had the almost unanimous approval of the delegates but in the press of business at the last moment it failed to obtain action.

Churches Appeal for Europe

THE clerical conference of the New York Federation of Churches has started a movement to make Thanksgiving day a day of nation-wide appeal through the churches for a voluntary loan through banking agencies of $1,000,000,000 for the commercial rehabilitation of Europe. The meeting at which this decision was reached heard the requirements of England, France and Italy. Edward A. Filene, representing the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, who was instrumental in calling the meeting, sounded this key-note.

"If Jesus had been on earth at the present time he would have done as he teaches us in the parable of the Good Samaritan; bound up the wounds of the oppressed world. Further, he would have made the world a safe place for women and children. The war is over. We must stand for brotherly love. We must learn again to love our neighbors. This task alone is worthy of the highest ideals. The church must create an opinion with the people and then the people will mpress their opinion on our Congress."

Prohibition Fight in England

ENGLAND is in the throes of a prohibition fight that is even crowding politics and reconstruction quarrels out of the leading places in the newspapers. Strangely enough, the most striking figure in the campaign is an American not one in thousands of persons in London would know if he were brought face to face with them. This man is H. E. Johnson, an Anti-Saloon League worker from the United States, who, at the request of reform organizations in England, is there to give advice based on the experiences of the prohibition forces in this country. The London newspapers and vaudeville performers have been bitterly attacking him and have made him a widely known person as "Mr. Pussyfoot." He practically monopolizes the space at the command of the jokesters in the daily press. The anti-liquor fight, in spite of strong journalistic opposition, is making great headway. The government has recognized the situation in its decision to provide a peacetime substitute for the Liquor Control Board.

Church Women's League

NATIONAL Headquarters for the Church Women's League for Patriotic Service has been opened in New York City. The organization was formed a few weeks ago by 500 women in New York as a part of the Episcopal church's campaign to expand its religious, hospital, educational and social service work at home and abroad. Branches of the League are being opened in every diocese in the country. The organization is strictly non-sectarian but the officers will be communicants of the Episcopal church. Committees appointed and already active include those on rescue and preventive work for girls; on community service, which will co-operate with city missions and other organizations in the establishment of social centers; on hospitals and prison work; rural missions and religious education. As far as possible, the league will work through existing welfare agencies.

Battery Life Depends upon INSULATION

There's only one sure-fire preventive against aging on the shelf—that is to store the batteries in true bone-dry condition, which is possible only with the Willard Battery containing Threaded Rubber Insulation.

The life of the battery is largely up to the man in the car, but Threaded Rubber Insulation adds greatly to its chance of long service, because it removes one of the commonest causes of battery trouble—breaking down of the insulation.

Nearly every battery with ordinary insulation has to be re-insulated at least once during its lifetime. Willard Threaded Rubber Insulation never has to be replaced.

Threaded Rubber Insulation has the three distinct advantages over any othe

1. Threaded Rubber Insulation eliminat depreciation in the dealer's stock.

Willard Batteries with Threaded Rubber Insulatio since they have no wood insulation in any form, c be shipped and stored bone dry—since neither plat nor insulation in the battery have ever been wet.

The storage battery with wood insulation in a form can not be kept in a dealer's stock witho depreciation, because wood insulation must be p into the battery wet at the factory, and, once t insulation is wet, a continuous chemical action begin and furthermore, the insulation can not be allow to be dried out, as it would become damaged. Hen the battery must soon be filled.

2. Threaded Rubber Insulation return bigger dividends to the user.

Threaded Rubber Insulation is a manufactur product held to rigid uniformity, more durable a long-lived than any wood can be. The car owner not wholly relieved of caring for his battery, but t battery will stand more abuse, and function at hig efficiency for a much longer time.

3. Threaded Rubber Insulation makes r insulation unnecessary.

When installed in the car no one can say just h soon wood insulation will begin to break down, o account of the impossibility of securing absolut uniformity in wood, since it is the product of natu not of scientific manufacture. During this peri even careful driving and faithful attention to batte care will not absolutely insure long life.

Re-insulation—at considerable expense—is alm certain to come before the ordinary battery is wo out, and the life of any battery after re-insulation uncertain.

Threaded Rubber Insulation outlasts the plates a re-insulation is, therefore, unnecessary.

e illustration above shows what estone has done for users of cord tires, instance.

e Firestone Cord is built to the largest e established by the industry.

is so much bigger than usual standards at there is no comparison. Dealers rywhere say "it sells on sight."

d it is just as big in service as it is in size.

The mileage adjustment basis on this tire has been raised to 8,000 miles, but that is still only a starting point—a minimum from which to begin to figure your extra mileage.

Examine the new non-skid tread. Note the extra volume of rubber and the quality of it. The unusual thickness of tread and toughness of rubber means extra mileage.

More fine rubber combined with greater air capacity gives this tire added resiliency. This means fullest comfort. It means more car protection.

It means less drag on the engine. It means less gasoline per mile.

The new non-skid design is another superior feature. It does prevent skid or spinning of wheels. Yet it has no suction to retard speed, waste power or create noise. For the same reasons this tire makes steering easy and true.

Put this tire on every wheel. You will save tire money, your gasoline will go farther, you will be more comfortable, confident and safe. There is a Firestone dealer near you.

WHAT MY CHURCH IS DOING FOR THE COMMUNITY”

PRIZE CONTESTS

THESE entries for the $25 prizes offered are not necessarily prize-winners. Many others will appear from now on until December 15, at which time decision will be rendered as to the best ones published. The prizes will be won by the letters that present the most practical working programs for the most effective help to others.

What is your church doing to help the community? What methods in your own experience have brought the best results?

Get into this contest, if not for the prize offered, then for the far higher prize of the good that you may do.

The Friendly Church Caller

OR some years I have felt and seen the great need for the Friendly Church Caller. Last spring I felt the Silent Call to take up this work in our church. My offer was accepted e church, they to furnish and allowance for sundry es. Flowers also should be l for the sick — a single n has often soothed and some broken spirit with its nd silent message card is double. On the front mane as Friendly Caller, s, 'phone number, and name rch. At the bottom is my “One Thing I Do — I E As Far As I Can Reach.” e other side is name and s of the Church and Pastor; ncement of services; and that: “John 11:28. The Master is come, and h for thee.” On the next two pages are several ng verses; and last, this special message: “If y need, spiritual or otherwise — or perhaps ympathy — drop me a card, or call me up, and I ll as soon as possible.”

each round of calls I will arrange a new form d, with different verses, so that a new message lways reach the people.

ce May, though in the country a month, and or weeks, I have made nearly 300 calls. Many, people are hungry and thirsty for a little simple lliness. As Rexford writes in his beautiful lines:

> Many a heart is hungry, starving,
> For a little word of love;
> Speak it then, and as the sunshine
> Gilds the lofty peaks above
> So the joy of those that hear it
> Sends its radiance down life's way,
> And the world is brighter, better,
> For the loving words we say.

friendly calling is so neglected in most rches that when I first began these calls there some who could hardly believe I had not come eg or solicit. I am rapidly gaining their confi- e, however. By the majority I am received teously and pleasantly, and by many most ially.

y aim is as suggested by a verse on my card:

> May I reach
> That purest heaven, be to other souls
> The cup of strength in some great agony,
> Enkindle generous ardor, feed pure love,
> Beget the smiles that have no cruelty
> Be the sweet presence of a good diffused,
> And in diffusion ever more intense;

ommunity Service a Specialty

N the outside in front of our Church we have a bulletin board bearing among the other announcements this sign — mmunity Service a Specialty.

First of all, we are trying to reach all kinds of eople, rich and poor, to get them in touch with rist. We want our Church to stand for that one pose in life — to electrify all hearts.

During the summer we conducted a Bible School the whole community, both young and old. In nection with the study of the Bible we have so- service with games and drills. This is the pro- m that we have adopted: Devotional exercises, call, general singing and the learning of new gs, a story to all told by an efficient story teller, ble Group class work, practical work, manual rk for boys, sewing for girls, drawing and making ins, etc., for the youngsters, games galore for e children, closing with drill work by the pastor some one else who understands the nature of illing.

We have three clubs, one for the girls and two for boys. The club for the boys ranging from 10 to 18 is known as the Knights of Chi Beta — Knights of Christ's Kingdom with degree work in connection with Scout work. The degrees are as follows: The degree of Honor, the degree of Mercy, the degree of Achievements, the degree of Service. Before a boy can take the first degree he must promise to attend some Sunday School regularly, and so on with all the degrees.

In the winter months we organize a Basket Ball league among all the Sunday Schools of this community, increasing interest not only in social work but in attendance at Sunday Schools. In the summer of course we have similar games to suit the weather.

We are planning to erect a building in which the necessary equipment will be installed suitable for all games, social life, and worship for girls, boys, men and women. The purpose of it is to get the whole community together in touch with everybody.

My Church is cementing lives together and making us feel that we are one, as Christ and the Father are one. We are overcrowded with churches. Our purpose is to bring the community together in such a way as to make us feel that we can very well afford to have one Community Church where we all can come together to worship God and thus utilize our money and our time in the best possible way.

My Church is bringing people to the realization that we are working for the interest of all, to bring every soul in touch with God, to be set on fire with the Holy Spirit, that effective service may be rendered for our Master. We want our church to be known as “The Community Church.”

Many letters will be published as fast as received, but decision as to the winners will not be made until December 15.

A Church That Is Doing Nothing

WILL you consent to look over a few descriptive facts stated very briefly? I am a countryman, called farmer, and know that some people have no use for any such until it is time to share the products. The old homestead where I live joins on to a little settlement started before the days of great highways and air travel, so one time had a store and postoffice of its own. I can show you the door where the stage-coach stopped a hundred years ago, but wish the residence were more modern when the old brick oven won't stay latched in my house. Over on the green stand the old church and school house. State care has helped the school, but of the church—What shall I say?

Many of you know that there are thousands of churches all over the land with much such surroundings, that are kept in repair and have a pastor for a couple of hours on Sunday, who has to come from some neighboring church and hold an afternoon service or who lives in town and who because of advanced years or infirmities cannot take up the whole care of a church society; must preach and run for the train.

Now I want to know what to do for a community of this kind?

When a former generation maintained a church every effort was used to do big things. Nearly every family attended service, the children were all taken along, and sat quiet in the (possibly hard-backed) seats; prayer meetings were always held; Sunday schools and young people's societies came along, doing wonders — are doing wonders yet, in some places.

But with growing reports we must remember population also grows. Other fast moves are made in other directions besides the church.

Some churches favor using their auditorium as a lecture hall, a club house, or—but I don't know. It seems to me the church is a distinct place for worship. The tabernacle was not turned into a big picture show when the priests made a stop, even if it was a tedious journey; it was the “house of prayer.”

Still, how shall we get hold of the people outside the church? The few inside do not live enough example to offset and overcome by good influence the waywardness of those outside. We are covered up with profanity and thoughtlessness; many who never hear God's name in church continually listen to its mention outside; many who attend church—even members! —mention Heaven, Hell and Damnation in exclamation every hour of the day. Young men and young women, starting homes of their own, used to work in the church, but are now forgetting it; new life takes their attention and their ldhicren growing up possibly never even get to Sabbath School. All ages and classes among us have lost or are losing interest in the church.

What shall we do to get hold of them?

Our church, it can be said, is doing nothing for the community.

W. A. Churchville, N. Y.

FOR the best, most helpful answer to the above question of “W. A.” the Christian Herald offers an additional prize of $25.00.

How may religious organization and zeal be revived in this and many like communities?

Tell us definitely of methods that have been successful.

Community Helping a Church

A COMMUNITY church is the need of our day. If this awful war has taught anything, it has taught the foregoing thought. The church's work today does not consist in opening its doors on Sundays and nothing more.

In my church we realized this, particularly when boys in the service were stationed near us and had no place to rest when off duty. This situation was met by the organization of the women of the church to help carry on the work of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare Committee. The chairlady of this committee was our minister's wife By the combined efforts of friends, members of neighboring churches and our people, a recreation room was established in the community for the use of the boys. Perhaps we shall never be able to realize the good accomplished by this room, but we have the boys' word that they surely enjoyed it. Our minister became their chaplain and by contact with the church people, the boys made many good friends.

We have also connected with the church a Men's Club, which holds meetings in the Sunday school room. At these meetings they have good live speakers, good music and some refreshments, to make it more interesting.

Another active organization is the Ladies' Aid Society, and another, a Christian Endeavor Society.

Aside from all these activities we have a troop of Girl Scouts and another of Boy Scouts. At certain intervals they hold exhibitions and demonstrations, to which they invite their parents and friends. By these means we are able to keep in touch with the community at large.

Now that we are raising a fund for many improvements, much is being done by the neighborhood to help us. With no encouragement on our part, three carnivals have been directed by our friends and the proceeds given over to us for the fund. In less than two months of this campaign for money we have received three-fourths of the required amount.

Breaking ground for first Methodist hospital in Malaysia, at Tjisaroea, Java.

CHRISTIANIZATION THROUG KINDLINESS

Great String of American Protestant Hospitals for Mohammedans Springing Up Through Malaysia, Old-Time Land of Pirates and Headhunters.

By H. C. REYNOLDS. Inter-Church World Movement Photographs.

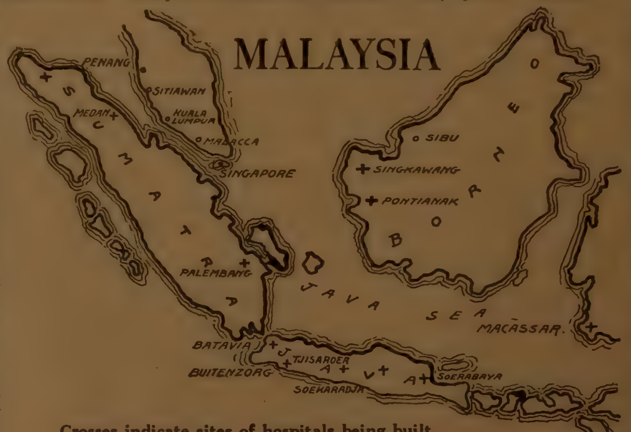
ONE day J. R. Denyes, the Malaysia veteran, and Bishop Oldham of the Methodist Episcopal Church left their carriage at the end of a road in central Java and started through the fields for a little village where a new Christian church was to be dedicated.

Suddenly they were astonished to hear a brass band. It was a native band and its music was not highly artistic, but it played with many mighty and enthusiastic flourishes.

The band hove into view, grotesque to Western eyes, but most serious and important to the Javanese. "There's not a Christian in that band," said a native preacher who accompanied them to Mr. Denyes and the missionary bishop.

Surely enough, they came from a purely Mohammedan village a mile from the site of the new church. The twelve musicians put themselves at the head of the parade given in honor of the church dedication, and later played vigorously far into the night. Moreover these Mohammedan villagers, the visitors learned, had carried the new church piece by piece for a mile on their heads and set it up in its present position. It was an old building which had been purchased for the church because there were no funds to erect a completely new structure.

Now, why had these Mohammedans, members of the proudest and most tenacious of religious sects, put themselves to all this trouble for simple American preachers?



Crosses indicate sites of hospitals being built.

THE story goes back to a great cholera epidemic, when the natives died like flies and when the Christian missionaries for a time put aside their efforts to save souls in their valiant fight to save bodies. The Dutch government supplied the missionaries with castor oil by the five-gallon can and cholera mixture by the quart. For two years Mr. Denyes never went out of his house without a bottle of the cholera mixture in his pocket. Only one person to whom he gave the cholera mixture died, although Mr. Denyes had had no special medical training.

One day he went with another man to a village of "hostile" Mohammedans. He tried to persuade those sick with the cholera to take his medicine. Every one of those who did take it was, by the grace of God, permitted to live, while most of those who refused it died.

This was the village whose inhabitants put up the church. Every member of the homely band was one of a family in which the missionary's medicine had saved a life.

They were Mohammedans then, but today they are Christians. Mr. Denyes was to see the proud day when nine men and women from this vill stood at the altar for baptism, and others follow thick and fast.

Out of this and similar experiences grew the gr string of Methodist hospitals for the Mohamm dans which today is springing up through Malay — in Sumatra, Java, Borneo, and perhaps even Celebes.

The Moslem of Malaysia, once head hunter or a pirate, today is poli and reserved in the presence of a whi missionary. But he is about the har est nut to crack in all the world missionary fields. He is perfectly sati fied that he has the best religion earth, and doesn't want to hear abo Christianity.

THE Chinese can be introduced Christianity through the scho Open a Christian school and the Ch nese tots will soon fill it, even if the parents have to pay for their tuition.

The Javanese says, "What good a books? We can't eat them!" The have a proverb — "The best school a hoe-handle."

But every man or woman is sick least once in a lifetime. Twenty mi lion persons of the thirty-five millio in Java, the densest populated countr on the face of the earth, are out reach of hospitals or physicians. Afte several years of experience with th problem, the American missionarie decided the only way to reach thes people was by ministering to thei bodies, and at the same time tactfully trying to lead them to the true God.

The first hospital, well equipped for that part o the world, was opened at Tjisaroea, in west-centra Java, last January. It was overworked from th first. The natives liked American methods. Ever before the hospital was opened as many as twenty- five natives a day would come to Mr. Denyes' hom for his simple remedies in preference to the Dutc nment hospital, up the street a short distance. vertheless due credit should be given to the h, who have done wonders in bettering the con- of the natives in the last twenty years. The nment gives a good share of the money for the ion and upkeep of the American hospitals, and the first one was completed the Governor- ral exclaimed: "May there soon be a dozen hem!"

HERE is a gentle kindliness about the American ospital treatment which attracts the natives. e they are waiting their turn in the big re- on room an evangelist in their own tongue and mple words tells them of the Great Healer. No mpt at Christian propaganda is made while the ves are being treated for their ailments. The ors tend strictly to their business. But when tient has gone home convalescent a missionary ker visits him, perhaps to change bandages or that the follow-up treatment is being carried and at the same time offers the love of God to man and his relatives, and invites them to send r children to a Christian school.

he hospital is only the center of a whole system merican Christianization. One difficulty in deal- with these Mohammedans is that everything have ever known or seen is Mohammedan. A probably has never gone over ten miles from village where he was born and has never rd of anything that happened over fifteen s from his home. His atmosphere is so entirely hammedan that he imagines the entire world most of it prays toward Mecca.

he missionary now tries to fix it so that the man's ry contact is Christian. Around the Tjisaroea hospital there have been built ten little village schools, and ultimately there will be fifty of these. The man is in the midst of a going Christian concern. Every time he goes to market he has to pass a Christian school and the Christian hospital. If he wants to write a letter he goes to a letter-writer who has learned in a Christian school. If he wants to hear what is going on in the great world beyond his village he has to listen to a man read who has been taught in a Christian school. Everywhere he meets Christianity of a gentle, irresistible sort. The missionary is ready to do anything to help him, from taking a speck out of his eye to advising him with his crops. Eventually he yields.

THE American Methodists have raised money to erect about ten of these hospital systems. The Interchurch Movement of North America will assist in the work. One of the hospitals will be on the Sambas River in western Borneo, south of the place where the American missionaries Lyman and Munson were killed and eaten many years ago. This river was long the headquarters of famous pirates. The Malay pirates about the Straits of Malacca held up even steamships, and were finally put down only about twenty-five years ago.

A second hospital will be at Pontianak, Borneo, where there is a flagpole famous because by walking around it once you cross the Equator twice.

One will be at the northwest end of Sumatra in the province of Acheen, among a fierce people who fought the Dutch for a century and indeed never were conquered by force of arms. Another will be at Medan, a Sumatra town of 40,000, which is growing most rapidly of all the cities in Malaysia. To the north of it are the oil fields, to the west vast sugar and tobacco plantations, and to the south the rubber plantations, on one of which an American corporation employs 100,000 coolies.

Another hospital will be located in Palembang, a city of 75,000 people in South Sumatra and the center of a district of a million people.

Besides the pioneer hospital at Tjisaroea, there will be four others in Java, one in the Bantam Province at the west end, the place where Bantam chickens originated; a second at the town of Soerabaya on the east end, a place of 150,000 people; a third at Boemiayoe, in the mountains of the central part, and a fourth in Middle Java.

It is possible a hospital will be established at Macassar, in southern Celebes, the funny island with the sprawling legs that amused us in childhood days. Northern Celebes is Christian, a remarkable example of successful missionary work on the part of Dutch Protestants.

IT is conceivable that you and I may live some day to see Malaysia, the wonder-land that could supply food to the whole world, all Christian. There have been several changes of religion in Java. The island started out with spirit worship, just as did mankind almost everywhere. About two thousand years ago the Buddhists made it one of their earliest missionary fields and for a time had great success. In central Java there are the ruins of the finest Buddhist temples in the world, really beautiful carved stone buildings.

But Buddhism soon died because it did not supply the faith by which a man might lead a normal life. It was impossible for a whole people to bury itself in contemplation.

The Methodist hospital at Tjisaroea completed. There are nine buildings. In the neighborhood are ten Methodist village schools, and some day there will be fifty.

FORSAKING THE FOUNTAIN

A SERMON By Rev. J. H. JOWETT, D. D.

Text: Jere.. 2:13 "My people have forsaken me, the fountain of living waters, and hewed out broken cisterns that can hold no water."

THERE is an intense solemnity in this great indictment. Such indictments are of frequent occurrence in the prophetic records. The universe is constituted into a vast assize, with God Himself making the impeachment, the heavens and the earth as the assembled jury, and man himself at the bar. "Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth, for the Lord hath spoken."

Again and again is the court constituted in the book of the prophet Jeremiah. "Be astonished, O ye heavens, at this!" "Hear, O earth, behold!" "O earth, earth, earth, here is the word of the Lord!" And yet once again one finds the same tribunal in the book of Micah: "Arise; contend thou before the mountains, let the hills hear Thy voice! Hear ye, O mountains, the Lord's controversy, and ye strong foundations of the earth, for the Lord hath a controversy with this people." And so here in my text the same tribunal confronts us, and at the bar of the universe, man is indicted for a revolt which breaks the music and the harmony of the spheres. The heavens, with all their suggestions of orderly, regular and seasonable movement, are called upon to give judgment concerning the self-willed and disorderly vagaries of man: "Hear, O heavens!" And earth, with all its punctual procession of the seasons, each one duly arriving at its appointed day, and with all the wondrous co-ordination of its powers, is called upon to give its verdict upon the self-aggressive and lawless rebellions of man.

"Hear, O earth!" The house is asked to give judgment against the tenant! Man's condemnation is sought and found in the orbit of the planet, in the flight of the swallow, and in the beauty of the flower of the field. Here is our indictment, that we are eclipsed by our surroundings, that we wear no robes which make the sunrise and the sunset pale, and that there is no melody in our spirits which makes the lark and the nightingale dumb. I say the tenant is eclipsed by the house he dwells in, and in that perverted emphasis is to be found our condemnation.

NOW, what are the terms of this indictment? "My people have committed two evils; they have forsaken me, the fountain." They have cut themselves away from the divine inheritance, they have severed the channels which made them one with the eternal springs. "With thee is the fountain of life!" All life, in all its manifold kinds and colors and degrees, finds its spring in Him. He is the source of all vitality.

But we can go further than this. "There is a fountain opened for sin and uncleanness." When life has lapsed into comparative indifference, and when dirt accumulates like filth in a thin and languid stream, and the channels of life are choked like unflushed and poisonous drains, and the great commanding need is a strong flood of fresh and exuberant vitality, "there is a fountain opened for sin and uncleanness," "there is a river, the streams whereof shall make glad the city of God," and in the full and overwhelming rush of the divine life, the corruption can be removed. Those grim old words we sometimes sing, words whose somewhat crude and staring figure makes many people shrink, have enthroned behind all their apparent coarseness the very secret of buoyancy and eternal youth.

"There is a fountain filled with blood,
  Drawn from Immanuel's veins,
 And sinners plunged beneath that flood,
  Lose all their guilty stains."

You may strip the words, if you like, of their unwelcome literary vesture, you may put it, if you please, in more congenial attire, and yet at its very heart there is this primary significance: that no holiness is attainable without the Lord; there is no salvation apart from the Saviour; there is no life divorced from the fountain. But these people in the prophet's day had turned their backs upon the fountain. Every way was well-trodden except the way that led to the fountain. All the broad highways led elsewhere, and the holy way was now just a little field-track but rarely frequented, along which walked a mere remnant, hungrily waiting for "the consolation of Israel." "They have forsaken me, the fountain!"

NOW, what happens when a people forsake the fountain? The track of their degeneracy is well-marked in these prophetic books, and nowhere more so than in the teachings of the prophet Jeremiah. First of all, when a nation turns its back upon the fountain, and loses sight of the supreme holiness, its perception of all things sacred begins to grow dumb. It is a universal and unavoidable law that we retain any sort of fine perception by continual communion with the highest objects of its kind. Literary taste is preserved by fellowship with the classics. Musical sensitiveness is retained by communion with the musical masters. And so it is with the perception of sanctity; to retain its sensitiveness we must continue to hold fellowship with the venerable and sublime. If we sever our fellowship with God, our sense of reverence will be impaired.

You know how this impoverishment of reverence proceeds. It has been ordained that one day in the week shall receive special solemnity, in order that the remaining six may be hallowed. Let that one day begin to be dethroned, and the six will be despoiled! One hour in the day is held with special sacredness, in order that every moment in the day may be pervaded with its hallowing influence. Let that hour be sacrilegiously invaded, and all the moments will be robbed of consequent glory! Some particular place is regarded with peculiar awe, in order that the broad earth itself may be sanctified. Let that place be neglected or despised, and the mystic light vanishes from the earth! That seems to be the rule of life in the present stage of our inheritance; the exaltation of specialties gives sacredness to the commonalties. If we neglect the one we impoverish the other.

Let a man say: "I will have no special hour of prayer," and all his hours are in danger of becoming common. Let a man say: "No special place shall receive a special sanctity," and there is every danger of the whole earth becoming unhallowed ground. Now, in the life of Israel, when they forsook Lord, the mystic life first vanished from their and the common life speedily shared in the vas poverishment. Let a man forsake the fountain, the general reverence will begin to decay.

LET the disendowment proceed! The ebbin reverence speedily leaves the family unhallo The sanctity of family relationships finds its ex sion in the flower of family worship, and in I family worship was withering away. Having fors the fountain, the family altar was overthrown.

I confess I look with consternation upon the ge overthrow of the family altar. The ruin is wider the waste of the altar. Is anyone prepared to m tain that the reverence of children for their par is a conspicuous feature of modern life? Surely t is a thinning in the relationship; surely there i irreverence in common speech which does not duce to the health and strength of familiar c munion. I am not contending for a shrinking servience, a timid constraint and reserve. I h never personally experienced that dull and restri road. But reverence is not synonymous with sad and reserve; it is rather the essential secret happy and healthy fruit. I would gladly welc back something of that fine, subtle courtesy which children honored their parents in generati past—something of that high-born, fine-fibred g which was so splendidly exemplified in the public private life of Mr. Gladstone. And I do not know such a reverence is to be recovered and kept a and maintained in exquisite sensitiveness, if there no family altar in the home, and if, so far as co-oper life is concerned, the eternal fountain is forsaken.

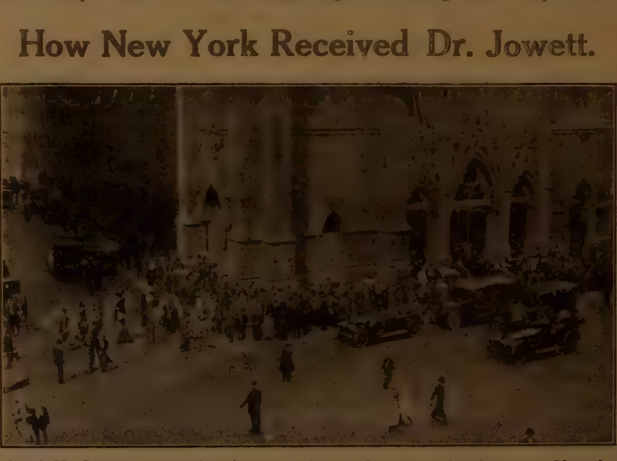
The two-fold decay of reverence and family ship was accompanied by the decay of natio chivalry. When we lose the sense of the sacredn of the family, we speedily lose the sense of the sa ness of man. Look at Israel's national life; its was forsaken, and man was not revered. Oppress abounded, but nobody cared! Injustice was ramp across the borders, but it did not stir their blood.

How different from the responsive, chival spirit of the apostle Paul! "Who is made to stum and I burn not?" But then, that was the burning a man who lived very near to the Lord. And in t country we have burned most for the oppression other people when we ourselves have lived near to God. But when God is forsaken, chivalry is starv to the heart.

GO on with the degeneracy. God forsaken! T decay of reverence! The decay of family w ship! The decay of chivalry! And all this issuing the loss of self-respect. How pathe is the indictment of the Lord whi is found in these words: "Is Isr a servant, is he a home-born slav What art thou? How dost th regard thyself? There is a migh saving influence in an elevated se respect. Thou art crouching alo like a slave; what art thou? H dost thou interpret thy vocation And surely, this too, is the voice the Lord to this own nation toda I have little or no ambition to s our country mighty in arms, if s lose the ardor of a mighty, chiva rous purpose, and has no hallow vocation ringing in her soul to pr serve her self-respect. "I sing arm and the man," cried Virgil; but th arms are a curse if the man is e slaved. Israel, in forsaking God, ha lost herself.

Now, what is to be the path return? See the graciousness of th Lord in these words: "Return, th backsliding Israel, saith the Lord; will not look in anger upon you; f I am merciful, saith the Lord, will not keep anger forever. On acknowledge thine iniquity, th thou hast transgressed against th Lord, the Lord thy God . . . a ye have not obeyed my voice, sa the Lord. . . . If thou wilt return O Israel, saith the Lord, unto m shalt thou return."

How New York Received Dr. Jowett.



Dr. J. H. Jowett, formerly pastor of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York, and whose sermons are such a popular feature of the Christian Herald, returned to New York from London in September to remain a month and preach from his old pulpit. Rarely has the city seen such congregations as gathered to hear him. The photograph shows the crowd in Fifth Avenue unable to get into the church for his first Sunday morning service.

ETTY HOPE — A Serial Story In Seven Parts

By GRACE LIVINGSTON HILL, (MRS. LUTZ)

PART 2, CHAPTER III

LONG before day had really started in the great city Jane Carson was up and at work. She dressed swiftly and silently, then went to her little trunk, and from it selected a simple wardrobe of coarse clean garments. One needed mending and two buttons were off. She sat by the dingy window and strained her eyes in the dawn to make the necessary repairs. She hesitated long over the pasteboard suit-box that she drew from under the bed. It contained a lark blue serge dress for which she had saved a ime, and in which she intended to r at church next Sabbath. She was d between her desire to robe the site little guest in its pristine folds her longing to wear it herself was a sense of justice also which ted into the matter. If that elegant ing dress was to be hers, and all wonderful silk underclothes, which likely she would never allow herself ar, for they would be out of place on or working girl, it was not fair to their donor in old clothes. She ed to give the runaway bride her blue serge. With just a regretful bit sigh she laid it out on the foot of bed, and carefully spread out the papers and folded the white satin ents away out of sight, finishing the le with a thick wrapping of old news- rs from a pile behind the door and it securely. She added a few pins to make the er more sure, and then got out a stub of a pencil abeled it in large letters, "My summer dresses," shoved it far back under the bed. If any seeking tive came he would not be likely to bother with , and he might search her trunk in vain for white slippers and wedding veils.

reakfast was next, and she put on her cloak and ied out for supplies for the larder had been ily depleted the night before to provide for her t. With a tender glance toward the sleeper she ed the key from the lock and placed it in the out- of the door, silently locking her guest within. there would be no danger of any one spiriting away while she was gone, and no danger that the might wake up and depart in her absence.

he stopped a newsboy on his way to the subway bought a paper, thrilling at the thought that e might be something in it about the girl who lay ep in her little hall bedroom.

hile she waited for her bundles she stole a glance er paper, and there on the front page in big letters the heading:

STANHOPE WEDDING
HELD UP AT ALTAR BY UNCONSCIOUS BRIDE

Relatives Seek Runaway Girl Who Is Thought to Be Insane

he caught her breath and rolled the paper in a e wad, stuffing it carelessly into her pocket. She d not read any more of that in public. She stened back to her room.

Betty was still sleeping. Jane stood watching her a full minute with awe in her face. She could not t recognize the difference between herself and this e sweet product of civilization and wealth. With gold curls tossed back like a ripple of sunshine, and pathetic little droop at the corners of her sweet uth, nothing lovelier could be. Jane hurried to window and turned her back on the bed while she used the paper, her rage rising at the theories put rth. It was even hinted that her mother had been ane. Jane turned again and looked hard at the ung sleeper, and the idea crossed her mind that en she might be deceived. Still, she was willing trust her judgment that this girl was entirely e, and anyhow she meant to help her! She stuffed e paper down behind the trunk and began to get eakfast. When it was almost ready she gently woke the sleeper.

Betty started at the light touch on her shoulder and oked wildly around at the strange room and ranger face of the other girl. In the dim light of e evening she had scarcely got to know Jane's face. But in a moment all the happenings of the day before came back, and she sat up excitedly.

"I ought to have got away before it was light," she said gripping her hands together. "I wonder where I could go, Jane?" It was pleasant to call this girl by her first name. Betty felt that she was a tower of strength, and so kind.

"I have this ring," she said, slipping off an exquisite diamond and holding it out. "Do you suppose there would be any way I could get money enough to travel somewhere with this? If I can't I'll have to walk, and I can't get far in a day that way."

Betty was almost light-hearted, and smiling. The night had passed and no one had come. Perhaps after all she was going to get away without being stopped.

Jane's face set grimly.

"I guess there won't be any walking for you. You'll have to travel regular. It wouldn't be safe. And you don't want no rich jewelry along either. Was that [illegible]ur wedding ring?"

How the Story Opens

Elizabeth Stanhope, just out of a fashionable school, walks down the aisle of the church to be married. As the minister begins the service she faints and is carried into the vestry room. A physician from the congregation attends her. When she opens her eyes and asks to be left alone for a moment he orders everyone out of the room. Instantly she opens a long-unused door into an area way and flees. She meets a girl about her own age on the street and asks for help. Her new-found friend takes her to a cheap lodging house, helps her hide the wedding gown and tucks her warmly into bed.

"Oh, no, father gave it to me. It was mother's, but I guess they'd want me to use it now. I haven't anything else."

"Of course," said Jane shortly to hide the emotion in her voice. "Now eat this while I talk," thrusting a plate of buttered toast and a glass of orange marmalade at her, and hastening to pour an inviting cup of coffee.

"Now, I been thinking," she said sitting down on the edge of the bed and eating bits of the piece of toast she had burned—Betty's was toasted beautifully—"I got a plan. I think you better go to Ma. She's got room enough for you for a while, and I want my sister to come over and take a place I can get fer her. If you was there she could leave. Mebbe you could help Ma with the kids. Of course we're poor and you ain't used to common things like we have them, but I guess you ain't got much choice in your porsition. I got a paper this morning. They're huntin' fer you hot foot. They say you was temperary insane, an' 'f I was you I'd keep out o' their way a while. You lay low an' I'll keep my eye out and let you know. I got a little money under the mattrass I can let you have till that ring gets sold. You can leave it with me an' I'll do the best I can if you think you can trust me. Of course I'm a stranger, but then, land! So are you! We just gotta trust each other. And I'm sending you to my mother if you'll go!"

"Oh!" said Betty, springing up and hugging her impulsively, "you're so good! To think I should find somebody just like that right in the street when I needed you so. I almost think God did it!"

"Well, mebbe!" said Jane, in her embarrassment turning to hang up a skirt that had fallen from its hook. "That's what they say sometimes in Chrishun Deavor meetin'. Ever go to Chrishun Deavor? Better go when you get out home. They have awful good socials an' ice cream, and you'll meet some real nice folks. We've got a peach of a minister, and his wife is perfec'ly dandy. I tell you I missed 'em when I came to the city! They was always doing something nice fer the young folks."

"How interesting!" said Betty, wondering if she might really be going to live like other girls. Then the shadow of her danger fell over her once more, and her cheek paled.

"If I can only get there safely" she shuddered, "Oh, Jane! You can't understand what it would be to have to go back!"

"Well, you're not going back. You're going to Tinsdale, and nobody's going to find you ever, unless you want them to! See? Now, listen! We haven't any time to waste. You oughtta get off on the ten o'clock train. I put out some clothes there for yeh. They ain't like yours, but it won't do fer you to go dressed like a millionairess. Folks out to Tinsdale would suspect yeh right off the bat. You gotta go plain like me, and it's this way: You're a friend I picked up in the city whose mother is dead and you need country air a while, See? So I sent you home to stay with Ma till you got strong again. I'm wirin' Ma. She'll understand. She always does. I kinda run Ma anyhow. She thinks the sun rises an' sets in me, so she'll do just what I say."

"I'm afraid I oughtn't to intrude," said Betty soberly, taking up the coarse, elaborately trimmed lingerie with a curious look, and trying not to seem to notice that it was different from any she had ever worn before.

"Say! Looka here!" said Jane Carson, facing round from her coffee cup on the washstand. "I'm sorry to criticize, but if you could just talk a little slang or something. Folks 'll never think you belong to me. 'Intrude!' Now, that sounds stuck up! You oughtta say 'be in the way,' or something natural like that. See?"

"I'm afraid I don't," said Betty dubiously, "but I'll try."

"You're all right, kid," said Jane with compunction in her voice. "Just let yourself down a little like I do, and remember you don't wear silk onderclothes now. I'm afraid those stockings won't feel very good after yours, but you gotta be careful. An' 'f I was you I'd cut my hair off, I really would. It's an awful pity, it's so pretty, but it'll grow again. How old are you?"

"Almost twenty-one," said Betty thoughtfully. "Just three months more and I'll be twenty-one."

"H'm! Of age!" said Jane with a sharp significant look at her, as if a new thought had occurred. "Well, you don't look it! You could easy pass for fifteen, especially if you had your hair bobbed. I can do it for you if you say so."

"All right," said Betty promptly without a qualm. "I always wanted it short. It's an awful nuisance to comb."

"That's the talk!" said Jane. "Say 'awful' a lot, and you'll kinda get into the hang of it. It sounds more—well, natural, you know; not like society talk. Here, sit down and I'll do it quick before you get cold feet. I sure do hate to drop them curls, but I guess it's best."

The scissors snipped, snipped, and the lovely strands of bright hair fell on the paper Jane had spread for them. Betty sat cropped like a sweet young boy. Jane stood back and surveyed the effect through her lashes approvingly. She knew the exact angle at which the hair should splash out on the cheek to be stylish. She had often contemplated cutting her own, only that her mother had begged her not to, and she realized that her hair was straight as a die and would never submit to being tortured into that alluring wave over the ear and out toward the cheekbone. But this sweet young thing was a darling! She felt that the daring deed had been a success.

"I got a bottle of stuff to make your hair dark," she remarked. "I guess we better put it on. That hair of yours is kinda conspicuous, you know, even when its cut off. It won't do you any harm. It washes off soon." And she dashed something on the yellow hair. Betty sat with closed eyes and submitted. Then her mentor burnt a cork and put a touch to the eyebrows that made a different Betty out of her. A soft smudge of dark under her eyes and a touch of talcum powder gave her a sickly complexion and when Betty stood up and looked in the glass she did not know herself. Jane finished the toilet by a smart though somewhat shabby black hat pulled well down over Betty's eyes, and a pair of gray cotton gloves, somewhat worn at the finger. The high-laced boots she put upon the girl's feet were two sizes too large, and wobbled frightfully, but they did well enough, and there seemed nothing more to be desired.

"Now," said Jane as she pinned on her own hat, "you've gotta have a name to go by. I guess you better be Betty Hope. It kinda belongs to yeh, and yet nobody'd reconize it. You don't need to tell Ma anything you don't want to, and you can tell her I'll write a letter tonight all about it. Now come on! We gotta go on the trolley a piece. I don't see havin' you leave from the General Station. We'll go up to the Junction and get the train there."

With an odd feeling that she was bidding good-by to herself forever and was about to become somebody else, Betty gave one more glance at the slim boylike creature in the little mirror over the washstand and followed Jane out of the room, shuffling along in the big high-heeled boots, quite unlike the Betty that she was.

CHAPTER IV

WARREN REYBURN laid down his pen and shoved back his office chair impatiently, stretching out his long muscular limbs nervously and rubbing his hands over his eyes as if to clear them from annoying visions.

James Ryan, his office boy and stenographer, watched him furtively from one corner of his eye, while his fingers whirled the typewriter on through the letter he was copying. James wanted to take his girl to the movies that evening and he hadn't had a chance to see her the day before. He was wondering if Mr. Reyburn would go out in time for him to call her up at her noon hour. He was a very temperamental stenographer and understood the

THE PUBLISHER AND HIS FRIENDS

WELL! We've been having a right stormy time, these three or four weeks past. What with the strikes and the generally upset condition of things, it has been enough to keep us stepping around lively. As for the printers' strike, which has seriously hampered the activities of some 150 periodical publications, religious and otherwise, including the Christian Herald, we are now hopeful that the trouble may soon be over. The worst feature, as far as we are concerned, has been the interference with regular deliveries; we will be glad to make amends by automatically advancing expiration dates to cover the shortage.

All of my publisher friends are now looking at the situation with more confidence, believing that it is approaching a basis of settlement which will be acceptable to both sides. We can then say: "All's well that ends well."

"It's been a big, old-time storm, the biggest, in fact, the publishing trade ever experienced," remarked an old friend with whom I was discussing the situation, "but your staunch, old Gospel frigate, the Christian Herald, is sound and sea-worthy, and fit to weather any gale. This thing brings to my mind an old experience. Many years ago, I was crossing the Atlantic westward bound, when we struck a tremendous storm and were blown out of our course considerably and found ourselves in the northern part of the Bay of Biscay. For three days and nights the gale lasted and it looked serious enough at times; but we pulled through all right, and came to the home port a few days later than usual, safe and sound, and the old engines pulling as though they knew they had to make up for lost time. And that's just what the publishing trade must do now. It must get back to a sound basis, which it will do just as soon as these agitations die away, and there are pretty sure signs that they have passed the crisis. We must be good to our reader-friends who have been the innocent sufferers, and I don't doubt that they will extend every indulgence to us, since the trouble was not of our seeking." I need hardly say that I cordially agree with him.

I FEEL right now that we owe a vote of hearty thanks to our Family Circle for their fine attitude during the strike. They have been patient and forbearing, realizing the difficulties with which we were contending. Many of them have written most encouraging letters, showing that their hearts are with the old "Gospel frigate," which has done so much good service in many fields in the past. One lady's letter, which now lies before me, says: "I have received so much good from the Christian Herald's pages that it has made me feel that I was one of the Family. My dear, aged mother is still able to read the paper, and I love to have it come."

Here is a very charming letter from a mother in Oklahoma: "I am sending two subscriptions for the Christian Herald each for a year. One is a renewal only in the sense that our first-born goes into his 'honeymoon house,' and we want the Christian Herald to be read by the young couple there — a little gift from us, you see — from mother. We have always had it come to our home for twenty-five years, and we all love it and would keep it in our home if it cost twice the price you must now ask. And we want the Bible Course, too, and my neighbor, a new subscriber, I have also persuaded to take both the paper and the Bible Course."

"Yes," writes a reader in Athens, Pa., who sends a two-year subscription: "I missed the Herald, but I knew the conditions and didn't blame the staff. I would not know how to get along without it, I get such help from it." A friend in Mt. Kisco, N. Y., sends this line of encouragement: "As one of thousands who are in full accord with your policy and in sincere sympathy with the annoyances and anxiety involved, I hasten to assure you of our complete confidence and loyalty. The weekly visits of the Christian Herald, lo, these many years, are like sunbeams shedding light and inspiration in our home. Its covers are gems of artistic excellence. God speed you in His service!"

A Delaware friend, in sending his subscription covering two years, writes: "I greatly appreciate what you have to contend with. We are all up against it, but I will be patient. I always keep the Her my Sunday reading. It is just fine!"

I might easily multiply these by hundreds, won't take your time. I have received mor enough of assurances like these to give me ever fidence that our friends understand and that th standing by us loyally and nobly.

Remember, all subscription periods will be matically extended to make up for omitted Subscribers will lose nothing in the end.

AND I am glad also to take this opportun thank those friends of our Family Circ their prompt and gratifying responses to my r for early renewals, which are now coming in i siderable volume. It is very important that should come early this season above all other it would help our Subscription Department than I can tell you in keeping the work straigh up to the moment. Usually they come in later flood, which entails a tremendous effort to kee records up to date and to avoid delays in tran sion, incident to changes of address, etc. Every you may make to help us out by sending in you scription early, will be a substantial aid and ciated accordingly.

You may remember the saying of Archi "Give me a fulcrum on which to rest, and move the earth." Well, we won't indulge any hope, in the physical sense, at least. The Chri Herald within the radius of its own activitie helped to move the world God-ward and ho keep on doing this, with the co-operation of its ers all over the land. This year, there is bigger than at any previous time in its existence for crum to apply to the obstacles in the way to inc national spiritual activities. This, dear friends, can supply, and we feel confident that you will only do so gladly, but that in the coming year will never have occasion to regret it.

Gratefully your friend,

THE NATION'S WELFARE FIRST

IN dealing with the critical situation created by the threatened strike of the 600,000 bituminous coal miners, President Wilson has been mindful of the course followed by President Roosevelt in 1902, when confronted by an impending strike of anthracite coal workers. Mr. Roosevelt was sick in Washington at the time as the result of an injury received in an accident. He dealt with the proposed strike with characteristic firmness. In his communication to the Union officers, he pronounced any step intolerable which threatened the life and comfort of the people, involving serious interference with the business of the entire country, and inflicting the paralyzing blight of a fuel famine upon the whole community. He had tried in vain to settle it by moral suasion, and he now warned the strike leaders that the entire machinery of the Federal government would be employed, if necessary, to stop it. Extreme measures, however, were not needed. The decision to strike was promptly reconsidered. The President appointed a Commission which settled matters, coal production was resumed and a fuel famine averted. Roosevelt's view was that the rights of the whole people were entitled to paramount consideration, and that any policy or course of action in conflict with their rights must necessarily give way.

President Wilson, in the present case, has even stronger reasons for the course he has adopted in dealing with the threatened nation-wide anthracite coal strike. His intimation of Federal intervention, he justifies on three grounds: 1. The repudiation by the Miners' Union of the agreement as to wages which they had made with the sanction of the U. S. Fuel Administration, to continue while the country was in a state of war, "but not later than April 1, 1920." 2. The general industrial disturbance which would inevitably be precipitated by a strike at the present time. 3. The fact that this country is still in a "state of war," peace not having yet been formally declared. He points out also that under such conditions, a strike at this time must be regarded as "a fundamental attack, wrong legally and morally, on the rights of society and the welfare of the country." He emphasizes the duty of the administration to be to protect the nation's interests in such an emergency, and he announces his readiness to appoint a tribunal to investigate the questions at issue and to aid in reaching a proper adjustment of the difficulties.

It is hardly necessary to add that this attitude is conservative in the sense that, without questioning the right to strike, it points out the inevitable results that must follow a strike under such conditions as now exist. Moreover, in this attitude he has received assurances of the full support of the people of the various states through the governors, who have expressed their entire approval of his communication to the Miners' Union.

POWER OF LATENT FORCES

SCIENTISTS are just now busy discussing a remarkable theory propounded by that eminent British investigator, Sir Oliver Lodge. In a recent address in Birmingham, he stated that his researches have led him to the conclusion that there is a secret force imprisoned in matter which, if liberated, is capable of developing energy that would revolutionize dynamics. No one, however, has yet found a way to utilize it. A comparatively insignificant piece of coal, he declares, contains enough of this amazing energy to furnish power sufficient to keep thousands of machines in full operation for months, to light the cities of a state, heat the dwellings and render virtually all the service that is now done by gas, electricity and steam combined. Its application, he assures us, would revolutionize the industrial activities of the globe. But while it is capable of becoming man's most efficient servant, man today is not fit to be trusted to venture upon the experiment. We have made many valuable discoveries, but we are still in the infant class as students in nature's vast laboratory. So he warns us that there is a danger that in some sudden and unforeseen manner the release of this secret force might prove tyrannical and destructive, even overwhelming and consuming life. Therefore he concludes that it is better on the whole that it should remain unreleased, lest its potentiality bring disaster to the race.

This scientist's discovery is not altogether new. Molecular motion and the wonderful effect of chemical combinations upon matter have been discussed by other able writers, though never in such startling terms. Professor Richards of Harvard has devoted many years to the study of atoms and their energy and the mysterious properties of matter generally. He, too, states that while there are boundless possibilities of amazing discoveries, no way of using these great forces is yet known.

As in the natural, so in the spiritual world, there are potential forces which when released develop resistless power. Faith in God, when it comes into the heart of a man, transforms not only his whole life, but all of his surroundings. It makes him equal to every emergency and superior to human trials and discouragements; it lifts him above the sordid th of life into a new atmosphere, and to lofty h which give him wider vision and a nobler conce of God's will and purpose for the world. Having we can remove mountains of difficulty. It will to us the most treasured secrets of nature. In a w we are assured that "all things are possible" to who have faith in God.

Today, after passing through the darkest pe in its history, the world needs this faith. It has fered inexpressible evils because of sin and unf In these times God is placing the race on trial. one thing needful is faith in him, for he has prom that none who come to him with faith in their he will be denied or rejected. With the exercise of the new and wonderful life begins, which is endles its development. "Faith," wrote Tolstoy, "is force of life." It is a higher faculty than reason is the power which, roused to activity, can set a th sand forces in motion. It builds for us a bri between the two worlds.

When men return to God and revive their fa the path of duty will become plain, and the attit of each of us toward our fellow man will be one justice and kindness.

THE BIBLE COURSE GROWS

WE ARE glad that our readers are beginning take a lively interest in the Course of Bi Study and that many are sending in their names enrolment on the student list. This is as it sho be; yet instead of hundreds, we could wish that might be thousands who are preparing to take vantage of this notable opportunity. It is an ent prise conceived solely for the purpose of stimulati the study of God's Word, and it involves so lit expense to the student that the individual outlay purely nominal from first to last. Besides, the Moo Bible Institute has put in charge of the Course best trained and experienced teachers—men w qualified to deal with a large student body and bring quite as good and probably more satisfacto results out of their efforts than could be had from smaller number. A big class is no new experiment wi these teachers, who have been directing the work classes all over the country with most gratifying resul

President Wilson, who is himself an ardent adv cate of Bible study, wrote for the fly-leaf of the Bibl which were distributed to our men in the service the words: "A man has deprived himself of the best the is in the world who has deprived himself of intima knowledge of the Bible."

"THE motor truck dealer was right when he advised me to use pneumatics on my dairy farm truck. The Goodyear Cord Pneumatics are good snowshoes for the truck. They plow right through snow and mud. I am never delayed on account of slippery going. The Goodyear Pneumatics are right in every respect for my dairy farm work, winter and summer, and that means they are tough."—Mr. Paul J. Grube, Mountain View Dairy Farm, Plattsburg, New York

ONCOMING winter, with its snow and ice, will bring no thought of frequently delayed milk deliveries to the owner of Mountain View Dairy Farm, near Plattsburg, New York.

When the photograph above was taken last January, Mr. Grube's motor truck on Goodyear Cord Pneumatic Truck Tires was covering its 25-mile route daily just as it had done during the preceding summer.

Under similar conditions, Mr. Grube had known solid tires to spin and get stuck, and on one occasion he had used his Goodyear-Cord-equipped truck to pull a solid-tired truck out of a miry place.

Further, the big Goodyear Cords were saving two hours in the morning, formerly spent in getting the horses ready; they were saving much time in collecting milk from neighboring dairymen and, then, in delivering it; and they were saving considerable money under the cost of keeping horses.

Now more evidence of the economy of the Goodyear Cords is afforded in their record of 22,000 miles to date, with all four tires still on original air and still rugged looking.

This latter fact supplies a very important reason why the general city and rural adoption of Goodyear Cord Pneumatic Truck Tires has proved so uniformly successful.

The Joy of the Christian Life

SUNDAY. John, 15:11. "These things have I spoken unto you, that My joy might remain in you; and that your joy might be full." Who would not say that this joy is sorely lacking in our modern religious life? We may have a certain triumph of will. We may loyally hold to the sterner virtues. We may be cultivating a keener social conscience. But I think we lack the apostles' exhilarancy, their power of nimble rebound, their song, their praise, their joy. Our religious life is in many ways a good, solid, roomy structure, but somehow or other we often forget the lights. The solidity is there but it is not radiant. The strength is there, but it is not winsome. We may be loyal to our God, but we are not delighted in Him. The virtues may be there but they are not lit up. Truth is there but it is not lit up. Patience is there but it is not lit up. I must repeat my figure, we have erected our building, but we have forgotten the lights. Or shall I say we have too often built a solid crypt, and we have not carried it forward to the belfry; and when we have no joyful hallelujahs, we lack the merry bells which might lead many a wanderer home.

Let us glance at one or two characteristics of the joy which is our appointed inheritance in the Lord. And, first of all, it is a joy of very startling independencies. It is perfectly amazing what this joy can do without, and yet keep on burning. It can do without material treasure. It can do without friendly circumstances. We find it shining in the association of persecution and pain. "The Disciples were filled with joy and with the Holy Ghost." "And they departed from the Council, rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer for Christ." This is the joy of the Lord which is strength.

What is its secret? Here is the secret:— "Abide in me and My joy shall abide in you." It is the joy of a deeply intimate communion with Christ. The deeper intimacy gives a larger freedom, and it is the larger freedom that gives birth to joy and song. And how do we get this deeper communion? How do we pass into the inner rooms of the love of our Lord? We do it just by giving Him entry into the inner rooms in our own souls. We get no deeper into Christ than we allow Him to get into us. Indeed what we really mean by getting into Christ is permitting Him to get into us. It is not our first concern to find room in Christ; it is really our concern to let Him have more room in us. Our intimacy with Christ is just in proportion to the surrender of ourselves to Him. If I would deepen my intimacy with Christ, the way to do it is to open another room. That is the primary secret; we open the doors and the Lord enters in. And the second secret of spiritual joy is this:—the joy wells up within us in ever-deepening copiousness as we co-operate with our Lord in the service of His Kingdom. "Rejoice with Me, for I have found my sheep which was lost."

Good and Bad Associations

MONDAY. Acts 4:23. "They went to their own company." What, is friendship but social magnetism? The positive and negative poles of our being work automatically. We are required to love all sorts of people but it is impossible to like them all. Loving and liking are totally different things. The former, as set forth in "the first commandment and the second which is like unto it," is distinctly a moral act; but our likes and dislikes are as natural and perhaps as unaccountable as our relish or disrelish for ripe olives.

We may find it necessary to associate with people whom we dislike; but we get our moral complexion only from our voluntary affiliations. Wherefore "blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful"; because, by the inevitable process of communal infection, he becomes such as they are.

In our industrial life men of capital form combines and syndicates, which are recognized as lawful when they involve no restraint of trade. In like manner workmen organize guilds and unions, which are unassailable so long as they do not violate the fundamental principles of the square deal. Our Secretary of Labor has recently expressed the opinion that the controversies between labor and capital will never be satisfactorily settled; and that it would probably be a misfortune if they were, because the welfare of both classes depends on a continuance of mutual stimulation.

The Triumph Over The Grave

TUESDAY. 1 Cor. 15:14. "If Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain and your faith is also vain." Guy Thorne, in his book, "When It Was Dark," portrays the awful condition the world would be in if it could be proven that Jesus did not rise from the dead. He pictures Joseph of Arimathea as having written upon a marble slab the following words, "I have borne the body of Jesus from the sepulchre to my own private tomb where He now lies." A distinguished archaeologist is hired to testify to the fact of finding this slab among the excavations in Joseph's garden. When the awful fraud is published to the world, business becomes paralyzed, churches closed, missionaries called home; the whole world is thrown into consternation as if shaken by the earthquake of doom.

What a loss in noble, heroic Christian endeavor if we had no pattern of the Christ to follow. Then there would have been no Florence Nightingale, no Frances E. Willard, no Grace H. Dodge, no Helen Gould Shepard to bless the world with their ministries. But now is Christ risen from the dead! Let all the world proclaim "He is alive forever more." The dark tomb is illumined with rays from the Star of Bethlehem, yea, more, the rising sun of eternal glory floods the grave with its beauty and gives living hope to dying men!

All Want the Real Christ

WEDNESDAY. John, 12:32. "I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men." A Japanese guide dwelling on the side of Fujiyama, said he had read carefully the life of Christ, and saw that every one would try to be like Him. It seems to be true that the heathen would believe in Christ, if they understood Him. All the unbelievers in Christian lands, if not utterly bad, would become followers of Jesus, if they saw Him as He is. To the unbeliever, "He hath no comeliness that we should desire Him," because the unbeliever has a distorted or false view of Him. Hence the follower of our Lord should put most emphasis upon his duty to live and to teach the real Christ.

It is one of the wonders of the Gospel that it has survived its teachers and followers. That Japanese guide was sincerely desirous of being a real Christian; but the great variety of Sects and Exponents, confused him to distraction. Among the travelers who employed him were men and women from Christian lands, who were called Christians, and who widely differed in their idea of Christ. But the most startling thing to him was, to see and to hear the cursing Christian sailors, and to hear of the vile deeds of Christian merchantmen and Christian government officials. He doubted if he had ever seen a Christian who believed in the beautiful and heavenly life of the Christ, as He is presented to the imagination in the G He earnestly declared that all of the hum would follow the Christ, if they believed it w sible to do so and were shown the way. He will draw all men unto Him, when He is so lifted they will see Him as He is.

NATIVE CHINESE HELP ORPHANAGE WORK

REV. J. E. SHOEMAKER of the American Presbyterian Mission at Yuyao, China, writes: "You will be glad to know that our Chinese friends have rallied to the support of our orphanage to such an extent that while we receive through the Christian Herald the support for fifteen boys, we actually have in the institution, or about to be received into it, over seventy lads. Thus you see that your readers began a good work in showing the Chinese how to start an orphanage, and take care of boys who might otherwise have starved or become beggars and vagabonds."

My Portion Forever

THURSDAY. Ps. 73:26. "My flesh and my faileth! but God is the strength of my heart a portion forever." "God in the heart" was the m John Wesley preached and Charles Wesley san 1788, at the age of eighty-one, Charles Wesle greatest psalmist since David, lay dying. His turned to these words, and in view of them he di the well known lines,

"In age and feebleness extreme
What shall a sinful worm redeem?
Jesus, my only hope Thou art,
Strength of my failing flesh and heart!"

Three years later John Wesley lay dying, and h tendants heard him repeating sentences fron Psalms. In the hour when his heart and flesh f God was the strength of his heart and his portio ever.

Is this the message of an old man, dying? Mu the Psalm from which it is taken indicates tha writer is by no means done with life. He is i thick of the fight, deep in trouble. There has b conflict. The world looks dark to him — until he to the sanctuary to worship. There he has a He is still tired, still tried, but he lifts up his because God comes into his vision. This, as D Hankey says, is religion — to take God into our of view.

"The strength of my life" is really "the rock o life." Rocks play a great part in the life of Pale They build their houses of it and on it. There are classes of people in the world, lifters and leaners. gularly, the strong are not always those whose fle strongest. What is the strength of our lives? what we care most about. If we care most about then He is the rock, the strength of our lives. because He is the strength of our lives that He comes our portion forever. If God is our rock, will be our portion forever.

A Faithless Generation

FRIDAY. Luke, 18:8. "Shall the son of Man faith on the earth?" Nay, men's hearts will be ing them for fear. They will be asking "Whe your God?" And the fool will be saying in his h "There is no God." The Church itself will pass u a dark cloud of spiritual declension. "The Son of p dition shall oppose himself to all that is called Go The hope of the second coming shall vanish into t air. "In the last days," says Peter, "scoffers s arise, walking after their own desires and sa 'Where is the promise of his appearing? For since fathers fell asleep all things continue as they were fr the foundation of the world.'"

The predominant error of our time is materiali that is to say, a displacement of God by reliance on calm operation of natural law. For this condition wide-spread acceptance of godless evolution is larg responsible. It is a singular fact that its advoc use the very words which the Scriptures ascribe scoffers of the last days: "All things continue as th were since the beginning of creation," they say; "th is no need of miraculous intervention or supernatu action. We live under the reign of law. No sud catastrophe need be apprehended. On the contra as to the succession of physical phenomena, we m count on a future of assured length. As it was in t beginning, so it is now and ever shall be."

Seeking for Christ

SATURDAY. Mark, 16:7. "Go your way and t the disciples and Peter that He goeth before you i Galilee." Oftentimes we look for Jesus in the wro place. He is risen: He goeth before you in the acti ties of life. The place where He lay in the sepulch is but a memory. You must come where He is brin ing dead souls to life. We should go where there sorrow, toil, trial and human need; you will find Hi there; on battlefields, among the wounded; He a His angels are there. Do not seek Him so much past experiences, but in present duties. Do not ling about the tomb of your losses and failures. He among the crowds of struggling people. The Ho Bible is only the footprints of His step; here you m commune with Him, but still better, you can accom pany Him personally, all the way.

The resurrection is the receipt of the soul as an ev dence that the debt was paid on Calvary. We may b lieve that Jesus paid it all when He cried, "It is fi ished!" but the receipt is necessary to show mankin The risen Christ is the evidence that the debt of si is paid.

The Ministry Pays.

Out of an experience of 55 years, this minister discusses the remuneration to be expected by the man who enters the church.

ES the ministry pay? If so, how?

A young, embarrassed, ss man said to me one day: sh I was a minister. He gets lary regularly and don't have rry about its coming in season r his bills."

pposing I change places with I said, "possibly we have made a mistake in the choice life-work."

; he could see it was too late race our steps. I may have d a good mechanic to make a minister. He may have d a good minister to make a business man. But I have convinced that God was able a poor tool to do some things im.

ctically, as I see it, it has paid a minister. As some have n me, they may have thought I have done much better for lf and others as a mechanic. genius along that line has saved many a penny, and given my y many a little convenience. ke my young friend, I have not ied. I had a better Paymaster many thought. I did not expect the dollars of Him directly to my bills, but He helped me to reful not to make any that my cted salary would not meet. denial, I found, was the hard to success of many of my parishioners. Why should not I travel well as they? I was economical did not resort to any side effort ay my bills.

entered the ministry in 1862 on lary of $500 and paid rent. I been able to live and have just many of the comforts of life as majority of my parishioners. I er was promised a salary of more nine hundred dollars, and I d to get all that. I was married two months after I was or-ned. I bought my own tools as poor mechanic would, and fif- months after I was settled I ght a horse and carriage to help in my parish work. Could I e had a better library, I could e done better work. I have en my four living children a better education than most in my par-had. My only son is a physi-n and all four hold useful posi-is in their community.

Ought a minister to expect better things than his parishioners? I w I did financially as well as st of mine. And now at 83 I ve all the comforts of life I need I trust I will to the end.

So much for just the staying here, for an anchorage in life; that, for ich most people struggle and are ntented to get. But what small y for one to live for. It's a small d limited ambition to be simply towaway to make the voyage of e. To help as a pilot will bring ners to a safe harbor. Its a sad ng when the poet sings:

is gone away,
Nor left a trace
In any place.
If I could only find
Its footfalls in some mind,
Some spirit nature stirred
By deed of mine or word,
I should not stand at shadowy eve,
And for my days so grieve and grieve."

Better sing
"He whom thou servest, slights
Not even His weakest one;
No deed, though poor, shall be forgot,
However feebly done.
The prayer, the wish, the thought,
The faintly spoken word,
The plan that seemed to come to naught,
Each has its own reward."

Nothing pays so well as service. The testimonial assurance of parishioners that I have helped them start well in life has paid compound interest. Bear a few examples. The young and efficient pastor in Connecticut converted at a time of revival interest in my church writes, "I want you to remember that you have an investment here."

Another, now a proficient city missionary, "I remember your sermon fifty years ago when I was but seven years old; how you weighed the righteous and the unrighteous in the balance and found the latter 'wanting'." At that early age he was put in the balance and was not found wanting.

Thoughts presented to another fifty years ago at the age of seven, she says, "were maxims driven into my sub-conscious mind which never forgets." "The stimulus of your praise has been like a guiding star."

Could one have better investment than in the lives of his fellows which he has helped to mould for usefulness and happiness.

If any young man is hesitating in the choice of a lifework that pays, let him take my testimony after forty-five years of experience that the ministry in the church of our Lord Jesus Christ pays well.

I was asked whether if I could live my life over again I would choose the ministry. You can guess my answer.

I feel very sure that I have had more joyful satisfaction out of my life than many of my schoolmates who entered business or some industrial occupation. And if length of life is worth while insurance, companies tell us we live longer. Perhaps the Master wants us longer than others who are not in his special work. I have been on the surgeon's table three times, yet I have outlived nearly all of a family of ten. I am No. 4 and myself and the one younger only survive. I have no doubt that I have had better opportunity to take care of my health since my time was more fully at my own disposal. Their life work had fixed hours over which they had little control.

The Ministry pays. Try it, young man!

T took Harvey Habig a whole year to build this miniature tomobile from parts of an old torcycle, some from an old cycle and still other parts which had to make himself. But when was finished, it was no disappoint-ent for it develops over 40 miles hour. Harry says that after he bstitutes a chain drive for the esent belt drive, his midget racer ll travel 70 miles an hour.

The unique little racer has a six-ot wheel base. It is equipped with two-cylinder motor taken from a otorcycle and contains a double ignition system. The springs were tensioned and bent by the boy himself. The miniature speedster weighs less than 1,000 pounds and travels 42 miles on a measured gallon of gasoline.

Harry is only 15 years of age and is attending the first year class at the Ohio Mechanics Institute. He has built two model submarine-chasers and several airplanes which were on exhibition at the institute. He also has constructed a wireless outfit with a radius of 300 miles which is able to receive messages passing between vessels plying on the Great Lakes.

On bended knees
the black slaves served
COFFEE

In this dazzling fashion, coffee was served in the court of Louis XIV:—

"In gorgeous costumes, on bended knees, black slaves presented coffee in tiny cups of egg-shell porcelain, with saucers of gold and silver and embroidered silk napkins, to the grand dames of the period".

Coffee is not now in any sense a luxury. It is the most democratic of drinks. It is found everywhere, enjoyed by everybody,—rich and poor. Coffee costs less than a penny a cup.

The charm of coffee,—who will deny its zest, its savor, its gusto? Coffee has subjugated nearly every nation,—edged its way around the habitable globe. Simply because it most fully satisfies the complex craving for food and drink.

In America, coffee as a beverage, is safely and firmly established in public favor. It is now used more extensively here than in any country of the world. The annual consumption is more than one billion pounds! It is on the menu of the millions. Coffee is part of our national life—as staple as bread and butter—the "Universal Beverage."

Coffee has earned this important place by the sheer might of merit,—by reason of an amazingly pleasing appeal to the taste,—by the force of its genuine wholesome goodness. It tastes good. It smells good. And by the verdict of the masses expressed in daily life—it is good.

Coffee is cheering, soothing, comforting, sustaining and healthful. Ask the soldier in the trench. Ask the sailor at sea. Ask the laborer in his cottage. Ask the millionaire in his mansion.

Coffee is "man's drink." A sturdy, hearty, flavory, savory drink. A real chummy, clubby drink. It greets the busy man at breakfast. It meets him at the conference luncheon. It regales him at dinner. And again at his club banquet.

Where prohibition prevails,—coffee becomes even more popular. We see the revival of the good old-fashioned coffee house, where men may meet, and mingle in honest, manly, friendly spirit,—where they may toast each other in a "bumper" of their favorite brand of coffee.

Coffee—the Universal drink

THE CLARK GRAVE VAULT

No more beautiful tribute can possibly be paid to our dead than care that their last resting-place shall be secure from water, ghouls and other disturbing elements.

The least and the last we can do for them is to see that they are properly and safely interred. This cannot be accomplished without the use of an air-and water-tight vault. Vaults of brick, stone or cement are too porous to furnish permanent protection. Even steel vaults which depend for sealing upon gaskets of rubber or soft metal, are not positively safe.

The Clark Grave Vault, made from massive plates of Keystone copper-bearing (rust-proof) steel, electrically welded into an air-tight "bell," tested to 5000 lbs. hydraulic pressure, is guaranteed to withstand all conditions for 50 years.

Because of these superiorities of material and construction, the Clark Grave Vault is known to undertakers throughout the country as the QUALITY VAULT—backed by 20 years of satisfaction-giving.

Numberless tests prove that the Clark Grave Vault never fails, even under the most trying conditions. Positive proof in booklet sent on request. Address Dept. A-11

A GREAT CONFESSION

International Sunday School Lesson for November 9

Matthew 16: 13-24

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

THE incidents of this lesson took place after Peter had accompanied Jesus for a long time, and had come to know him intimately from contact with him in all sorts of situations and under many trying circumstances. It is only thus that one person can come to estimate fully the character and purposes of another. And now Jesus sees clearly that the rising tide of opposition, fomented by the Pharisees and priests, will at last accomplish his death. So he takes his disciples apart to a distant region, where there is less of the turmoil and clamor of the crowd, and also freedom from the caviling of his opponents. Here, according to his custom, he prepared them for the future by a more searching series of questions and a new teaching for their special guidance.

Jesus asked his disciples what the people were saying about him. It is evident that he had made a very remarkable impression, for the least they thought of him was that he was one of the old Hebrew prophets come back again! Many compared him with the first great prophetic teacher Elijah and others with Jeremiah, that powerful voice of God who was condemned and unheeded by the authorities in Jerusalem in a former time of urgent need. Still others spoke of him as John the Baptist risen from the dead and continuing his work. But none of these great testimonies to the impression he had produced was enough for the mighty transformation which he had set himself to work in the earth. Was he only another John, preparing the way for a greater sent from God, or was he the Expected One himself, the Messiah to whom all Hebrew history had pointed? Was he a prophet or the Goal of Prophecy, God's son manifest in the flesh?

Jesus, after listening to the reports of one and another concerning the current opinions of his person and work, looked upon that little group in whom all his hopes were centered and uttered his searching challenge, "But who say ye that I am?" Peter was their natural leader and spokesman. Standing in his sturdy way, we can picture him looking straight into the eyes of the Master as he says with a voice vibrant with faith, "Thou art the Messiah, thou are the Son of the Living God!"

It was a new and glorious conviction regarding a fact which had been more or less hazy in his thought before. In so many ways Jesus had been disappointingly unlike the Galileean fisherman's conception of Messiahhood, with its trappings of royal pomp and earthly power. Besides he had not openly declared himself as such in plain terms, confining his public teaching to the good news of the Ki and saying little about the Yet now there surged th Peter's soul the mighty tru Jesus of Nazareth, his p friend and humble every-day panion, was the Christ of

International Bible Study Conference

AN important Bible Conference is announced to be held at the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, on Founder's Day, February 5, 1920, to which all the Bible Colleges and Training Schools in the United States and Canada are invited. The call for this gathering is signed by Dean Gray of the Moody Bible Institute, and Principal John McNicol of the Toronto Bible College, Toronto.

It states that several informal and unofficial meetings of representatives of different Bible Institutes, colleges and schools have already been held, at which questions were discussed relative to the need of a Declaration of Faith on which all such institutes could stand, and also the necessity for educational standard to wh they might attain. At one these early conferences, two co mittees were named to prepa such declaration and standard, a to report to a subsequent conf ence. This was done in May la when it was decided, in view of t widespread interest the plan h aroused, to invite all the traini schools and colleges in both co tries. Each institute desiring repr sentation is requested to appoi one delegate and one addition delegate for each ten years of i existence, and to forward the name of these representatives to Dea Gray of the Moody Bible Institut or Principal McNicol of Toronto not later than December 31.

A difference of 1410 arrests.

Robbery decreased 70 per cent under the dry regime and only 5 persons were arrested for vagrancy against 131 in the previous wet year. One of the largest decreases noted was in the arrests on drunkenness charges. From a total of 1266 for the wet period there was an 82 per cent decline to 228 during the dry period. There were also fewer disturbances and fewer arrests for disorderly conduct when liquor was not sold, the statistics showing 140 before and only 40 after May 1, 1918. In only a few cases were there more arrests made, chief among them being for charges of violation of the prohibition law.

The best proof of the benefit of prohibition is the county jail, whose inmates formerly crowded it to capacity. Very few cells are now occupied and the officials find it impossible to cultivate the work farm because of the lack of prisoners to do the work.

Not only from a moral standpoint has there been such a wonderful change but the superintendent of the city poor department, during his score of years of service, has never seen so few cases of poverty as since the state went into the dry column.

The saloons are no longer vacant stores, but grocery stores, meat markets, soft drink parlors and even milk counters have come to take their places and are doing a thriving business. Many former saloonkeepers are now firm supporters of prohibition.

Grand Rapids, which is a city of 140,000, is just a fair example of the change that has taken place under the dry law and its statistical report, which is so highly gratifying, could be repeated by every city in Michigan. GEORGE VELDMAN.

A Revival of Christian Stewardship

How the churches fail to see the utter incongruity injustice of asking their minis- to try to make $1,000 equal 00 in purchasing power is a ound mystery to the average ister. I am sure that back of his there is a sad lack of knowl- concerning the doctrine Christian stewardship. The ches say: "We cannot pay the ister more salary," but on the e day they say it, the members more motor cars, or plan some ensive pleasure trip and fail to how inconsistent their action f all the members of a church ld turn over to the Lord one- th of their income the whole tter could be quickly adjusted, and it would not longer be true that the engine-wiper in the roundhouse gets more salary than the hard-worked preacher. We need much a revival of the doctrine of Christian stewardship in our churches.

A great cry is going up in these days from the theological schools because there is such a dearth of candidates for the ministry; and the reason for such dearth is not hard to find. These boys have watched their fathers and mothers struggle all through the years to make ends meet, and they have seen the penurious tendency of the churches, and their hearts have hardened, and they have turned to the avenues of business where there were men who understood their worth and were ready to pay them what they earned.

The old-age pension schemes are all right in a way, but why not pay the minister what he is worth while he is preaching, instead of a pension when he cannot preach any more? Or give it to his wife when he is dead?

Sensation of Taste Is Complex

The sensation of taste, while of mmon and constant experience, ighly complicated in its nature. hat is commonly called taste is a simple sensation at all, but her a complex. In addition to actual functioning of the appa- us properly pertaining to the se of taste, the tongue receives pressions of various other sorts, ich go to make up this complex.

The reader will probably agree that ice cream and coffee are entirely different from their true selves when served at inopportune temperatures, and it is a matter of record that a person of the keenest taste may make the most ludicrous errors if asked, blindfolded and with his nose stopped, to identify substances placed in his mouth.

Bean Troubles

Which the Van Camp Cooks Corrected

It took four years for our experts to perfect this dish. And it cost $100,000

Old-style baked beans had the following faults:

The dry beans varied vastly. So we buy beans grown on studied soils, and analyze each lot before baking.

The skins were tough, due to hard water. So we boil beans in water freed from minerals.

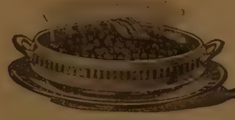
Beans were hard to digest. They were underbaked—they had to be in any old-style oven. So we built modern steam ovens, where Van Camp's Beans are baked for hours at 245 degrees.

The New Delights

Beans were baked in open dishes, so much of the flavor escaped. Van Camp's are baked in sealed containers.

Baked beans were crisped or mushy or broken. With our modern steam ovens, all Van Camp's come out nut-like, mealy and whole.

Baked beans lacked zest. So our culinary experts perfected a sauce by comparing 856 recipes. And that zestful sauce is now baked with the pork and the beans.



Van Camp's Beans are mealy, tender, whole. And the sauce gives every atom a delicious tang

Now in countless homes Van Camp's have changed the whole conception of baked beans. They are hygienic, easy to digest. They are whole and mellow. Every atom has a tang. And they are ever-ready.

In millions of meals Van Camp's are used to displace costly meats. And thousands of restaurants buy them because men like these beans.

Buy a few cans and see what science has accomplished in this dish.

LESSON II. The Crisis in Eden and What Followed It.

Read Genesis 3 and 4.

BEFORE starting with the new lesson, let us talk a little about the last one.

We are trying to seize upon the facts primarily, and not as yet their explanation or interpretation.

The first verse, which we called a "Preface" to all the rest — what fact does it state? And if, as it says, "In the beginning, God created the heaven, and the earth," then matter is not eternal. Keep that in mind.

According to Verse 2, what was the condition of the earth when it first came into being? The verb "was" might be translated "became." Read the verse with that change in it and see what it suggests. It makes it look as though the earth at first was not waste and void (R. V.), but that something happened to make it so, does it not?

May the earth at first have been perfect, and may some catastrophe have occurred to bring it into the condition of Verse 2? Who knows? And may this account for the idea of pre-Adamites, the theory that a race of men existed on the earth before the present one, before Adam?

Was it away back in that period that Satan fell, and that the mine was laid by him to destroy the new race of men that began in Eden? No one can reply to that fathomless question, but what an interesting mystery it is!

And furthermore, how much time may have elapsed between the creation named in Verse 1 and the condition in which the earth is found in Verse 2, — who can say? It may have been millions of years. Some geologists claim to have found evidence that the earth is as old as that. We doubt the genuineness of their evidence; but if it were true, there may have been time enough between the Creation of Verse 1 and what is revealed in Verse 2 for the formation of all the strata of which they speak.

But we hurry on. On the first day, note who put the energy into the waste and formless mass, and how it was done, and what resulted. The word "said" does not mean necessarily that God's voice was heard, but only that the going forth of His power brought "light" to pass.

In the record of the second day the word "waters," refers to the gaseous matter of Verse 2 and not the liquid of the "seas" of t third day. Look in the margin f the Hebrew of "firmament."

On the third day, note wh came first, the herb or the seed, a the bearing it has on the recurri question as to which was the fir the hen or the egg?

On the fourth day, note th "lights" is not the same as "ligh on the first day. On the first da we have light at its source, and the fourth day we have it in co tainers that are created for certa purposes. Note those purposes.

On the fifth day, the waters d not bring forth the fowl. See t margin.

In the record of the creation man, note the plurals "us" a "our," affording an early hint the Trinity in the Godhead. F an idea of the "image" of God, com pare the marginal references. to man himself, note his dignit authority, and responsibility, well as the provision for his nee and the perfection of his person.

Passing over into Chapter I we have the general record of cr ation brought to a grand clima in Verses 1-3, and then commenc the story in detail of the creatio and early history of man (4-25 To our mind, there are four gre outline facts in this part of th chapter which we leave you to di cover for yourself, and on whic you will be questioned later.

Now, we are ready for lesson tw Please refer to what we said las week, and read this lesson, chapte 3 and 4, in strict accordance wit the rules. These lessons are sin pler in character than some to fo low, in which observance of th rules will be more necessary; the fore accustom yourself to their ob servance while it is easy to do s which will make it less difficu afterward.

Learn the facts of these chapter and do not be anxious about thei explanation or interpretation a present.

To accomplish this, read the slowly and carefully, once a day.

Read them each time continu ously.

Ask and expect the Holy Spiri to aid you.

Next week we will contribut suggestions, as we did this week before announcing the third lesson.

The Child Welfare Special

A BIG gray automobile truck known as the "Child Welfare Special" is being used by the Children's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor to carry the message of better babies into rural communities. The truck is completely fitted as a model "well baby clinic" with a Government doctor and nurse in charge to examine children and give mothers advice concerning the care necessary to make and keep them well.

Such advice can be obtained by mothers in towns and cities at children's health centers; but the country woman is usually shut off from such sources of information. The Children's Bureau car will demonstrate a practical means of bringing education in child care to the doors of mothers who are far from infant welfare stations, and indeed often many miles from doctor or nurse. It is hoped that after a few months in the field a "log" of the car may be put at the service of organizations wishing to operate movable health centers.

The eagerness of rural mothers t gain such help as the special ca give them is demonstrated by th report just received by the Chil dren's Bureau of the receptio given the car at its first stop, a vil lage in Illinois. In spite of the fac that the threshing season was a its height, the government docto and nurse were almost overwhelme with the crowd of mothers, father and babies. Examinations laste until late into the evening.

"Every mother," writes th bureau nurse, "was more impresse with the opportunity of learnin what, if anything, was wrong wit her child than with the novelty o the motorized clinic. One mother who through an error lost her tur on the first day and waited in vai all through the afternoon to hav her children examined, returned o the following evening from he home several miles out in the coun try, so as not to miss the oppor tunity afforded by the special."

HE POOR PAY OF THE MINISTERS

IT IS a shame, a scandal, the measley salary paid to the average minister of every denomination in these times of the cost of living. A number of congregations have pushed up pastors' salaries to meet the price times, but a majority of ches have seen the price of living advance seventy per cent in the past five years, with the wages of e carpenter, the bricklayer, the man in the factory and everye advanced to make a support ble, and have never said beans t an advance in the pastor's y, or if the subject has been ched have discouraged it. The that cleans the street or drives garbage wagon receives as much as the average minister, the enter and bricklayer twice as h, and the man who drives the f the church official is paid from to four times as much. It is nated that the salary of the ave minister is between $700 and). Such a situation dispirits the ister, oppresses his family and okes the anger of God. How did thing come about. Not for any t of generosity or loyalty on the of the laymen. They have red out their money like water the various branches of the 's kingdom, have loved their ister. They have simply overed this first duty, to provide the support of their own pastor, ly because in his modesty and secration to his Master's work has neither kicked nor struck for er wages. This oversight, this lect must cease at once. There o time for argument or debate; cause is pressing, and action only e thing. Moses demanded a just pensation for the ministerial e, and the apostle repeats the hand in these words: "For the ipture saith, 'Thou shalt not zle the ox that treadeth out the ' and, 'The laborer is worthy of reward.'" (I Tim. 5:18.)

ECURRENCE OF INFLUENZA THREATENED

HE Surgeon-General of the United States has just written message warning the nation of probable recurrence of the epic of influenza this year, and ing the people to take special cautions to prevent its spread. Some of the rules laid down by eral and State authorities are eat three meals a day, to sleep h the window open, to take some rcise in the open every day, to h the first approach of a cold, keep clean, and to avoid contact h those affected by the disease. e Federal Board of Health makes astounding and humiliating consion that medical science has not nd one thing about the deadly stilence that carried off 500,000 our people and millions of the er countries of the world; that it s not discovered the germ, and s discovered no remedy for the ease. It is evident that isolation ll keep the disease in bounds and mp it out. If each case in the nily or community is instantly d completely quarantined there ll not be a tenth of the mortality year ago. It is not necessary to t scared or go into a panic over the nger, but it will be well for famis to be cautious, to consult competent medical skill, and especially to ep any member affected with it m the rest and from the neighs. Leprosy was counted an inrable disease among the Hebrews. t Jesus cured that and the deadly which it typified: "And Jesus ched forth His hand and touched m, saying, 'I will; be thou clean.' d immediately his leprosy was nsed." (Matt. 8:3.)

BRITAIN'S DRINK QUESTION

REAR ADMIRAL SIR REGINALD HALL, M.P., who was recently elected to the directorate of important brewery interests, says he is preparing a bill which will cure some of the evils of the liquor traffic and lift it to a higher plane. The plan proposes a check on drunkenness, a reduction in the number of licenses, etc. It also provides for reading-room facilities, for writing, music and games. The admiral is on a fool's errand in attempting to purify so corrupt a thing as the saloon. Rev. Dr. Lyman Harold Hough, president of Northwestern University, who has just returned from London, where he occupied one of the leading pulpits for two months, makes the astounding statement that Britain will be dry in five years from now, in her determination to keep pace with the United States industrially. The English press is against prohibition; so was the American metropolitan press five years ago. The nations are catching the spirit of the temperance hero of thousands of years ago, of whom it was said, "But Daniel purposed in his heart that he would not defile himself with the portion of the king's meat, nor with the wine which he drank." (Dan. 1:8.)

DR. BURCH ELECTED BISHOP

DR. CHARLES SUMNER BURCH has been elected Protestant Episcopal bishop to succeed the late Bishop Greer. The New York Diocese includes 428 clergymen and 96,000 members. It has 80 missions and scores of organized charities. Its church property is valued at $100,000,000, of which amount $38,000,000 belongs to Trinity Corporation. In the Roman and Protestant Episcopal churches it is held that there is apostolic succession, which is transmitted by the bishop. The Presbyterian, Baptist, Congregational and other bodies hold that the bishop's order is no higher than that of the presbyter; that he is only a presbyter in charge of a larger field. The Methodists hold that the bishops are only elders elected by the General Conference to have oversight and to appoint ministers to charges. The Wesleyans do not call their leaders bishops at all, only general superintendents. Dr. Burch admirably answers the description of an ideal bishop: "A bishop then must be blameless, the husband of one wife, vigilant, sober, of good behavior, given to hospitality, apt to teach." (I. Tim. 3:2.)

SHIPBUILDING IN HAWAII

ONE of the most complete and commodious dry docks in the world has just been finished at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii. It will accomodate any vessel of any size and was constructed by the United States Navy. There is this reference to an extensive shipbuilding industry among the Jews: "And King Solomon made a navy of ships in Eziongeber, which is beside Eloth, on the shore of the Red Sea." (I Kings 9:26.)

THE RAT PROBLEM

THERE are as many rats in this country as there are people, and it takes half a cent each day from every man, woman and child to support them. Besides, they are deadly carriers of disease. The government has called on the people to exterminate them, and especially to make all houses rat-proof. The Jews undoubtedly had pests answering to our rats, but they were not called by that name. There is this mention of the pest that damaged their food products: "Wherefore ye shall make images of your emerods, and images of your mice that mar the land." (I Sam. 6:5.)

250,000 cars have faulty brakes

THERE are 250,000 automobiles in use in public streets and roads whose brakes are in a dangerous condition—a quarter of a million cars which are a positive menace to every motorist and pedestrian. A searching study of the causes of automobile accidents by the state traffic authorities of New Jersey has resulted in establishing this conclusion.

Ordinary woven lining — Notice the loosely woven texture. Wears down quickly and unevenly, losing its gripping power as it wears.

Thermoid Hydraulic Compressed Brake Lining — Notice the compact texture. Wears down slowly. Gives uniform gripping surface until wafer thin.

Make sure of your car by timely inspection

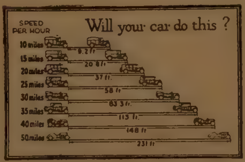
Don't wait for an emergency. Then it may be too late. It is your duty to know positively, before you take your car out of the garage, that your brakes will hold and stop your car instantly.

It is so easy to be safe and sure. Perhaps all that is required is a simple tightening of the brake rods, or an adjustment of the equalizer, to give you safety instead of danger.



This chart shows the distances in which a car should stop, at any given speed, if the brakes are efficient

If your brakes need relining, your garage man will tell you so. Have him inspect them without delay.

Why Thermoid brake lining is safest and wears longest

In each square inch of Thermoid brake lining there is 40% more material than in ordinary brake lining. This additional body gives a closer texture which is made tight and compact by hydraulic compression under 2,000 lbs. pressure. In addition to this, Thermoid is Grapnalized, an exclusive process in manufacture which enables it to resist moisture, oil and gasoline.

The tight, compact texture of Thermoid, so processed, causes it to wear down more slowly than ordinary brake lining, and so evenly that it maintains its gripping power even when worn to wafer thinness.

The engineers and manufacturers of 50 of the leading passenger cars and trucks have standardized on Thermoid Hydraulic Compressed Brake Lining because it makes their cars safer.

Have your brakes inspected today. Remember that every foot of Thermoid is backed by our guarantee: Thermoid will make good — or WE WILL.

The War
The Flu
And the Sunday-schools

Startling statements have been going the rounds as to great losses in Sunday-school membership in the last two or three years.

Are these statements true?

If true, just what are the facts?

And if true, what is the remedy?

Do you know what successful steps have already been taken by Sunday-schools to make up war and epidemic losses, and to hold or restore membership and attendance?

There are some Sunday-schools, you know, that have not only held their own, but have actually increased their membership and attendance during these times.

Have you investigated the condition of your own school, so that you know exactly what the need or loss or gain is there?

For some months past The Sunday School Times has been investigating this subject that is of such vital importance to the very life of the Sunday-schools of North America.

Every section of North America is being scoured for authentic material that will be of tremendous value to your school.

All kinds of Sunday-schools are being included in this investigation, small and large, city and country, so that all may move forward together in the new era of opportunity.

You can get the benefit of the full results of this investigation in only one way: by

THE

in your home and school.

The articles covering this whole subject will commence this autumn, and continue into the winter. They will give a wealth of practical, soundly successful material, showing how any and every school can more than overcome the set-back of the last few years.

And in every issue you get a dozen unusual lesson-help features, on the International Improved Uniform Lessons, by the best Bible teachers in North America.

But the very best thing about this Every-Week Interdenominational Journal for Adults in Bible Study and Teaching, Sunday-school Management, and the Christian Life and Service, it that is stands for the whole Bible as the infallible Word of God, and the shed blood of Jesus as the only way of salvation.

RAIN

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"SEEMS to me," sighed the girl regretfully, "that we're having more rain than ever before, this autumn. Seems to me that we're having more dreary days than I ever dreamed could be. It's awfully unpleasant to wake up in the morning to a cloud-filled world. And it's even more unpleasant to go to sleep at night with the sound of rain beating against the window. Seems to me there isn't any sense in having so much rain!"

The girl's grandmother looked up over the top of her rounded spectacles. She might have been laughing, almost, but the spectacles served as a screen to half cover the laughter.

"It always amuses me," said the girl's grandmother, "to hear some little world-person say that she can't see any sense in—well, the rain for instance, or in any other element that she hasn't the least control over. It always makes me want to laugh when I hear it!"

The girl's face was a trifle flushed. She hurried to explain.

"It wasn't," she said, "that I was complaining, grandmother. It wasn't that I was fretting. It was just that I didn't exactly understand why we should have to live in such a wet world. We're not," she smiled, "we're not fishes! And so—"

Even the grandmother's round spectacles could not hide the twinkle of laughter in the wise old eyes.

"Of course we're not fishes, honey," she said; "but after all, rain—even excessive rain—has its purpose."

"In the spring," said the girl, "it makes the crops start growing. And in the summer it keeps them from drying up. But in the autumn"—she shook her curly head vigorously—"in the autumn there's no real sense in having so very much of it! In the autumn it—it exasperates me! Even you, grandmother, can't think of a legitimate reason for a steady downpour that ruins velvet hats, and spoils slippers, and gives people sneezy colds. Even you can't find any justification for it!"

The grandmother's laughter had grown to a silvery stream of mirth.

"Maybe not," she agreed; "maybe not! Maybe I can't find any real justification for it. But I will say one thing. It certainly does make me appreciate the sunshine—when we have it!"

Perhaps that, after all, is the real reason for autumn rain!

I KNOW an old, old woman—a woman who has lived through the horror of three wars, who has seen death come unexpectedly, who has watched home and money and friends swept away upon a rising tide of misfortune. She is something of a writer, after a small sense, but she has had little time to spend at the work she loves, for she has been too busy for years, doing tasks that had to be done, to put together her charming little story plots or her clever small verses. Now that she is facing the sunset of life things are mercifully a bit easier for her. Now that she is an old, old woman, she can rest a bit; can play the rôle of onlooker for a while.

One would expect her to be bitter, for fate has not dealt kindly with her. But she is a cheery little thing, with a snatch of song on her lips most of the time, and a word of ready philosophy to give to troubled souls. She sits in a cozy old armchair and talks most of the time to callers. She wears a bit of gay ribbon at her throat and loves to give tea parties. And though at times her voice trembles a bit when she speaks of some lost loved one or of some broken dream—though her eyes grow misty when something reminds her of a hope that she knew or of a faith that was broken, I have never heard her speak regretfully. Regret seems to have been left out of her life.

"Everybody," she said to me once, "has had to face storms. Nobody knows it better'n I do. P'raps," she laughed, "p'raps I realize it because some o' my storms have been blizzards. P'raps that's why I understand how t' help other folks through their stormy times!"

I tried to be consoling—though consolation wasn't exactly necessary in the circumstances.

"I don't think it was fair, dear," I said, "that so many blizzards were sent into your life. It doesn't seem right. You didn't deserve them!"

The old, old lady lifted the lid of her teapot and gazed inquiringly into the depths of it.

"It ain't drawn enough yet," she said. And then—"Land, child, it isn't our place to quarrel 'bout th' storms that are sent. It's an Almighty hand that sends 'em—an' it's not for us to question. Maybe my storms were sent—as I said—so as I could help other folks in trouble."

"But you must regret those storms," I argued resentfully, "they've left such dark clouds in your life—"

The old, old lady was smiling softly. Her slim, faded little hand was laid above mine.

"The dark clouds, dearie," she said gently, "have had their purpose. For they've made the sky seem brighter—after they've drifted by—than a sky that'd always been bright could seem. Every dark cloud in my life has made the light spots seem lighter. Every storm has made th' fair weather a happier time for me. I don't regret a one of them—not a one. They've just made me big enough to appreciate th' best things; appreciate them like they should be appreciated."

LONGFELLOW wrote a poem once that holds a certain gloomy philosophy. You all know it—it's not necessary to quote more than a few lines. It begins like this:

"The day is dark and cold and dreary,
It rains, and the wind is never weary—" and it ends like this:

"Into each life some rain must fall;
Some days must be dark and dreary!"

Longfellow's right—partly. Into each life some rain must fall. Because every normal life—every worth-while life—must know its measure of sadness. But he's wrong when he says, at the very last, "Some days must be dark and dreary!"

There he's wrong. No days need be entirely dark and dreary—no matter how much rain is falling; no matter how unnecessary the storm may seem. No days need be entirely dark and dreary, despite the fact that the storms are almost blizzards!

For, to a person with real strength of character, and real grit, storms are only a test. To a person with a big quantity of courage a day that is dark and cold and dreary is only a bit of shadow thrown, for the purpose of contrast, across life's sunshine-splashed road. To a person who is far-seeing enough, who has enough imagination and—and soul, stormy days are almost a challenge!

They're justified to the real person because they make that real person appreciate the sunshine—when he sees it.

V H. S., Greenville, S. C. "Is it possible for man to get so deep in sin that he ot be forgiven, even though he till love for God and desires to ight? Would God accept an ate, hould he do the right ? Or would the man's heart hardened that he would not re- . and for this reason God would orgive" Does God ever prevent itance? Can a man go so deeply sin that he could never hope to be oted as among the righteous in world to come, even though he it?"

er and over again, God in his l assures us that He will abun- ly pardon all who come to him in re repentance. "Though your be as crimson, they shall be white now," is the clear statement in h 1:18. The danger for one who rsistently falling into sin is not God's forgiveness has been drawn, but rather that, by con- ing in sin, the sinner becomes ened and his conscience ceases to oach him. Still, the very fact such a one is concerned at all it his spiritual condition is a hope- vidence that he is not beyond re- ance and forgiveness. Read the ages in Matt. 18:21-35; Luke 4; Isa. 1:16,17; Micah 7: 18, 19. one, if he earnestly desire for- ness, must confess his sin before and throw himself on his mercy, ng forgiveness, not through any it of his own, but for the sake of dear Son, who died to save the ld. He must pray for faith that may believe, in spite of all his ked desires and promptings, that will not only forgive but will him strength to resist and to rcome these desires. It would be if such a man could have the help ome Christian friend or evangelist guide him through the stormy e.

V. E. L., La Mesa, Calif. We e no available statistics as to the parative seating capacity of the phitheaters of the United States. should think 40,000 in any one ance an extreme figure. Certainly seems almost incredible that the nan voice could reach the fringes such an audience.

E. McL., Yorkton, Sask., Can. e are well pleased with the general religious news of the Christian rald. We have just before us a ture, Chateau-Thierry, where the ericans turned the tide of the war. u forget those who broke the Hin- burg Line and fought many a hard tle before the Americans entered war. We are pleased that the ericans came to help, and we give m great praise for hard fighting, t there were others. We want to on friendly terms. The Anglo- cons must stick together like thers, or let Christian civilization wrecked and ruined. Get behind President and show the world t the soul of the American nation true."

W. C. A., York, Pa. The matter purely controversial and we do not that any amount of discussion uld decide it.

J. W. Y., Covington, Ky. The ening verses in Hebrews 6, and es- cially verses 4, 5, and 6, have been ch discussed. "Those who were ce enlightened"—that is, who re- ved a vivifying knowledge of the th, and who had taken satisfying incomplete steps toward the heav- ly life, even awakening the first pulses of faith,—had hesitated and, the call of the world, had deliber- ely turned away, thus rejecting ew the power of Christ's sacrifice. is to such as these—whose faith d been weakened—that the apostle plies these despairing words (verse : "It is impossible to renew them ain unto repentance." What is manly impossible, however, is ssible with God, but it is only rough the miracle-working power the Holy Spirit in the heart that ch a one can be won again from the orld and turned in the right direc- n. Every Christian minister and ospel worker knows how difficult is to win a backslider. Such a one ems impervious to the Gospel truth. here is hope, however, when the son is distressed about his spirit- l condition, as it gives evidence at the Spirit is still striving to win Peter's backsliding and denial s most flagrant; yet, through the vine mercy, he became repentant, as forgiven and restored.

All railway passenger and traffic rvice throughout Germany ceased r ten days beginning November 5th an endeavor to save coal.

You Ask - - Is Your House the Right Kind for Kelsey Health Heat

Perhaps our best answer is to tell you the kind of houses it is now successfully heating.

In California, it is making Bungalow owners happy.

In Ohio, it is saving coal for farmers.

In Georgia, it is giving comfort to those fine old Plantation residences.

In New England, it is heating the Colonial houses of the Pilgrim Fathers' descendants.

On Long Island, it is giving Palm Beach temperatures to hundreds of those cosy new houses.

At Newport, Lenox, Tuxedo and Stockbridge, it is driving out the chill of autumn and the zero of winter from palatial country houses.

In the Philadelphia suburbs, it is taking the place of unsatisfactory furnaces and temper testing radiator heats.

All of which it not only heats, but ventilates and humidifies as well—a three in one system.

Looks like you will have to "look further" into the Kelsey Health Heat. Our booklet called "Some Saving Sense on Heating" is a good thing to start with.

Making "All-Around" Men

How the American College Is Bringing Its Students Into Closer Contact With Industry

By Fred H. Rindge, Jr.

"SAY, that's the greatest thing I ever saw. I never thought those 'wops' had it in them!" The speaker was the leader of the student body in one of our great Middle West universities. He had just witnessed a demonstration lesson in English to a group of foreigners of five nationalties in a large factory.

The "wops" had come into the superintendent's office sullen and disgusted because they had been obliged to remain half an hour overtime for the experiment. But in two minutes after the lesson had begun they were transformed into a smiling, eager group, sitting on the very edge of the benches in their anxiety to catch the teacher's every word. They were no longer a collection of "wops"—but twenty distinct individuals, vying with each other to see who could first master that interesting lesson.

No interpreter was necessary. The teacher first "acted out" the main idea of the lesson. Then he gave five verbs which were quickly memorized. Using these verbs in sentences he dramatized successively:

"I awake from sleep.
"I open my eyes.
"I look for my watch.
"I find my watch.
"I see what time it is."

The five nationalities were soon able to repeat these sentences, with no assistance from the teacher other than his acting the ideas expressed. After memorizing in logical order the lesson "Getting Up in the Morning," there followed a reading from the chart and individual lesson sheets, copying the script which was on the reverse side, simple grammar and a final review. In less than an hour the men had memorized and understood seventeen good English sentences, and it was difficult to discover who was most pleased—the foreigners or the college students who had been such interested observers.

NEEDLESS to say, it was a simple matter to arrange for a continuance of this class twice a week. Soon other classes were formed in the shops, boarding-houses, foreign stores, societies, social centers, box cars—wherever the men were. The students placed in charge rapidly acquired an understanding of certain industrial and social conditions, an appreciation of these men from another realm, and considerable tact in handling a group of one or more nationalities. Who can doubt that the college men learned far more than they taught? Look ahead five or ten years and see these students gradually becoming leaders in business, engineering and the various professions. Will they not be men of far greater sympathy motivated by the social service impulse, because of such experiences in college days?

Indeed, this is no idle theory. For ten years the Young Men's Christian Association in its Industrial Service Movement has been helping to move the colleges of America closer to Industry. Thousands of college men have been enlisted in a hundred varieties of service with working men and boys, and great have been the results. Self-interest has turned into social interest. The war has engendered a spirit of sacrifice and service which makes it easier than ever to arouse the enthusiasm of college men and women along these lines. The universities have helped make the world safe for democracy. Now they are going to help make democracy safe for the world. And democracy will never be for the world until the indivi makes it a part of the very fibr his life.

We hear a great deal these d of Reabsorption, Readjustment, construction. How glibly the w are flung out upon a credul world! But what do they mean the average man, especially in colleges? Can they be made r in the practical experience of students and returning soldiers whom Secretary Baker says, "Tw ty-five years from now the Uni States will be what they make it

I HAVE returned from unforg able experiences in the gr army camps and the vast war ind tries of the country, seeing many problems in a new light. And wh are some of these great problems industrial reconstruction? The ening illustration indicates one Americanization!

THEN the great problems of lationships between Capital a Labor! On every hand, from t camps of the radicals, and, unf tunately, from some of the Cha of Sociology and Economics, hear that the interests of Capi and Labor are irrevocably oppo Are the college men of Ameri graduate with this insidious theo of the Bolshevik, or are they to re ize that, in spite of all the difficulti these two great forces in indust can get together? During the w we have witnessed the encouragi phenomenon of Capital and Lab fighting side by side against a co mon foe. Can they not fight side b side against the present foe to o ganized Government—Bolshevism If not, where lies the hope of our ci ilization?

ONE calls to mind, too, the po sibilities of conciliation and a bitration, and the prevention of i dustrial accidents and disease. Ar in the last analysis health, housi recreation, thrift, social insuran child labor, women in industry, a human problems. The improvemen of industrial conditions, fair hour good wages, and an appreciation the whole human factor in industr are things which the average colleg curriculum theorizes about. That not enough. Let the college stude go "down town" and mix up wi some of the real "folks" and his s cial studies will take on new meani

Recently a few engineering s dents accompanied me to lab union headquarters in their tow We discussed our plan with so of the leaders. "Your men need be more efficient in their everyd work. They need more of the theo ry—the mathematics, mechani mechanical drawing, etc. Our st dents can help in this, provided th undertake it in the right spirit. A the same time they will learn fa more than they teach. They w get your point of view, will understand some of your problems, a when they graduate will have a di ferent conception of their service r sponsibilities." So it was settled and twice a week in various sho and unions small group classes workingmen met to discuss the theoretical side of their every-day job

It is one thing to study the pr grams of the various labor parties i the class room. It is quite anoth thing to mingle in a friendly w with the men who make the pr grams and acquire a personal know edge of both sides of some of the great questions. The study of po sible international labor standard takes on new meaning. At the same time the need for more "efficiency" in industry is seen in a new light.

The Right Professional Niche

Some Boys Choose Their Lifework, Others Have It Chosen For Them. A Plea for Self-Determination.

By Jesse Thompson Miller

WOULD you let a member of the Bricklayer's Union fill your teeth? Would o permit a hod-carrier to re ve your adenoids? Can a -digger preach a sermon? It d be a pitiful sight to see a man ying the pulpit of a church he ought to be digging ditches, it would be a sin to let a di- y inspired minister waste his shoveling dirt. It would be as bad to see a surgeon-who- t-have-been wielding car- er's tools.

ung fellow, how are you ed? You are going to college to learn a trade or a profession. Is the right one, the one for h you are fitted, the one toward h you feel inclined, or did one pick it out for you and shove you blindly, protestingly in it? The result will be in- able, and you will be an object idicule to your fellow men. I w, because I have been through It took me two years of valu- time and cost me several dreds of dollars to find out that ould never make a successful tor. When I woke up I found elf talking rather forcefully to parents, and as a result I ted all over again in a pro- ion of my own choosing, one ch I love devotedly and for ch I would give my life if nec- ry.

am not attempting to instil spirit of rebellion in the minds young fellows about to enter lege, nor do I wish to change ir minds for them; but I do nt to warn them to think care- ly and wisely before spending a of good money and valuable he in learning something for ich they have no use or for ich they are not mentally or ysically fitted.

OME fellows literally "fall" into a profession; some have e handed to them on a silver tter; others, with the respon- ility thrust upon their own youth- shoulders, have to choose one. ght at this point a boy's troubles gin. Many fathers and mothers ink it their duty to choose a ofession for their sons. But it ght to be the son who does the osing, with the advice of older ople. A lad about to go to llege should delve into the re- sses of his brain in search of that mething which tells him whether is right or wrong; that something hich indicates a liking or a dislike r this or that trade or profession. hen he is sure that he has found e general direction of his inclina- ons, then and only then is it time him to go ahead with the train- g necessary for success in that rticular calling.

No one can appreciate, until he as been through it, the mental orm that surges through a young an's brain when it comes time him to choose a profession— life work which will culminate ither in a brilliant success or a reary failure. He alone, deep in is own heart, knows what he is st fitted for. It is there in him mewhere, and sooner or later it bound to assert itself. But too ten a fond mother, well-meaning d with her boy's success upper- ost in her mind, will have a career lanned for him long before his wn ideas have matured. Or an xious father will have his son's ollege picked out and a few deep- ated ideas orderly arranged for m to follow. It must be re- embered, however, that the boy has ideas and ambitions of his own; ambitions which he cherishes secretly, perhaps, fearing to give voice to them because of the parental wrath sure to follow any deviation from their cherished wishes.

THERE is a time in a boy's life when he gradually ceases to be a boy. It is the period of adolescence. A marked change takes place as he crosses the threshold into manhood. He becomes energetic and adverse to restraint; he begins to think for himself along more solid and mature lines. The time of flightiness and wild imagination is over. He is restless and is desirous of seeking a vocation. He develops independence in thought, will-power, and action.

A young man must choose his occupation—his life work—at the very beginning in order to achieve success. If the thirteen million young men in the United States could be made to realize the importance of that, there would be no long line of failures in business and professional life; there would not be so many "down-and-outs" in the charity bread-lines of the large cities; there would be few if any suicides on account of business failures. Can you imagine a young man trying to make a success of himself in a profession of another's choosing, a profession which he probably dislikes? Can you imagine a fellow with his whole future before him entering with all his heart and youthful vigor a profession which he has been compelled to follow by those who think they know what is best and who preach experience as the best teacher? That man would be a pitiful sight indeed, his spirit crushed, his hopes and ambitions dashed to pieces and the best years of his life past reclaiming.

From an article which I came across recently, these few quotations portray vividly what I have said: "To overlook natural adaptation in selecting a calling and to follow that for which one is not fitted is downright cowardice and dishonesty. It not only buries the talents but turns work into toil and drudgery and renders the life of the offender unnatural and artificial. They only are happy whose labor and talents harmonize. No one so demoralizes a trade, a profession, or a business as the awkward misfit therein striving to succeed. It is as great a sin to murder our talents as it is to bury them."

The modern hobo and the other failures strewn along life's highway are sad examples of the man who allows his talents to remain dormant. Professional misfits are a source of ridicule and sympathy to the successful men who were alive to their own possibilities at their time of entering college. It takes but a word from those who govern a boy's movements to deny him his desires. It takes but a word to grant them, and that word is far easier said. If his wishes are granted his talents and inclinations, backed by ambition, spring forward unhampered. Should they go ungranted and he is compelled to go on through life toiling at THEIR chosen profession, his talents remain unseen by those who might help him and who would recognize the possibilities of the trained man.

NEVERTHELESS there are talents in him somewhere, untrained by those who have it in their power to bring them out in all their gloriousness, striving

"By the Blessing of God

"I ascribe to Bible study the help and strength which I have had from God to pass in peace through deeper trials in various ways than I had ever had before; and after having now above fourteen years tried this way, I can most fully, in the fear of God, commend it. * * * A man has deprived himself of the best there is in the world who has deprived himself of intimate knowledge of the Bible."

—Woodrow Wilson.

Systematic, Prayerful Bible Study gives that knowledge of God and man without which real success in life is never attainable. It gives uplift, inspiration, refreshment; strength, courage, wisdom, breadth of vision, spiritual enthusiasm, and power with God and men.

Don't allow anything to cheat you of your wonderful privilege of systematically studying the one Book which outweighs in value all other books in all the world. Dig in it as for gold and you will secure treasure of value and extent beyond any calculation.

moods and tenses of his most temperamental employer fully. It was all in knowing how to manage him. James was most deferential, and knew when to keep still and not ask questions. This was one of the mornings when he went to the dictionary himself when he wasn't sure of a word rather than break the ominous silence. Not that Mr. Reyburn was a hard master! Quite the contrary, but this was James's first place straight from his brief course at business school, and he was making a big bluff of being an old experienced hand.

There was not much business to be done. This was Warren Reyburn's "first place" also in the world of business since finishing his law course, and he was making a big bluff at being very busy, to cover up a sore heart and an anxious mind. It was being borne in upon him gradually that he was not a shouting success in business so far. The rosy dreams that had floated near all through his days of hard study had one by one left him, until his path was now leading through a murky gray way with little hope ahead. Nothing but sheer grit kept him at it, and he began to wonder how long he could stick it out if nothing turned up.

True, he might have accepted an offer that even now lay open on his desk; a tempting offer too from a big corporation who recognized the influence of his old family upon their particular line of business; but it was a line that his father and his grandfather had scorned to touch, and he had grown up with an honest contempt for it. He just could not bring himself to wrest the living from the poor and needy, and plunder the unsuspecting, and he knew that was what it would be if he closed with this offer. Not yet had he been reduced to such depths, he told himself, shutting his fine lips in a firm curve. "No, not if he starved!"

And that was the legitimate worry that ruffled his handsome brow as he sat before his desk frowning at that letter. He meant to begin dictation on its answer in another five minutes or so, but meantime he was forcing himself to go over every point and make it strong and clear to himself, so that he should say, "No!" strongly and clearly to the corporation. It might do him harm to make his reason for declining so plain, but he owed it to his self-respect to give it nevertheless, and he meant to do so. After all, he had no business so far to harm, so what did it matter? If nothing turned up pretty soon to give him a start he would have to change his whole plan of life and take up something else where one did not have to wait for a reputation before he could have a chance to show what was in him.

But underneath the legitimate reason for his annoyance this morning there ran a most foolish little fretting, a haunting discomfort.

He had taken his cousin to a wedding the night before because her husband had been called away on business, and she had no one to escort her. They had been late and the church was crowded. He had had to stand, and as he idly looked over the audience he suddenly looked full into the great sad eyes of the sweetest little bride he had ever seen. He had not been a young man to spend his time over pretty faces, although there were one or two nice girls in whom he was mildly interested. He had even gone so far as to wonder now and then which of them he would be willing to see sitting at his table day after day the rest of his life, and he had not yet come to a satisfactory conclusion. His cousin often rallied him about getting married, but he always her it would be time enough think about that when he had income to offer her.

But when he saw that fo face, his attention was held once. Somehow he felt as if had not known there was a like that in all the world, so lik child's, with frank yet mo droop to the head, and the plicity of an angel, yet the sadn of a sacrificial offering. Unbidd a great desire sprang up to for her whatever burden she bearing, and bring light into th sad eyes. Of course it was a pass sensation, but his eyes had trave involuntarily to the front of church to inspect the handso forbidding face of the bridegro and with instant dissatisfaction looked back to the girl once m and watched her come up to t altar, speculating as those w love to study humanity are wont do when they find an interesti subject. How had those two ty ever happened to come togeth The man's part in it was plain. was the kind who go about seeki whom they may devour, thoug Warren Reyburn, but the woma How could a wise-eyed child li that have been deceived by a han some face? Well, it was all spec lation of course, and he had nothi to do with any of them. They we strangers to him and probably ways would be. But he had conception at that time what small world he lived in, nor h near the big experiences of life all about us.

He watched the lovely bride all the audience watched her un he saw her fall, and then he start forward without in the least reali ing what he was doing. He foun himself half way up the side aisle the altar before he came to hims and forced his feet back to where h cousin was sitting. Of course he ha no right up there, and what cou he do when there were so many her friends and relatives about h

His position near the side do through which they carried made it quite possible for him look down into her still face as th took her to the vestry room, and h found a great satisfaction in seei that she was even more beautif at close hand than at a distanc He wondered afterward why mind had laid so much stress up the fact that her skin was love like a baby's without any sign cosmetics. He told himself that was merely his delight to learn th there was such a type, and that ran true.

He was therefore not a little di appointed that the minister, aft the congregation had waited unconscionable time for the retu of the bride, came out and a nounced that owing to her co tinued collapse the ceremony wou have to be postponed. The clatt of polite wonder and gossip a noyed him beyond measure, a he was actually cross with cousin on the way home when ranted on about the way gi nowadays were brought up, co dled, so that a breath would blo them away. Somehow she ha not looked like that kind of a gi

But when the morning pape came out with sensational headlin proclaiming that the bride had ru away, and suggesting all sorts unpleasant things about her, felt a secret exultation that she h been brave enough to do so. was as if he had found that h spirit was as wise and beautif as her face had been. His intere in the matter exceeded all comm sense and he was annoyed and im patient with himself more than h cared to own. Never before had face lured his thoughts like th one. He told himself that hi business was getting on his nerve hat as soon as he could be bout one or two little matters le hoped would fall into his to transact, he would take days off and run down to ore.

in and again the little white came across his vision and hts, and hindered the courteit stinging phrases with which d intended to illumine his . At last he gave it up and his hat went out in the ng November air for a walk ar his brain.

is was James Ryan's opnity. It was almost twelve k and no harm in calling the lady" in the cotton blouse tment of the big factory. He g to the telephone with ity.

want to speak with Miss Carplease. Yes, Miss J. Carson. at Miss Carson? Oh, hello, is that you?"

es, it is Mister Ryan," and Jane sweetly.

ane!"

Vell, didn't you 'Miss Carson'

Give it up, Jane, You win. Jane!"

Vell, Jimmie?"

That's my girl, say how about wedding veil? Been thinking more about it?"

here was silence for a moment, a conscious giggle, the full ficance of which James Ryan not in a position to figure out.

Say, Jimmie, quit your kiddin'! mustn't say things like that the phone."

Why not?"

'Cause. Folks might listen."

I should worry! Well, since say so; How about seein' a show ther tonight?"

Fine, an dandy, Jimmie! I'll ready at the usual time. I a go now, the boss is comin'. ong, Jimmie!"

So long, darling!"

ut the receiver at the other end g up with a click, while Jane a smile on her lips thought of pasteboard box under her bed wondered what Jimmie would if he could know. For Jane fully made up her mind that mie was not to know. Not at sent, anyhow. Some time she ht tell him if things turned out right, but she knew just what lly masculine advice and critm would lie upon James Ryan's if she attempted to tell him ut her strange and wonderful t of the night before. Maybe was a fool to have trusted a anger that way. Maybe the would turn out to be insane or ong somehow, and trouble come, she didn't believe it; and anyw she was going to wait until saw what happened next before got Jimmie mixed up in it, sides, the secret wasn't hers to l. She had promised Betty, d she always kept her promises. at was one reason why she was slow in promising to think about wedding veil in response to nes Ryan's oft repeated question. That evening on the way to the ovies Jane instituted an investition.

"Jimmie, what kind of a man is ur boss?"

"White man!" said Jimmie omptly.

"Aw! Cut it out, James Ryan! don't mean how'd s'e look, or at color is he; I mean what kind a man is he?"

"Well, that's the answer. White an! What's the matter of that? said it and I meant it. He's white there ever was one!"

"Oh, that!" said Miss Carson in orn, "Of course I know he's a ach. If he wasn't you wouldn't workin' for him. What I mean, he a snob?"

"No chance!"

"Well, I saw him with 'em last ight. I was passin' that big church Spruce Street and I saw him andin' with his arms folded so-" e paused on the sidewalk and indicated his pose. "It was a swell weddin' and the place was full up. He had a big white front an' a clawhammer coat. I know It was him 'cause I took a good look at him that time you pointed him out at church that evenin'. I wondered was he in with them swells?"

Her tone expressed scorn and not a little anxiety, as if she had asked whether he frequented places of low reputation.

"Oh, if you mean, could he be, why that's a diffrunt thing!" said James the wise. "Sure, he could be if he wanted, I guess. He's got a good family. His uncle's some high muckymuck, and you often see his aunts' and cousins' names in the paper giving teas and receptions and going places. But he dont' seem to go much. I often hear folks ask him why he wasn't some place last night, or phone to know if he won't come, and he always says he can't spare the time, or he can't afford it, or something like that."

"Ain't he rich, Jimmie?"

"Well, no, not exactly. He may have some money put away, or left him by some one. If he don't have I can't fer the life of me see how he lives. But he certainly don't get it in fees. I often wonder where my salary comes from, but it always does, regular as the clock."

"Jimmie, doesn't he have any business at all?"

"Oh, yes he has business, but it ain't the paying kind. Fer instance, there was a man in today trying to get his house back that another man took away from him, and my boss look the case! He took it right off the bat without waiting to see whether the man could pay him anything or not! He can't! He's only a poor laboring man, and a rich man stole his house. Just out an' out stole it, you know! It's how he got rich. Like as not we'll lose it too, those rich men have so many ways of crawling out of a thing and making it look nice to the world. Oh, he'll get a fee, of course—twenty-five dollars, perhaps—but what's twenty-five dollars, and like as not never get even the whole of that, or have to wait for it? Why, it wouldn't keep me in his office long! Then there was a girl trying to get hold of the money her own father left her, and her uncle frittered away and pertends it cost him all that, and he's been supporting her! Well, we took that, too, and we won't get much out of that even if we do win. Then there come along one of these here rich guys with a pocket full of money and a nice slick tongue wanting to be protected from the law in some devilment, and him we turned down flat. That's how it goes in our office. I can't just figger out how it's coming out! But he's a good guy, a white man if there ever was one!"

"I should say!" responded Jane with shining eyes. "Say, Jimmie, what's the matter of us throwin' a little business in his way—real, payin' business, I mean?"

"Fat chance!" said Jimmie dryly.

"You never can tell!" answered Jane dreamily. "I'm goin' to think about it. Our fact'ry has lawyers sometimes. I might speak to the boss."

"Do!" said Jimmie sarcastically! "And have yer labor for yer pains! We'll prob'ly turn them down, Fact'ries are always doing things they hadn't ought to."

But Jane was silent and thoughtful, and they were presently lost in the charms of Mary Pickford.

The evening papers came out with pictures of Elizabeth Stanhope and her bridegroom that was to have been. Jane cut away the bridegroom and pasted the bride's picture in the flyleaf of her Bible, then hid it away in the bottom of her trunk.

The Church and the Press

A Suggestion for Closer Cooperation in the Interests of Cleaner Cities and a Cleaner Nation.

By Richard Hayward

IT was the day after the Sabbath, several weeks ago, and Mr. Chicago Citizen, opening his morning newspaper at the breakfast table, was able to read a "story" covering almost five entire pages. The story was not about the League of Nations, or a catastrophe in which a hundred lives had been snuffed out, or the latest scientific discovery. And it had nothing to do with the previous day's church services, although, it is safe to assume, the majority of the newspapers' readers had worshipped at the city's many churches.

The story told of the confession wrung from a degenerate that he had murdered a five-year old child; every revolting detail of the crime was there in print; the criminal was described and analyzed; "sob sisters" contributed their impressions of him; every word the murderer uttered was reported with embellishments. Five solid pages; in a large city of the United States in the year of our Lord, 1919!

There was church news, too, that morning, but it was not easy for Mr. Chicago Citizen to find it, and it did not take him long to read it.

Why do the newspapers ignore the clean-minded, the worth-while citizens? Because they do not make their influence felt. And the churches, which should be the leaders in a movement for a cleaner press, have done nothing to improve conditions. Ministers, wading through columns looking for a mite of constructive or educational news, have neglected their opportunity and power. For the newspaper is a quasi-public institution and therefore subject to criticism, with a view to correction.

And the solution of this problem?

In every city and town the churches, acting in concert, should appoint a publicity or press representative, a sort of liason officer between the church and the press. He should be an experienced newspaperman and to him all the churches should send their news. He could separate the wheat from the chaff and would be able to obtain more space for the worth-while affairs of the city.

He could report back to the churches which of the newspapers incline toward co-operation, and the members of the churches could throw their support to those newspapers. The other newspapers soon would take cognizance of the state of affairs and would join the forces of good. Large advertisers also would keep in touch with the campaign for a cleaner press, and would be able to assist it in many ways.

And a cleaner press would result in a cleaner and better city, cleaner and better citizenship and a cleaner and better nation.

The Right Professional Niche

weakly for supremacy over the trained talents of other men who are striving vainly to mould him to their wishes. The young man's brain, his whole being, are choked and clogged with his own talents, choked and clogged with the purpose in life which God endowed him with. His natural inclinations work in secret, and in time they multiply to immense proportions. It is like a dam which overflows and destroys the works of man in the valley below. How can a fellow be expected to make his mark in life in one profession when his brain, his soul, and his heart are in reality living in the little world of his own creation—HIS profession?

Many young men are compelled by financial conditions to start work early in life. The method he probably will follow will be to start at the bottom and work to the top step by step.

Then there is the question of time. When shall a young man decide for himself the all-important question of his future work?

CERTAINLY this brings him much nearer his goal. Armed with a trained mind and filled with the mature ideas acquired in college, he is now ready and eager to cope with the obstacles strewn in his path. Business rivals will be only too glad to place these obstacles in his way, but once he has asserted his right to success these same rivals will eagerly aid him so that they may be counted among his friends.

There is another side to the question of time, born of my own experience. When a young fellow has entered upon a course of training that the advice of others induced him to follow, is he justified in changing his plans? Is it advisable for him to start all over again when the other career, HIS career, the one toward which he really leans, asserts itself upon him? Is it too late for him to start upon a new profession, especially when his education thus far has made it possible for him to do so without delay? It would be a sin to quench the fires of his ambitions, which, if allowed to burn, might light up the universe as have the lights of great men before him! I can only make use of the Biblical adage, "Don't hide your light under a bushel," which in this case amounts to a feeling of duty toward those who picked out your profession for you. By all means, stop where you are when you find you do not like the picked profession. If your own profession asserts itself upon you, drop everything else but that. Then stick to it. It will mean the making of you.

Follow your natural inclinations. The way may be hard, the road may be long and rough, but the end will be glorious.

START now, young man! Get into it! Give your natural inclinations full power over you, let them guide you the right way, give them full sway. If you feel that you would rather be a hobo than a surgeon, try it. If your inclinations lie toward hoboism, the chances are you will never make a good doctor, If you dream of hod-carrying or brick-laying when you are filling some one's teeth, you had better stop the filling process and join the union.

Make YOUR profession yours. Prepare yourself today for that which is rightfully your calling. Tomorrow may be too late.

"It belongs to every man to know," said a champion of youth some time ago, "better than any one can tell him, what he should like to do and what would suit him best. No rules can be written to guide him. The world's greatest successes have often defied the most plausible advice of others. There is an inward impelling voice, the calling of God perhaps, which tends to lead YOU in the right direction."

"Ridgetop, Consolidated"

The Establishment of a Strong, Influential Community Church In a Tennessee Mountain Village

By Elise Morris

ALMOST nineteen years ago in a middle Tennessee section, in a shabby little unpainted building that six months out of the year housed a rural school, there was started a community Sunday school. Possibly it was not at first known as a "community" Sunday school. In those days community service and community welfare were not daily-used words as they are now, yet the little group that met here were drawn from the community at large, not from any one denomination.

As a community factor its beginning was insignificant, but that Sunday gathering of a small group of persons from several different denominations has grown into a community church organization that is the spiritual and moral fiber out of which a prosperous and God-fearing citizenship has been woven. So far as I know this was the first community church in the United States, and from a sixteen-year test as a recognized organization it has made wonderfully and splendidly good.

Conditions in this particular spot in middle Tennessee were peculiar. Ridgetop, on the Highland rim of Tennessee foot hills, was composed of a summer colony of well-to-do city people who spent three months of the year there, and an outlying fringe of unprosperous farmers who were native to the ridge land. In those days to motor down to the city, Nashville, twenty miles away, for a Sunday morning church service was an undreamed of experience for those were years when one's automobile license, if one did own a car, was printed in two or three figures instead of six. There were no denominational churches convenient to the summer colony except ill-kept, poorly attended, ones that had been built by the native residents, with possibly an itinerant preacher every few Sundays.

Of course at heart we can worship the same God in the same spirit of reverence in a corn field corner, or in the back room of a saloon, but I fear we all will admit that a polished sermon of well chosen words and hymns sung with true regard to harmony appeals to a certain side of our natures. This betterment was accomplished at Ridgetop through the establishment of the community church.

The undenominational Sunday school that was started in a school house was attended by members of both interests, the city colony and the native farming element. With few interests in common on the outside, they met on Sundays to teach the children and to listen to the message that was meant for the high and the lowly alike. Truly, religion is the greatest of all world levelers.

The Sunday meetings outgrew the shabby little school house. In the center of the collection of summer homes stood a building most frequently used for dances and plays but this was opened on Sundays for religious services. A more formal form of service was established, an eleven o'clock service and a prayer service at night, as well as the Sunday school. The attendants of the church included practically all the summer residents and those living within a radius of a few miles in the country. The meetings had begun to be recognized as "the community church" and, as it was still unnamed and without definite rules and by-laws, a plan of organization was drawn up by one prominent citizen who had been the guiding spirit in its establishment. Through the financial and spiritual efforts of this man plans were m for the erection of the church bu ing and these plans later mat alized.

During the early days of Ridgetop community church, Hi land Chapel, the ministers for Sunday service were drawn fr the various denominations, a Me odist one Sunday, a Presbyter another, and so on, but eventu it was realized that this plan v defeating the true object of church organization. That sp of common fellowship, a belief one God for all, a spirit of disint ested Christianity, could not maintained as long as denomi tional creeds and doctrinal indiv ualities thrust themselves into t service.

For some years the ministers Highland Chapel have been dra from the Vanderbilt Theologi School, which is now non-sectari According to the laws of the chu the minister is permitted to prea the word of God in whatever fo he deems it best, but is required refrain from all doctrinal teachi and from any criticism of any d trine or practice which is distincti of any Evangelican denominati In this lies the foundation of t success of this particular chur It no more attempts to control t individual beliefs of its membe or tries to mold the organizati into one creed, than it would tempt to reach into each separa home and to dictate the daily men Its members are composed of p sons who have allied themselv with many of the larger denomin tions, and its church officers a men who have in the past work for the interest of their individu churches. At present the chur officers are composed of an Episc palian, a Presbyterian, and a Met odist, all of whom are earnest wor ers in their efforts to abide by t rules set down in the church by-law

Membership in the communi church at Ridgetop does not d qualify a person from affiliati with any particular faith at a lat day and does not require a wit drawal of membership in any d nominational church in other se tions. Persons who have not be baptized may choose the meth most preferred individually, an if they so wish, may ask a minist of any definite denomination officiate in the baptism.

In New York City there is community church under constru tion which is being established de pite the criticism and grave dou of the clergy and others.

But it is the small town and rur section that needs the communi church just as much as they need a consolidation of schools. T church as an educator has nev been given its just credit, but as inadequate school deprives a chi of its greatest blessing in this wi awake world so an inadequa church, a church that holds i members through a sense of drea duty rather than through a spir ual attraction, is also failing to gi its full quota of benefits to mankin

During the dozen or more yea that I have been a member Highland Chapel I have watch its hold growing closer and clos on the people. Unquestionably t church has been an education factor in this particular communit The tone has been raised because it, ambitions awakened. And those of us who have been bless with the privileges of higher educ tion and of travel into the b world, I fancy that membership h given to us a wider and more sy pathetic understanding of humanit

RRANGEMENTS are being considered in Washington for t reception and entertainment of t King of Siam who is contem- ing a trip to the United States. T young king has been on the t ne of the "Land of the White E phant" since the year 1911 when succeeded his father, the late K g Chulalongkorn, who was one o he most progressive of the rulers of Siam, even though he had so m y wives it is id he did n know their e t number W hat revenue of vo millions st ling, ($10,- 0 000) the q stion of s porting a large ber of wi- gave him e concern queen ranked was Sow- Pougsi, and s declared t her jew- were of r quality greater lue than se of any ropean een. The one on which the king sits in his gnificent robes of state is of gold rusted with precious stones, and is declared that the mantle he ars when on the throne is the hest and costliest single garment the world. It has been handed wn through several generations of gs and a half dozen soldiers guard ight and day.

King Chowa Maha Vajiravuth

King Chowa Maha Vajiravuth is of the best educated and most gressive of the modern rulers of a. His father was eager to have successor a man of intelligence d breath of thought and vision. He therefore sent his son to England to be educated when the boy was but thirteen years old, and he did not return to Siam to live until he was twenty-one. In the meantime he had been to the best schools in England, including Oxford where he was in the history department. Then he traveled extensively as a "finishing" process so that when he finally went back to his native land he was an exceptionally well informed young man. Indeed, he rather startled some of the conservatives of the country by his modern ideas and the freedom with which he exploited them.

One of the highly commendable things about Siam is the affection of the people of all classes for their children. Of this one visitor to the country says: "Fathers were constantly observed carrying their children about in their arms, and mothers were engaged in adorning them. The king was never seen in public without some of his younger children with him; and we had no interviews with the nobles where numbers of the little ones were not on the carpets, grouped around their elders and frequently receiving attention from them. The skins of the children are covered with a fine yellow powder and in the early mornings Siamese mothers may be seen industriously yellowing their children from head to heel. So universal is the custom that in caressing the children of the king or nobles you may be certain to carry away yellow stains on your dress."

Whiskey and Salt Water

T has been said, and said so often that many men of affairs have e to really believe it, that pro- ition will not work in a seafaring n. Rear Admiral Capps, at one e in charge of the government building program, held that inion. That is, he believed it fore he visited Bellingham, ash., on his trip to inspect the cific Coast ship yards.

After driving through the main et and observing the large e buildings which had replaced e shacks formerly occupied by loons, the Admiral was conducted the Hotel Leopold, one of the st hotels in the country for a y of like size.

"This hotel," remarked his com- nion, "was built by the owners the brewery after the town went y."

The Admiral looked down Dock eet, which opens out upon the and then up at the towering ilding

"Well if you had told me this in ashington," said he, "I wouldn't ve believed it."

Bellingham, a Puget Sound City about 35,000, claims the dis- action of being the only important y to go dry and stay dry [illegible] or the adoption of State w[illegible] [illegible]ohibition. Furthermore, it is located but 20 miles from the Canadian boundary, which was another argument advanced by the liquor interests to show that prohibition could not be made effective.

However, in 1910, following a four weeks campaign conducted by "Billy" Sunday, Bellingham adopted prohibition, the efforts of a business mens' organization to the contrary. Dire catastrophies were predicted as a result. The owners of one large building under construction ceased work and the largest saloon in town was sealed with ugly rough sawed boards. But disaster did not materialize. What actually happened was this; owners of the old wooden shells on the main corners formerly used as saloons discovered that they could not rent them for anything else and were obliged to tear them down to make room for modern brick buildings. Bellingham soon experienced a healthy building boom. The old brewery is now turning out powdered milk by the carload, the police force has dwindled to near the vanishing point, and hardly a single business man who signed the wet manifesto in 1910 can be found who will deny that it was a good thing they lost. Formamint is recommended by the leading throat specialists—do you know why?

IT is because, long before you ever heard of Formamint, it was submitted to the leading specialists of the world for trial in the great hospitals and for examination by experts on bacteria.

Not until a verdict was rendered of its extraordinary germ-killing power, of its harmlessness to body tissues, and of its welcome superiority to the awkward gargles, was Formamint brought directly to your attention.

This scientific endorsement of Formamint accounts for the confident tone of our announcements. We are firmly convinced of the value of Formamint and we welcome with pleasure, but without surprise, the daily receipt of enthusiastic testimony from people who are getting such fine results from using Formamint in mouth and throat troubles and as a preventive against infection. Formamint combines a powerful germ-destroying agent in the form of a delicious tablet, which melts in the mouth fluids and bathes the sore parts in a soothing and healing solution.

It is a pleasure to use Formamint. It tastes almost like a confection, in spite of its fatal action on germs, and is of proven harmlessness to the membrane in the mouth of even a child.

Winning the Children with the Motion Pictures

By Rev. Adam Chambers

Pastor Harlem Baptist Church

PASTOR CHAMBERS BELIEVES:

"Play with a child and he will love you, and if he loves you, you can influence him for good."

"The hope for a triumphant future for the church in New York City is in winning the children of the streets for Christ."

FOR sixteen years we have been using motion pictures at our Tuesday night Penny Concert at Harlem Baptist Church with telling effect. The concert is really a big week-night Sunday school. It fills our main audience room to its utmost capacity with the children from the streets and a few of their parents.

We sing gospel songs, led by the pipe organ and a choir of young people. A bible story is told each night by a previously selected young man or woman who has grown up in the Penny Concert and it is wonderful the splendid and charming way in which they tell these bible stories and how earnestly the children listen. Then follows a short prayer in simple child language and style. Then two reels of motion pictures, generally comic.

The pictures are the bait, without them we could not get the audience. The moral and spiritual results are evident to a great extent but their full value can never be estimated. This meeting is our fishing pond from which we gather into our clubs, Sunday School, Christian Endeavor Society and Church.

The use of motion pictures is the secret of our great and continued success.

A few years ago we used motion pictures on Sunday nights for about three months with fine results and one of the strongest and most constant active Christian men we have was won to church attendance and to Christ by the sermons illustrated by motion pictures at that time. We had to discontinue their use because of the great difficulty in getting suitable pictures for Sunday use, but now good pictures are available and we are beginning a Community Service to be continued every Sunday night, using one reel, a biblical subject, and two reels of drama, and we expect great spiritual results.

Our lady missionary said she w walking along a street one hot d when all the windows were op and she heard singing; the stra were very sweet and clear. Getti nearer, the words became distin

"YIELD not to temptation,
For yielding is sin,
Each vict'ry will help you
Some other to win."

No person in any of the apar ments of several big houses cou help hearing every word of th magnificent hymn, following t sound, she sought the singe She came to the open door of big tenement house and there s on the stairs three dirty faced a poorly clad little boys, with th heads close together to keep ha mony, singing at the top of the voices.

"Well, boys," she asked kindl "where did you learn that hymn

"Oh! at the Harlem Bapti Movies," they answered.

Children can be made wonderf missionaries. One little Jewish bo said to his father at the supp table, "Papa, you told me abo Moses and David. Why didn't yo tell me about Jesus? Jesus is be of all." Then he told the fami the stories he had heard at th Harlem Baptist Church about Jesu

If we can win the children of th streets by the use of movies t learn gospel hymns and gosp truth to carry into the streets an homes, by all means, let us use th movies.

Children are great advertisin agents. They come, drawn by th moving pictures, to the Penn Concert, when they get home the parents hear nothing from the but moving pictures, Bible stories and gospel songs and coaxing t come to Harlem Baptist Churc and hear and see for themselve Some of the best members of ou church were drawn to us in thi way. So the motion picture ha been a Godsend to us.

"New England Bygones"

By Ella Shannon Bowles

THE senior boy and girl classes of the Sunday School decided to entertain their friends by holding a "New England Bygones Party."

Charming dames of early days were painted on the invitations. Tiny pieces of white eiderdown were pasted on their hands for muffs, and minute ribbon bows decorated their coquettish caps.

Strings of popcorn, festoons of cranberries and ropes of evergreen were hung around the hall, and the stage was set to represent an old time kitchen. The electric lights were covered with red crepe paper and the stage was lighted with candles. The guests had been asked to come in the costumes of long past years, and ladies with ringlets bowed coyly to gentlemen in stock collars.

The first event of the evening was a spelling bee and after a half hour's trial at the hard words assigned, a copy of "The Foolish Dictionary" was awarded the person who successfully "spelleddown" each contestant, and a dunce cap was given for a consolation prize.

Old games of "Stage Coach," "Hunt The Thimble," "Clap In and Clap Out," and "Bird, Beast and Fish" were then played. Th night before the party, silhouette of the classes and teachers had bee made by casting the shadows o their faces on wrapping paper an drawing around them. These ha been cut out and mounted on blac cambric and hung around the room A framed silhouette was presente to the person guessing the mos faces.

These games and contests wer followed by an easily arranged pro gram. The first number was series of shadow pictures adapte from Lowell's "Courting;" a humor ous reading, "How The Deacon Le The Calf" was given, and tw couples in costume sang and enacte "Reuben and Rachel." A series o tableaux depicting "New Englan Bygones," The Girl With Th Spinning Wheel, The Old Spinnin Wheel At Rest, The Husking Bee The Quilting and The Singin School, followed. The Singin School was made up of members o the classes and at the end of th tableau they sang a number of ol time songs.

Refreshments of sugared doughnuts, popped corn passed in wooden chopping trays, apples, molasses candy, and lemonade were served

Christian Citizenship

THE whole world getting right with God! This is the vision and the definite aim of the World's Christian Citizen- Conference at Pittsburgh, Pa., N ember 9-16, 1919.

n-sectarian, as well as international, is this notable assembly which gathers to demonstrate effectively and eloquently that Christian principles are the only real and final solution of world-wide social and moral problems.

jects of the conference are fivefold:

o collect and present authentic data as to the actual character of all existing governments, how far the character in Christian lands has been determined by the influence of Christianity; how far it is expressed in and secured by law, and the present attitude and policy of the native governments in missionary lands.

o consider definitely the present political, social and industrial conditions of the world, with the distinct and definite purpose of relating human society with God in all these relations in life.

o deal with moral problems with which governments necessarily deal, such as the moral element in public education; vice and crime; prison reform; marriage and divorce, polygamy; social impurity; intemperance, the weekly rest day; capital and labor; Bolshevism; anarchy; war and peace.

To discuss Christian principles in their application to governmental moral problems as their only real solution.

O devise means of effective co-operation among Christian patriots of all nations, including, it may be, some form of permanent organization and provision for future similar conferences.

Nine world commissions of nine members each have been appointed to prepare and present reports regarding conditions in: Capital and Labor; Intemperance; The Lord's Day; Social Purity; The Family; Immigration; Mormonism; Peace; and Public Education.

The gathering is under the auspices of the veteran National Reform Association formed (over half a century ago); that splendid interdenominational and nonpartisan group of many tens of thousands of Christian patriots in all parts of the United States, working aggressively to uphold and extend Christian ideals, customs and laws everywhere. The holding of international conferences is one of its greatest endeavors.

Rev. James A. Cosby
Sec. National Reform Association

Rev. Dr. W. M. Rochester

Rev. John L. Sutton

Rev. Charles O. Bemie

Samuel B. Steadwell
Pres. American Purity Federation

PRELIMINARY to this great conference a declaration of principles for Christian civic world reconstruction has been made by a representative committee of American and foreign Christian patriots. This declaration of principles is the keynote of the Conference. It summarizes the great problems of reconstruction, which include the rebuilding of the very framework of human society; it points out the imminent danger that "mankind, in a passion to rear new superstructures to hide the ruins of the war, will forget to build upon the sure foundations laid of old;" it emphasizes the fact that the woe of the nations bring deeper than mortal remedy," "Jesus the Divine Ruler alone can rescue"; that Democracy, "the chosen human instrumentality of our Lord for civil government among men," "must embody His law in its statutes and conform its customs to His Gospel of man's duty to man."

Certain that "no nation ever fell while it was right with God," the Conference aims to line up Christian leaders around the world for effective co-operation, probably through some form of permanent organization.

AMERICAN reformers and experts in Christian welfare form the majority of the speakers. "Bolshevism and its Antidote" is discussed by the Hon. Charles E. Hughes; "Righteousness in International Relations," by President Nicholas Murray Butler, Columbia University; and the "Federation of Nations," by Rev. Dr. C. E. Jefferson. The Conference will hear Hon. Gifford Pinchot on "Social Justice and Conservation"; Rev. Dr. Charles Stelgle on "Christianity and Industrialism"; Senator Arthur Capper, on "Christian Ideals in Official Life."

The first World's Christian Citizenship Conference in 1910 drew religious leaders from seven nations; the second in 1913 attracted Christian patriots and welfare workers from seventeen countries, and no assembly hall in Portland, Ore. was large enough to seat the throngs who wanted to help in establishing a world of justice and a world of Peace.

The third conference at Pittsburgh heralds the great forward post-war movement of humanity to visualize the influence of Christianity, to apply the principles of Christ's laws as the one sure "safety first" rule for all the nations.

Make Money in Your Own Home

This is a very unusual advertisement, due to a very unusual condition. We want thousands of new workers, men and women, to make socks for us at home on The Auto Knitter. Our need for these workers is very acute.

We are a large hosiery concern doing a world-wide business. Not only in The United States, but throughout the world, there is a great hosiery shortage. Though we employ an army of home-workers we cannot fill our orders.

Parents Can Help Young People Rightly to Enjoy Life

By Uthai Vincent Wilcox

WHEN boys and girls reach the high school age they seek and require pleasures and amusements in keeping with their growing intelligence. The mental strain of the modern school curriculum makes it imperative that the right kind and amount of recreation be furnished them by those who ought most closely to guard their best interests. In order to make their social meetings as pleasant and profitable as possible, it is necessary to give the subject thoughtful consideration.

Young people at this age often present difficult problems. In order to bring them the greatest good, no haphazard, ill-considered plans of amusement should be adopted. We can not entertain them with stories and toys, but we should be careful lest we arrange for pleasures which excite the passions and enervate the soul. Oftentimes parties for young people in these days are marked with extravagance and mental dissipation.

"When I arrange for a young people's social gathering," said a bright mother, "I invite with the others the best men and women of my acquaintance — boys and girls they are still, in spite of their gray heads. Of course, I let the young people plan the program, issue the invitations and take the part of hosts and hostesses, although their father and I are the real powers behind the throne. We help to see that the program is as varied and bright as possible.

"The presence of such older friends among the younger insures the very best conduct on the part of the boys and girls, for youth always respects age when coupled with the grace, dignity and sympathy which wisdom has added to the years. These older people bear their years with all the buoyancy of youth, and contribute as no one else can, to the joy of the occasion, and it is difficult to say which enjoys the others presence the most."

What a splendid and ideal arrangement! Such a plan benefits immeasureably both youth and maturity. The mixing of the life and enthuasiam of the young people with the wisdom and discretion of their elders is bound to be of benefit to the whole community. Such social gatherings wisely planned would forever discredit the now too prevalent belief that the older people are "dry and dull." And, on the other hand, the seniors would find that youth is not always, "wild and reckless and irresponsible."

"We have games," this wise mother continued. "These are often original and very ingenious. A boy of seventeen recently proposed that we have a contest opened in the company for the most original and best game. Imagine the pleasure and surprise of the young people when a man sixty years old carried off the honors.

"Our programs generally open with good music and singing. The young people like to sing, the rhythm and melody of song lends itself to youth and acts as a safety valve for pent up spirits. We have dialogues, discussions of current topics that often bring out the most original arguments, and some wisely selected humour either in recitations or stories with moral and satirical conclusions. Refreshments when served are always simple and without display and expense.

"These little affairs are always without ostentation and very informal. But that does not mean that there is the slightest disregard for the proprieties. Young people in such an atmosphere are wonderfully well-behaved, and really learn to enjoy themselves so that outside pleasures of a rougher and coarser kind pall upon them. We aim to secure the amusement of all at the expense of none. Among us are bright boys and girls whose social advantages are limited, and whose resources financially are meager, and who often shrink to appear in social gatherings because of this. For the sake of these whom we wish to help and encourage, we avoid display."

And the whole keynote of this mother's plan, and she was generously supported by her husband, was summed up in her statement made to another parent. It was this: "We try to make play as profitable and educating as work, recognizing, as we do the powerful influence of our pleasures especially on the young."

Some one may say, "Social gatherings tend to detract from the work of the church and the young people's society and the Sabbath-school." But just the reverse is the result. On such evenings splendid suggestions are frequently made, and the discussions promoted are such that they help the young people to rightly regard these organizations. Talents are developed and discovered among some that might never have known to be in existence. The older guests learn the viewpoint of the others in reference to church work and missionary activities that will make their appeals several times more effective.

Girls and boys must have enjoyment, and they are wise parents who let them have it at home. It is not always easy nor is it necessary to fall in with every request young people make with reference to their recreation, but it is of vital importance that every child, old or young, should feel that what it desires to do can be done at home — not in the home of some other boy or girl elsewhere. If parents are to know how their children are progressing in manners, morals and tastes, they must so act that the latter will feel that there is more than perfunctory interest.

Young people are wonderfully resourceful, and unless they know, by experience, that their parents care about their having a good time, they will go elsewhere when they wish to amuse themselves.

When a youth or maiden wills to stay at home and have their friends come there, because "it's more fun at home than anywhere else," they offer a tribute to father and mother, which surely compensates these faithful ones for all work of hand and brain. Is not such a triumph worth working for? Only in this way can a father or mother learn to know what their children desire and long for, and if this desire or inclination is not a wise one loving tact will be able to direct and change it. Tact, however is absolutely necessary.

Youthful confidence is a shy thing and often suspicious. It takes little to make a child feel that its father is too harsh and tyrannical and its mother a killjoy. Once this feeling is established, who shall overcome it? Young people with this impression will be found everywhere except at home when they "wish to have a good time." Wise and loving toleration on the part of parents will cause the children to cherish them with unconscious gratitude, which will increase with the years. This toleration does not mean that the boys and girls will think that whatever they do is right, but that there is wise forbearance and sympathetic understanding even when approval is withheld.

Girls Whom We Do Not Understand

By Lily Reed Tork

THREE of the teachers for our village school had been employed, but there was yet vacancy and the board were ing about for a teacher for fifth and sixth grades. There been some three or four appli- ts but for some reason none been accepted. Finally it was nored that a teacher from an- er part of the state had been ployed. The new teacher was n the country too! She would ive a week later, and it is need- to say that a week allows time quite a bit of surmising.

country girl to teach in our ool! What would she be like? s, she had a diploma from one of State Normals and came well ommended by other boards why was she coming two hun- d miles from home to teach? haps she could not get a posi- on in her home vicinity, or bably she was fleeing from the dow of some disagreeable love ir. Any way we women of the age determined to "go slow" making friends with the new cher and on her arrival in our vn the day before school opened found it impossible to get rd except at the one small hotel, hough she tried almost every vate home in the village.

ALTHOUGH we failed to show any degree of friendliness for new teacher she apparently did t notice our attitude and seemed rfectly unconscious of the high ll which we older women of the vn had erected as a defense ainst invasion. Miss Lucile, at was her name, had taught but short time when both boys and ls in her room began to express rked admiration for their new acher. She took part in their mes, taught them many new s, gave the girls instructions crocheting and other fancy work noon and told the little ones ny interesting stories of her other and sisters at home as well showing them pictures of scenes d animals taken at her home.

After some weeks Mrs. Jameson ered Miss Lucile board in her me provided she would care her own room. She gladly cepted and being used to helping th the housework at home was lling to do this and even more order that she might obtain a ace in a private family.

Two weeks later when Mrs. meson was prostrated with rheu- atism and no help could be had iss Lucile with the help of the ildren carried on the work with- t friction. A neighbor on in- iring of the afflicted woman as to she managed to keep the acher and her confined to her m was told. "Why she keeps e now, it would have been hard get such help as she has been, erything is put in shape and she d the children are ready for hool on time every morning. mentioned keeping Mildred home sterday to wash when Lucile sisted that she be allowed to go d that she would help with the ashing after school so she and ildred put out the weekly wash ter returning from school. Mil- red thinks there could not be nother teacher like Miss Lucile."

And that is just what Kathryn inks too" said Mrs. Myers, She really must be an excellent for Millie says every scholar the room simply loves her," oke Mrs. Warren.

And thus the imaginary wall gradually removed. The ll of evil surmisings, unjust iticism and wrong imaginations ich too many of we older women, instead of removing from the pathway of the young beginner, nurse and caress them until, sometimes, they stand a serious barrier between the struggling girl and success. When Lucile Holton left our village it was with deep regrets on the part of both students and patrons and a hope that she would come back next term.

From our village she went to take a small school several miles out in the country. Here too she was unable to find a home except with a Mrs. Holmes, who was in delicate health. She was to help with the work in exchange for her board. A new baby arrived at the home a week after school began and she took up the task of helping with the housework, churning, etc., as well as foster mother to six children yet she and the children were always at school on time. Mrs. Holmes was able to be up in two weeks but was unable to do any heavy work. Her health went fast. Soon the doctors pronounced it an abscess on the lung. Her case soon became hopeless and after lingering two months the end came. During all these weeks it was Lucile Holton who stood by the suffering woman in every way that a dutiful daughter could have done and ministered to her every need, lending every assistance possible.

WHEN the mother was too weak to care for the infant the young girl took it in bed with her and gave all care that could be given. When spoken to about the difficult task of looking after the little ones she would say, "caring for children comes very natural since I was brought up with half a dozen and was the oldest."

When the dying mother felt that the end was near she called the young girl to her bedside and taking her by the hand begged her to stay in the home to look after the children and care for the tender babe. To be sure the brave little teacher realized that such a thing could not be but did she sadden the dying mother's last hours by answering her to that affect? Not in the least, but said very kindly, "Mrs. Holmes, I shall be glad to do every thing in my power for the children" And she did. Her school had closed two weeks before. She remained in the home two weeks, taking care of the little ones, washed, ironed and put away the mother's clothing and at the father's suggestion went to town, selected material and made the necessary winter clothing for the children. Having put every thing in order she went as silently as she came; back to her country home. The bereaved husband insisted on paying her for services rendered but her work was one of love. She would accept no pay.

There were no barriers between Lucile Holton and the people of our village when she said good bye. Why should there have been any walls between us when she came? We simply did not understand as we should have done.

Household Hints

Iron and rust spots may be removed by a dilute solution of oxalic acid.

Tarnished silver may be brightened by being rubbed with moist salt and then washed in ammonia.

Brown stains in porcelain wash basins, tubs, etc., caused by an abundance of iron in the water supply, may be removed by the use of hydrochloric acid, followed by rinsing, then by the application of a solution of soda.

The Simple Way-

The easy, practical way to polish and preserve finished surfaces is Johnson's Prepared Wax and a cloth—you don't need brushes, sprays or mops of any kind. Simply apply the Wax with a cloth and then polish with a dry cloth—very little rubbing is required to produce an exquisite, lustrous polish of great beauty and durability.

Johnson's Prepared Wax is not only a polish but a wonderful preservative—it forms a thin, protecting film over the finish, similar to the service rendered by a piece of plate glass over a desk, table or dresser-top.

Johnson's Prepared Wax gives perfect results over any finish—varnish, shellac, oil, etc. It imparts a hard, dry, velvety polish which is impervious to water, dust, scratches, heel-marks, finger-prints, etc. The finish obtained is always sanitary—durable and disinfecting.

JOHNSON'S
Liquid and Paste
PREPARED WAX

Johnson's Prepared Wax contains no oil, consequently it cannot discolor the wood or catch dust and dirt. It never becomes soft and sticky in the hottest weather or from the heat of the body—and it doesn't show finger-prints.

Johnson's Prepared Wax is made in paste, liquid and powdered form. We recommend the Liquid Wax for polishing furniture, woodwork and automobiles. Use the Paste Wax for polishing floors of all kinds—wood, linoleum, tile, etc. Sprinkle Johnson's Powdered Wax over any floor and you can immediately put it in perfect condition for dancing.

Johnson's Prepared Wax is just as necessary around the house as soap. Keep it always on hand for cleaning and polishing—only takes a few moments to attach em when you know how. No jack re- ired. Study the directions. Practice akes perfect. No danger of injury to tires.

THE careful driver regularly gives his car "the once over" every few days before he takes it out of the garage. He gives a turn or two to the grease cups—tests out the brakes, sees that there is a sufficient supply of , water and gasoline and that the batteries are in good condition, etc. By doing he is assured, barring accidents, that he will have no trouble on the ad. But—

HOW few there are that pay the slightest attention to the proper method of attaching Weed Tire Chains

Rain comes on, the road and pavements ddenly become slippery and treacherous the car slips or skids—the Weed Chains, rried in nearly every tool box, are hauled t and a hundred to one the driver has ly a hazy idea how to attach them. He mbles around, gets hot under the collar d falsely accuses them of being a nuisance.

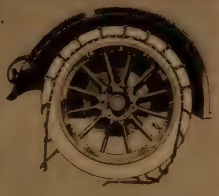
Women drivers are very numerous nowa- ys. They are driving out into the untry over all sorts of roads—they surely ed protection against the dangerous skid. ow many of them know how to put on eed Chains? Have you ever instructed ur wife, your sister or your daughter?

The directions for attaching Weed Chains e simple yet most important. Avoid annoyances on the road—learn how easy it is to put them on correctly—practice in the garage and give the women instruction. It will amply repay you in security, satisfaction and comfort.

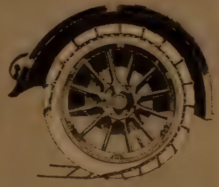
Printed instructions for attaching Weed Chains are packed in every bag—If you desire a copy write us and we will gladly mail it to you.

Weed Chains are also made to meet the demand for an anti-skid device for trucks equipped with single and dual solid tires or with the very large pneumatic tires. They are so constructed that they satisfactorily meet the requirements of heavy truck service in mud, sand or snow.

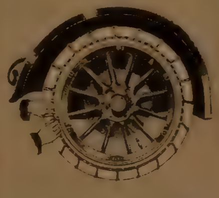
Observe these three fundamentals



Lay chains over wheel with hooks toward rear, and tuck the slack under front part of wheel.



Start car forward just enough to run over slack ends.



Hook chains as tightly as possible by hand.

AMERICAN CARE OF MEXICANS

By EDWARD L. DOHENY

EDWARD L. DOHENY, the pioneer developer of petroleum in California and Mexico, has made the following statement which we are glad to print, as it will correct any misapprehensions which might have come to readers from "The Case of Mexico", which appeared in a recent number.

Mexican Children at Tampico attending a free school maintained by an American Oil Company of which Edward L. Doheny is president

HAVE seen with surprise an article appearing in the Christian Herald of October 4th, 1919, which has set me down as an 'interventionist', working for military occupation of Mexico for h ends. This allegation is a repetition of similar ges frequently made by adherents of the Carranza né, who, unable to defend their efforts to confis- the petroleum properties situated in Mexico in h I and many other American investors have ts, seek to avoid the issue and deceive the Ameri- public by unfounded charges to the effect that we conspiring to induce the United States to enter a campaign of conquest against Mexico.

fter the full disclosures which have been so recently e before the United es Senate Investi- ng Committee, it ld be unnecessary peat that there is no h in such charges. the situation is so expressed in the wing clipping from mportant New Eng- l daily newspaper I desire to quote full:

The bare facts of Mexican oil ques- , unclouded by pro- andists and entirely blished by the d of four foreign ernments, are:

'The Mexican Gov- ment has enacted s providing for the poiling of foreign producers and in- tors in lands in xico.

'The American Gov- ment has protested; American com- ies have brought t in the Mexican rts.

'Pro-Carranza publicists cannot justify the steal; y turn to dragnet, bird-shot calumny of those they uld despoil.

"The American Government has said, 'Thou shalt t steal.' The Mexican propagandists reply, 'Those o have what we covet are working for war.' And o the campaign of calumny have fallen the Ameri- n correspondents in Mexico (who must leave if they l to co-operate), some of the American newspapers, rical bodies assured that their rights will be pro- ted, and who apparently wish to see other Ameri- s despoiled, and certain American publications at do not yet know that in shouting 'they are work- for intervention,' they are crossing their own vernment in a matter of great moment, and encour- ing those who would make the American diplomatic titude a silly joke.

"Intervention may come, but if it does, it will be cause of the absolute failure of the Mexican Govern- nt to live up to its international obligations, and not cause the oil companies insist only upon recognition legally acquired rights."

I am striving and intend to continue to strive to the most of my ability to obtain protection for the es of my friends and American and Mexican co- rkers in Mexico and respect for our legal property hts—which, it must always be remembered, contrary false statements so frequently made, were not acquired concessions from the Mexican Government but in ry instance by private purchase or lease from the ividual Mexican owners of land,—acting in close ord with our own State Department and on lines d down by it. I am also trying to help the Mexican the American peoples to learn the exact truth out the present situation, its causes and the persons ponsible for it.

hese activities are the sole basis for the "inter- tionist" claim.

It is my confident hope that all the matters in which American rights are now being infringed can and will be arranged without war; but they will never be arranged at all if the facts are not known and if writers in religious magazines continue to vilify the American victims of injustice, to make it appear that they, and not their despoilers, on whom the American Government has served warning in their behalf, are the unrighteous aggressors.

I am a Catholic by birth and training, yet am surrounded by friends and business associates of the Protestant faith. John R. Mott, the greatest man in Protestant welfare work in Mexico will testify to my faith in and effective help to Protestant activities.

The effect upon me of unjust criticism by writers whom I charitably concede to be laboring under an excess of zeal is of astonishment that such things can be.

My long life of storm and stress has taught me the wisdom and the holy source of a God-born law, "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor."

It may in a measure show my interest in the welfare of my Mexican assistants and neighbors if I quote the following extract from the records of testimony under oath before the United States Senate's sub-committee investigating Mexican Affairs.

Mr. DOHENY. I would like to show the attitude of the oil people toward the people of Mexico, and to show we have not been unmindful of the needs of those people down there, as well as the rights of our own stockholders.

I ventured one day to say to Mr. Joaquin De Casasus, my lawyer and a close friend, in a moment of generosity, that I would like to have the opportunity of doing some good in the way of developing the best instincts of and of educating the people who were in our employ and who lived in the vicinity of the Huasteca region. I asked him if he would request his wife to ask Secretary Limantour if he would request his wife to become one of the sponsors for an academy I would establish at Ebano, or Chijol, or some other suitable place to be selected by us jointly for the education of the children of those who worked for us as well as those who might care to come from more distant localities. I offered to place at their disposal, for the purpose of carrying on this education $50,000. I asked them to furnish us with the teachers and to be sponsors for the school, so we could not be accused of doing something contrary to the laws of Mexico. That was submitted to Mr. Limantour in my presence by Mr. Casasus. It was acknowledged, and I never heard another word about it.

Years later, when Mr. Madero came into power, I told Mr. Madero of my desire to do something to start an educational institution on our property, or near it, at some suitable point, to develop a technical and agricultural school. I told him of the developments we had made which justified now a larger institution than the one I had talked of to Mr. Casasus, and I suggested that one of the healthiest places on our property, a place called Chijol, would be suitable, and that I would get our company to grant a thousand or more acres of land, or hectares of land, if that were needed, and we would start an institution there for the training of Mexicans of any age who might desire to learn agriculture; that we would build machine shops at other places needed to do the work in the oil camps and educate the young men and give them technical training.

I offered to contribute for the purpose $500,000. I made the offer again later on through Mr. Calero, who had been the minister of foreign relations for Madero and who was at that time ambassador to the United States. Mr. Calero promised me to take it up with Mr. Madero and see if a law could not be framed that would permit of the organization of such an institution and to have for its control such trustees as might be selected to see that the money was properly used.

The death of Mr. Madero the next spring prevented that from being carried on.

I just mention those as incidents to show the feeling which our company has always had toward the people among whom we were doing business since nearly 20 years ago.

SENATOR BRANDEGEE. Was this to be a free academy?

Mr. DOHENY. A free academy; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You have, however, carried on the schools, the photographs of which you showed here this morning?

Mr. DOHENY. We have carried them on at our own expense with competent teachers and they are training a large number of pupils. They are not public schools, but they are open to the public; they are privately maintained, but open to the public.

Here are some more photographs showing how the people live down there. I would like to place these on file to show we take care of our employees [handing photographs to the chairman].

The CHAIRMAN. They are very instructive.

Mr. DOHENY. These show the homes of the peons.

The CHAIRMAN. What rent do you charge your employees for those houses?

The Redemption of a Defaulter

A MAN told me this as we sat in front of the fireplace of his little home, while his wife and mine were busy with their sewing in another room.

"I was so glad you could come to dinner tonight," he said simply. "It is the fifteenth anniversary of my coming here."

I remembered his coming very well. A forlorn-looking family they were—himself, his frail little wife, and four half-starved children. Out of pity I had given him a job without asking for references, because I half suspected he could not furnish them. And in my foolish way I had supposed that it was I who had helped him to his feet again. I thought it was my doing; and not until that evening did I discover the real secret of his struggle out of failure into success.

"I was pretty near the bottom when I arrived fifteen years ago," he continued quietly. "You never asked me about the past; and I was grateful to you for it. If you had asked and acted on the information, I do not know what might have become of us. For the record was black enough.

"I have kept it a secret all these years; but tonight—on our anniversary—I should like to have you know. You may have suspected it: I was a defaulter. Every cent I had saved in the world had been taken to pay for my dishonesty, and it was only because my former employer took pity on my wife and children that I was not sent to jail."

He paused a moment, a quick flush of pain passing over his face, and I waited quietly for him to go on.

"I need not bother you with all the sordid details," he continued. "I was an expert accountant, as you know. It was part of the business of our company to administer concerns that had got themselves into financial difficulty. We were often appointed receiver by the courts, and one such concern was turned over by my people to my management.

"It was the old, old story. I thought I saw an opportunity to make a quick, sure profit. There were funds in the bank representing accounts that I had collected. I would need them only for a week or two; then they would be replaced. I would have my profit and no one would be the wiser. How many thousand men, I wonder, have seen the same mirage and lost their lives pursuing it?

"I 'borrowed' the funds; I made the move in the market—and lost. And after weeks of terror which almost robbed me of my senses, my shortage was discovered. My employers took my savings, my home, my insurance—everything. The amount was almost enough to cover the shortage, and in pity for the children, as I have said, they let me go, a broken, useless wreck without destination or plan.

"The loss of my savings was bad enough for a man at my time of life. But that was the least of my disasters. The experience had utterly destroyed my belief in myself; I walked the streets unnerved; I was a crook, saved from jail by my wife's helplessness, and the thought obsessed me."

Again he paused a moment, and I could see that he was wondering just how to go on.

"I won't take you through those weeks," he said; "they hurt even at this distance. But one afternoon, when I had tramped the streets all day looking for work and had found nothing, I opened the front door and stepped into the cold room where we were living. And there, beside the bed, I found my wife on her knees.

"She did not hear me enter. Her mind and heart were far away. She was praying—praying out loud—praying as I had never heard anyone pray before or since; calling out to the God of hopeless, helpless men and women to put new courage into me and to show us the way out. I cannot explain it; I do not pretend to understand. But in another instant, I, who had not prayed before for years, found myself by her side.....and somehow as we knelt there, our cry rising to heaven.....somehow there was born into my heart the firm conviction that God had heard.....

"I stood after that a changed man. The next day we took the tiny bit of money that was left to us and bought tickets for the farthest point to which it would carry us. That point happened to be here; and the following morning I came to you.

"That sounds like the end of the struggle, but it was really only the beginning. I took the job you offered me, but I took it as a broken man. I had no faith in myself; every day I expected to make a slip that would cost me my chance. The terror of what would happen if I lost the place made me almost unfit for work. Only one thing saved me—a thing not on this earth. Every morning, after breakfast she and I dropped to our knees; every evening we knelt together and thanked God that He had carried us through one more day.

"It was faith that He poured into me night and morning that pulled me through. I tell you that prayer is no matter of speculation to me. This home and my wife and child and everything worth while in my life is a monument to the truth that prayer is heard and answered."

Carrollton, Md. E. T.E.

Prayers for Sabbath Observance

ON the morning of every third Sunday I was either unable to attend or late at taking my place in the volunteer choir of the Mission Church. I wanted to be there, for I felt that I ought to be there; but my duties as a letter carrier necessitated my presence and active service at the post office.

For about one-third of us carriers were employed on Sundays, sorting and routing mail for the accommodation of patrons that called for their mail at the office on Sundays and to expedite delivery on Monday mornings. This Sunday labor was considered necessary and had its origin in the days when the arrival of the mail-coach at a settlement aroused hopes, fears, and curiosity relative to the contents of the pouch under the driver's seat. It increased until in the year 1910, according to a statement made by Dr. C. P. Grandfield, the First Assistant Postmaster General, at the National Convention of Letter Carriers held in Rochester, N. Y., 15,000 carriers reported every Sunday part of the day, and 30,000 every Sunday.

The wisdom and necessity of Sunday labor became a serious question of right or wrong with me, and earnestly I sought divine guidance relative as to how I, a Christian, ought to deal with this problem. Is it wrong? If so, then the U. S. Government is wrong.

I had been taught to consider as irreproachable our Government's sense of fairness in all its dealings, had banished contrary mental suggestions and was stubbornly slow to change my views and opinions until it was clearly demonstrated that Sunday mail delivery was wrong and an injustice to those business men who had regard for the day. For after I had been transferred to a purely business section of New York City, I was required to deliver as many as 700 letters to a single Sunday caller for mail, thus enabling him to transact extensive mail business and to obtain a day's advantage each week over competitors.

Distinctly I remember the scoffs and sarcastic replies on the part of a group of fellow carriers, when for the first time I gave expression to my conviction and said that if the Church and organizations of the Church were acquainted with Sunday post office conditions it would result in a marked improvement.

The resentment and opposition to the Churc which Jesus Christ is the head, and the expressio doubt of the sincerity of Christians came as a prise to me, and with heart-felt grief and distr prayed and plead with God for a manifestation o great power and glory through the agency of Church by closing the postoffices and release of thousands of postal employees on Sundays. I wre with God in prayer, exercising unquestionable f and obtained the assurance that my prayer had heard. Thereupon I acted the part of a man knew the mind of God in this matter. My faith sorely tried; I was shunned and despised by the in the postal service, was considered visionary mentally unbalanced.

More than seven years have passed since C gress approved and President Taft signed a bill made it a statute law for post offices of the first second class to be cl to the general public Sundays, providing that the few men of necessity work on S days receive compensat time of rest on a w day.

Credit for this splen legislation has been cla ed by many of our dis guished public men, various organizations and by individuals connec with the postal service, but to our God belong the praise and honor. He was the mainspring, real power, the guiding, energizing and propel influence back of this great nation-wide movement.

As his effective agency, God chose the Lo Day Alliance of the United States, a representat organization of the Church, which, aside from prom ing Sabbath observance in the postal service, has b instrumental in changing the generally prevail resentful attitude of post-office men toward Church into one of high regard and esteem. Cou less testimonies have been received by Dr Bowl the General Secretary of the Lord's Day Alliance of the United States, and also by the writer, relativ the beneficent effect upon the lives of postal employ and their families, of conversions, increased atte ance, and active participation in Church work.

A Vision and Fulfillment

JUST previous to holding revival services on one the early appointments in my ministry, I beca greatly burdened for the conversion of a leading m in the community. For several days my soul was an agony for his salvation. One night, I had a visio not a dream, but a vision as real as life. I was in t pulpit preaching the sermon. Near the middle of discourse, the door into the auditorium was sudde opened and the unbeliever for whom I had pray who had never attended our service before, walked His face was pale as death; his whole form trembl with emotion. As he hurried along the aisle to altar, a dozen of his friends followed him, all kne ing together, sobbing and crying for mercy. Afte brief struggle, the man of my prayers arose; his f was radiant with joy; glory filled his soul, while t whole audience shouted the praises of God. My o soul was in such an ecstasy of delight that, as I awo I continued my exclamations of praise for seve minutes. I could hardly realize that the vision w not a reality.

During the day following, I proclaimed my fa in the coming victory to several intim friends, saying that I believed the vis would come true on that evening. Wh I was delivering the sermon that night found myself looking towards the d every few moments. Only a few in audience knew what I was expecting.

Suddenly, as though the door h been burst open, the man stood ins with face white with terror. Instantly marched up the aisle, while twelve oth seekers followed him.

That sermon was never finished; was lost amid the cries for mercy. T entire audience was on its knees in pray In a few moments, the shouts of victo filled the house. One hundred and fif conversions followed that night of pray during several weeks of revival service.

The spirit of God had rolled up my soul a burden for this man, who sto as a leader in the town in opposition the church. I had never spoken with hi on the subject of his conversion. He d not know that I was praying for hi and yet I felt as though I could die for redemption. He surrendered like a Sa of Tarsus under the Divine arrows of co viction, that he might be saved a hundreds of others might follow him in the Kingdom of Jesus.

A Prayer That Won 100,000 Souls

IT is difficult to write one story upon this subject, when so many lives have been packed full of wonderful answers to prayer. Many years ago, Dr. Munhall was practicing dentistry in the West where we resided. His office was nearly opposite mine, on East Market Street, Indianapolis. His business was increasing, but many of his evenings were spent in the services of the Y. M. C. A. and in other religious work. These grew, bidding fair to encroach upon business hours. It was evident that dental hours must suffer, or doings in Christian work must be reduced. He got anxious and called in his friends to consider. They advised prayer to seek Divine wisdom and guidance, and to show Dr. Munhall his plain duty. The answer came to their prayers! There was no room for doubt,—the business of dentistry, it was quickly decided, must be given into other hands. The dental office was sold out and as far as possible the doctor gave his whole attention to Christian work. Later, he became an evangelist, known throughout the Union, "throwing out the Life Line," holding services in many places. In some cities of the West, where he held services it was estimated that 20,000 souls confessed Christ as Saviour, in others 10,000, and some less. In one Eastern city over 10,000 offered themselves. I remember he visited the saloons in one place, shaking hands and inviting the bartenders to attend his meetings. This appeared such a "new wrinkle" to them that they agreed to close their saloons that day and attend. And so increasingly we saw the effect of his pleadings and we kept counting the numbers of those brought into the fold until the 100,000 mark was passed. Was this not a wonderful answer to Prayer?

A Prayer for an Education

IVED on a small farm in North Mississippi with my parents. We were poor and in 1916, year in which this incident urred, the corn crops in our sec- n were destroyed by floods and cotton crop was destroyed by l weevil. It was a year of asters, and failure was parked on our little place.

was twenty-seven years of age d for a long time I had looked for day when I would be able to go college; but now all hope seemed lden, and I paraphrase that an- nt but ever-living question that ac propounded to Abraham: ather, here is the boy; there is college, but where is the money?"

Yet somehow out of my anatomy gan to bubble that old song: "I coming, Lord." Over in the cor- of the little farm were a few res of timber, the trees large enough saw-logs. On one hot day in Au- t of that year, Mr. B. F. Bane, timber-dealer, came driving up to r place, wanting to purchase some nber. He came as the ram in the shes. He had looked through the iniature forest in the corner of the ace and said that he would give 00 for our timber right. Immedi- ly Dad accepted the offer and the o were off to draw up the timber ed. Then Dad returned and told I could have enough of the money land me in college and pay my en- ance fees. Needless to say I accepted e offer. As a result, to-day, I am inister of the Christian Church at ittle River, Kansas. And since my ming to that work, six months ago, enty-two souls have been added to church; the organization is good d now I am enabled to finish my llege degree.

A Prayer That Brought Back A Prodigal

TOM CRANE was the only son of his parents. At the age of eighteen he ran away from home. Time passed and no word concerning his whereabouts came to the distressed father and mother. The mother was a woman of strong, deep-rooted faith. She prayed that they might be informed where their boy was. As days, weeks, and months went by, leaving her anguished petition still unanswered, instead of losing faith she only sought the throne of Grace all the more frequently, and the more confidently.

There came a day, a gray lowering day, in the month of December, when the mother experienced an indefinable, intuitive feeling that her boy was in great and sore trouble—in need of her—longing for her presence. All day long, as she went calmly about the usual duties this feeling oppressed her heart. As the long day drew near its close the burden of her thoughts increased. Unable to longer bear the weight alone she retired to an inner room and, locking the door, fell upon her knees in prayer. On this occasion she did not plead that her boy might be kept from the danger of temptation and that their anxiety concerning him might be relieved. Instead she asked for him a friend, an earthly friend, some one who might take her place in this time of his need and help him to resist the power of the tempter. She arose from her knees greatly comforted and went forth again to her work. Had others been present they would have noticed a strange transforming light on her countenance.

While the scene described was taking place in the sorrow-stricken home, at another place, several hundred miles distant, a noted physician was dismissing from his consultation room a young man—suffering, broken down wreck of humanity. "I can do nothing for you until you overcome the alcoholic habit," the physician was curtly saying. "Good afternoon."

The man—he was little more than a boy—stumbled blindly from the room. In the corridor outside he almost collided with a man a year or two his senior. Doctor Harris was an understudy in the office of the celebrated Doctor Davis. The young student looked after the forlorn figure shuffling down the corridor with interest and sympathy. "I cannot define my feeling," he said, when later he was narrating what followed. A strange insistent Something—a compelling Presence, seemed to oblige me to follow the boy and learn what was wrong with him—in what way I could help him. I am glad I went after him. He had traveled a long ways into the "Far" country and he was dangerously near to committing suicide. I sent him out to Cleever's sanitarium for a month's treatment. When he was dismissed there I found him something to do. For six months I did not lose sight of him. I am glad I did not. In the end the young man made good. Two weeks ago, a thoroughly reformed prodigal, he returned to his home.

Deliverance from Chinese Rowdies

MANY years ago, in the pioneer days, four missionaries, two quite new and green, were journeying in China. For two weeks we sailed in comfort up a big river by large native houseboat, then reaching a small tributary were obliged to hire instead, two small, low boats. There was a dead calm, the heat intense, the river-bed all but dry and our pace snail-like.

It was noised abroad that "foreign devils," never before seen in those parts, were in boats on the river. We were visited by curious crowds, men and boys wading into the river and surrounding our boats. Thus it became necessary for my husband to stay all day in the water that our progress be not entirely impeded. All day, also, to appease curiosity, I sat on deck in the broiling sun under my white umbrella. Little naked boys, with impish delight, drenched me over and over.

Throngs of blue-clad women, debarred from wading because of bound feet, gathered impatiently on the banks. Their men folk took possession of our boats and dragged them shore-ward for the women's entertainment.

After three such days, with no human help near,—resources exhausted, nerves overtaxed, health endangered and lives imperiled—we still knew, theoretically, that our extremity was God's opportunity.

When, at noon, we found ourselves strangely alone, the populace having gone to midday rice, we unitedly gave ourselves to definite prayer. We claimed the promises and asked for the impossible—wind and water to speed us on. We looked up from prayer to see men wading out to resume hostilities hesitate and hurry back to shore. We then noted flecks of foam in the water and looking up stream saw a great, foamy wave approaching.

It reached us suddenly, raised our boat from the sandbank, a favorable wind sprang up; our sails were hoisted and we sailed away from our dazed and disappointed tormentors. We sailed on rapidly far into the moonlight night, anchoring at last in a quiet haven where the presence of "foreign devils" was unsuspected. Our destination was reached in safety, with faith strengthened and lives enriched by an experimental knowledge of God's power to answer prayer.

Listening to the "Great White Father"

An Indian Group in North Dakota Hears President Wilson Talk on the League of Nations.

WHEN President Wilson was in North Dakota on his recent speaking tour asking the people to support the League of Nations, he had no hearers who were more interested than some of the Indians who came to see the "Great Father" and to hear him. The Indians came from the Standing Rock reservation, and while the women wore the dress of the white women they retained some of the Indian characteristics of dress by wearing shawls over their heads. A few years ago they would have worn blankets, and modern millinery has not yet found favor with some of the women, although the younger generation of Indians take kindly to it. The men dress just as the white men dress and some of the younger men affect rather "sporty" clothes such as no Indian of a few years ago would have thought of wearing. How much of the speech of President Wilson the Indians "sensed" no one may know, but they saw the "Great Father" and that was worth while. J. L. H.

BETTY HOPE — A SERIAL STORY IN SEVEN PARTS

By GRACE LIVINGSTON HILL, (MRS. LUTZ). Illustrated by B. N. SALG

PART 3

CHAPTER V

WHEN Betty found herself seated on the day coach of a way train, jogging along toward a town she had ever seen and away from the scenes and the people of her childhood, she found herself trembling violently. It was as if she had suddenly been placed in an airplane all by herself and started off to the moon without any knowledge of her motor power or destination. It both frightened and exhilarated her. She wanted to cry and she wanted to laugh, but she did neither. Instead she sat demurely for the first hour and a half looking out of the window like any traveler, scarcely turning her head nor looking at anything in the car. It seemed to her that there might be a detective in every seat just waiting for her to lift her eyes that he might recognize her. But gradually as the time dragged by and the landscape grew monotonous she began to feel a little more at her ease. Furtively she studied her neighbors. She had seldom traveled in a common car, and it was new to her to study all types as she could see them here. She smiled at a dirty baby and wished she had something to give it. She studied the careworn man and the woman in b'ack who wept behind her veil and would not smile no matter how hard the man tried to make her. It was a revelation to her that any man would try as hard as that to make a woman smile. She watched the Italian family with five children and nine bundles, and counted the colors on a smart young woman who got in at a way station. Every minute of the day was interesting. Every mile of dreary November landscape that whirled by gave her more freedom.

She opened the little shabby handbag that Jane had given her and got out the bit of mirror one inch by an inch and a half backed with pasteboard on which lingered particles of the original green taffeta lining and studied her own strange face, trying to get used to her new self and her new name. Jane had written it, Betty Hope, on the back of the envelope containing the address of her mother. It seemed somehow an identification card. She studied it curiously and wondered if Betty Hope was going to be any happier than Betty Stanhope had been. And then she fell to thinking over the strange experiences of the last twenty-four hours and wondering whether she had done right or not, and whether her father would have been disappointed in her, "ashamed of her," as her stepmother had said. Somehow Jane had made her feel that he would not, and she was more light-hearted than she had been for many a day.

Late in the afternoon she began to wonder what Tinsdale would be like. In the shabby handbag was her ticket to Tinsdale and eight dollars and a half in change. It made her feel richer than she had ever felt in her life, although she had never been stinted as to pocket money. But this was her very own, for her needs, and nobody but herself to say how she should spend either it or her time.

Little towns came in sight and passed, each one with one or two churches, a schoolhouse, a lot of little houses. Would Tinsdale look this way? How safe these places seemed, yet lonely too! Still, no one would ever think of looking for her in a lonely little village.

They passed a big brick institution, and she made out the words "State Asylum" and shuddered inwardly as she thought of what Jane had told her about the morning paper. Suppose they should hunt her up and put her in an Insane Asylum, just to show the world that it had not been their fault that she had run away from her wedding! The thought was appalling. She dropped her head on her hand with her face toward the window and tried to pretend she was asleep and hide the tears that would come, but presently a boy came in at a station with a big basket and she bought a ham sandwich and an apple. It tasted good. She had not expected that it would. She decided that she must have been pretty hungry and then fell to counting her money, aghast that the meager supper had made such a hole in her capital. She must be very careful. This might be all the money she would have for a very long time, and there was no telling what kind of an impossible place she was going to. She might have to get away as eagerly as she had come. Jane was all right, but that was not saying that her mother and sisters would be.

It was growing dark, and the lights were lit in the car. All the little Italian babies had been given drinks of water, and strange things to eat, and tumbled to sleep across laps and on seats, anywhere they would stick. They looked so funny and dirty and pitiful with their faces all streaked with soot and molasses candy that somebody had given them. The mother looked tired and greasy and the father was fat and dark, with unpleasant black eyes that seemed to roll a great deal. Yet he was kind to the babies and his wife seemed to like him. She w dered what kind of a home they had, and what r tion the young fellow with the shiny dark curls b to them. He seemed to take as much care o babies as their father and mother did.

The lights were flickering out in the villages n and gave a friendly inhabited look to the hou Sometimes when the train paused at stations Be could see people moving back and forth at w seemed to be kitchen tables and little child bringing dishes out, all working together. It was one thing to run aw from something that you hated, but it was anot to jump into a new life where one neither knew was known. Betty began to shrink inexpressi from it all. Not that she wanted to go back! Oh, far from it! But once when they passed a lit white cemetery with tall dark fir trees waving gua ingly above the white stones she looked out alm wistfully. If she were lying in one of those be her father and mother how safe and rested she wo be. She wouldn't have to worry any more. Wh was it like where father and mother had gone? W there any? But somehow that did seem to be the commonly accepted bel There was always a beyond in most peopl minds, and a fear of just what Betty did know. She was a good deal of a heath though she did not know that either.

Then, just as she was floundering in lot of theological mysteries of her own d covery the nasal voice of the conduc called out: "Tinsdale! Ti dale!" and she hurried her feet in something o panic, suddenly conscious her short hair and qu clothes.

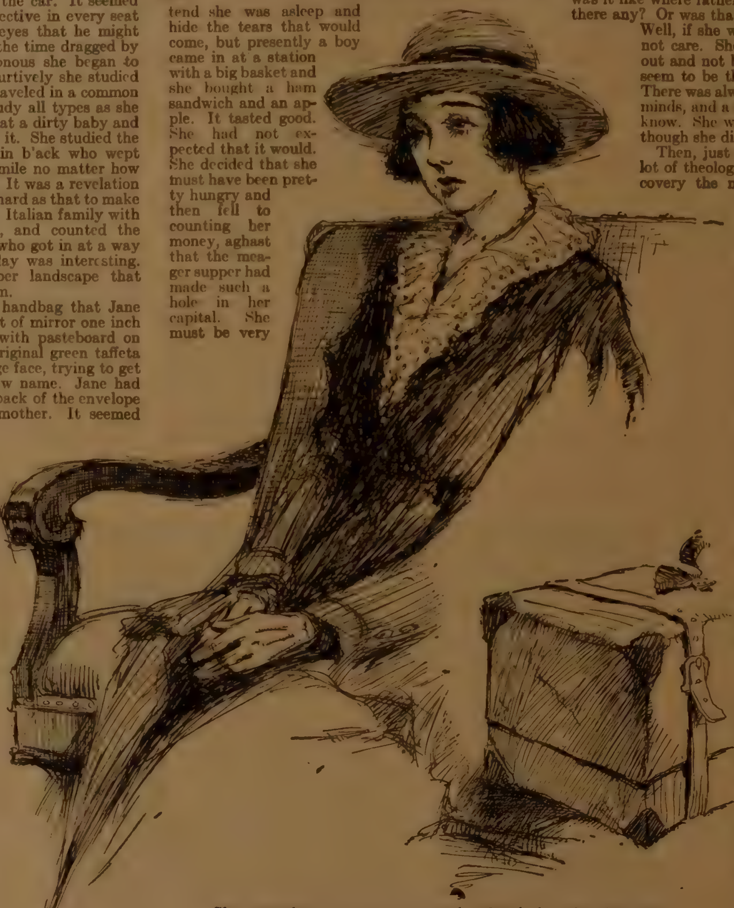
The Story Thus Far

Elizabeth Stanhope faints at the altar as she is to be married and then flees from the vestry room of the church when she is left alone momentarily. On the street she appeals to Jane Carson, who agrees to hide her. Jane takes her to a cheap lodging house, gives her a neat serge dress in exchange for the beautiful satin wedding gown and after learning that Elizabeth refuses to return home, arranges for her to go to the Carson home in the village of Tinsdale. Elizabeth takes the name of Betty Hope and the girls contrive a crude disguise to prevent recognition of the runaway bride, for already the newspapers have made a sensation of the disappearance of the wealthy, fashionable girl on her wedding night. Jane's sweetheart is employed in the office of Warren Reyburn, a young lawyer and Jane is making her plans to call on Reyburn to assist her new friend.



She wanted to cry and she wanted to laugh, but she did neither. Instead she sat demurely, scarcely turning her head.

he house was a square wooden affair, long wanting t, and trimmed with little scrollwork around the inutive front porch. The color was indescribable, nding well into the surroundings either day or t. It had a cheerful, decent look, but seemed very . There was a small yard about it with a picket e, and a leafless lilac bush, and a cheerful bar- ry flanked the gate on either side. The front was open into a tiny hall and beyond the light eamed forth from a glass lamp set on a pleasant ing-room table covered with a red cloth. Betty pped inside the gate and found herself enveloped two motherly arms, and then led into the light d warmth of the family dining-room.

CHAPTER VI

THERE was a kettle of stew on the stove in the kitchen, kept hot from supper for Betty, with fresh dumplings just mixed before the train ne in, and bread and butter with apple sauce and cookies. They made her sit right down and eat, before she even took her hat off, and they all sat around her and talked while she ate. It made her feel very much at home as if somehow she was a real relative.

It came over her once how different all this was from the house which she had called home all her life. The fine napery, the cut glass and silver, the stately butler! And here was she eating off a stone china plate thick enough for a table top, with a steel knife and fork and a spoon with the silver worn off the bowl. She could not help wondering what her stepmother would have said to the red and white tablecloth, and the green shades at the windows. There was an old sofa covered with carpet in the room, with a flannel patchwork pillow, and a cat cuddled up cosily beside it purring away like a tea-kettle boiling. Somehow, poor as it was, it seemed infinitely more attractive than any room she had ever seen before, and she was charmed with the whole family. Bobbie sat at the other end of the table with his elbows on the table and his round eyes on her. When she smiled at him he winked one eye and grinned and then wriggled down under the table out of sight.

The mother had tired kind eyes and a firm cheerful mouth like Jane's, and she took Betty right in as if she had been her sister's child.

"Come, now, get back there, Emily. Don't hang on Betty. She'll be tired to death of you right at the start. Give her a little peace while she eats her supper. How long have you and Jane been friends, Betty?" she asked, eager for news of her own daughter.

Betty's cheeks flushed and her eyes grew troubled. She was very much afraid that being Betty was going to be hard work:

"Why, not so very long," she said hesitatingly.

"Are you one of the girls in her factory?"

"Oh, no!" said Betty wildly, wondering what would come next, "We- just met- that is- why- out one evening!" she finished desperately.

"Oh, I see!" said the mother, "Yes, she wrote about going out sometimes, mostly to the movies. And to church. My children always make it a point to go to church wherever they are. I brought 'em up that way. I hope you go to church."

"I shall love to," said Betty eagerly.

"Is your mother living?" was the next question.

"No," answered Betty. "Mother and father are both dead and, I've been having rather a hard time. Jane was kind to me when I was in trouble."

"I'll warrant you! That's Jane!" beamed her mother happily. "Jane always was a good girl, if I do say so. I knew Jane was at her tricks again when she sent me that telegram."

"Ma's got you a place already!" burst out Nellie eagerly.

"Now, Nellie, you said you'd let Ma tell that!" reproached Bob. "You never can keep your mouth shut."

"There! There! Bob, don't spoil the evening with anything unkind," warned the mother. "Yes, Betty, I got you a position. It just happened I had the chance, and I took it, though I don't really b'lieve that anythin' in this world just happens, of course. But it did seem providential. Mrs. Hathaway wanted somebody to look after her little girl. She's only three years old and she is possessed to run away every chance she gets. Course I s'pose she's spoiled. Most rich children are. Now, my children wouldn't have run away. They always thought too much of what I said to make me trouble. But that's neither here nor there. She does it, and besides her Ma is an invalid. She had an operation, so she has to lie still a good bit, and can't be bothered. She wants somebody just to take the little girl out walking and keep her happy in the house, an' all."

"How lovely!" exclaimed Betty. "I shall enjoy it, I know."

"She's awful pretty!" declared Emily eagerly. "Got gold curls and blue eyes just like you, and she has ever' n' ever so many little dresses, and wears pink shoes and blue shoes, an' rides a tricycle."

"How interesting!" said Betty.

"You'll get good wages," said the mother. "She said she'd give you six dollars a week, an' mebbe more, an' you'd get some of your meals."

"Then I can pay my board to you," cried Betty.

"Don't worry about that child, We'll fix that up somehow. We're awful glad to have you come, and I guess we shall like each other real well. Now, children, it's awful late. Get to bed. Scat! Betty can have her bath an' get to bed too. Come, mornin's half way here already!"

The children said good-night and Betty was introduced to the tin bath tub and improvised bathroom—a neat little addition to the kitchen evidently intended originally for a laundry. She wanted to laugh when she saw the primitive makeshifts, but instead the tears came into her eyes to think how many luxuries she had taken all her life as a matter of course and never realized how hard it was for people who had none. In fact it had never really entered her head before that there were people who had no bathrooms.

Betty was not exactly accustomed to washing her own hair, and with the added problem of the dye it was quite a task; but she managed it at last, using all the hot water, to get it so that the rinsing water was clear, and her hair felt soft. Then, attired in the same warm nightgown she had worn the night before, which Jane had thoughfully put in the suitcase—otherwise filled with old garments she wished to send home—Betty pattered upstairs to the little room with the sloping roof and the dormer window and crept into bed with Nellie. That young woman had purposely stayed awake, and kept Betty as long as she could talk, telling all the wonderful things she wanted to know about city life, and Betty found herself in deep water sometimes because the city life she knew about was so very different from the city life that Jane would know. But at last sleep won, and Nellie had to give up because her last question was answered with silence. The guest was deep in slumber.

The next morning the children took her over the house, out in the yard, showing her everything. Then they had to take her down to the village and explain all about the little town and its people. They were crazy about Betty's beautiful hair and much disappointed when she would insist on wearing her hat. It was a bright sunny morning, not very cold, and they told her that nobody wore a hat except to church or to go on the train, but Betty had a feeling that her hair might attract attention, and in her first waking hours a great shadow of horror had settled upon her when she realized that her people would leave no stone unturned to find her. It was most important that she should do or be nothing whereby she might be recognized. She even thought of getting a cap and apron to wear when attending her small charge, but Nellie told her they didn't do that in the country and she would be thought stuck up, so she desisted. But she drew the blue serge skirt up as high above her waistband as possible when she dressed in the morning so that she might look like a little girl, and no one would suspect her of being a runaway bride. Also she had a consultation with herself in the small hours of the morning while Nellie was still fast asleep, and settled with

ANNOUNCEMENT

THE strike of New York printers has made it impossible for the Christian Herald, in common with most of the other periodicals published in New York, to be printed regularly during the last six weeks.

It is a most unfortunate condition over which the publishers themselves have no control whatever. The strike is not directly against the periodicals, but against the big printing firms with which we have printing contracts, which contracts they at present are unable to carry out for us. The demands of the striking printers are so excessive that their employers cannot grant them without running at heavy loss. At the same time the strikers' own union has declared this strike a "violation of contract" and has "outlawed" the strikers.

Meanwhile, The Christian Herald and many other periodicals are innocent, helpless sufferers.

The present edition is issued under the greatest difficulties, as were also those of October 25 and November 8. It will be followed as regularly as possible. At this moment I can definitely promise nothing except to do the very best I can. It looks now as if the situation will soon clear up. Of course, the trouble at worst can only be temporary. In a little while your Christian Herald will be coming regularly on time, bigger and in every way better than before.

All issues missed will be added at the end of your subscription period.

I beg your patience until this difficult, complex matter can be adjusted in fairness to all.

GRAHAM PATTERSON, Publisher.

Brownie Lads and Lassies To-day

By BELLE GRAHAM HOWARD, Kodoli, India

THE writer went to India during the 1900 famine and has lived in Kodoli ever since; hence her opportunity to watch the growth and development of which she writes. Many supporters of Christian Herald children will recognize a familiar correspondent in the above signature if, for an instant, a finger is held over the third name.

A 1900 Brownie

IT'S Sunday afternoon, and I am sitting in church: in India we have Sunday school in the morning and "church" in the afternoon, along toward the evening hour. A spirited sermon it is that people are hearing; full of point and illustration, and none the less full of spiritual teaching. The women, and the babies even, are quieter than usual, and the men and young men don't miss a sentence. The boys and girls, 250 of them, sit spell bound for a full half hour! "Little children, keep yourselves from idols"—they will not need to be asked twice at school next day, what the text was Sunday. "Yes, yes," we say, "we have no idols, we threw them all into the river years ago; we're not heathen!" And then the young preacher of the afternoon goes on to spin out true tales of how even Christians have idols, and we all go away from the service bound never again (in the strength of God) to worship money, position, learning, or self.

Five of these were 1900 Brownie Lads

Who do you suppose the "young preacher" of the afternoon is? Twenty years ago this June the monsoon failed; there was no rain; famine stalked the land; food gave out and clothing was simply "not to be had." As for blankets—weavers stopped weaving them! Today's "Young Preacher" was a lad then, and he, too, was hungry. His father died in their village and his poor mother brought him to Kodoli. Just at that time, many mothers and fathers died, and many wandering, hungry, homeless children were brought here for food and clothes and shelter. People at home heard of it, and thousands of dollars were sent out to Miss A. A. Browne's Brownies! The "Young Preacher" of today was one of those brownies!! Did he pay?

As I look over the assembly this afternoon, I see many Christian men, good, faithful, consecrated, efficient men, elders and officers in the church and leaders generally in the community; and my mind goes back to the day when many of these too were Brownie Lads.

The picture that appeals to me even more is that of the women, the dear Christian Mothers of Kodoli. Some of them are really beautiful; most of them are so transformed by the years that one has great difficulty in connecting them with the wriggling, squirming, unmanageable masses of the 1900 Brownie Girls!!

Many of the boys and girls in our Kodoli school today are children of those children! All of our teachers (with one exception) were former Brownie lads and lassies. Again I ask you—did the Kodoli Brownies pay?

Today The Christian Herald brings us news of hearts at home that have again been touched by our need here in Kodoli! We hear of money on the way to feed some of the hungry and to help clothe some of the poor! God bless you all! God repay you your unselfish love!—your unstinted sacrifice!

Even in these days of great stress, one hesitates in writing home, for fear of seeming to exaggerate. One's honest self tries to be persuaded that after all times are really not very hard! Last evening little girls whom I had promised to take int school turned up about dusk. As I stood looking them, my heart within me kept saying; "How ever take these girls? What in the world shall I feed them? How shall I ever manage to clothe and keep them warm these chilly days?" In 1900 famine, right here in Kodoli, we fed and clot and housed and schooled hundreds of destitute dren at the rate of $15 a year. It was no troubl all to make ends meet financially! The cost of ta in these three little girls today (and of boarding for one month) would have entirely supported a year in the 1900 famine. Do you wonder th almost say, "No," when they come, even thou have promised?

As People Know These Facts

Regard for the Mitchell Grows

THIS new Mitchell has been built to give you lasting newness. A multitude of improvements has been made to that end. And two years have been spent to perfect them.

The difference is conspicuous. Every detail shows it. But the greatest difference will show later, after years of use.

Much strength has been added, much endurance. Many important parts are larger. There are better materials, new heat treatments and 123 drop forgings.

The car is built with infinite care. There are hundreds of inspections, scores of new, exacting tests.

There is greater smoothness, which means much less wear. Crankshafts are twice balanced on two new-type machines.

See the New Ideas

A new-style body gives amazing beauty. The new-grade top does not grow shabby. The finish keeps its luster. The leather upholstery is filled with interlaced hair, so it keeps its shape.

Fuel cost is reduced. The cylinders are ground. The motor is much smoother. A thermostat is added. A new method is employed to get complete combustion.

The steering gear is ball bearing. Long cantilever rear springs give matchless riding comfort, and they cannot break in use.

Compare them with the old types, part by part. No man can do that without giving Mitchell first place in its class.

Yet note the modest price. That is due to building the whole car—motor, chassis and body— under factory efficiency methods.

AUTUMN LEAVES

A SERMON by REV. H. P. LYMAN-WHEATON, D.D.[*]

Text: Isa. 64:6. "We all do fade as a leaf."

ONE of the most successful paintings in the London Royal Academy, a few years ago, was described in the catalogue as "Autumn Leaves." In the foreground of the picture there was a heap of pale, faded leaves about to be consumed by a fire, the smoke of which could be seen faintly curling up from the ground. Two girls were standing by the heap, watching the progress of destruction, their forms tinged with the brightness of the setting sun. They were but simple elements thus blended together to form what one of the first critics of the age styled "the most poetical work the painter had yet conceived." Yet no one could gaze upon the work without feeling as much its happy suggestiveness as its felicitous execution.

I, too, would ask you to look with me at the Autumn Leaves as they fall thickly about our feet. Let us ask for grace from Him Who made both them and us that we may read aright the lessons He would teach.

These leaves have helped to form the beauty of the woods, and by their fresh and lovely forms and colors have cheered the hearts of those who, weary with the toils of active life, have sought for rest beneath their grateful shade. Each one of them has given forth its contribution of purity and life to the air we breathe, taking back again—such is the wonderful economy of nature—that which would prove injurious to human life. Behind the close drawn curtain of rich foliage the birds have built their nests and reared their young. At the base of each leaf there has been carefully cherished the germ of next year's leaf, protected and nourished by its predecessor of the present. But more enduring proofs of usefulness have been left behind in the growth and vigor of the solid wood. To the strength of the tree each leaf has contributed its share, taking in from sunlight and from shower the nourishment needed by the parent stem. And thus we see the leaf—dead and dry as it is—has a sermon for us, as it speaks of duties done, and works of usefulness performed.

TO many of us such a lesson as this is suggestive of painful thoughts. May we not feel as we hold that dry dead leaf in our hand that, after all, our vaunted superiority, a comparison between us must be to our disadvantage? The leaf was useful. In its day—brief as it was—it did its part. It fell not till duty was discharged. But what of our duties? Where has been the usefulness of our lives? Where are the spots of human life made more lovely by the beauty of our Christian character? Where are those whose hearts we have cheered by loving words and gentle deeds? Where are the tried and wearied spirits over whom we have cast the grateful shade of comfort, or counsel, or assistance? To what extent have we contributed to the purifying of the moral atmosphere, cleansing it from foul passions and unholy feelings, and even giving forth the holiest influences of a heaven-born life? In a word—have we been useful in the world? If this should be our autumn, and if to-day, of us our text were literally true, if we were now falling to yonder grave yard soil like the "sere and yellow leaf," could others point to us and say, "They lived lives of usefulness and left no duty undischarged? Let conscience answer!

Again, the autumn leaves speak to us of preparation for the storms of winter. Even summer has its dangers for the trees of the forest; and under some conditions it is possible for those dangers to be the greatest during the calm. For example, heavy dews descending in the calm nights of summer have so ladened the leaves with their moisture that the branches have broken beneath their weight. In like manner the snows of winter, if they should fall on trees still bearing leaves, would often destroy the branches; and the violent hurricane of the wintry storm would sweep to the ground thousands of trees if the foliage were retained to resist its sway. But the leaves which the gentle breezes of summer only cause to murmur sweetest music as they flutter in the air, have fallen in the autumn, and then the storms of winter rage around the tree in comparative harmlessness. Have not some of us seen how all this is repeated in the region of human life? Have we not seen on the one hand a man retaining his wealth, yet losing his godliness under the sweeping force of temptation? Are not the cases frequent in which the words of Paul are true, and professing Christians from greed of gain pierce themselves through with many a sorrow? On the other hand, have not the mysterious workings of Providence often taken away the possessions of a good man, so as to enable him the better to endure temptation and trial? The leaves have been taken from the tree in order that it might the better withstand the storms of winter.

AGAIN, the fading leaf is suggestive of the desirableness of rest. The forces of life have been very active in that tree all through the early year. When the spring days brought their first gleams of cheering sunshine, and when they distilled their refreshing showers, what activity there was in every part of the tree! Vessels and tissues, which in winter had been lying dormant, or at best had acted sluggishly, now woke up to life. The nourishment derived from the soil was drawn up by the remotest "feeders" of the roots; it hurried from fibre to fibre, entered the trunk of the tree and was soon dispersed evenly through all the gigantic limbs, so that not one tiny twig stretching far away towards the sky but felt the life-giving influence. Again, the bark and leaves were, through the myriad pores, drinking in the moisture which the air provided so copiously; and from the smallest leaf or weakest twig there came a contribution to the life and vigor of the whole.

But such work as this could not go on forever. All things need rest. Even Jesus Christ Himself "being wearied with His journey, sat thus on the well." How refreshing is the thought that rest awaits the weary worker when his life is spent! "There remaineth, therefore, a rest for the people of God." Is there one who has long toiled for God, who has fought the good fight of faith, who finds at length that strength is failing fast? Is death at hand? Think not that the weakness of age will make it easier work for the foe to conquer. The decay of strength comes, not because Christ has left His follower to perish. It is but the falling leaf that tells of coming rest, for death to the Christian is nothing less. "He giveth His beloved sleep." When weary with the world they lay themselves on Jesus' breast to wake again amid the glories of the future life.

"For death is not a break or end
Of thought and action, but the change
Of rising into loftier range
Where thoughts to nobler issues tend.

The thought of autumn suggests that there is a beauty even in decay. Go forth to yonder height in the early spring, and gaze upon the richly wooded vale which spreads far away at your feet. What beautious colors and what richness of foliage! Look, too, at the same luxuriance beneath the blazing light of the summer's sun. But if you would drink deepest into the beauty of nature as developed in the myriad shades and tints of leaves, choose a bright autumn day. And is there no analogy between the fading leaf and fading man? There is a beauty in the freshness of early piety, and there is a beauty in the active piety of middle life; but there is also a beauty in the falling leaf. "The hoary head is a crown of glory, if it is found in the way of righteousness."

Her Ministries

By EUGENE C. DOLSON

As in some long untended spot—
  Some half-forgotten place of gloom—
A flower-seed, wafted by the winds,
  Will spring to bloom,—

So, from her pure heart's overflow

In lonely homes, and other lives
  Grow brighter there.

BUT there is one other thought; the leaf has a material being; there is no real soul there. C sequently, these figures are restricted in their ap cation to that which is material, and have little o bearing upon that which is spiritual. Is it not str that there should be broad marks of distinc between body and soul? Both are God's workm ship. Each is essential to the other. Where th is not both body and soul, there can be no man, yet what opposites they are! Marks of identity th are: yet, oh, how different! One aspires to hea pants for its sempiternal heritage, ever clinging, rising. The other, for a time the unwilling spor circumstances, struggles on; fleets through its duration rapidly; then, like a useless and worn machine, perishes and passes. The body fails; strength decays. "We all do fade as a leaf." E the youngest among us may take home this thou A great moralist in a former age left behind among unpublished writings this beautiful sentence rela to youth: "The world lies enamelled before him a distant prospect sun-gilt." How true a pic this of life as it appears to the young! Far down future lies the distant day of death, so distant, the clear bright eye of boyhood fails to scan the prospective. Yet the young must die. Not e leaf that fades falls in the autumn season.

The trees mourn the loss of many early buds. summer breezes bore away some leaves, premat severed from the parent plant.

The body fails; its strength decays. "We a fade as a leaf." The healthiest may lay this to h Death's snares lie thick about our path, and mo perish in a thousand ways.

The body fails; its strength decays. "We a fade as a leaf." In this text even the strongest learn a lesson. How few among us have any clear definite idea of our mortality! Creatures of a day, live as if eternity were ours. With our lives hang like Damocles' sword by the tenderest hair, we a if they rested on the eternal rock.

"All men think all men mortal but themselv Go where you will, you trample on the ashes of dead. Turn where you will, some monument of th long since departed meets your eye.

"The hands that raised them, long ago
  In death and dust have slept,
And long the grave hath sealed the fount
  Of eyes that o'er them wept.
But still they stand, like seamarks left
  Amid the passing waves
Of generations that go down
  To their forgotten graves."

AMID all these mementoes of mortality we sp as if mortality were a fiction. "As for man, days are as grass, as the flower of the field so flourisheth; for the wind passeth over it and it gone, and the place thereof shall know it no mor "So teach us to number our days that we may ap our hearts unto wisdom."

But I said just now that the text applies not to soul of him whose "life is hid with Christ in Go "The gift of God is eternal life." The soul posses of that life—unlike the leaf—can never fade. E nity has no grey hairs. The flowers fade, the withers, man grows old and dies, the world lies do in the sepulchre of the ages; but Time writes wrinkles on eternity. Eternity! Stupendous thoug The ever-present, undecaying, undying; the end chain composing the life of God; the golden thr entwining the destinies of the universe. Earth its beauties, but Time shrouds them for the grave. honors are but the sunshine of an hour; its palac they are but bursting bubbles. Not so in the untr bourne. In the dwelling of the Almighty can come footsteps of decay. "For this corruptible must put incorruption, and this mortal must put on immort ity." And "when this corruptible shall have put incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on i mortality, then shall be brought to pass the sayi that is written, Death is swallowed up in victo O Death, where is thy sting, O grave where is t victory?" The sting of death is sin, the strength of is the law. But thanks be to God Who giveth us t victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.

ys passed and the mystery of the rkable change in "Plain Louise" ined unsolved. Some of the girls confided their own cherished secrets effort to disclose her story. But Louise only smiled or changed the subject.

In the meantime she continued to maintain her high standing in the class room and enjoyed an ever-increasing popularity that had been denied her the year before. She appeared often in Madge's room, a place where only a selected few—generally the leaders in the school—felt comfortable and welcome. The old days when we had passed her by with a nod were now a mere memory.

Then one day a dainty, square white envelope appeared in each of the college mail boxes. The little simply-worded announcement it contained set the whole college talking and added greater mystery than ever to the change in "Plain Louise."

The announcement read:

> You are invited to attend the opening of "The College Girls' Modiste Shop," at Thirty College Place, Thursday afternoon, October twentieth, at three-thirty o'clock.
> LOUISE CLAYTON.

On the appointed day 30 College Place was crowded to the doors. Louise, gowned in a delightfully simple but adorable afternoon frock, proved a charming hostess. She had transformed a small, old-fashioned house into just the kind of place where girls love to shop. About the rooms were several charming frocks displayed to wonderful advantage.

They were the kind Louise herself wore—dainty, distinctive creations which fairly breathed a personality and charm that made them irresistible.

In the rear of the shop sat a woman whom Louise introduced as Mrs. Blake, her assistant. The girls needed no urging to take the initial step of real customers. I know at least a dozen gowns of various kinds were ordered within an hour.

Later in the afternoon, when most of the visitors had left, Madge and a few other girls of our set surrounded Louise.

"And now," began Madge, "don't you think you have baffled us long enough? There simply must be an interesting story behind all this, because—well, simply because you have changed so yourself, and this little shop is so wonderful. Won't you tell us how you did it?"

Louise hesitated a moment and over her face there came a flush of pride and happiness, as she answered, "I've been thinking all the afternoon that I owe you an explanation.

"I WOULD have told you before, only I wanted to wait until this opening, proved a real success. Now that the business is really started, I am anxious that you should know the wonderful thing that has changed my former dull life into a new one of happiness and opportunity.

"When I was twelve my father died, leaving only our little home to mother and me. For a while it looked as though I would have to give up school. But that was not necessary when mother secured employment in the village library.

"Even then, though, as you can understand, we had all we could do to procure just the necessities of life. And there was never any money left for clothes. We wore our old ones as long as they would stand it and then called upon the village dressmaker to make us just the simplest kind of dresses so her bills would be as small as possible.

"I worked hard in High School—my heart was set on getting an education—and when they told me I had won the Hadley Scholarship, covering board, room and tuition for one year at Cotter, I thought was the happiest girl in all the world!

"You see I had never known what it meant to have stylish, becoming clothes. Here at college, surrounded by other girls, I realized for the first time how forlorn I looked. I saw that I did not know how to make myself attractive and that I could not be one of you—hungry as I was for your goodwill and your companionship.

"FROM my darkened little room, I watched you girls, in your beautiful evening dresses, cross the campus to the gymnasium on the night of the Junior 'Prom.' And the hot tears sprang to my eyes as I told myself that not one of you in all that gay throng would give so much as a thought to the heart-sick girl who would have to spend the evening alone!

"I sat there till I couldn't stand it to look at the brightly lighted windows and hear the wonderful music any longer. And then an inspiration came to me.

"I opened the door of my room and peered into the hall. Everything was dark, and there was no one to see me. My heart was beating furiously as I slipped noiselessly across the hall to Nell Bradley's room. I knew she had gone to the 'Prom' in one of the beautiful dancing frocks which Campbell's had sent out that afternoon.

"Pushing open the door, like a thief, I switched on the light. As I expected, the other dress lay in its wrappings in the box beside the long French mirror! Oh, but it was beautiful—the dress that wasn't good enough for Nell! With trembling fingers, I caught it up, slipped out of my plain, shabby little dress and into that gorgeous gown. The transformation was marvelous—I saw that I was really pretty!

"But then the hopelessness of it all swept over me. I laid the magic gown in the box and, clad in the old clothes, like Cinderella when the clock struck twelve, went back to my room. But in those few short moments I had tasted the joy of being attractive. And for days the vision I had had of myself in Nell's dress before the mirror haunted me!

"A week or so later I was reading a magazine when my glance fell on a picture that attracted me. I began reading the article and it told the story of a girl, just like myself, who found the way to friends and happiness by learning at home, through the Woman's Institute, to make for herself distinctive, becoming clothes.

"Almost wild with hope I read every word of the story. It seemed so real—so convincing—and so much the very opportunity I needed, that I wrote the Institute that very day.

"WELL, the information I received proved such a revelation that I joined the Institute at once and took up dressmaking.

"As soon as I saw my first lesson, I knew that I had found the way to happiness! Any one could learn by this easy, fascinating plan.

"Right away I began to feel like a different girl—happier than I had ever been in my life! In comparison to study here at college the work was easy. I devoted every moment I could to my lessons and, of course, I made rapid progress—I couldn't help it! The textbooks seem to foresee and answer every possible question and the teachers take just as personal an interest as they do here in the classrooms.

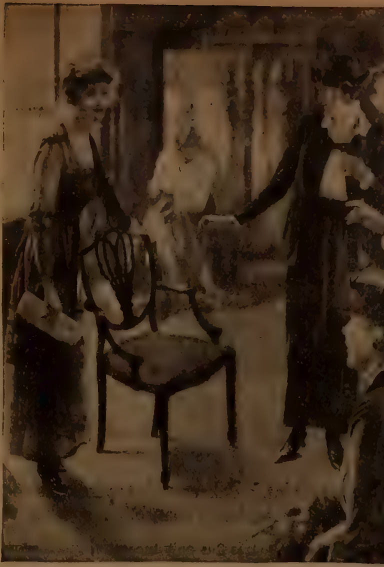
"Almost at once I began making actual garments—that's another delightful thing about the course. Why, I made a beautiful little waist after my third lesson! You will never know what a temptation it was to wear it to class next day, but I had decided not to wear any of my new clothes until I had enough so that I would never have to wear the old ones again!

"What was most important to me, I also learned what colors and fabrics were most appropriate for different types of women, how to develop style and add those little touches that make clothes distinctively becoming.

"It was during the Eastern vacation when, after just a few lessons, I finished my first dress. I simply had to wear it. Every one at home remarked how pretty it was, and mother was simply delighted with it and the work I was doing.

"Later I learned to copy models I saw in the shop windows, on the street, and in fashion magazines. And so it went all through the course. Every step was so clearly explained that the things I always thought only a professional dressmaker could do were perfectly easy for me!

"Then I decided to do more than make just my own clothes. I saw that I could turn my study to further profit. By the time summer vacation came last year I had about completed the course, and with the money mother had been saving all winter to buy me one summer dress I made three prettier than I ever had before.



"And now," began Madge, "don't you think you have baffled us long enough?"

"But my scholarship had ended. College looked impossibly expensive and I decided to make dressmaking my life work. Little did I know then how easily I could make my skill in dressmaking pay for my education.

"Back in our little town, my dresses soon attracted the attention of the best-dressed people. I called on several women who for years had gone to expensive city shops for their clothes. They welcomed my suggestion that I could create the kind of clothes they wanted and save them money besides.

"The very first afternoon one woman gave me an order. Girls, I worked like mad on that dress! When it was finished, she was so delighted she gave me two more orders—one a tailored suit. From that time on, it was easy. By the middle of the summer I had more work than I could possibly handle and Mrs. Blake, my present assistant, came to my aid. Most of my work then was designing and working on the more elaborate and expensive clothes.

"Toward the end of my vacation I found I had more than enough money to return to college this year. But I hated to give up my business. Finally, I decided to combine business with pleasure and start this College Girls' Shop here on the Hill. Already its success is assured, for the orders that you and the other girls have given me today mean that I will get another assistant soon and the shop will not interfere in any way with my college work. What is more, I am going to write mother tonight that she can give up her position in the library and come to live with me.

"SO that's my story," finished Louise. "I'm the happiest girl alive, and I owe it all to the Woman's Institute! That alone could have made possible the wonderful change that has come into my life. And what I did—in saving so much money on my own clothes, having prettier, more stylish, better-made garments than I could have had any other way, and attracting happiness and friends and prosperity with them—any woman or girl can do!"

This modern miracle has a practical application to your needs. More than 30,000 women and girls in city, town and country have proved that you can easily and quickly learn at home, in spare time, through the Woman's Institute, to make all your own clothes and hats, or prepare for success in dressmaking or millinery as a business.

It costs nothing to find out all about the Woman's Institute and what it can do for you. Just send a letter, post card or the coupon below and you will receive—without obligation—by return mail, the full story of this great school that has brought the happiness of having dainty, becoming clothes, savings almost too good to be true, and the joy of being independent in a successful business, to women and girls all over the world.

This Cake—

is made from the only coconut canned in its own milk

IT is the milk in the Baker can that makes this coconut cake richer and better than other coconut cakes.

For the Coconut Milk is the only successful guardian of the rich flavor of the fresh nut. This Milk keeps the meat in the Baker can moist, crisp, and tender. No other ready-grated coconut has this supreme flavor of the newly picked nut, for Baker's is the only coconut canned in its own milk. Remember that word "only."

Coconut Layer Cake

½ Cupful of Baker's Fresh Grated Coconut	½ Cupful of coconut milk
½ Cupful of Butter	2 Cupfuls of flour
1 Cupful of Granulated sugar	2 Level teaspoonfuls of baking powder
2 Eggs

Cream butter and sugar until light; add well-mixed yolks of eggs, coconut milk, half the sifted flour and baking powder, the coconut which has been thoroughly drained. Beat the whites of eggs until light; fold in and add the rest of flour. Pour in lined cake tins and bake in moderate oven about 25 minutes. Use remaining coconut in the icing and to sprinkle cake.

MAY ALSO BE BAKED AS LOAF CAKE

THE COAL STRIKE

THE greatest struggle in which the government has ever en with labor was precipitated on October 31 when on the petiti the Department of Justice, Federal Judge Anderson of Indi apolis approved an order restraining all officials and agents of United Mine Workers of America from advising or directing the bitu nous miners in the strike called to take effect at midnight of that day. entire labor movement arose in wrath at the attempt to enforce "gove ment by injunction." A few hours after the restraining order was iss Samuel Gompers, Mathew Woll and Frank Morrison, president, vice pr dent and secretary of the American Federation of Labor, protested f mally to Attorney General Palmer and in a public statement announced th support of the miners and intimated that the great labor body would un in opposition to any effort to deny to the wage earner use of the str weapon. Despite the orders of the court, the miners, variously estimat at from 300,000 to 425,000, abandoned the workings at the hour fixed the original strike instructions and brought about the most complete t up of coal production the world has ever seen.

The week preceding the closing of the mines saw feverish activity in eve direction. The Fuel Administration under Dr. Harry A. Garfield w reorganized, fuel prices were fixed again on a war basis, the War Depa ment mobilized regular army troops for quick movement to the coal regio the Railroad Administration seized for its use coal in transit, an embar was put on all exportation of coal and a war-time priority list was repu lished. Every effort was made to move coal from the mine mouths points of distribution, but with all the energy expended in this directi the country entered the strike with approximately a three weeks' reser of bituminous to see it through the crisis. The largest reserves, fortunate were located in the north, northeast and northwest where winter alrea has descended and where the need for fuel is greatest.

As this is written, it is impossible to estimate the effect the action of t Indianapolis court will have on the situation. The officials of the Mi Workers have given no indication of any intention to disregard the straining order but they maintained communication with the various d trict organizations until the very minute they were served with the cou order. The strike machinery had been well organized and the leade count on its impetus and the direction of the lesser local union leade aided by the officers of other unions outside the coal industry, to give the maximum of effectiveness. Troops are in possession of one West V ginia field and other troop bodies are ready to move but thus far there ha been no reports of disorder.

The government now is as concerned over the attitude of the A. F. of and the four railway brotherhoods as it is over any other phase of the situ tion.

THE PEACE TREATY

THE Senate thus far has been unable to agree on a date on which t final vote on the Treaty of Peace shall be taken. Senator Lodge h proposed November 12. Senator Hitchcock, leader of the administratic forces, objected to the fixing of a definite date and offered instead, an agre ment to limit debate and add another hour to the daily sessions. Bo sides seem anxious, however, to have the vote on ratification taken a the debate concluded so there will be no possibility of the treaty wrang being carried over into the next session. Observers fail to see how this c be avoided if, as now seems probable, ratification is accompanied by t series of reservations agreed on by the majority. It is admitted that ra ification is impossible without some reservations and these the Preside has announced he will not accept. In the circumstances the final vote ma be merely the signal for a new struggle over the conditions of peace accep able to the Senate of the country, and this struggle will necessarily carried into the next Congressional session.

Several efforts have been made to insert the name of God in the preamb of the treaty but a vote had been avoided on the question until Senat Sherman, of Illinois, insisted on a record on an amendment to include t phrase to: "invoke the considerate judgment of mankind and the gracio favor of Almighty God." The amendment was defeated by 57 to 27. Th vote served to call attention to the fact that nowhere in the treaty is the reference to a Higher Power; a fact which makes it unique among diploma ic documents of such vital importance.

PERSHING FOR SMALLER ARMY

GENERAL JOHN J. PERSHING'S long-awaited expression of opini on what the future military policy of the nation should be, has be delivered before a joint session of the Senate and House committees military affairs. The Commander-in-Chief of the expeditionary force a the highest ranking officer in the army disagrees with the General St on the advisability of retaining a large standing army and puts a lim of 275,000 to 300,000 on the regular establishment. He is strong convinced, however, of the need of universal training for youths 19 and he would have every boy when he reached that age called out f six months' intensive training. The regular army, he says, shou be kept up to quota by voluntary enlistment. He urges the rete tion of all regimental designations used during the Great War into whi would be incorporated a new army if the emergency should arise and favors a separate department of air service with enlarged appropriatio to keep the aerial arms of defence in the state of highest efficiency.

BOLSHEVIST FORCES MAKE GAINS

THE virtual collapse of the anti-Bolshevist armies in Russia has ma the Lenine-Trotzky regime safe for another winter so far as outsi pressure is concerned. The last week has seen the defeat and retreat all the forces opposing the Red armies and the manoeuvring of the Nort western Russian army under Yudenitch into a position southwest of Ga china which threatens its complete destruction in a wide series of marsh The difficulty of appraising the real situation in Russia grows constant because of the conflicting stories brought out by men whose views comma attention. Men of equal responsibility differ diametrically in their report The most recent traveler to emerge from the land of mystery is Lieutena Colonel Lestrang Malone, member of the British House of Commons, wh has just reached London from Petrograd. He declares reports of disse tion between Lenine and Trotzky are untrue and that he saw Trotzk review thousands of Bolshevist soldiers who wildly acclaimed him as "t divine leader." The physical and moral strength of the Red army must recognized when it can signally defeat Yudenitch, Denikine and Kolch

CHINA GETS BACK MONGOLIA

TER Mongolia once more is under the wing of the Chinese Central overnment. In 1912 the government at Urga decided it would pre-nominal independence to dependence on Peking and in the midst of ninese revolution it demanded autonomy. Peking relinquished its on the vast hinterland and Outer Mongolia began to run its own . Two years later, however, Russia forced a protectorate over the , imposed a loan on the government under rather onerous terms, and began the process of absorption. The Russian revolution threw the olians back on their own resources and after two years of worry and ainty they have sent a petition to Peking for the cancellation of the nent for autonomy and the return to the protection of the Chinese nment. Peking has begun negotiations with Russia looking to the ation of a treaty of 1914 in which the two powers recognize autono-Outer Mongolia, and has appropriated $800,000 for salary and allow- to the native princes and chieftains.

INTERNATIONAL LABOR CONFERENCE

O conferences of unusual importance to the world's labor are in pro-ess in Washington: The International Labor Conference called in lance with the labor clauses in the Treaty of Peace, and the Interna- Conference of Women Workers. No American delegates have been l as members of the former conference and none will be named until ace treaty has been ratified. Considerable debate followed the pro-to seat delegates from Germany and Austria, at the time on the high ound for New York. When the vote was finally taken they were seated out one dissenting voice, that of a French delegate. The conference es both workmen and employers. The Women's Conference has entatives from practically every country in Europe and it is dis-g problems which particularly involve women wage earners.

nuel Gompers has issued a call for a national labor conference to le the railway brotherhoods, to meet in Washington on December 13. or is confronted with grave dangers vitally affecting the very founda- of its structure,'' he says in his message. The meeting is the out-h of the National Industrial Conference which broke up the with-l of the labor delegates.

The New Trackless Town

WILL the city of the near future be a city without street railways?

New York City's experience in doing without surface transportation lines which the difficulties of the old traction companies caused to be abandoned has provided food for widespread discussion among traction experts. Some of these men insist that the "trackless town" is certain to make its appearance in the next few years and thereby bring to its municipal originator an era of quiet, cleanliness and convenience.

The change will be brought about, according to this view, by the adoption of motor buses to run along lines heretofore cared for by the trolley systems.

In New York virtually every system of transportation has been thrown into the hands of the federal courts through receivership proceedings. Heavily capitalized in the way of the traction lines in the palmy days of high finance, they were unable to meet the interest demands of their funded debt during the war years, and they now

The Prayer League

DURING these past weeks the churches of the country have been praying for the President, that he may be restored to health and given strength to resume his duties. Petitions for his complete recovery have been offered up by the Prayer League, both in meetings and individually, and in countless homes appeal has been made in his behalf.

Many special requests for prayer by the League have been received from readers who have faith in God's goodness. A. W., Chelsea, Wash., writes, asking prayer for the recovery of a daughter from severe physical affliction. A friend in Jamaica, N. Y., seeks prayers that a son-in-law who has a bad temper may become a Christian and live happily with those around him. Reader, Santa Cruz, Calif., writes: "Pray that God will help me in regard to certain matters, also that a friend and her daughter may be reconciled; that an elderly lady may be cured of eye trouble, that an old acquaintance may be brought to Christ, and that a young girl may find the way open to attend business college."

"Sincere Believer,'' Flora, Ind., writes: "I have been a reader of the Christian Herald for many years and my faith has been wonderfully strengthened by reading of the many faithful ones who have had answers to prayer. I never miss reading the Prayer League column. I have had many answers to prayer. I have one special desire, known only to God, and I seek the help of the faithful in praying that it may be granted.''

Reader, Senoi, Ga., writes that some time ago she made two requests for prayer by the League, one that a mortgage might be lifted and the other that the household might be able to obtain more money for the necessities of life. Both prayers have been answered and she gladly records her gratitude to God and sends her thanks to the Prayer League. She also gives thanks for answered prayer in the healing of a dear loved one. She asks the comforting petitions of the League that another prayer, made some time ago, may be answered soon.

Mrs. M. A. W., Cleveland, Tenn., writes: "I have had wonderful answers to prayer, and now I am asking the League to pray in behalf of a dear loved one.''

"A Poor Lonely One" writes from Hagerstown, Md., asking for prayers that she may be strengthened and comforted in a great sorrow that has come into her life.

Mrs. E. B. writes: "Some time ago I requested prayer for my son, who was so broken down in health I feared he would never reco

A Literary Evening

By Nellie Ryder Gates

is awfully hard to find entertainments for church sociables that will be equally interesting the young and old, but that is ourse what they should be. This cleverly accomplished last year little church up where I spent my mers. They issued invitations a Literary Evening. The tickets e twenty-five cents each for the wn-ups and fifteen cents for dren. It was held in the Sun- School room where all enter- ments are held.

veryone was given a slip of er when they took their seats. en the curtains were drawn back, re was a huge red book standing its edge, with its title across the it FAMOUS FRONTISPIECES FICTION in white letters.

ne of the young girls of the con- gation stood there and opened book. A frame had been con- icted of strips of wood, covered h white paper, and inside the ne were the pictures. After we l looked at each one, she closed book, and while the next was ng posed, we wrote down on our s of paper what book we ught the picture was from. e book was made of very heavy dboard covered with red cloth, h the lettering made of white per, and it was fastened to the e of the frame with hinges made loth.

The pictures had been chosen carefully so they needed little background and few properties. For example the first one was an old colored man with a wreath of flowers on his head and a little girl in white perched on his knee. They were reading together. It only took a second even for the children, to guess "Uncle Tom's Cabin.''

The ragged little boy holding out his empty bowl to someone outside the picture was not quite so easy, but a great many of us wrote "Oliver Twist." The four girls grouped about the old fashioned lady who was reading a letter to them were the beloved Meg, Jo, Amy and Beth, of course. Then there were Robinson Crusoe finding the footprints in the sand, Portia choosing the caskets, Elaine guarding Lancelot's shield, The Little Minister and Babbie having tea together, Alice at her famous tea party, and Romeo and Juliet.

The real secret of the wonderful success of this party was that the audience had something to do besides just look at the pictures. It seemed that they had given tableaux before, quite lovely ones, but because we of the audience were to guess these, we loved them. And then it made the usual long waits between tableaux almost as interesting as were the pictures themselves.

Evangelizing the Mountaineers

R. Elmer E. Gabbard, Principal of the Harvey Murdock ool, Bowlingtown, Ky., writes: was somewhat surprised to find t my letter, written to you re- tly concerning the books you t us, had been put in the Chris- n Herald. I was still more sur- sed when letters began coming rom various parts of the country ing about the work and some of m offering to send us books, if vould suggest what was wanted. we you, therefore, another letter thanks.''

Principal Gabbard and his school interesting. The latter is located the Middle Fork of the Kentucky ver, among the foot hills of the mberland mountains. It was ablished three years ago under supervision. He came from ckhorn, Ky., five miles below wlingtown, on the same river, the mouth of Squabble Creek. ly a few years ago the latter ice was the rendezvous of feud- s and moonshiners; now it is the t of Witherspoon College with 0 students and has a village urch with a membership of over 0 The place has become a ter of education and spiritual tivity. Bowlingtown until lately a backward community, neg- ted as to education and with few portunities. Now under the influ- ce of the progressive movement Bowlingtown, the situation has mpletely changed

Mr. Murdock is himself a native untaineer and a graduate of itherspoon. When he was a sen- in the theological seminary, he oposed the establishment of a mmunity work at Bowlingtown t would concern itself with the ysical, intellectual and spiritual eds of the community. Plans e then laid and the following the work was begun. A com- table home has been built for e minister, which accommodates cial gatherings of the community's ng people A commodious school ilding has been erected, with a apel for church and community etings of various kinds There e rooms for Sunday and day- hool classes. Land has been cured for agricultural purposes a small scale. A great change has me over the place

Intimate contact with the people interest in the affairs of their everyday lives and friendly assistance at all times, are preparing in their hearts a "highway for our God.'' Former enemies are now friends. Through the association of the children in the school, and personal contact with the older people of the community, it is hoped to get rid of objectionable conditions and gradually lead the people to a better life. The Gospel is continually held before them as "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth.''

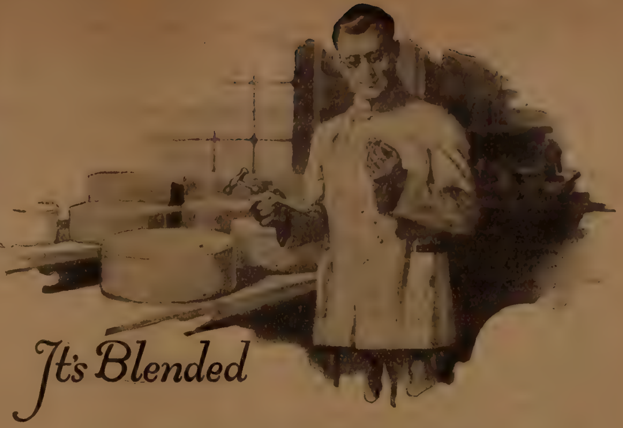
Years ago, when Dr. Guerrant, the great friend of the mountaineer, rode through the hills from Virginia and saw the conditions of the people his heart went out to them, and from that hour he dedicated his life to the spread of the Gospel among these needy people. He saw that in order to appreciate the Gospel and enjoy its benefits, they needed education and he established schools at many places. He was a warm friend of the work at Buckhorn, and before his death came to regard it as the leading example of what could really be accomplished in the Master's name in that section.

Prof. J. A. Burns, a mountaineer and a man of unique personality who has been brought before the public through the writings of Emerson Hough, has built up an important work at Oneida, in Clay County, twelve miles distant from Buckhorn. Other points could be mentioned where faithful souls are endeavoring to bring the full power of the Gospel to bear on every phase of mountain life. The response gives courage and hope.

Blinded by Alcohol

Twelve to fifteen cases of wood alcohol poisoning a day are being reported in the Chicago hospitals since the country went dry, according to the Illinois Society for the Prevention of Blindness. One teaspoonful of the poison will cause blindness.

Mrs. Winefred Hathaway of New York, secretary of the National Society for the Prevention of Blindness says that Cleveland reports four cases a day in the hospitals.



It's Blended

— a very simple, yet a very wonderful thing. Few people really sense the full significance of "Blended" when applied to cheese. Blending of coffee or tea is usually employed to produce a particular individual flavor. But in cheese making it is the only method by which a perfect, uniform and unvarying quality can be secured.

ELKHORN CHEESE

is the blended product of never less than six of our rural factories—usually more. The composition of a perfect cheese is easily analyzed. But there are so many things —even climatic conditions—entering into the making of a perfect cheese that no rural factory can produce an unvarying quality from day to day. The bulk cheese from our rural factories is first sent to our Central Storage Warehouse for ripening. Each cheese is then tested for texture, moisture, flavor, butter-fat, etc., as a basis for a skillful blend of the different makes in just the right proportion to produce that exquisite Elkhorn Flavor.

The patented Kraft process that sterilizes this blended product really pre-digests it—makes Elkhorn "like you" —and the parchment-lined air-tight tin brings this highly nourishing food to your table with all its original purity and smooth, creamy richness, for, "The first hands to touch it are yours."

Eat more cheese—it is the condensed goodness of pure milk—more than twice the food value of meat. You will never know how surprisingly good cheese can be made until you have tasted Elkhorn Cheese—8 Varieties in Tins. No rind, no waste; stock your pantry shelves, it is guaranteed to keep until opened.

THE RED PLAGUE

THE amazing fact that today in this country there are more than 3,000 strikes in progress marks a most extraordinary situation and an even more extraordinary threat. The Bolshevist epidemic of eastern Europe has spread its deadly infection among tens of thousands of aliens in our own land. Like in other plagues, its germs breed, are conveyed, and find lodgment in irresponsible ignorance. It is not industry alone which is threatened but the entire social order. The Red Plague is a malignant disease at the vitals of Christian civilization.

The spread of the strikes is but one symptom of a malign intent on the part of unreasoning ignorance either to rule or ruin — to secure to itself control of industrial power or, like another blind Samson, tear the pillars from the temple.

Any who imagine that these three thousand and more strikes are the coincidental results of legitimate labor grievances are sadly deceived. They are results of subtle conspiracy, of which honest labor is the first and must ever be the worst victim.

The "strike" to render a great city helpless to thuggery, the "strike" to destroy the national periodicals, the "strike" to tie up the output of steel, the "strike" to shut off the supply of coal at the beginning of winter — these are not strikes at all in the real interest of labor, which is the first and last to suffer from them.

In the strike for the avowed purpose of forcing wages up to meet the high cost of living, labor necessarily loses at both ends. The strike at once suspends labor income and increases prices. Every decrease in production automatically increases cost of living. High prices brought about by labor shortage and industrial disorganization during the war cannot be lowered but only made higher still by further shortage and continued disorganization. Nothing but the world at work can win steadily increasing wages and at the same time bring prices back to normal. It is peculiarly a time when labor interest is not in industrial dissension and idleness but in general cooperation and uninterrupted work.

The delusion that these revolutionary movements have any great degree of popular sympathy has faded away. The Massachusetts vote on this clean-cut issue was overwhelming and decisive, and as Massachusetts has spoken so will every state in the Union speak at the first opportunity. Americanism is still supreme in America — let none doubt that. The American people of every section at every test will ever be found standing shoulder to shoulder for American institutions, ideals, security and progress, and uncompromisingly intolerant of alien anarchy, insidious or open, of secret propaganda and the bomb or of defiant demands and the "strike." He who for one moment doubts this does not know American history and American character.

Let us beware of seductive catch-phrases of plausible sound but devoid of real meaning. "Collective bargaining!" The New York publishers depended on collective bargaining, and found the bargain broken without just cause or fair warning. Collective bargaining is nothing without collective responsibility. No stable collective contract can be made with elements as shifting as the sands. Though leaders and the great bodies of unions may stand by agreements, yet so long as individuals can default their part there can be no force in collective contract.

The coal miners, while dealing the deadliest blow in their power at the industry, health and comfort of the nation, in defiance of Federal law, ask that the outraged Government now arrange for arbitration between them and their former employers. Arbitration is always in order — under right conditions. But the miners' differences with their employers ended with the ending of their employment, and at the same point there were created between themselves and the Government serious differences not subject to arbitration. There can be no arbitration of defiant violation of law, no compromise with criminal conspiracy against the whole people of the country. There must be acceptance of law and submission to it before its benefits can be claimed.

Law stands — and will stand — backed by the spirit and force of a hundred million Americans. The law is not cruel, but just. The law, both human and divine, is double-fisted — gloved in velvet to defend and fondle the tractable and mailed in steel to smite and subdue the recalcitrant.

The worst of the Red Plague is its utter Godlessness. It takes no account of Christ and His teachings except in contempt. It would overthrow and demolish all that Jesus in His life, sufferings and death established in the relations of men. Atheism and anarchy are the right and left eyes of the Red Plague, and such vision can lead only to chaos all who follow it.

America, and particularly Christian America, has a tremendous duty directly before it. The forces of evil in the form of the Red Plague must be sternly resisted and defeated. But the end is not there. These deluded elements must be rescued into sane and enlightened manhood. It is for the Church, now as never before in our time, to hold the truths of Christ aloft as a glowing torch to light the way to better days.

THROUGH UNITY TO EVANGELISM

THE Interchurch World Movement, still less than a year old, is already attaining a maturity of plan and structure that augurs well for its efficiency as a unified effort of evangelical Protestantism. The original plan contemplated the gathering together of all the various common efforts of the churches into one movement, which should be the eye and hand of all, seeing opportunity and planning to meet and compel it. In line with this plan, the Laymen's Missionary Movement was made a part of the Interchurch. Also the Missionary Education Movement, one of the first in which the denominations united for united service, was to be a department of Interchurch and is now organized as such. The Missionary Education Movement was started in 1902 to plan and prepare material for mission study among Young People. It expanded its activities in 1911 to include books for adults as well. It has done effective work in spreading missionary intelligence and awakening missionary zeal, and has made a record somewhat unusual among such organizations, of becoming self-supporting. It brings to Interchurch its enthusiasm, its proven plans, its text books and a wealth of missionary exhibits and curios. Thus the Interchurch World Movement is preventing duplication of effort by uniting other parallel movements. It is building a great medium of spiritual power which will work in and through all the churches for a wider evangelism and a more inclusive and less competitive program.

From all over the world come reports of a readiness on the part of the people to receive the Gospel message. There is also a demand, from both inside and outside the Church, that it elimintae inner conflict and consolidate its forces for a great evangelistic movement. Such a consolidation would make the Christ spirit dominant, and insure peaceful development in an atmosphere of brotherly helpfulness and common interest. Russia is today a spectacle of communism without Christ. The world needs the saving touch of the blood of Calvary. The Interchurch World Movement is a long step on the part of the American Church toward the only answer to the world's need that can be effective, a world-wide evangelism, the preaching of the Gospel to every nation.

OUR PREMIUM CATALOGUE

THE strike of the printers and pressmen makes it impossible for us to issue in the Christian Herald our usual supplement made up of full pages, in November. We are, however, getting out a very attractive Supplement, which will be sent by mail to all subscribers before the end of the month. We have availed ourselves of some exceptional bargains of books of great value, which we offer in connection with subscriptions to the Christian Herald. We want every reader to get a copy of this list of premium offers. If you have not received your copy by December 1, please write for a copy. We feel sure that you must have the names of some friends whom you would like to interest in the Christian Herald, and we will be glad to mail a copy of our premium catalogue to any names you send us.

FARMERS TO FIGHT H. C. L.

ANNOUNCEMENT is made that, at the coming Conference of Labor and the Farmers in Washington early in December, one of the big objectives to be sought will be co-operative buying, with the elimination of all middlemen between farmer and consumer. This will probably take the form of a proposition for the establishment of co-operative stores or centrally located depots for the distribution of farm, and other products. It is by no means a new remedy, however, but has been utilized with considerable success in certain localities in this country, while in England it has been tested for nearly three-quarters of a century.

Another remedy for the high cost of living is farmers' markets. These are still a standard feature in many parts of Europe. They were once popular here; but with our rapidly growing population and the admixture of races, bringing new conditions, these have somehow almost disappeared. There are many who will remember them, however. Farmers, with loaded wagons, came to the market-town over night and returned next day with empty wagons and full pocketbooks. Several years ago, these markets were resumed in a number of states, and it would be worth wh to renew the experiment now on a larger scale.

The farmer has now become an important factor American life. The old type of overworked a underpaid agriculturist has given place to the mode up-to-date producer, who knows how to make far pay. At the recent Congress of Farmers in B more, the contingent of delegates from Ohio, India and Illinois—all farmers—came in their automobil

Farmers' markets in available public squares other suitable locations, with reasonable facilities upon simple regulations, would go very far toward ting down the cost of living wherever they are e lished.

PALESTINE THE BEAUTIFUL

WE like to think of Palestine as a land of beaut and fertility, rich in climatic products, wit splendid forest areas, spreading pastur for grazing flocks, and incomparable vineyards. No different the reality! More than half the country a war-devastated desert; Lebanon's mighty ceda have been chopped up for firewood during the grea war; even the natural abundance of seasonal wil flowers has been much reduced, although the flor procession which marks the long season of blossoms still so brilliant and rapid in its many-hued change that nowhere save in the Holy Land can it be foun in its highest perfection. But with the new era th is now setting in, the ancient land will regain i former glories.

It is well that rehabilitation should begin wit irrigation, and this is now being planned on an exte sive scale, which gives promise of restoring its forme loveliness to which sacred history makes frequen allusion. Among the developments now under con sideration are one for a vast irrigation canal, anothe for the reclamation of submerged lands south of th Dead Sea, and still others which will aid both in cul tivation and transportation. Then it is planned t transform Jerusalem itself into a great model city, o modern lines, yet preserving its ancient landmarks Concrete highways will be built to reach all the scene of sacred association and parks, glorified with al the skill of the landscape architect, will aid i making the city an attraction for the whole world.

With the revival of national life and spirit of Palestine, the old land will become attractive in many ways hardly now dreamed of. Its little railway lin from Joppa to Jerusalem will become a mere outpos of the transportation system soon to be developed Its beautiful lakes, each with its hallowed associations will be centres of attraction to multitudes of reveren tourists. Its historic hills, Hermon and Tabor, it blossoming plains, scenes of many battles in ancien times, its valleys and groves, its one majestic river and its tiny streams will all be preserved and beautified i the national progress. With the introduction of irrigation the whole country will take on new life And what shall we say of the capital itself—war battered, age-old Jerusalem? What reviving glories may not be expected to spring up under skilful, loving hands, until it becomes the centre of the world's attraction, the joy of the whole earth!

THE BIBLE COURSE OPENS

TWENTY-FIVE hundred students, distribute among all the States, have been enrolled in the Christian Herald Bible Study Course which bega the last week in October. This number would doubtles have been greatly exceeded but for the delays inciden to the printers' strike. We feel, however, that a moderate-sized class is an advantage at the outset, as it wil afford ample opportunity to deal personally with the students, and will enable the Moody Bible Institute Faculty to develop the best results.

We are looking forward with confidence to the worl of both teachers and students and believe it will b thorough and effective. For a long time we hav had the organization of this Course in mind, and now that is is fairly launched, we desire to say a word t the Class. Be patient and painstaking; observe the rules laid down in the earlier lessons; work with just such helps as the lessons indicate, your mainstay being a good Reference Bible and the lessons themselves. Don't let a single reading of the indicate portions of the Bible be sufficient; read each portion as many times as the lessons demand, and each time try to get the broadening viewpoint. If you find any difficulty—which we do not anticipate—send a note by mail, addressed to the "Christian Herald Bible Course, Moody Institute, Chicago, Ill.," enclosing postage for reply. The first four lessons will so familiarize you with the system that the others will be easier to follow. Try to acquire the reverent spirit that should go with earnest Bible Study, and you will succeed and find the Course not only wonderfully enlightening as you progress, but rich in spiritual blessing.

Heat Your Home With a Pipeless Furnace

There are two big points that make the Kalamazoo different from all others. One is the method of installation with separate flues for returning cold air to the furnace from distant parts of the house, the other is the money saving price because of dealing direct with manufacturers.

You can't beat the construction in a Kalamazoo furnace. The castings are extra heavy—the grates operate easily on ball bearings—the casing is made with three thicknesses — steel, asbestos and steel.

Two styles: Pipe and Pipeless.

Our catalog tells all about them. Send for a copy.

RELIGION AND THE CHILD

BY MARGARET W. HEALD

SUMMER is gone and my young son and I are back in town. What will be the request early Sunday morning when I am about to turn over in my first comfortable bed for many wee for another nap not permitted to the com- m except on Sunday morning? These were my th hts the first Saturday evening at home.

ll there be a patter of little feet in the hall at irty? Will there be a touch on my cheek from y little hand? Will a voice in my ear say, ldy we must not be late to church"? Will the ous experience of last spring go on as before we own for the lakeside in the month of June?

heart thumped wildly as I waited, my eyes ed to close because of my eager anticipation, my ears were alert to hear the patter of little As the sun's first rays found their way into my wi ow.

ere they came! The thrill I experienced! Only ent can understand who has tried with his whole involved to lead a child to God.

Daddy we must get ready to go to church. The will ring in a minute, "came my first born's g voice vibrant with responsibility.

Yes, my son," I responded.

d by the little man, we prepared quietly for journey. Still without discussing our plans we ed down the street. Suddenly the chimes rang "Oh Come, Let Us Adore Him."

What do the bells say, father?" came the little e as my son's radiant face was lifted in question. eated the lines and he repeated them after me. the time we reached the church we were hum- g the song together.

nly a few worshipers were in the pews when we red and the chimes continued their incomparable ody. Off came the little cap as we met the sub- d and softly colored light within. We knelt down by side, the little pilgrim not waiting to see what uld do. We then stood until the glorious music of bells died away. We paused a minute before a dow through which poured as from a cloud a sling light. With the same selfconfidence dis- yed on our approach to the sanctuary the little led the way out. He was no longer an imitator a worshiper.

WE now proceeded on our way to the near by park, as we always did the Sundays before our mer vacation. That city breathing place had lost early splendor of flowers, green trees and blooming ubbery. An overcast sky and a wind with an edge l driven away the few pedestrians that had eared strolling about when my son and I came up main walk.

Jnseen Power manifested through the activities the wind was the Divine Truth and the principle olved upon our last excursion from the House of d to find God in the open air.

Not daring to intrude upon the silence of my dy companion, I busied my mind trying to recall lines from Henry Van Dyke—the lines that were justification for these after church walks.

'Why do the leaves fall off the trees father? Why the flowers dry and black? Where are the birds?" s inquired this infant soul who was having his t wrestle with an "enigma which has allured and tured the mind of man upon every plane of his- ic development."

THE psychological moment, as usual, came unexpectedly. I hastily brought my mind to bear on the question that my son asked so seriously replying, "Summer is gone. Jack Frost, that rry little elf, has nipped the flowers and leaves d has told the birds, 'they better hurry away to e south land, because winter will soon be here and e north wind strong and bold.' "

"O—h—!" drawled my perplexed listener.

After a few minutes came the usual questions that llow an unsatisfactory answer. "Where has sum- er gone? Why has summer gone away? Will mmer come back, and the birds and the flowers? here is Jack Frost? I don't like him, Father."

A very troubled face looked up to me, and the portance of my answer at this moment quite overhelmed me.

But a conversation between the boy and his other that morning came to the rescue and the ecious moment was saved. "All Gone. Sonnie's lk is all gone! Where did it go? Little lips, little ngue, little throat, you can tell. Will it come back gain? Yes, for see, Sonnie's legs are growing longer, d his cheeks rosy."

The boy's mother sang what she called "The All one" song almost every time the infant boy was d, many times to my great amusement. The mean- g now of the simple song and story of "The All one" conversation was clear to me for the first ime. His mother was leading the boy, through the ange of the infinitesimal circle of change which fell within his minute experience, by connecting the disappearance of food with his bodily health and rowth, and with this synthesis to be the boy's first solution of the enigma of change and help him later to conquer the mystery and keep his poise of mind.

THE pause was a little long before I dared to respond to the boy, and the thought and responsibility of giving a satisfactory answer to an infant question that involved "destructive processes".and converted change from a physical plane to a spiritual activity in subduing, transforming and idealizing nature was a bigger task than had confronted me in many a day.

Elizabeth · FitzHugh

"Summer is all gone, but it will come back by and by. The birds have all gone to the warm south land, but they will all come back in the spring to build new nests and sing us sweet songs. The flowers are all gone, but let us find their seed babies. They will sleep all winter in the earth covered over with leaves and a blanket of snow. When spring comes back with its warm sunshine and little tapping rain drops, the seed babies will wake up and grow into new plants and the park will be filled with flowers again."

The light from this familiar point of departure cleared the clouds from the child's face and brought forth the most enthusiastic, "let's find the seed babies, father!"

We found maple keys. We peeped into milkweed cradles. We gathered a few burrs. We filled our pockets with chesnuts and acorns galore. We plucked pods from some sweet-pea vines and haws from the wild roses that grew everywhere. When we turned a corner into a fierce gust of wind a cloud of leaves were tossed all over us; we burst into the gay little song, "Come Little Leaves Said The Wind One Day!" With our pockets filled with treasures and our hearts with God's love and care, we turned our steps homeward.

IN the seclusion of the library later in the day we tenderly examined the seed children. We discovered how God had put some of the seed babies in cradles. Some had wings and some were covered with prickers. He covered others with hard little shells, and most delightful of all there was a whole family side by side in a dear little pod. Most solemnly we were impressed by the mystery that God had tucked away a tiny plant in each little seed. Most lovingly we took them all into the garden, in a corner where many leaves had been blown, and planted them. The time being so propitious, we also found some crocus bulbs which, after investigating and comparing with the other seeds endlessly, we gently covered with earth. By-and-by, just casually, came the remark from the child, "the sun is all gone, the day is all gone, summer is all gone; then we go to bed, don't we father?"

Do you think this experience an adequate response to your son's perplexities, wonder and fear of vanishing objects and changes?" asked my interested listener. In reply I quoted the idea that our familiarity with change deadens our sense of its mystery; we must meet the child's wonder with a more comprehending sympathy. Think of fleeting days, of changing seasons, of passing years! Behold in the heavens the setting sun, the waning moon, the vanishing stars! Let your imagination wander over the face of the earth until you feel the meaning of rushing rivers and ebbing tides, of fading flowers and falling leaves, of withering plants. Consider how the mother vanishes from her child, the child from its mother, friend from friend. When your heart has dwelt upon these things until you begin to realize what it means to be the denizen of a world which is forever fleeing from itself, stretch your thought and from these commonplaces of change pass to its wider workings. "The heavens wax old as a garment, and as a vesture shall they be changed."

"Religious education must begin at two to be in practice at forty. It must grow day by day and associate with a good example. The times are grave, oh parents; lose not a day," ominously declared my interested listener.

YOUR BOY

By Charles Grant Miller

EVERY boy is going to have a confidant, some one to whom he can tell his secrets and whisper his hopes and ambitions which he would not breathe to others. This friend, this confidant, should be his father.

Any man would be horrified at the suggestion that he would ruin his boy by neglect, that his absorption in business would result in the undoing of his own son. But it is the easiest thing in the world to forfeit a boy's confidence. It will only take a little snubbing, a little scolding, a little indifference, a little unkind criticism, a little nagging and unreasonableness to shut off forever any intimacy between him and his boy.

One of the bitterest things in many a man's life has been the discovery, after he has made his money, that he has lost his hold upon his boy, and he would give a large part of his fortune to recover this loss.

It is an unfortunate thing for a boy to look upon his father as a task-master instead of companion, to dread to meet him because he always expects criticism or scolding from him.

Some fathers constantly nag and find fault with their sons, never thinking of praising them or expressing any appreciation of their work, even when it is well done. Yet there is nothing so encouraging to a boy, especially if he finds it hard to do what is right, as real appreciation of his effort. This is a tonic to youth. Boys thrive on praise. That is why most of them think more of their mothers than they do of their fathers. Their mothers are more considerate, more appreciative, more affectionate. They do not hesitate to praise well doing.

Don'ts For Young Mothers

By Elizabeth Fitz Hugh

DON'T allow the baby to sleep with his mother or with any grown person.

Don't cover him so warmly at night that he perspires—and in case of exposure, takes cold.

Don't forget to shade the light in his room.

Dont allow it to burn all night.

Don't let the baby sleep in a room that does not get sunlight sometime during the day.

Don't dry diapers in the nursery.

Don't be afraid of too much fresh air by day or night. The crib can be protected by screens.

Don't allow the baby to fall asleep over his bottle, or while nursing.

Don't take advice about food formulas from anyone but a doctor.

Don't feed the baby between his regular hours.

His little stomach requires nearly three hours to empty itself.

Freedom of the Fixed Heart

SUNDAY—Ps. 57:7. "My heart is fixed O God." This man de his circumstances in extraordinary vivid speech. Metaphor upon metaphor in almost breathless pace. Every word presents a suggesting grave difficulty and antagonism. Figure is piled upon fi the attempt to express the strenuousness of the conflict. He is " lions." He moves "among them that are set on fire." "Spear arrows" are hurtling about him. He is in peril of the "sharp sw His enemy "has digged a pit," and skilfully concealed it. And assumes an attitude toward these perils and antagonisms which giv spirit strength and leisure to break into song. His altar is not the gl seat of lamentation, it is the bright abode of hope and aspiratio brings to mind the birds which sang on the battle-fields of Flanders. yet it is our purposed triumph in God. It may not be ours to sin song of ecstasy and rapture, but it is ours to sing the song of confid and hope.

But there is another thing that must be said about the psalmist's umph. It is only as the heart is fixed that we become truly free. It seem as though the fixed heart forfeits its liberty. It is the gravest mistakes. The man who has no liberties has no true freedom. Vagr is not liberty, it is only license. The first condition of freedom is th be bound. That is why we have those strange paradoxes in the le of the apostle Paul. He writes about "Paul the bondslave," and almo the same breath he sings of "the glorious liberty of the children of G And the secret of the liberty is found in the bondage. It is just becau is gloriously fixed that he is gloriously free. The spiritually bound their wings and are able to "rise into heavenly places."

Well, it is not far from wings to song. When the heart is fixed we be to soar. "Because He hath set his love upon me. . . I will set him on hig That exaltation is as sure as the being of God. J. H. J.

The Old Gospel

MONDAY—John 8:32. "The Truth shall make you free." Wom may cry out for freedom, and in many things they need it; thank God they will never be emancipated from motherhood. As generation comes on, motherhood is renewed with the beauty, grace, m and peace which have for ages set it above all other human achieveme Philosophers, critics, unbelievers and scoffers may attack the home, predict its abolition; but the tide comes back as strong and true as bef So the old, old Gospel of Mercy and Salvation comes back as Jesus c back from the tomb which the Pharisees thought was sealed for etern The old Bible comes back like the old springtime and all is renewed. truths and inspirations are necessary to the human soul, and as the c goes away from a plenteous dinner-table and would dismiss the co thinking he would never need another meal, and yet comes back weepi and hungry, pleading for supper, so foolish men will declare there is more need for Gospel food, until, famishing, they cry out for their place at the table. The old Bible has been thrown aside, as the schoolb on the way to school throws away his dinner-pail; but he hurries back noon to find it. So the Bible's most destructive critics come rushing ba for the Book, or search vainly for something just as good.

Christian, don't worry! Love and the Gospel are perennials. T same inspired Book on which fell your grandmother's tears will be bede with your tears when you reach that age and condition. That Book favored above all other books with indestructible life. It is the best Boo to live by and the only Book to die by. It is the Book, and always will The Book of Life is always up to date, as is Life itself; and Life can ne die. How sweet the name of Jesus sounds in the believer's ear! And ho sweet it will sound a hundred generations hence! Be ye therefore steadfast unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord.

God's Good Care

TUESDAY—I Peter 5:7. "Casting all your anxiety upon Him; becaus he careth for you." Does God care, and does he care for us? Ar our steps ordered by the Lord? Does he think of us, and are we dear to hi Answer these questions affirmatively, and you have lifted a great lo from the weary shoulders of men.

The stone which marks the resting-place of one of God's faithful se vants contains only the name of the sleeper, the dates of his birth a death, and the single simple word, "Kept." "Kept" is the New Test ment word, but "preserved" is the Old Testament word, for the resu of God's care. Look at the "Traveler's Psalm" (Psalm 121): "The Lo shall preserve thy going out and thy coming in." Paul speaks One who is "able to keep that which we have committed unto him. Moreover, the apostle speaks of those who are "kept by the power of Go through faith unto salvation." These words have the military significan of a guarded camp. Sweet is the promise, "Thou wilt keep him in perfe peace whose mind is stayed on thee."

In all our wishing for our friends and families and for ourselves, is ther any better wish than this,—that we be "kept?" It means kept from evi kept from everything which may not be turned to good. The Mizpa benediction, "The Lord watch over thee and me," was not originall a benediction. At first it was, rather, "The Lord watch between me an thee." That is to say, "The Lord keep his eyes on both of us that w take no undue advantage of each other." We have turned the words t Christian use, have given them an evangelical sense, and employ them t invoke God's care.

Nearly three hundred years ago, an English clergyman, in preaching o the last verse of Psalm 121, called attention to the fact that the Hebre verb rendered "preserve" implies a very tender care. From it comes a wor signifying the eyelids, because they are the keepers of the eye. What comfort in this hidden meaning! How tender to the touch is the huma eye! The Lord calls us "the apple of his eye." He is our Keeper even unt death. Unto death? He is our Keeper through death, for death is but going out and a coming in — a going out from earth and a coming in to th larger chamber, the other room, the place prepared.

MEDITATION

V. Wilson, Rev. E. W. Caswell, D. J Burrell, D.D.,

The Power of Holy Zeal in the Heart

WEDNESDAY—Ps. 69:9. "For the zeal of thine house hath eaten me up." John Wesley, Bishop William Taylor, William Booth, D. L. Moody, . Chapman and Billy Sunday all had the passion for souls which made a worldwide evangelists. The world was their parish, multitudes their wers into the kingdom of heaven.

stead of trying to depreciate the work of evangelists, every minister ıld desire to be like these zealous souls. To be only a teacher, an instruc- of the sheep in the field is not the greatest work of the men "sent of God." who winneth souls is wise; reaching out after each single individual ıe way to draw all men unto God.

he sainted Brainard once said, "I have been dwelling upon the sides ternity." After that vision, he had still greater agony for the rescue inful men. Summerfield, in the midst of heavenly glories in his last ss, cried out, "Oh, if I might be raised again! I would preach as I er preached before, for I have had a look into eternity. McCheyne aimed to a brother minister, as he was on the borders of heaven, "Go on, dear brother; only an inch of time remains to preach to perishing souls, then eternal ages roll on forever."

Ioly zeal is dynamical; it is God in the soul, pleading for his children. re oratory and rhetorical beauty of expression become platitudes and service, beside the flame of the Pentecost and the tongues of fire. It is gift of the Holy Spirit for all, the power from on high, drawing all men the arms of the Infinite. E.W.C.

Enthusiasm in Christian Service

THURSDAY—Rom. 5:3. "Tribulation worketh patience." No one has ever had to combat with the more difficult temperament than Paul's. ost him tears to write a stiff letter, like his first epistle to the Corinthians. t he was not morose—he was no pessimist. He believed in victory. e James, he counted it joy even to fall into temptations, because trial rked patience; and patience, the capacity to suffer, was worth while, ause there is such patience in God.

According to Peter, this patience is more precious than fine gold, because fering meant to him something more than a service or a sacrifice for rist's sake. Suffering helped him to understand Christ—as if to say, Ie and I have felt one pain—have been crucified together—will share one ry."

To men and women of the early church who had once forsaken Jesus and d, or actually persecuted Him in His followers, this supreme chance of king things with Him and paying the ultimate penalty evoked the same pture with which young soldiers go forth to die in their country's cause. ristianity was not so much attending Church as volunteering for the aft, embarking on a transport, creeping forward, one by one over No an's Land. They wished to win territory—a little here—a little there— d their zeal released them from the destroying cares, the sordid rivalries, e wretched lusts which war against the soul. The early Christians had time to be miserable. The surplus of energy which in others developed , in them was consecrated to service—to worship—to prayer. Their joy as thus the scientific product of a life well balanced.

P.W.W.

The Miracle of the New Birth

FRIDAY—John 3:3. "Except a man be born again." It is a new birth; in which old things pass away, and behold all things become new. he man who is thus twice-born is "a new man in Christ Jesus," with a w mind, new conscience, new heart, and, above all, a new will. Then he egins to live.

Do I mean that a man who has not accepted Christ has not really egun to live? Just that. He is "dead in trespasses and sins." How else all we interpret the words, "I am come that ye might have life?" When hrist says "Thy sins be forgiven thee" it is as when a culprit's chains are roken off, and he enters upon the glorious liberty of the children of God. ll that goes before is waste; the waste of energy in muckraking for gold, chasing the thistledown of momentary pleasure, in striving after the orthless emoluments of this world. Waste, waste, frightful waste! Rise p, my friend; the Lord of Life is passing by!

Levi's biography is briefly comprehended in the words, "he followed hrist." It is recorded that he began by making a feast for Jesus, at hich he entertained his business friends and associates. I doubt not he rose at the table and made an open confession of his faith, avowing his elief in Jesus as the Messiah and exhorting his guests to do likewise. Thus e burned his boats behind him.

All the rest was following Christ. And whither would those footprints ake him. Can you follow, too? Or are you among those recalcitrants who y, "I don't believe in Foreign Missions?" If so, my friend, is it not bvious that here you part company with Christ? You cannot follow without following all the way.

Our Union With Christ

SATURDAY—John 17:21. "That they also may be one in us." It is not a union like a river flowing into the ocean, losing its identity; it is as "Thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee," both preserving personality, affection, will and powers of being. It is a stronger union than between parent and child, for "how much more will your heavenly Father give good things to is children." The tie of human affection is often weakened by separation, ut Christ will never leave you. A parent may change, but God is unchangeable; or a parent may die, but God ever liveth; or our friends may lose all their riches, but God's are unfailing and unsearchable. In him we cannot die; we lay off this mortal coil, with death grasps, while the soul ascends to its everlasting communion and blessedness.

The union with Christ is indissoluble, except by our own choice. He is the Head, we are the body. He is the vine, we are the branches, one lifegiving power pervading every remotest twig. Without him there is no fruitage; with him the leaf shall not wither. Paul begins the eighth chapter of Romans with "no condemnation" and ends the chapter with "no separation." Here we find certainty of salvation. E.W.C.

Before Deciding on Your Church Heating Investigate

KELSEY HEALTH HEAT

ONE of the surprising things you will find out, is the shortness in time it takes to heat the entire church.

It is no uncommon thing for it to bring about a saving of 10 to 12 hours of coal burning, in one Sunday morning.

Further than that, it ventilates while it heats. It effectually solves the costly problem of heating and the vexatious one of ventilation.

Let us send you the address of a Kelsey heated church to write to.

Effecto AUTO FINISHES

Listen! The Thomaston Express, of December 6th, 1918, a newspaper in Thomaston, Conn. ran this news item: "Dr. Kane has purchased a Grant touring car." The fact is, the only thing the doctor purchased was a small can of Effecto Auto Black Enamel, which was applied to his old Grant car, in an unheated barn. Why not "purchase" a new (?) car this way yourself?

Effecto Auto Finishes are made in nine live enamel colors, Finishing (clear varnish) and Top & Seat Dressing. It requires but a few hours of interesting work, a few dollars' worth of Effecto and 24 to 48 hours for drying, to transform the old weather-beaten car into a real automobile that you needn't be ashamed of. Your friends won't know the old boat.

Do not be persuaded that there is a substitute for Effecto. Effecto Auto Enamel is the original, genuine, high-luster auto enamel; easy-working, self-levelling and quick-drying; not a wax, polish or paint, but an enamel finish that will last longer than the finish on most new cars.

Top & Seat Dressing renews and waterproofs all kinds of tops, seats and upholstery. Dries in fifteen minutes.

A can of Effecto Auto Black Enamel will save you many dollars, if you keep it handy in the garage for touching up banged fenders and rusty spots.

If you can't find Effecto Auto Finishes at local paint, hardware or accessory stores,

Send us $1.70 for a Quart of Black Enamel enough for the average car, which will be sent you transportation charges prepaid.

A Child's Right to Good Cheer

Color, Sunshine, Flowers and Music Exert a Remarkable Influence on the Mind and Life of the Growing Boy or Girl.

By Marion Brownfield

ONE day as I was walking along the street, with my arms full of bright colored flowers, I passed a little girl absorbed in play. The moment she caught sight of the gay blossoms, she paused and looked up and said shyly, "Hello!"

I wondered if merely a smile would have impelled her to greet a stranger. I have my doubts, for color has a powerful attraction for children, more so it must be admitted than the most pleasant smile. Witness children's delight in bright colored candy, fruit, shop windows, toys or clothing.

Children love gay colors, sunshine, music, flowers. They are naturally artists for they instinctively, without any teaching, reach out for the beautiful and it is emphasized—the cheerful.

The psychological effect of color which is certainly one form of good cheer, should be remembered by every mother bringing up young children, no matter what circumstances seem to force themselves upon her. The years of childhood once passed can never be called back and often it is not realized what a large part dark, ugly, dreary things have in forming a child's disposition and character. With a sensitive child the dark house where sorrow or illness and all its trappings are permitted to dwell, endanger the child's whole outlook on life. A sombre sensitiveness of temperament is unconsciously, but sometimes almost irreparably developed.

I remember a home I used to visit with my parents occasionally as a child. I always had a completely inexplicable fear in entering and a longing to get away. The family were always hospitable enough but it was the general atmosphere, I discovered when I analyzed the discomfiture later after I had grown up. The rooms were apt to be a little chilly, the sunshine was carefully excluded, the furnishings were dark and heavy except for a very gaudy red rug on which a full sized tiger walked among some lilies.

The predominant odor in the house came from a basin of onions and vinegar which was usually left in the hall near the stairway, convenient for the person who used to take them upstairs frequently for a foot bath. And all this darkness and unpleasantness was unnecessary, for to my amazement, I learned that this family were well to do and could have replaced furnishings inherited from long dead relations with cheerful artistic pieces, had it occurred to them. They could have afforded to let the sunshine in, for if it faded the rugs they could have well afforded to replace them. More than that, it would have been economy to have the sunshine, for dark and almost damp rooms fastened both melancholia and illness on every member of the household. To-day a middle aged daughter is a chronic invalid who, instead of paying the price of sunshine, is paying a nurse and doctor to attend her more or less constantly for a "nervous trouble," and this same home has literally become her prison house.

The point is, that with children such things as darkness, dampness, unpleasant odors, dreary or tragic pictures, ugly clothing and medicine should all be minimized as much as possible. Of course their whole pathway cannot be strewn with roses, but there is so much trouble in life that must be faced whether or no, that it is the ideal mother who makes the home and everything it just as happy and attractive she can. The very memory of th haven of peace and cheer is oft what helps grown-ups to strugg bravely over the rough place

Sometimes a mother thinks sl "cannot afford" pretty clothes "up-to-date furniture" and fe correspondingly discouraged. B these are not necessarily expensiv Pretty clothes are not always t latest style or material, or a cost fabric. For children, they are chee ful colors and mean fresh starch house dresses with perhaps becomin dainty frills at the neck, a ros colored girdle or an every day shi waist that is pink or yellow. Te cents' worth of dye will transform even old waists and ribbons. Le the mother notice to what teache a child is attracted on the first da of school. It is sure to be the almos frivolous type who hasn't taugh long enough to tighten her hair an who besides fluffy locks, wears pink waist. The old custom of wearing mourning having gone almos completely out, let a mother bewar of drab colors, no matter what arguments of the practical they seem to present. For instance, soft yellow sweater, instead of gray or brown one is surely worth the difference in happiness and optimism it will develop in growing children.

As for cheerful house furnishings, they mean light muslin or flowered cretonne curtains, furniture that is thoroughly useful, bright flowers and potted plants, plenty of air and sunshine, and perhaps a trilling canary. None of these cost a great deal. If a comfortable couch with bright colored cushions designed for hard wear, some kind of a musical instrument and attractive pictures can be added to the home living room, the children are sure to be appreciative. How many homes are well furnished, but so generally gloomy that children as soon as the first bit of initiative in the "teens" develops, either try to "do over the house" in one way or another, or failing to win any sympathy from conservative or indifferent parents, desert it at the first opportunity for more cheerful, if less approved surroundings.

The cheerful things that attract a child to its home are comfortable, "usable" furniture, touches of brightness in the curtains, sofa pillows and flowers, good reading matter, music, pets and a general atmosphere of sunshine and warmth.

Just eliminating unnecessary furnishings will frequently transform dreary rooms surprisingly. Larg steel engravings, for instance, with dark heavy frames, banished will make the room seem lighter and larger. Several small gilt framed pictures are infinitely better as far as children are concerned. So many attractive colored pictures, both reproductions of the work of famous artists and very appealing advertisements come in up-to-date magazines, that there is no excuse for making a child sleep in a bed over which is hung a family portrait. And when the eliminating process takes place let a mother try to smile and laugh just as often as she can.

Jesus Corrects John's Narrowness

International Sunday School Lesson for November 23
Luke 9: 46-56.

HERE is a Scriptural passage that evidently was not read with understanding for many centuries! For if men had read and comprehended Jesus' teaching, how could Christians have persecuted Christians so sorely in the days that we are quite glad to forget? Not only did Jesus teach a spiritual faith that made no room for the persecution of others, but the incidents of our text prove that he specifically rebuked the manifestation of an arrogant and intolerant spirit in his disciples.

The story begins with a dispute among the followers of Christ as to which of them was the greatest. They had failed in catching the spirit of their Lord! He, for his part, called to him a little child and told them plainly that a really great thing to do is to receive and minister unto a little child in his name. He had nothing to do with competitive honors but only with the desire to be of truest service. That little child was of more consequence to him than earthly preferments. Moreover such a humble, trustful figure represented to him a higher ideal of discipleship than quarreling men, disputing their respective rank or abilities.

The graphic lesson bore fruit. As Jesus drew forth the child and delivered his judgment, John's conscience pricked him. He "answered" Jesus by telling of an occurrence which had recently taken place in which he had followed the dictates of pride and exclusiveness, and now he felt uneasy about the matter. They had come across a stranger, a man not a member of their little band, who was casting out demons in Jesus' name. Because they did not know him and had not authorized his work, they had forbidden him to continue his ministering. How quickly and positively Jesus warned them against such exclusiveness and narrowness,—"Forbid him not: for he that is not against you is for you."

Exclusiveness has been the bane of ecclesiasticism—of that Churchianity which has so often failed of being Christianity. Forbidding people to hold services, to preach and to pray, because they were not commissioned by the self-appointed censors of the organized church!

It is a fine thing when men can rejoice in the success of workers of righteousness who are not of their group, and who may even use very different means of manifesting the Holy Spirit. In the eleventh chapter of Acts we read of the sending of Barnabas from Jerusalem, to look into the situation at Antioch, where Greeks were being won to Christ, "who, when he was come, and had seen the grace of God, was glad; for he was a good man and full of the Holy Spirit and of faith." He was glad at the prosperity and success of men not of his group. He had a faith that was ready to overstep boundaries of race and locality.

Even in American communities, children of the Protestant denominations need to be taught the appreciation of other churches than their own, lest they think of their fellow-disciples as alien and strangers in religion. The great co-operation of our forces in the Federal Council and the Interchurch World Movement should be explained to the pupils in our Bible Schools.

VERY shortly after this colloquy, there was an illustration of in how different a spirit John and Jesus met intolerance when manifested by others toward themselves. It is one thing to become broad-minded oneself and quite another matter to suffer the bigotry and intolerance of others. It is a hard question to answer,—"Shall we be tolerant enough to intolerate intolerance?" Perhaps the truest answer would be, Yes, when our own pride and pleasure are all that are at stake, and No, when the progress and happiness of others are hindered thereby. But even intolerance is not to be met by fury and revenge. When the Samaritans would not allow Jesus to enter their village, through race and religious prejudice, James and John wanted the Master to call down fire from heaven upon them. But Jesus said, "Ye know not what Spirit ye are of."

How much the exclusive and narrow people miss! These Samaritans, for example, missed having Jesus Christ for an honored guest of their village; the greatest and most helpful Being who ever came their way was driven out. Bigots hurt themselves far more than they hurt any one else. The narrow-minded miss some of the very choicest friendships of life by failing to receive people who are different from themselves. In our own country, there are "natives" who might learn a great deal from their immigrant neighbors, and sectarians who might profit by the methods of their fellow-Christians of another regiment in the Army of Christ. Moreover, by their refusal to work together, they obstruct the coming of His Kingdom among men. Ofttimes the spirit of Christ tries in vain to bring a mighty revival in their community, but because they will not recognize Him, he goes on to some other village. It is a strange thing that men should have closed minds when the doors of their houses are open.

Jesus quietly turned away, and patiently went about the preaching of his glad tidings. He shows us that we must not be upset by rebuffs. Like him, we can always find someone who will be glad to hear the Word, and willing to receive us in the name of our Father who sends us.

Prohibition In New York

AS the chief of the magistrates' courts, Justice McAdoo says: "New York is in a transitory period; neither wet as formerly nor dry as intended."

In fact virtually all of New York City's saloons remained open after July 1 when the war time prohibition act went into effect and in most of them, with the proper approach, the thirsty customer was able to buy in any proportions and in any strength his appetite craved. High prices as much as the illegal aspect of the business, however, greatly cut down the consumption of alcohol and this decrease is reflected in the reports of the magistrate's courts before which all persons charged with intoxication are taken. This report on convictions for intoxication from April to September, 1919, is taken from a compilation of city statistics:

April, males, 496, females, 117; May, males, 487, females, 122; June, males, 457, females, 117; July, males, 259, females, 52; August, males, 222, females, 59; September, males, 200, females, 48. This gives a total for the respective months of 586, 609, 574, 311, 281, 248.

The report, in other words, shows that convictions for the three months preceding the date for war-time prohibition numbered 1,769. For the next three months, during which Justice McAdoo says the city was neither wet nor dry, the convictions totalled 840. The effect of total prohibition on the face of these figures would not be hard to estimate.

Got 117 Eggs Instead of 3

Says One of Our Readers

One of our readers says: "'More Eggs' increased my supply from three to 117 eggs." Any poultry raiser can easily double his profits by doubling the egg production of his hens. A scientific tonic has been discovered that revitalizes the flock and makes hens work all the time. The tonic is called "More Eggs." Give your hens a few cents' worth of "More Eggs" and you will be amazed and delighted with results.

Now is the time to give "More Eggs" to your hens, while prices are high and profits big. Don't let your hens loaf; make them lay. "More Eggs" Tonic has done this for 400,000 chicken raisers all over the country. It will do the same for you.

LESSON III. THE WORLD OVERFLOWED.

Read Genesis 5-8 inclusive.

BEFORE we start upon this lesson, let us look back upon our previous one (Gen. 3-4).

You were asked to read those chapters through, and to do so repeatedly. Did you do so? You were also asked to note the facts recorded. Have you these in mind?

Would you call the first great fact the Temptation of the woman by the serpent? If so, shall we say that this includes about the first five verses? To understand who or what is meant by the serpent compare the marginal references, Rev. 12:9; 20:2.

What serious error did the woman make at the outset? Would it have been better had she treated the serpent as Christ treated Satan in Matt. 4?

Compare verse 3 with verse 13 of previous lesson, and observe another error of the woman in adding to the Word of God. What was the real essence of the Temptation of the woman, as indicated in verse 5?

If the first great fact is the Temptation, shall we call the second great fact the yielding to the Temptation, or as it is commonly called, the Fall? Perhaps the next two verses will cover this Division.

Note the mental progress leading to the open act of sin in verse 6, and compare it with I John 2:16. Did any part of Satan's promise come true? What part failed to come true? Compare 2:25.

What would you call the third great fact covering say, verses 8-13? Some have called this the Trial.

If you are using the Two-Version edition of the Bible (Oxford), you will notice on the margin that "voice" is rendered sound, and "cool" wind.

Do you think God's inquiry, in verse 9, was in wrath or in love? Did Adam tell the exact truth in verse 10? Does verse 12 express penitence, or the opposite? On whom, really, does Adam cast the blame in verse 13?

We now come to the fourth fact or Sentence on the serpent (verses 14-15). Did the serpent originally crawl? What do you think the text teaches about that? Note that the curse on the serpent continues even to millennial days. (Isa. 65:25; Micah 7:17).

We here quote the Christian Workers' Commentary (Gray): "The seed of the serpent is placed by metonomy for that of Satan, and is identified as the wicked and unbelieving people in all the ages (Matt. 3:7, 13:38, 23:33; John 3:44, Acts 13:10, I John 3:8). In the same way, the seed of the woman might be supposed to stand for the righteous and believing people in all the ages, and certainly does in a certain sense, but very especially it stands for Our Lord Jesus Christ, the Head and Representative of that people, the One through Whom they believe, and by Whom they become righteous. He Himself is the seed of the woman and they in Him (Isa. 7:14, Matt. 1:18-25, Luke 1:31-35, Gal. 4:4, 5)."

In verses 16-21 we have the fifth fact which is the Sentence upon Adam and Eve. Note the two features of the sentence on the woman, and also that for which the man is condemned. Note that the curse on the ground is also a curse on the man. What part of man returns to the dust? (Compare Eccl. 12-7).

Following further the illustration from human jurisprudence, may we not call the last great fact the Penalty (verses 22-24)?

Have we previously met the word "us" as related to God, and what does it signify as to his nature? Do you think verse 23 expressed the anger or the love of God for man?

We cannot here take time to comment upon the mysterious beings placed on guard at the gates, but they may be alluded to at a later time.

So far as chapter 4 is concerned, we will have to be content just now, in the main, by saying that in our judgment it contains four great facts, about which you will be questioned at the close of the next lesson. Search out these facts and be ready to name them.

The first runs from verse 1 to 8 inclusive, the second from 9 to 15, the third 16 to 18, the fourth 19 to 24. The concluding verses of chapter 4 look almost as though they belonged to the next chapter, and their contents will be touched upon by and by.

These facts are all of great importance, and in process of time, as these lessons proceed, they will be dealt with and interpreted; but as has been said again and again, let us get the facts first.

However, we must not pass from the consideration of the first fact, without asking you to compare what the New Testament says about the reason for the acceptance of Abel's sacrificeover that of Cain (Heb. xi:4). We have here the earliest intimation of the Bible as to the way only in which a guilty sinner can approach God, even through the blood-shedding of the Son of God, which Abel's sacrifice typified (Heb. ix. 22).

Coming to our present lesson, we would like you to note the great outstanding fact in each chapter as heretofore. Careful reading will enable you to do this, and it will become easier as we advance.

As to the fifth chapter, form an opinion as to the real occasion for the genealogical table. Why did the Holy Spirit place it there? As to the sixth, note the reason for the judgment of the Deluge. As to the seventh, the length of time it continued, and its extent. In the eighth, observe the divine promise at the close; and in the ninth, the establishment of that promise by the Covenant with its sign, which remains to this day.

The ninth chapter contains another fact of much importance, as recorded in verses 5 and 6.

Our next lesson will, in some respects, be the most important thus far, as it will include a summing up of what has gone before. It will also have a list of questions for review, and to form a basis for the first test to be forwarded to students through the mail. It will also take a wide sweep of the future.

America's Thanksgiving Bird

By Earl W. Gage

I the United States of America here is one day of universal easting, a day set aside by dential proclamation for the vance of a religious festival, ndering thanks to the Creator ıe blessings of a bounteous har- and for the prosperity of the le, and this day is known ghout the length and breadth e land as Thanksgiving Day. dissolubly associated with that in the minds of the people is a —a bird of large proportions, d distinctly American, charac- ed by neither the bold ferocity ıe eagle of war nor the meek idity of the dove of peace, but the standpoint of strict utili- nism perhaps superior to both. t bird is the turkey.

ıe first time that any Thanks- ng Day and the turkey were ght together into intimate re- n was when Governor Brad- , of Plymouth Colony, in 1621, aside a day of thanksgiving to orate the gathering of the first rest made by the Pilgrims who come over in the Mayflower the before. The harvest had saved colony, and incident to the reli- ıs features of the occasion the ernor sent out four men with r flint-lock fowling pieces to pro- meat to grace the festive board rder that the colonists "might r a more special manner rejoice ether."

n those days the wild turkey strutted in great flocks and in nolested pride and splendor ough the forests of New England. ubtless the then friendly red man l introduced the early settlers to creamy taste of the white and succulence of the dark meat of turkey; so wild turkeys were object of the hunters. From t good day to this the turkey, ıer wild or tame, has occupied place of honor on the Thanks- ing dinner table where opportun- or opulence could possibly pro- le it.

Thus on the last Thursday of vember of each year, the day that tom has assigned for this cele- ation, the turkey reigns as un- owned king of the festival, al- ough he needs must die to achieve at distinction.

UST why the bird should have been called "turkey" in the glish language no one seems to ow. Turkey had no more to do th the introduction of the bird to lite society than did Greenland Kamschatka. The real turkey a bird indigenous to North Am- ica and was first introduced into rope by the returning Spanish lventurers who had found it in the w World. It may be that since e bird was brought to northern rope from Spain the generally norant public concluded that, like any other unusual things, it came om Turkey or the Far East. gain, the bird may have named elf, since the call of the hen to her icks sounds very much like tur-r- , tur-rr-k, tur-r-r-k. At any rate, ıere is no actual connection be- veen the bird and the country of ıe same name.

The turkey was a favorite fowl mong the aboriginal inhabitants America. It had its habitat over l that section where grew its vorite food, Indian corn. When ortez, in 1519, first reached the ealm of the aztecs, Montezuma ntertained him in royal splendor nd among the delicious viands set efore the Spanish invaders was oasted turkey. It was found that he Aztecs had domesticated the owl and that it was also plentiful in ts wild state. North of the Rio rande the bird was equally well nown, and the adventurous Coro- ado found it among the cliff- welling Indians and other tribes he et on his expedition through what now Texas, Arizona and New Mexico. The Zuni Indians seem to have known of the turkey for centuries, and some of their earliest traditions deal with this interesting bird. Not only did the bird serve as a delectable food, but its feathers formed a valuable asset for purposes of adornment in the headgear of the Indians and for embellishing the garments of the women, besides lending accuracy to the flight of their arrows. When the English settled Massachusetts they found wild turkeys in abundance, and other colonists found them from New England to Florida.

As the population of the country increased, the wild turkey gradually disappeared until today the domesticated and farm-raised turkey has, as a commercial factor, entirely supplanted its wild ancestor.

By careful breeding, turkeys have been increased markedly in size since domestication. Wild turkeys of today average in weight about 12 pounds for young toms and nine pounds for young hens, while the standard weight of domestic Bronze turkeys is 25 pounds for young toms, 16 pounds for young hens, 36 pounds for mature toms, and 20 pounds for mature hens. In sections where little or no attempt is made to domesticate or raise the standard, the weight is but slightly more than wild turkeys.

NEXT to common fowls, turkeys are the most widely recognized source of income for the American farm woman. However small a business turkey raising may be considered by the farmer during the spring and summer, it frequently happens that the money obtained from the sale of turkeys plays an important part when the Christmas shopping season comes around in December. On the average farm the expense of raising turkeys consists mainly of the time spent in caring for the sitting hens during the hatching season and in looking after the wants of the young poults for the first few weeks of their life; to which must be added the cost of the grain used in fattening the turkeys for market in the fall. Compared with the profit in feeding other live stock, turkeys have a marked advantage, not only because they pick up most of their food in the fields and meadows, but also because of the higher prices when they are sold.

As destroyers of weed seeds, grasshoppers, and other injurious insects, turkeys reign supreme. In many sections where grasshoppers abound farmers who have seen their crops destroyed time after time by these pests have turned their attention to turkey raising for the sole purpose of destroying them, and have not only succeeded in doing this but have made a handsome profit besides.

Because of the decreasing production of turkeys on the average farm, the business of raising turkeys on a large scale promises to develop into an important and interesting form of ranching. In the unsettled foothill regions of California, for instance, and in certain sections of Arizona and other western States, a few persons have engaged in this industry to the extent of raising a thousand or more turkeys each year. Here the range is unlimited, and the natural food of the turkey, such as grasshoppers and other insects, green vegetation, and the seeds of various weeds and grasses is abundant. Advantage also is taken of the turkey's relish for acorns, and where these are plentiful but little grain need be used for fattening in the fall. These large flocks of turkeys are managed much like herds of sheep, being taken out to the range early in the morning and brought home to roost at night. They are herded during the day by men, either on foot or on horseback, and by dogs specially trained for the work.

300 EGGS EVERY DAY

"Since using "TWO for ONE" I get 250 to 300 eggs a day instead of 25 or 30," writes J. C. Hoff of Indiana.

Poultry raisers who have not given some thought to increasing their egg production this fall and winter, are making a big mistake. Present indications are, the price of eggs will be sky high, and if the owners of laying hens do not make every effort to profit by these conditions they will regret it later, particularly when they hear of the large profits being made by their next door neighbor If there ever was a time when a little extra attention should be given to the poultry yard, now is the time. Do not delay. A few pennies spent wisely today will bring you back dollars tomorrow.

World's Greatest Egg producer

"TWO for ONE" is the marvel of all egg tonics. It is the most remarkable producer of eggs ever known to the poultry world. "TWO for ONE" is making records every day in egg production that were never before believed possible. Flock owners all over the country are amazed with the results. The most experienced poultry experts say they have never seen the like of it.

"TWO for ONE" is not a mere food It is an egg tonic in the truest sense of the term—a scientific preparation in concentrated tablet form—the result of scientific research and experiment. Every factor entering into the matter of egg production was scientifically studied

As a result you have in "TWO for ONE" a tonic that conditions the hen for the utmost in laying capacity—that builds muscle and bone—that stimulates active functioning of the hen's reproductive organs—that insures fertile eggs and 100 per cent hatchings—that makes the laggard lay and increases the production of active layers. A tonic that gets more eggs for you, winter and summer, than you ever thought possible.

MISS C. H., Cragmont, N. C. The long passage of condemnation of evil deeds, described in Matt. 23:13-36, was aimed at the Scribes and Pharisees. They were charged with shutting out heaven against men by withholding the key of spiritual knowledge of God's revealed Word, and substituting their own petty traditions. They were charged with contriving to get possession of the property of widows and orphans, promising them the benefit of their prayers. They were charged with reaching across the world to get a single heathen convert, while neglecting the unconverted at home. They were charged with being "blind guides," in the sense of teaching error, and of confusing inquiring minds by subtle distinctions, in order that they might prey upon them the more readily. He also charged them with being peculiarly careful about the dues they exacted from the people, and yet neglecting the greater matters—the law, judgment, mercy and faith—and he accused them of cavilling about petty offenses against the law and ignoring greater violations. He charged that with their lips they made a fair show of religious reverence, while their hearts were full of corruption; further, they still had in them the same spirit, which opposed all attempts at religious reformation and which would again kill the prophets. It was a terrible arraignment, but one that was needed.

Reader, Steubenville, O. Profanity is specially condemned in the Scriptures, and there are many passages which refer to it. See I. Tim. 1:9; 3:1-5; 5:1; Heb. 12:15, 16; James 5:12; Matt. 5:34, 37.

Reader, Jackson Springs, N. C., writes: "I want to write you and tell you how much the Herald means to us. We feel that we could not get on without it. It comes in my sister's name, who is away teaching but I have been keeping it paid up most of the time. I hope you may come safely through the troubles due to the printers' strike and that you may have a most successful year. The Herald touches and uplifts so many lives. Only this morning I picked up a number, and found comfort in part of the sermon."

We appreciate the kindly expressions in your letter. We have sent your request for prayer to the Prayer League.

Mrs. E. C., Spokane, Wash., writes: "As so much is being said and written on the subject of Church Unity, may I take the liberty of putting forth an idea? None of the churches seem altogether willing to merge their creed and doctrines with another, but there is one point, in Christianity on which, unless I am greatly mistaken, all denominations agree and that is that to be a Christian a man must needs be a follower of Jesus Christ. Now what does 'a follower' mean? Christ taught the people a doctrine of love and in several places he summarized that doctrine—first in Matt. 7:12: 'Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them,' and he finished his admonition by claiming, 'This is the law and the prophets.' Also in Mark 12:28-31, he gives the same commandment as the fulfillment of our love toward God; the two work hand in hand and produce, according to the testimony of Jesus Christ, the greatest commandment of the Gospel. On this subject I think all churches, Protestant and Catholic, will agree. Will not some minister try this idea in his church?"

O. M. W., Bellefontaine, Miss. The conduct of the steward (Luke 16:1-9) was dishonest, but Christ did not hold up his dishonesty for imitation. He was inculcating the same lesson that He taught in Matt. 25:34-40. Those who ministered to the poor and the afflicted, especially to the followers of Christ, would receive a reward out of all proportion to their services. If they knew how great that reward was, they would not let the opportunity escape them. The children of the world were more crafty, and he tells of one of them who worked a device at his master's expense to effect this object. He placed his master's debtors under an obligation, so that they might feel bound to help him, when he needed it, as he had helped them. It was not Christ who commended him, but his own lord, who admired the shrewdness of his dishonest scheme.

D. C., Novar, Ontario. We would suggest that you turn to the passages in Rev. 12:7, 8, 9; II Peter 2:4; also Job 1:7 and 2:1; Luke 10:18 and Jude 1:9. There are many other passages relative to the subject.

Mrs. E. P., Lawrenceburg, Tenn., writes: "It seems to me if 'we are our brother's keeper' in any sense whatever—when struggling, starving Europe is dependent upon us for future safety—we, as the greatest nation, could not refuse to join and uphold the League of Nations. If it is possible to have a 'League of Nations,' why shouldn't there be a 'League of Churches,' in which the main point would be to help wipe out sin; each denomination to work to that special end, instead of there being no harmony and a continual fight for new church members, the most expensive churches, etc.? Why not drop all worldly matters and work for higher spiritual things?"

M. C. S., Deer Lodge, Tenn. It is held that China is the oldest country whose nationality has survived. The Jews as a race are older even than the Chinese.

W. S., Wisner, La. The higher altitudes are usually indicated for the best health results. For full information write to Bureau of Vital Statistics, Washington, D. C.

L. F. B., Greenville, Ill., writes: "Some one suggested through the Herald that all Americans read or re-read the Declaration of Independence. A good suggestion! I would suggest that American Christians read and re-read the Sermon on the Mount; or Christ's Inauguration Address to His Disciples and the multitude, recorded in Matt. 5, 6 and 7, then His Farewell Address to His Disciples and to all Christians, beginning John 13:31 including chapters 14, 15 and 16, also His prayer contained in the 17th chapter for their sanctification."

E. L. T., Martha Washington Club, Cleveland, Ohio. "I have always admired your paper, and often been one of your interested readers. I write to ask you if you think anything more could be done for our children in the public schools, besides training the intellect. I suppose that courage, patriotism, purity, honesty are taught in the schools to some extent; but it seems to me there should be lessons on them every day. Etiquette or propriety should be taught as it would certainly save some impulsive ones from making wrecks of their lives. We had courses in the schools in German not long ago. Why not have courses in Bible Study? If the Bible is not to be read in the schools, those who are encouraged by their parents should surely be allowed the privilege of studying the Book of books."

Our correspondent has given some very practical suggestions, and we should like to hear from other readers on the same subject.

The Spirit of Thanksgiving

By G. H. S.

N counting our blessings, and setting them side by side with our discouragements, we find that they outnumber the latter beyond measure. Yes, the American people have this year true cause for national thanksgiving. Although the echoes of the great world-struggle have yet wholly died away, we are justified in looking forward to the ulti- e restoration of peace and order among the nations. Even the storm- d of industrial unrest has a silver lining of hope, to cheer us with the pect that it will ultimately pass and give place to happier conditions. President, for whose recovery the whole nation prayed, has been ed from his bed of sickness and marvelously strengthened. Our crops abundant for all our needs, and our flour bin is big enough and full ugh to feed the world. The health of our people never was better. The ndations of business have been roughly shaken, but they have withstood strain. Strikes and labor disturbances continue, but even these are sing. On the horizon-line we can see the indications that the whole sky earing.

herefore, although it has been a year of unusual trial to multitudes, we e the satisfaction of knowing that, thanks to the splendid spirit of our ple, they have met all with indomitable courage. While other nations e suffered deeply—and they have our sincere compassion—we have been nderfully shielded. Surely we can say in gratitude of the Omnipotent nd who has guided us safely through all the storms of the past, and who uiding us today, that "He hath not so dealt with any nation."

t is, therefore, in the spirit of gratitude and hope that we welcome the anksgiving of 1919. Let us lift up our hearts in grateful acknowledg- nt to God for the blessings we enjoy. We feel that we can confidently st Him in the days ahead to bring about, in His own good way, the full toration of the national spirit and of firmer faith in His wisdom and vidence.

ount your blessings! As we gather around the Thanksgiving table ich He has spread so bountifully for us, let us put aside all vexing ughts and remember only his great goodness. Make it a day of re- cing. He has helped us and brought us safely through many difficulties l He is still our Helper and our Provider. There are problems yet to be ved, but experience has shown that the American spirit, sustained by nfidence in God's overruling justice, righteousness and goodness, sur- unts any obstacles. Let no grief or regret intrude to overpower this titude, but honor the day which has always been dear to the American rt—the day on which we can feel as a people more than on all the er days of the year that we have the right to come under the gracious ns of our Heavenly Father and to "Give thanks unto the Lord for He is od, and his mercy endureth forever."

The End Of a Story

By Margaret E. Sangster

THE Jerry McAuley Mission stands on a little crooked street not many steps from e sluggishly flowing East River. arehouses loom in darkness upon ery side of it, folk chatter in a reign tongue upon its very door- p, street sounds rise to its highest ndow. But it stands there, acidly erect—built of solid con- ete and firm masonry—a monu- ent to the lives of Mr. and Mrs. rry McAuley.

Every one knows the dramatic ory of Jerry McAuley's conver- on from a life of crime. Released om Sing Sing prison in 1871, he rned suddenly from sin and ught comfort in the sheltering ve of the Saviour. And, through e help of friends and the grace of od, he established a mission in a ngy frame house at No. 315 ater Street—the very site of the cAuley Mission today. It was the steps of that frame house at he found Maria Fahy, one ght in the winter of 1873—found r in a drunken stupor; broken and one.

A young Irish girl she was, who d taken the wrong turning on the ad of life—and had not had the urage to retrace her steps. It as Jerry McAuley who gave her e courage that she needed—the rength and the trust. It was no rprise to the folk of the mission— e marriage that took place less an a year after the meeting on e steps. It was all so very—right.

They worked together after that, r. and Mrs. Jerry McAuley. housands of men and women re- ponded to their whole-souled iendliness, their willingness to lp, their outstretched welcoming ands. Derelicts and drunkards, hieves and murderers answered heir call—and were saved.

The work that the McAuley's ere doing was a new sort of work r that day. It was a work that eeded expansion. And so, in 1882, iends of the couple aided them in tarting the Cremorne Mission in West Thirty-second Street—the enter of what was then New York ity's Tenderloin district.

It was with the founding of the Cremorne Mission that the work of the McAuleys was divided. Jerry continued to help the downtown derelicts at the original mission, and Mrs. McAuley went uptown to show the light—the light that she herself had seen—to an entirely different element. For the men and women that Jerry McAuley preached to had never had a chance, and the folk that Mrs. McAuley reached had thrown their chances away.

Two years after the opening of the Thirty-second Street Mission Jerry McAuley died, and Mrs. McAuley undertook the entire management of both places. It was not until she married again that she gave up the actual direction of the work. Her second husband was an architect, Bradford L. Gilbert, and he it was who designed the concrete building that has taken the place of the original frame structure in Water Street.

Mr. Gilbert died several years ago. And it was soon after his death that Mrs. Gilbert began to show the effects of her crowded and self-forgotten life. During the war she threw herself into welfare work among the soldiers and sailors—but she was not strong and the work sapped her waning vitality. She grew tired and ill. And recently she died quietly in her Brooklyn home. She was seventy-eight years old—and her work was done!

But down in Water Street in the McAuley Mission she is not dead. Her spirit is alive down there; her hand is pointing the right path to lost men and women. And she will never be forgotten.

John Nyburn, superintendent of the Mission and himself a convert of the McAuleys, spoke of her tenderly when I saw him yesterday in his austere little office.

"Lately," he told me, in a curiously hushed voice, "she hasn't been well enough to be with us—much. But sometimes she'd come, on a Sunday afternoon, and pray with us. She had a gift of prayer—a gift of faith."

COCOANUT CAKE

¼ pound butter
2 cups sugar
3 eggs
3 cups flour
4 teaspoons baking powder
½ cup HEBE
½ cup water
1 teaspoon vanilla

Cream butter, add sugar gradually and continue creaming; then add yolks of eggs and beat until mixture is light. Mix and sift the flour and baking powder. Add the water to HEBE. Alternately add the sifted flour and diluted HEBE to the first mixture. When thoroughly mixed, add the vanilla and carefully fold in the stiffly beaten white of eggs. Pour into buttered layer cake pans and bake in a moderate oven 15-35 minutes until delicately browned.

Make a boiled icing, using HEBE, add freshly grated cocoanut, and spread between the layers and cover entire surface.

Burning Up Money

By Harry Botsford

A FEW weeks ago a man stood on the top of a very high mountain and looked down on hundreds of acres of magnificent forest. Not only were the trees beautiful, but they were worth millions of dollars. From this vantage point he could see a blue-gray pall of smoke in the distance that gradually increased in volume.

Helpless and soul-sick, the man stood and watched millions of dollars worth of beautiful timber destroyed by fire. Nature had worked for hundreds of years in growing the timber and within a few hours its value was wiped out because a careless hunter had dropped a lighted cigar in a brush pile. In a few days the fire burned out, leaving mile after mile of blacked stumps and somewhere a statistician computed the value in cold figures and made entries under the separate headings of "Preventable" and "Carelessness." Another item had been charged to the grand yearly total fire loss of three hundred millions of dollars.

We are a rich nation—perhaps the richest nation in the world—but no one can say that we can stand a yearly fire loss equal to the above sum. Three hundred million dollars is a sum so large the mind has difficulty in grasping it. Compare it with the budgets raised by the Y.M.C.A. and Red Cross for war work; contrast it with the sums paid out by life insurance companies in the course of a year and you have some conception of its magnitude. With an understanding of what this sum represents, there comes to the intelligent person the realization that this loss constitutes just as wasteful a drain on the national resources as the great loss of life that is the result of the fires.

FIFTEEN thousand lives are lost every year in preventable fires! Here is a matter that cannot be determined in terms of dollars and cents. This appalling loss must be measured by tears and sorrow and want, and inconceivable suffering. The victims are nearly all women and children, helpless infants, and the aged and infirm—the human elements we love and cherish.

A property owner is never justified in jeopardizing the lives and possessions of his neighbors by refusing to take precautions against fires. More particularly is this true of a building in which people congregate. Here the moral responsibility becomes a matter of the greatest moment, and dereliction is little short of criminal.

Prevention methods are the factors to be considered in eliminating the fire hazard. Every fire is first of all, a little fire. Action taken promptly will put out the blaze that may soon reach destructive proportions. For this reason, it is always advisable to have in your house, barn and garage and on your car and tractor some form of effective fire extinguisher. A small chemical extinguisher is inexpensive but effective and the mere fact that such an instrument is convenient for use in an emergency is a factor that will add to your peace of mind. Its use on a small fire will stop the blaze quickly. Added to this, the fact that such an extinguisher is carried on your car or tractor will cut down the cost of the fire insurance 15%. That extinguishers are thus recognized by the insurance companies is conclusive evidence that they are good things to have around.

It has been often stated—and the facts seem to warrant the observation—that we are a nation of poor housekeepers, both in our dwellings and public buildings. Destructive fires, during the last year, have been confined in 65% of the cases to dwelling house. Nearly all of thes have been caused by carelessn one way or another. All could been prevented. This 65% c fire loss experience in all state world will augment the fire haz and the little blaze starts in garret or attic and grows in volu until discovered. So often a fire this nature breaks out at night wh the occupants of the house are aslee thus adding to the danger of lo life.

It is a deplorable fact that ma women still use gasoline as a cle ing agent for clothes. Many fi gasoline must be used for this purpo —and its use is forbidden by th usual fire insurance policy—ta

Another example of "bad ho keeping" so often in evidence is accumulation of rubbish in the b yard. A pile of rubbish, so situa offers a fertile opportunity fo chance spark while if oily matte hazard.

Not long ago a man who had be doing some painting around home hung his oily overalls i warm closet and went to bed. H was fortunate in owning a dog tha slept lightly for, when the chemic phenomenon known as spontaneou combustion ignited the overalls, th barking of the dog wakened th family in time to be saved. As i was, the house and contents wer burned.

One of the most common cause of fires is electricity. Great car should be exercised in using a electric iron that the switch is turne off before the iron is left unattended
Many serious fires have been cause from carelessness in this respect.

A BASIN of fat boiling over on stove immediately ignites and burns fiercely. Immediate application of the fire extinguisher will drown the flames but the average woman uses a pan of water which causes the fire to spread. In event that no fire extinguisher is convenient, a pail of flour or sand will smother the flames.

Many states and cities now have laws that forbid the use of rubber hose as a gas connection but in spite of this obvious danger almost every home has at least one rubber hose gas connection. The hose has a dual capacity for danger: one, from explosion and fire and, the other, from asphixiation. The latter is more liable to occur at night when the occupants of the house are asleep and are unconscious of the fact that

First Aid In The Kitchen

By Mrs. Charles M. Sheldon

OR years the daily newspaper has been my "First-Aid" in my kitchen when preparing al.

always have a clean one ready, s soon as they are read I fold neatly and put them into ry drawer, for nothing makes om look more untidy than piles wspapers lying around. When ready to prepare a meal my move is to lay one sheet of paper he table or wherever I am to k.

it happens to be breakfast, the d for toast is cut on the paper, melon is cut here and the seed left, the boiled eggs are put into the egg cups here and the shells left; sometimes the toast is burned, but if scraped on the paper there are no crumbs to clean up.

It is the same in preparing lunch or dinner: the sandwiches are made here, the vegetables, potatoes, beets, beans, peas and all the rest are all prepared here and the newspaper takes care of all the "muss," where after the meal is over whatever scraps may be left can be added to it, then all gathered up and put into the trash-burner.

I hope if you have never tried it, you will.

Feeding Europe's Children

T the time the American Relief Administration terminated its vities in Europe, 3,500,000 dren were receiving one supple- tary meal a day of American l. When Herbert Hoover con- ed to continue the work it was a view to obtaining the active peration of the national organi- ons in the United States to her relief operations in their own ntries. The appeal for this help now gone out from the Relief ninistration which says the dren o Europe will be fed until ditions are improved if every ign society here, representing countries in which juvenile food eaus are conducted, will give ir support to the projects.

ive cents a day is the estimated t of the meals which Mr. Hoover ns to give to every child in Europe who needs nourishment. Out of the $100,000,000 appropriation made by the United States government last spring, $7,500,000 was assigned for the establishment of the children's bureau. An additional $3,047,000, derived from various relief societies and other organizations in this country, was sufficient to carry on the work until August 15.

The following figures show the number of debilitated children who have been receiving the care of the American Relief Administration and are still in need: Finland, 140,028; Esthonia, 62,442; Lithuania, 57,156; Letvia, 31,350; Czecho-Slovakia, 368,787; Austrian republic, 303,570; Serb, Croat, Slovene State, 222,729; Poland, 651,738; Rumania, 171,432; total, 2,009,232.

y are breathing death-laden air. gislation along these lines for- ding the use of rubber hose as a connection is sensible and should in force in every state. But even islation will not entirely reduce hazard.

he fact that so many of our ellings are of wooden construc- n is responsible for the spread of ire into a conflagration affecting ity. Primarily, wood was cheap d convenient, and always has been compared with other building terial which accounts for the fact t wooden dwellings are in the jority. As long as wooden build- s are the rule, the menace of a flagration will exist. While the oden building cannot be banished, wooden roof can and should be laced with a fire proof material. e menace of the wooden roof is vious and the joint experience of ny cities is that as high as 18% of dwelling-house fires originate on ingle roofs. The shingle roof st go, eventually, and many es now have ordinances forbid- g their use.

T costs us millions of dollars annually for the doubtful pleasure smoking Carelessly thrown cigar d cigaret stubs are responsible for a large number of fires. In Illinois "matches-smoking" caused 3,156 fires with a property loss of $299,072. This happened last year and this year in New Jersey a warehouse with two million dollars worth of material stored in it was burned because an employee threw a lighted cigaret stub on the floor and forgot about it.

As a nation, it seems that we must plead guilty of carelessness. Insuring your property against loss by fire is not sufficient. We must become alive to the moral responsibility attached to the matter. We must not retain a selfish view of the matter, for insurance cost is based upon the national losses and any efforts we extend toward fire elimination is going to react favorably upon the cost of our own fire insurance.

The moral and criminal—and I mean criminal in all the word implies—responsibility for fire prevention rests with the individual. Fire is not a private thing, but a matter that affects the community. If I had a fire, it concerns you; if you have a fire, it concerns me. Once this is realized, the public will never look upon a fire, even unattended with fatalities, as a matter of indifference.

Mr. Doheny. We bring the ter through a steel pipe line a dis- ce of about 45 miles—or we did ing it that distance. Now we e developed some water about or 5 miles away, good, clean well ter, and they have baths and ydrants in their houses just xactly the same as the Americans have. Their source of supply of water is the same. Their ice is from the same place; their food is of the same quality, and their houses are inspected for sanitary purposes by our health officers.

The Chairman. What do they pay for water; do you know?

Mr. Doheny. They pay nothing for water, nothing for light, nothing for fuel of any sort. I am quite sure that is true—I do not testify as to this under oath, but I am quite sure this is true as to every oil company operating in the Huasteca region—as to every American company, and the others, too, I think

The steady grind and shocks of work and worry have worn out the nerves' reserve. Short of a complete rest, a scientific food-tonic is the one thing urgently needed—and that means Sanatogen.

To this statement thousands of brain-workers unhesitatingly subscribe, some even going as far as Arnold Bennett, the famous writer, who exclaims, "The tonic effect of Sanatogen is simply wonderful!"

her conscience just what she would tell about her past and what she would keep to herself. There was a certain reserve that any one might have, and if she was frank about a few facts no one would be likely to question further.

So next morning she told Mrs. Carson that since her parents' death she had lived with a woman who knew her father well, but lately things had been growing very unpleasant and she found she had to leave. She had left under such conditions that she could not bring away anything that belonged to her, so she would have to work and earn some more clothes.

Mrs. Carson looked into her sweet eyes and agreed that it was the best thing she could do; they might follow her up and make all sorts of trouble for her in her new home if she wrote for her things; and so the matter dropped. They were simple folks, who took things at their face value and were not over inquisitive.

On the third day there arrived a long letter from Jane in which she gave certain suggestions concerning the new member of the family, and ended: "Ma, she's got a story, but don't make her tell any more of it than she wants. She's awful sensitive about it, and trust me, she's all right! She's been through a lot. Just make her feel she's got some folks that loves and trusts her."

Ma, wise beyond her generation and experience, said no more, and took the little new daughter into her heart. She took the opportunity to inform the village gossips that a friend of Jane's had come to rest up and get a year's country air, boarding with them; and so the amalgamation of Betty Hope into the life of the little town began.

The "job" proved to be for only part of the day, so that Betty was free most of the mornings to help around the house and take almost a daughter's place. That she was a rare girl is proved by the way she entered into her new life. It was almost as if she had been born again, and entered into a new universe, so widely was her path diverging from everything which had been familiar in the old life. So deep had been her distress before she came into it that this new existence, despite its hard and unaccustomed work, seemed almost like heaven.

It is true there was much bad grammar and slang, but that did not trouble Betty. She had been brought up to speak correctly, and it was second nature to her, but no one had ever drummed it into her what a crime against culture an illiterate way of speaking could be. She never got into the way of speaking that way herself, but it seemed a part of these people she had come to know and admire so thoroughly, as much as for a rose to have thorns, and so she did not mind it. Her other world had been so all wrong for years that the hardships of this one were nothing. She watched them patch and mend and make, and strain and sacrifice cheerfully to buy their few little plain coarse new things. She marveled at their sweetness and content, where those of her world would have thought they could not exist under the circumstances.

She learned to make that good stew with carrots and celery and parsley and potatoes and the smallest possible amount of meat, that had tasted so delicious the night she arrived. She learned the charms of the common little bean, and was proud indeed the day she set upon the table a luscious pan of her own baking, rich and sweet and brown with their coating of molasses well baked through them. She even learned to make bread, and never let any one guess that she had always supposed it something my rious.

During the week that Nellie preparing to go to the city, B had lessons in sewing. Nellie w bring down an old garment, faded and worn that it would s only fit for the rag-bag. She w rip, and wash, dye with a myster little package of stuff, press, behold, there would come f pretty breadths of cloth, blue brown or green, or whatever c was desired. It seemed like ma And then a box of paper-patt would be brought out, and whole evening would be spent contriving how to get out a dr with the help of trimmings sleeves of another material. B would watch and gradually try help, but she found there were many strange things to be c sidered. There, for instance, the up and down of a thing and right and wrong of it. It was ex ly like life. And one had to p not to have both sleeves for arm, and to have the nap of goods running down always. was as complicated as learning new language. But at the end the week there came forth t pretty dresses and a blouse. Bet as she sat sewing plain seams trying to help all she could, thinking of the many pretty froc she had thrown aside in the yea gone by, and of the rich stor pretty things that she had when she fled. If only Nellie Jane and little Emly could them! Ah, and if only she her might have them now! How needed them! For a girl who h always had all she wanted it w great change to get along with one coarse serge and aprons.

But the sewing and other wo had not occupied them so ful that they had not had time to i troduce Betty into their litt world. The very next evening aft she arrived she had been taken t that wonderful church entertain ment that the girls had told h about on the way from the statio and there she had met the mi ister's wife and been invited to h Sabbath school class.

Betty would not have thought o going if Nellie and her mother ha not insisted. In fact, she shran unspeakably from going out int the little village world. But i was plain that this was expected o her, and if she remained here sh must do as they wanted her to do. It was the least return she coul make to these kind people.

The question of whether or no she should remain began to com to her insistently now. The childre clamored every day for her to bin herself for the winter, and Jane's mother had made her most welcome. She saw that they really wanted her; why should she not stay? And yet it did seem queer to arrange deliberately to spend a whole year in a poor uncultured family. Still, where could she go and hope to remain unknown if she attempted to get back into her own class? It was impossible. Her mother had just the one elderly cousin whom she had always secretly looked to help her in any time of need, but his failing her and sending that telegram without even a good wish in it, just at the last minute too, made her feel it was of no use to appeal to him. Besides, that was the first place her stepmother would seek for her. She had many good society friends, but none would who stand by her in trouble. No one with whom she had ever been intimate enough to confide in now. She had been kept strangely alone in her little world after all, hedged in by servants everywhere. And now that she was suddenly on her own reısibility, she felt a great timidity aking any step alone. Some s at night when she thought t she had done she was so ıtened that her heart would , wildly as if she were running y from them all yet. It was like ghtmare that pursued her.

rs. Hathaway had sent for her made arrangements for her to n her work with the little Elise following week when the ıent governess should leave, and ty felt that this might prove a y pleasant way to earn her liv- The Hathaways lived in a ıt brick house away back from street in grounds that occupied ıt in the city would have been a ıle block. There was a high ge about the place so that one ld not see the road, and there e flower-beds, a great fountain, . a rustic summerhouse. Betty not see why days passed in such leasant place would not be de- ıtful in summertime. She was altogether sure whether she ıld like to have to be a sort of vant in the house—and of course se cold fall days she would ve to be much in the house—but nursery had a big fireplace in a long chest under the window ere toys were kept, and many nfortable chairs. That ought to pleasant, too. Besides, she was just out looking for pleasant ngs on this trip. There was another element in the rson home that drew her strong- although she was shy about en thinking of it, and that was frank, outspoken Christianity. Perhaps the spirit her sweet mother allowed to be e of those who "bear them up, t at any time they dash their et against a stone." Or it might ve been some memory of the achings of her father, whom she lored, and who in his last days ten talked with her alone about w he and her own mother would ant her to live. But now, safe d quiet in this shelter of a real me, poor though it was, the God- stinct stirred within her, caused r to wonder what He was, why e was alive, and if He cared? ne could not live with Mrs. arson without thinking something out her God, for He was an ever- esent help in all her times of need, d she never hesitated to give od the glory for all she had hieved, and for all the blessings e had received.

The very first Sabbath in the little white church stirred still deeper her awakening interest in spiritual things. The minister's wife was a sweet-faced woman who called her "my dear" and invited her to come and see her, and when she began to teach the lesson Betty found to her amazement that it was interesting. She spoke of God in much the same familiar way that "Ma" had done, only with a gentler refinement, and made the girls very sure that whatever anybody else believed, Mrs. Thornley was a very intimate friend of Jesus Christ. Betty loved her at once, but so shy was she that the minister's wife never dreamed it, and remarked to her husband Sunday night after church, when they were having their little quiet Sabbath talk together, that she was afraid she was going to have a hard time winning that little new girl that had come to live with Mrs. Carson.

"Somehow I can't get away from the thought that she comes from aristocracy somewhere," she added. "It's the way she turns her head, or lifts her eyes the quiet assurance with which she answers. And she smiles, Charles, never grins like the rest. She is delicious, but somehow I find myself wondering if I have remembered to black my shoes and whether my hat is on straight, when she looks at me."

"Well, maybe she's the daughter of some black sheep who has gone down a peg, and our Father has sent her here for you to help her back again," said her husband with an adorable look at his helper. "If anyone can do it you can."

"I'm not so sure," she said, shaking her head. "She maybe doesn't need me. She had Mrs. Carson remember, and she is a host in herself. If anybody can lead her to Christ she can, plain as she is."

"Undoubtedly you were meant to help too, dear or she would not have been sent to you."

His wife smiled brilliantly a look of thorough understanding: "Oh, I know. I'm not going to shirk any but I wish I knew more about her. She is so sad and quiet, I can't seem to get at her."

Even at that moment Betty lay in her little cot bed under the roof thinking about the minister's wife and what she had said about Christ being always near, ready to show what to do, if one had the listening heart and the ready spirit. Would Christ tell her what to do, she wondered, now right here, if she were to ask him? Would He show her whether to stay in this place or seek further to hide herself from the world? Would He show her how to earn her living and make her life right and sweet as it ought to be.

Then she closed her eyes and whispered softly under the sheltering bedclothes, "O Christ, if you are here please show me somehow and teach me to understand."

When Hostess Must Be Waitress

By Laura A. Kirkman

IN planning to entertain guests at dinner, the woman who has no kitchen helper finds her most serious problem in the serving of the meal. She realizes that the time spent at table should be one of repose and that it is disconcerting to a guest to have someone continually leaving the table to remove soiled dishes, bring another course, etc.

The clever hostess, then, plans her guest dinner with the question of serving uppermost in her mind. For instance, she decides to have a cold dessert instead of a hot one, in order to save a trip to the oven; the cold dessert may stand on the console near the table and may be exchanged for the soiled salad plates with very little fuss and bother.

When the guest takes his seat he will find the steaming soup before him. The salad, too, will be already on, the table, in individual portions at each plate, thus saving the commotion of serving it after the meat-and-vegetable course.

In this way the hostess will have to make but two journeys to the kitchen: she will carry out with her two of the empty soup plates (not using a tray); bring in the meat dish; carry out two more soup plates (assuming that there are more than two at table), and bring in the potato dish in one hand and the second vegetable dish in the other (as it is still our patriotic duty to conserve food, a third vegetable is not necessary). If the number at table exceeds four, the remaining empty soup plates must be carried as far as the pantry. The dinner plates will stand on the serving table or console and these the hostess will bring to the table before reseating herself.

By serving a meal in this unobtrusive way, a hostess puts her guest's comfort before all else, thus showing him the finest hospitality.

Why Kindergartens?

By P. P. Claxton,

U. S. Commissioner of Education

HAVE you ever learned as much in any other six years of your life as in the first six? Of the heavens above you and the earth about you? Of your own body and soul? Of elementary, social and economic relations? Of fundamental qualities of things? And of the activities of life? And in what other period have you made so many important beginnings in action and in bodily control and care?

Try to enumerate the knowledge gained and the beginnings made in these years.

Was not the sweet-souled Bishop Comenius right when he said that everything one ever knows or can do has its beginning in these years? And Jean Paul Richter, when he claimed that the child sees more new things in these six years playing about the door of its village home than the man can see traveling around the world, and learns more from mother and nurse than it will afterwards learn from tutors and professors in college and university?

Was not Richter right again in his belief that the most important thing that can come into the life of any individual is a happy, joyous, active childhood? No fortune, he thought, of material wealth which parents might leave their children could ever compensate for the loss of such joyous activity in their early life.

Rousseau and Pestalozzi were right in their new conception of education as growth and development through self-activity rather than the storing of the memory with the forms and phrases of knowledge.

And Froebel was equally right in his estimate of the value of socializing the life of little children through the proper organization and direction of their spontaneous plays and other activities. Since he discovered the kindergarten thousands of men and women have worked out its technique far beyond his ability, until it has come to be regarded among thoughtful educators as one of the most valuable parts of our system of education. The kindergarten is good for children of all classes, for the rich and poor; for black and white; for native and foreign born—for many reasons probably more valuable for the children of the foreign-born among us than for any others.

The growth of the kindergarten in this country has been greater in the last ten years than in the forty years preceding, but still only one-tenth of the children of kindergarten age are in kindergartens—about one-fourth of those who live in cities and towns. Wherever there is a kindergarten the children attend gladly. No compulsion is required. The happiness and the joy of it are sufficient.

Then why not provide kindergartens for all? The only excuse is economy. But, is it good economy to save a few dollars at the price of neglect of the children at this most important age?

Is your community awake to its responsibility? Is it doing its full duty?

Are there kindergartens in all your schools?

Training For Citizenship

By Dr. Lyman Abbott

WE are creatures of habit. Actions continuously repeated become habit. Habit long continued becomes second nature. Thus is character formed by education. Instruction informs the intellect. Training forms the character. The two combined constitute education. If America is to be a law-abiding, peace-loving and prosperous Republic, its youth must be trained as well as instructed. In them must be formed the habit of reverence for God, respect for the moral law, and regard for the rights and interests, of their fellow men.

Hints For Housekeeping

Either cayenne pepper or gum camphor is said to repel mice.

Have you planned the changes in the kitchen that will save steps?

Surface water running into the well or cistern is as dangerous as poison.

The inside of a banana peel, well rubbed on, will remove ink stains from the fingers.

Figs and dates instead of much candy for the children will be a source of benefit and not of harm.

If a metal button is attracted to a magnet, one can be sure that such a button will rust in the wash.

Nothing adds more to the comfort of the farm home than a good water system; next to water in convenience is electric light.

A card index has as much usefulness in the home as in the office; one use is for recipes clipped from newspapers or magazines.

CHILD MEMBERS OF THE CHURCHE

THE Census Office has given the Churches something new, interesting, and very important. It is known generally that there are children in the membership of most of the Churches, but no one has had trustworthy information as to how many there are in any of the denominations because no Church or other authority has ever made a report on the subject. As a matter of fact, there are 5,365,134 children under thirteen years of age in the various denominations of the United States. It should be said at the outset that not a few of the denominations, including the Roman Catholic, consider all baptised children as members, so that many infants are included in the statistics

The Director of the Census, when he was about to take the census of religious bodies in 1916, called a conference of ecclesiastical statisticians, of which I was a member, to advise him as to the items to be included in the schedule. As a result, some items of the old schedule were dropped and a new inquiry was introduced calling for a return of Church members under thirteen years of age. The proposal originally made was that this inquiry should include children ten years of age and under, but after careful consideration, this was changed so as to include children under thirteen. The chief reason for this change was that the general line between childhood and youth is the thirteenth year.

The report of the Census Office on this inquiry has been completed and will shortly be given to the public. It is a long table of two and a-half pages octavo and has nine colums. It appears that sixty three denominations, including all Lutheran bodies and a number of the Mennonite, the Unitarian, and the Christian Reformed, made no report, some, it is understood, for the reason that they have no children in their membership.

OUT of the total number of members of all bodies reported by the denominations in 1916—namely 41,926,854,—5,365,134 were members under thirteen years of age. This number is the result in part of an estimate made by the Census Office on the basis of reports received from the churches of the several denominations, the children in the congregations not reporting being estimated on the basis of those reporting. The figures used in this article are the Census Office estimates. According to the figures of the Census Office nearly thirteen percent of the total members of all Churches consists of children. This includes the Roman Catholic, the Eastern Orthodox, other Catholic Churches and the Church of the Latter Day Saints and the Friends who receive children of tender age. The total of 5,365,134 would, of course, be larger if the Lutheran bodies and a few others who made no reports were included.

The Churches having the largest number of children counted as members are naturally those who include children of all ages as members. The following table will show the most important, though not all of these bodies, which include also the Moravian, the Pentecostal, and other Protestant denominations which, with a few exceptions, do not count infants as members.

The National Lithuanian Church	42.6%
The Syrian Church (Eastern)	39.8%
Old Roman Catholic	36.9%
Latter Day Saints of Utah	33.7%
Armenian Church (Eastern)	31.1%
Catholic Apostolic Church	27.4%
Moravian Church	26.1%
Roman Catholic Church	25%
Albanian Orthodox (Eastern)	22%
Penetecostal Holiness Church	21.8%
Russian Orthodox	20.3%

A National Census shows 5,355,134 little folks under 13 in the various denominations.

Compiled by

H. K. CARROLL, LLD.

It is very interesting to note that the Moravian Church has a percentage even higher than that of the Roman Catholic Church, which includes all baptised persons as members. The Moravian Church regards all baptised children as incorporated in the Church but they do not become communicants until after Confirmation. In view of this fact it is remarkable that its percentage is higher than that of the Roman Catholic Church. The latter receives all children who, in the judgment of the priest in charge, have attained the age of reason. Some as young as seven years are received to communion which antidates confirmation.

HERE it may be noted that there are of children under thirteen in the whole population of the United States, returned in 1910 as 91,972,364—25,877,671. The Roman Catholic Church is credited with 3,921,402 children under thirteen out of a total Catholic population of 15,721,815. The number of children in the population in the United States under seven years is 14,700,595. In all probability no child under the age of seven receives communion in the Roman Catholic Church, and doubtless only a few of those.

Denominations Having the Smallest Percentage of Child Members.

Primitive Baptists	0.1%
Three Bodies of Plymouth Brethren	0.4%
Protestant Episcopal	1%
Mennonite Church	1.8%
Congregational	1.9%

The most astonishing fact shown by this table is not that the Primitive Baptists, who are very conservative and do not believe in missionary work, should have only 65 children in their membership, as they conduct no Sunday Schools for children; but that the Protestant Episcopal Church should have only one per cent of children in its membership and the Congregational denomination only one and nine tenths per cent. The Protestant Episcopal Church desires its children to have a thorough understanding of what the Church stands for in faith and order before receiving them into membership, and the age of thirteen is considered by most rectors as the minimum age of reception. This table does not, of course, include all denominations having a very small percentage of children in their membership.

Percentage of Child Members in Large Protestant Denominations.

Northern Baptist Convention	3.4%
Southern Baptist Convention	3.9%
National Baptist Convention (Colored)	5.5%
Dunkirds Conservative	4.3%
Disciples of Christ	3.7%
Churches of Christ	2%
Friends Orthodox	16.1%
Methodist Episcopal	7%
Methodist Episcopal, South	9.4%
African Methodist Episcopal	8.8%
African Methodist Episcopal (Zion)	11.1%
Presbyterian U. S. A.	3.9%
Presbyteriar in the United States (South)	5.9%
United Presbyterian	4.8%
Reformed in America	1.3%
Reformed in United States	1%
United Brethern	10.3%

THE variation in percentages in similar bodies peculiar. Note the difference between those r turned by the two Reformed bodies and those given f the Presbyterian bodies. It appears that the percen age is almost always higher in the South than the North and in colored than in white churches.

Does the number of children in the Sunday Scho have a bearing upon the number of children in th Church? The Methodist Episcopal Church ha according to the census in 1916, 3,872,200 schola in its Sunday Schools and 261,046 child member the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, had, th same year, 1,683,129 scholars and 199,408 chil members; the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A (Northern) had 1,387,938 scholars and 62,079 chil members; the Presbyterian Church in the U. S (Southern) had 312,952 scholars and 21,052 chil members; The United Presbyterian Church ha 156,072 scholars 'and 7,636 child members. C course, each denomination has its own method o preparing children for church membership.

Churches With the Largest Number of Chil Members Arranged in Numerical Order:

Roman Catholic	3,924,402
Methodist Episcopal	261,046
Methodist Episcopal, South	199,408
National Baptist Convention (Colored)	162,682
Latter Day Saints	136,028
Southern Baptist Convention	104,609
Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A.	62,079
African Methodist Episcopal	48,155
Disciples of Christ	45,856
Northern Baptist Convention	41,830
United Brethren	36,065
African Methodist Episcopal—Zion	28,605
Presbyterian in the U. S.	21,052
Friends Orthodox	14,837
Congregational	14,683
Protestant Episcopal	11,182

It is noted by the census report that those denominations having the smallest percentage of members under thirteen years are the minor Baptist bodies and those denominations reporting a large membership in rural districts. The large percentages in the Lithuanian Catholic Church and other bodies of immigrants are due to the fact that their larg families are all included as members.

It is a well-known fact that the recruits for the churches who make good the losses by death, exclusion, and other causes, are received in great part from the young people of the churches.

Quarantining Against the Bollworm

THE United States government is now engaged in carrying on the biggest entomological experiment ever made, and the indications to date are that it will prove entirely successful. In its efforts to prevent the pink bollworm of cotton from entering the United States by way of Texas, the Department of Agriculture has caused large areas of cotton lands in Texas, along the Mexican border, to be quarantined—zones in which the planting of cotton is prohibited by law.

As a first step in this quarantine, however, it was necessary to clean up some 10,000 acres of land on which cotton formerly had been grown. This was accomplished by a force of nearly a thousand laborers, working under the supervision of entomological experts, who went over every inch of the area under suspicion as closely as a scrupulous housewife sweeps the kitchen floor, and then sifted every pint of the sweepings as carefully as a miser would sift pebbles with gold nuggets among them.

How well the work was done was demonstrated at the end of the 1918 cotton season when reports of all the government investigators showed that no evidence of the presence of the bollworm in the are cleaned up could be found. It is proposed, however, t continue the quarantine for at least another seaso to preclude any possibility of the bollworm gaining a foothold in thi country.

Scene in a Texas Cotton Field

The importance of keeping the country free from the pink bollworm will be understood when it is stated that, according to experts, its presence here would mean an annual loss of at least $50,000,000, if indeed, not the total destruction of the entire cotton crop. This insect enemy spreads like wildfire, once it becomes established, and since man with his railroads is the chief agent of dissemination jumps of a hundred miles at a time would be comparatively easy. The overwintering larva might well be loaded in the litter on the bottom of a freight car in Texas, and swept out in Georgia, thereby starting a campaign of destruction just as has been the case in every cotton growing country in the world except the United States.

GOING BACK

A STORY OF NOW AND THEN

PART TWO

By DANIEL
A.
POLING
(Associate President United Society of Christian Endeavor)

Dr. Poling October 25 gave the first f his impressions on returning this ear to the battlefields made holy by he blood of American youth and where e served as a "Y" man in the advancng front lines. This week he carries s through the St. Mihiel salient, up o the very face of Metz, and into heroc Verdun, with graphic pictures y the way of men and events in the errible struggle for the Heights of the Meuse.

FROM Rambecourt we turned back to Boumont, and hurrying through came in another quarter of a kilometer o the head of the communicating rench that immediately at the oadside left the camouflage and ropped down into Seicheprey, less han a kilometer away. At Seicheprey had been located the headquarters for the 3rd Battalion of the 18th Infantry of the First Division, during my brief stay in this portion f our advanced positions. About Seicheprey occurred some of the earlier memorable actions of the war after our participation in the great struggle began, and here I came into my real baptism of fire. We turned "Henry's" nose through the now badly dilapidated camouflage, and drove straight toward the town. Looking at my friend, I said:

"Hints, 'Bill' Hints, [for "Bill" Hints was my companion], did you think that we would ever ride into Seicheprey like this?"

And he grinned.

In the old days only ambulances had taken the open for it, or sorely needed supply trains. Seicheprey was under direct observation from the enemy at all times; standing in the very midst of our advanced trenches, it constantly suffered everything, from machine-gun fire to gas and shrapnel and high explosives of all calibers.

In a few seconds we were in the heart of the town. How changed I found it! A ruin before, it was a super-ruin now. All about were mighty wounds that had been made since last I turned my face away from it.

I stood in the entrance to "headquarters" with a great heaviness in my heart,—there at the foot of the way I had left Major Griffith. As I left him there I said, "I'll see you later, Major," and smiling he replied, "Yes, later."

It will be "later," now!

Only a few weeks after we separated he stepped from his dugout at Cantigny, where the First Division had hurried when the great German offensive opened in March 1918, and where it won undying fame, in time to intercept a shell from Germany. Yes it will be,—later.

FROM the battered old headquarters we drove on, out by the abandoned trenches to the open field. No people greeted us; among those walls we found not one living thing. As we passed the trenches I halted the car again. Through the snow that revealed shell-holes, by its unmistakable sinks and hillocks, I came to a half-filled, hog-like wallow. Soon it, too, will yield to the alchemy of nature. The avalanches of another spring-time will almost fill it.

In it I had found safety on a wild March day when with shrapnel overhead and bursting high explosives all about, with a regimental runner, I dove headlong into it to escape a close-up barrage. There we had crouched until the storm ceased. The trench coat that I wore that day has its right sleeve and shoulder almost eaten away as the result of the swirl of mustard-gas we fell into as we plunged to the bottom of the abandoned ditch. There, or hard by, I breathed the poisoned air that was to give me my glimpse of the horrors thousands of brave men found who went on the heroic search after peace and freedom for the world.

Out into the open field we tramped toward the ruins of the forest through which our trench lines ran during the days preceding the battle of Seicheprey. I stood upon the ground where, on Friday afternoon, March 1, 1918, with William Pest of Newark, New Jersey, and a dozen litter-bearers, I had been caught by the direct fire of the German artillery. We were carrying the remains of one of our own lieutenants and a wounded German prisoner. Our trenches had been so battered by the terrific shelling of the morning that we had been compelled to leave their shelter and proceed in the open toward headquarters.

Suddenly a veritable inferno had opened about us. Scores of high explosives fell. Dropping upon our faces we had quickly scattered in every direction. Miraculously all of us escaped with our lives. A three-inch buried itself in the soft earth at the side of a lad not four feet from me. Falling at an angle it blew up directly beneath him and hurled him into the air. He came down limp and quivering into a shell-hole half filled with water. With the exception of bruises and severe shell-shock he was uninjured.

HOW strange the silence seemed to me now! Save for the explosions of an ammunition dump far off where pioneer troops were cleaning up, all was still. Only the white hollows so close together, blotches of the leprosy of war, reminded us that a little while before death had sown the field with iron and gathered a rich red harvest from his planting.

I stopped for a moment by a ditch very near the spot, if not exactly upon it, where I found a blue gas-mask that had covered the face of a gallant French lad who fell there. He died when the French came down from the right and waited in the open as a reserve against the possible breaking through of the Germans during the first of a series of great raids that came into our lines late in February and early in March, 1918. Today that mask is one of my priceless possessions; with its cracked and blurred goggles and the tell-tale splotches of rusty red, it speaks of suffering and sacrifice that transcend the bravest legends of the past, and of a brotherhood in arms that righted a great wrong and blazed an ample trail of fraternity and peace to larger freedom for mankind.

I walked on across the field toward the old German lines. Emotions that well-nigh overwhelmed me shook my body even as they moved my soul. I made note of the slight depression where the bearers had dropped the wounded German when his companions over the way had begun shelling our stretcher-party, and I recalled how the shrapnel balls had spattered mud upon us as we ran up the narrow road.

Straight ahead I pressed across the now silent and safe No Man's Land. It seemed only a short hour ago that this had been a fertile field of death. I did not cast a glance backward until I reached the old enemy parapet. Then I turned and gazed long and intently toward the lines we held in the early weeks of 1918. It was one of the supreme moments of a life-time. Months before I had said, "Some day I will come back to Seicheprey and this field; back again in flesh to the meadows and in spirit to this very day. Down the road and by the trenches I shall walk, across No Man's Land and straight away to the positions that opened their hell upon us. And when I reach those lines I shall face about and look into the south,—toward battalion headquarters and the friendly dugouts; the outer defences of Toul, and all the rolling country where the bronzed lads in khaki burrowed and toiled, marched and suffered, fought and died. Yes, some day I shall come back!"

OUR journey northward led us along the line of the memorable American offensive,—through the villages that one by one had fallen into the eager hands of our khaki-clad soldiers,—Buxerulles, Buxieres, Heudicourt and Vigneulles, St. Benoit, Chamblay, Mars-le-Tour and Jarney. Thanks to the German signs with their great letters and directing arrows, we did not lose our way. During his years of occupation, the enemy carefully marked the roads and everywhere did his best to remove from the guideposts and public buildings all that identified the country with France.

A Little Girl with a $216,000-a-Year Income is a Member of the Sewing Class.

A Few of the 20,000 Quarts of Fruit, Preserved by the Girl Students.

AN ALL-AMERICAN SCHOOL

By CHARLES J. LISLE

A SERVICE flag with 220 stars thereon, and only half a dozen of them for drafted men—that ought to be a satisfactory introduction to any American audience. And if red blood is fighting blood, red skin also must be honored in the company of heroes; for this is the record of the Chemawa Indian School at Salem, Oregon, one of the largest Indian schools in the United States.

These students did not have to fight. Uncle Sam exempts them. Some of them are wealthy. One little Indian girl, an Osage from Oklahoma, has an income of $216,000 a year. She didn't go to war, but she stayed at Chemawa, without vacation, to sew steadily for the little boys and girls growing up into high ideals, for the big boys who, having learned their lessons, hearkened to the sublime call and sailed gladly away across the Great Waters to fight the battles of humanity. They have whooped the war whoops of their fathers in the Argonne Forest; they have stalked the enemy at St. Mihiel and all the way from the Channel to the Alps, where their matchless woodcraft made them invaluable as scouts, sharpshooters, intelligence agents. And some of them have died—Wahanowin! Wahanowin! But not in vain—oh, not in vain! For their people's record is spotlessly clean.

Chemawa is an All-American school. Eighty-five tribes have sent their children there. It was with a prophetic eye on Chemawa, perhaps, that the proverb-maker wrote "Cleanliness is next to godliness;" for with the one picture of a divine sacrifice on the battlefield, is another of 16,000 pieces of linen going through the Chemawa laundry for the commencement week in 1919. And with roses in every one of the almost 300 rooms in the school group and a course of study that, if it does not touch Latin or Greek, substitutes the home-making virtues of sewing and baking and nursing and farming and blacksmithing, Chemawa has assimilated so much that is worth while, that Americans ought to know more of it.

CHEMAWA had a total registration of 850 during 1918–19, though not more than 650 were in attendance at any one time. The school was established in 1885 by moving an older school from Forest Grove, Oregon, where it had been maintained on leased ground. The educational plans of the Indian Bureau called for more industrial work and a permanent home, and when Salem people donated part of the present site it was accepted and the new school established there.

The 450-acre farm is one of the show places of Oregon. Sixty-five buildings of all kinds have been built on the place. A 12-acre lawn keeps a battery of mowers busy all summer and there are so many roses that wagonloads of blossoms are hauled in for table decorations all through the school.

The farm is not all roses, however. There are ten acres of onions and 25 acres of potatoes. The 1919 crop of potatoes should be close to 8000 bushels—and the school will eat every one. They had 6000 bushels in 1918, and 2000 bushels of onions, but it wasn't enough—they had to Hooverize. The students will preserve between 15,000 and 20,000 jars of their own fruit—strawberries, loganberries, cherries; and the prune dryer will contribute several tons of evaporated fruit for winter use.

A total appropriation of $173,000 comes from the government for the school. That insures the salaries, the buildings, the fuel and general running expenses. But the total receipts and necessities are much more than that. The rest comes from the raising and selling of farm and other products. The saddlery department sells several thousand dollars worth of harness each year, made up by Indian workmen in the school shops. The swine are worth close to $10,000 in a year. The fruit and vegetable product of the farm goes direct to the dormitory tables; the grain and hay and roots go to the stables, where 50 fine Jersey cows furnish thousands of dollars worth of milk and butter. With an average estimate of $50 an acre for all the farm products, including fruit, the annual revenues will be above $20,000. As most of this is produced by student labor, the profit is real.

A GROUP OF GRADUATE NURSES

Prejudice against Indian nurses is rapidly dying out in the west and the services of these girls now are in great demand.

IT isn't "all work and no play," without personal reward. During the long vacation the students who remain at the school, approximately one-half the registration, are allowed to work out on alternate days, giving the other time to the school. In 1918 they earned above $26,000 working for their neighbors. Fruit growers for miles up and down the Willamette Valley count on securing Indian help during the picking season. The students have all their own earnings. Some pupils who come in from unrestricted tribes that have their tribal allotments, pay their own school expenses, about $250 for the year. But there are few of these. Most come from the restricted nations, for whom the government pays transportation, board, clothing and every expense.

A force of 57 teachers looks after the welfare of the student body. This teaching force is drawn from almost every avenue of life; for it includes all the industries taught. Dairying, household economics, harness-making, painting, nursing, printing, bookkeeping, normal teaching, are on the curriculum—and the title "Professor" may mean many things.

"The Indian, contrary to general belief, is keenl musical," says Superintendent Harwood Hal "Our band will rank with the best bands anywher maintained under similar conditions of changin membership. Our orchestras and mandolin club would please the most critical audiences. Th Chemawa String Quartet, composed of students from this school, has traveled widely on Eastern Chautauqua and Lyceum circuits, with splendid succe One of the boys is from the Pribylof Islands; anothe from Wrangell, Alaska; the thir is from Montana, and the last from Oklahoma. They broke u to get into The Great War, every man volunteering though one wa rejected; but they will be togethe again this year. I would say that th Indian is a better natural musicia than the average white America —yes, decidedly better."

SUPERINTENDENT HALL has been with the Indian service for 34 years. As a superintendent on the Quapaw reservation in Oklahoma, then with increasing authority and influence, he has learned the Indian as few others know him. He was superintendent of the Phoenix, Arizona, school and of the great Sherman Institute at Riverside, California. For some years he was a traveling inspector visiting practically everything Indian in the United States. He is a real authority on his subject, and so what he says is to be received as the judgment of one who knows.

"The Indian is essentially an artist," he said, while showing his wonderful collection of Indian baskets; not quite the largest, perhaps, but almost certainly the most valuable in the country. Some splendid collections, the loss of which he speaks of as a public calamity, were destroyed in the San Francisco earthquake and fire. His own collection of 400 covers practically every tribe of basket-making Indians in America; the famous Cahuilla "Eagle Basket," a tribal fetich and model, that brought Indian women on foot for a distance of 50 or 100 miles through mountains and wearisome deserts, merely to look at and admire it, is on his shelves.

"Take these baskets as examples," he continued. No artistic work of mankind is more carefully planned, more wonderfully executed, than some of these finer wares. It is comparable to the best painting or sculpture, anywhere from Phidias down to today. Do you doubt it? You have only to examine the handiwork to see for yourself; the artistry is there, in every fibre. Such work can be done only by a people with the artistic instinct—by people with artistic hands. Note the hands of our girls, of our men, even of any old Indian woman whom you may find. They are taper fingered, supple, dainty—the despair of the average white person. They are artists' hands; they are fitted for the most cunning embroidery, drawn work, basketry; the envy of the unskillful, the joy of the deft. They are the hands of a people who should paint, who should become skilled musicians, who should take up the arts as a plant takes up the sunshine and the rain.

"INDIAN art has been too little cultivated or appreciated. But when some of the old basketmakers pass away, and their daughters have neglected or forgotten their ancient tribal art, then the ld will be immeasurably the loser—until they go k and find it. Collis P. Huntington paid $3500 one little basket, just like that one in your hand, y an inch or so larger; the two were made by the e incomparable Indian woman artist. That is judgment of the few real art critics who know ues—and some day the Indian art will be gen- lly recognized."

Among the eighty-five tribes represented at emawa, covering one-third the distance around globe from Maine to the farthest Aleutian ands, and from the Arctic Land of the Long Night the tropics, they have a real spirit of equality. ere are no sectional or tribal or caste lines; all are ericans, seeking an education in better citizen- p. This does not suggest the lowering of standards m the higher; it means dignity and mutual respect d helpfulness in raising the less brilliant to a higher el.

In only one other place in America is this spirit equality so well developed—at the national mili- y and naval academies. But even these splendid ucational mills could gain much from a study of the ternal Indian.

There is a real difference in the Indians, however. the three years since Superintendent Hall came to e school, there has not been one death among his dents from the Umatilla tribe in Oregon, that nds more children than any other tribe. The ez Perces of Idaho, and the Blackfeet of Montana, e also strong, hardy, superior peoples. The Alaskan dians have proven to be exceptionally capable entally, and of good physical quality. These laskans were in hard luck in 1918, for the govern- ent had requisitioned all the Pacific coast shipping, d 40 prospective students had to stay at home the hole year, no ships being available to bring them. he Alaskan Tlinkets have sent some girls who are ally beautiful even from the best white standards amiability, good health, regular features and entality.

THE school course covers only the tenth grade, or the first two years of high school. It offers o language work save in English. However, it gives ther things of great value. A few years ago, the perintendents of several of the largest Indian hools, educators and executives of high standing, ere called into council to lay out a course of study r all the schools. They spent several months in the ork, and have produced an almost ideal plan for ducation.

Half the time is given to books, the other half to ractical work, one day of each in alternation. The ittle children, up to the fourth grade, are given only lay and study. During the next three grades, the "pre-vocational" stage, the pupils are given ten eeks each in a number of departments—trades for he boys, domestic arts, teaching and nursing for the irls—to learn their capabilities. After that they re assigned to the work for which they show the nost aptitude and liking.

The school day is from noon until noon. Those in the chool halls study as do other children; their work is ell done, too, as evidenced by the maps, the penmanship, the industrial and free-hand drawing, the ompositions that are kept on exhibition. In the ndustrial departments, however, there is a preliminary lecture of half an hour before starting the day's work; an outline of what is to be given, the vocabulary and nomenclature of the business, and the relation of the immediate lesson to what has already been done and what is to follow. This is an unvarying practice, whether for printing, for dairying, for household economics, for nursing. Then the actual performance follows, for the afternoon and the next morning. At noon the "shifts" change places; the industrials go back to the school room, the students don aprons and overalls, and so it goes.

CAREFUL examination shows that the course of study will match up, year by year, with the best white grade and high school work; and the Indian students spend half their time in industrial work, so that every one has a trade or a profession well in hand by graduation time. Not so much can be said of many white high schools.

Oregon state military authorities have said that the Chemawa Indians have the best disciplined military unit in the state—and that is saying a good deal, for there are the crack Multnomah Guards of Portland, and others that excel. They still drill with the old Springfield single-shot rifles; though modern arms are expected at no distant date. Conditions have changed since the time of the great Sioux War in 1876; then it was the whites who had only the single-shot arms, while the Indians had the best modern repeating arms by the thousands. The Indian has never been as good a rifle shot as the average white man; just why, no one knows. In athletics, he excels in games of endurance, like running; but he has never been quite the equal of his white brother in games of skill. The military drill, however, shows the Indian at his best; and no finer soldiers have served in any army than the American Indians, from Chemawa and elsewhere.

Superintendent Hall has been greatly pleased with the progress of his Indian nurses. In one way, the West is more intolerant than the East; the Carlisle nurses found no difficulty in obtaining the best places according to their individual ability, whereas the West, closer to the Indian life of yesterday and today, has been slow to accept the dusky-faced ministrants at their real value. The prejudice is dying away, however, and the Indian nurses are becoming more and more numerous. A full graduate course is provided at Chemawa. There has been ample opportunity for practice; in 1918 there were 550 cases of "flu," and every girl who could nurse at all was given the opportunity to serve. The percentage of fatalities was remarkably small. A model hospital is maintained, with dispensary, operating room and every facility for training. The Indian patience and fortitude, and ability to devote one's self solely to the object in hand—like their marvelous basketry and needlework—is an excellent foundation for nursing success.

WHEN the wonderful Willamette Pageant was given by Willamette University at Salem, in 1919, to celebrate the 75th year of the college, the first educational institute of academic grade to be established west of the Mississippi River, the Chemawa Indians took a considerable part. The story of the University is the simultaneous story of Oregon and the whole Northwest; so Indian life was a necessary part of the display. Indeed, the coming of the Methodist missionaries who founded Willamette, was solely for the purpose of bringing education and religion to the Indians, and the first Indian school was built within a few miles of Chemawa of today. One hundred of the Chemawa students assisted, and their appearance was heartily applauded. They presented the Love Dance, the Scalp Dance, the Peace Council, and other tribal rites, in the costumes of their fathers.

In general, the presentation of aboriginal rites and scenes is not favored by the Indian bureau. The old Indian life is being put into the background as fast as possible; its hopelessness, its squalor, its dirt, its degradation of women, its worthlessness of men. Any of the old rites that seem to emphasize savagery is properly being relegated to the limbo of the lost. Still, it would be a pity to have all record of the old habits pass away and leave the Indian without knowledge of what his people did and were; so under proper conditions the department will sanction even the scalp dance in a school like Chemawa—for it is a part of early American history, and it tempts no one to retroversion.

THE United States is trying to make up for many generations of wrongs that have marred its relations with the Indians. Almost every war with the Indians has been brought about by greed, by duplicity, by disregard for common decency in dealing with the native tribes. On almost every page of Indian history through the West—and through the East also, though it is longer ago—there is some ignoble betrayal, some broken official promise, some contemptuous disregard, some robbery or spoliation on the part of the stronger whites. Superintendent Hall has in his home a wonderful basket made by the original "Ramona," the California Indian woman whose story as told in the book bearing her name acted so powerfully to call attention to the Indian wrongs in America. With good intentions, perhaps, the government has usually made the mistake of dealing with the native peoples only through the army that makes a virtue of inflexible hard-heartedness and adherence to rules that are usually not well understood even by those who enforce them. The Indian deals directly; the circumlocutory plannings of official military control are past his finding out—and trouble must follow army regulations. A live humanity is needed in dealing with all primitive peoples; military harshness breeds only bloodshed—and the remorse that eventually finds its expression in such schools as Chemawa.

There is much really pure Indian blood yet in America. The Chemawa graduates of 1919 are 83 per cent Indian; that is rather better than the whole school average, but still the admixture of white blood is surprisingly small. The old manner of wigwam life, with its exposure, its hopeless drudgery, its periodical feasting and famine, did not tend to longevity or hardihood; tuberculosis used to be a terrible plague, and small pox, measles and other contagious diseases carried off whole tribes. But the individual life expectancy of these native Americans has increased so largely that they bid fair to more than hold their own in the battle of life. And seeing what they do at Chemawa, one must be glad; for they are worthy!

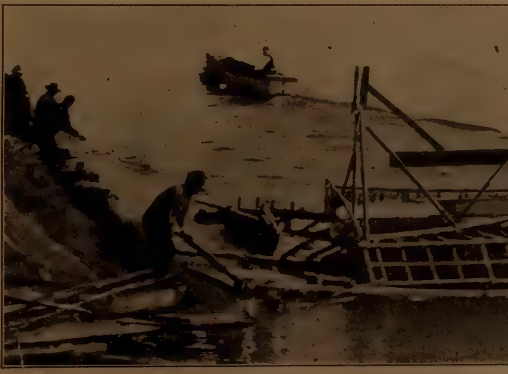
Trapping Salmon in the Yukon

The Crude Fish-Wheel Is Depended on by White Men and Indians Alike to Provide the Main Article of Diet For the Long Winter Months.

THE rush of gold-seekers into Fairbanks, Alaska, is responsible for one of the favorite forms of catching salmon in the Yukon and other Alaskan rivers—the fish-wheel.

It was nearly fifteen years ago that Fairbanks grew from almost nothing into an intense, bustling little city. The demand for food in Fairbanks (and food there meant dried salmon, the staple diet of Alaska) was so great that the fish-wheel was invented or adapted to salmon fishing. The Indian process of sitting in his canoe and watching until a few bubbles told him a salmon was swimming up the muddy waters of the Yukon or Tanana rivers and then dipping the fish up in the native dip-net, was too slow to supply Fairbanks. The fish-wheel was put into operation and was so exactly what was needed and so appealed to the Indian's love of ease that it was soon adopted throughout the muddy length of the Yukon and its tributaries.

With a fish-wheel in operation, the Indian can loll at his ease and wait for the wheel to throw the salmon into the boxes arranged on both sides of the wheel to receive the catch. All he has to do is gather them out of the boxes.



A Fish-Wheel in Position on the Bank of the Yukon.

The fish-wheel is a four-paddle-wheel. Two of the paddles which are covered with wire netting (or made with slats across them) are used for catching the fish. The other two are just paddles, and with the force of the river's current for motor power, keep the wheel revolving. The salmon, on their way upstream to the clear headwaters where they were spawned, are caught in the net-covered paddles and, when the paddle reaches a vertical position, strike a board in falling which deflects them out of the paddle into the boxes arranged to receive them.

The fish-wheel can be used only in muddy streams. In clear water the salmon would see the traps and avoid them. They are set usually close to the shore as the salmon seek the shores in their upstream journey to avoid as much as possble the swift current. The wheel has an average width of six feet and has a light draft for shallow water, the average draft being from six to nine feet. It often requires the strength of two men to put the wheels in place.

When the salmon are running nets are employed as well as the fish-wheel and all along the course of the Yukon and its tributaries may be found fishing camps. The splotches of red which the split fish form while drying in the sun grow gradually but rapidly as the season progresses, from a mere speck until they cover acres upon acres.

BETTY HOPE—A Serial Story in Seven Par

By GRACE LIVINGSTON HILL (MRS. LUTZ). Illustrations by B. N. SALG.

PART 4

THE PRECEDING CHAPTERS

ELIZABETH Stanhope faints at the altar as she is to be married and then flees from the vestry room of the church when she is left alone momentarily. On the street she appeals to Jane Carson who agrees to hide her. Jane takes her to a cheap lodging house, gives her a neat serge dress in exchange for the beautiful satin wedding gown and after learning that Elizabeth refuses to return home arranges for her to go to the Carson home in Tinsdale. Elibabeth takes the name of Betty Hope and the girls contrive a crude disguise to prevent recognition of the runaway bride, for already the newspapers have made a sensation of the disappearance of the wealthy, fashionable girl on her wedding night. Betty reaches Tinsdale safely and is warmly welcomed by Mrs. Carson and Jane's brother and sisters. She learns for the first time what a real Christian home is, takes her first lessons in cooking and attends Sunday school. Mrs. Carson obtains a position as governess for her and she settles down into a happy, contented village life. In the meantime Jane, whose sweetheart is employed by Warren Reyburn, a young lawyer, fears efforts will be made to locate Betty and plans to enlist the aid of Reyburn to protect her.

CHAPTER VII

WHEN Betty had been in Tinsdale about a week it was discovered that she could play the piano. It happened on a rainy Sunday in Sunday school, and the regular pianist was late. The superintendent looked about helplessly and asked if there was anybody present who could play, although he knew the musical ability of everybody in the village. The minister's wife had already pleaded a cut finger which was well wrapped up in a bandage, and he was about to ask some one to start the tune without the piano when Mrs. Thornton leaned over with a sudden thought to Betty and asked:

"My dear, you couldn't play for us, could you?"

Betty smiled assent, and without any ado went to the instrument, not realizing until after she had done so that it would have been better policy for her to have remained as much in the background as possible, and not to have shown any accomplishments lest people should suspect her position. However, she was too new at acting a part to always think of these little things, and she played the hymns so well that they gathered about her after the hour was over and openly rejoiced that there was another pianist in town. The leader of Christian Endeavor asked her to play in their meeting sometimes, and Betty found herself quite popular. The tallest girl in their class, who had not noticed her before, smiled at her and patronized her after she came back from playing the first hymn, and asked her where she learned to play so well.

"Oh, I used to take lessons before my father died," she said, realizing that she must be careful.

Emily and Bob came home in high feather and told their mother, who had not been able to get out that morning, and she beamed on Betty with as warm a smile as if she had been her own daughter:

"Now, ain't that great!" she said, and her voice sounded boyish just like Jane's. "Why, we'll have to get a pianna. I heard you could get 'em cheap in the cities sometimes—old-fashioned ones, you know. I heard they have so many old-fashioned ones that they have to burn 'em to get rid of 'em, and they even give 'em away sometimes. I wonder, could we find out and get hold of one?"

"I guess 'twould cost too much to get it here," said Bob practically. "My! I wisht we had one. Say, Betty, 'f we had a pianna would you show me how to read notes?"

"Of course," said Betty.

"Well, we'll get one somehow! We always do when we need anything awfully. Look at the bath-tub! Good-night! I'm goin' to earn one myself!" declared Bob.

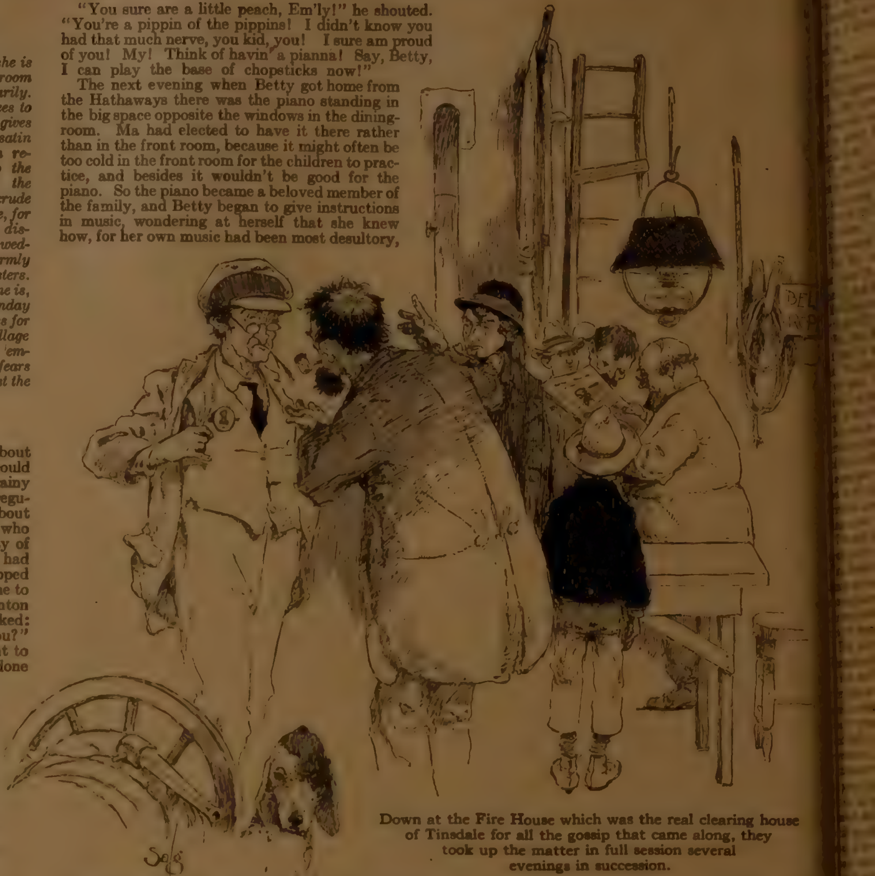
"Mrs. Crosby's gonta get a new one. P'raps she'll sell us her old one cheap."

That was the way the music idea started, and nothing else was talked of at the table for days but how to get a piano. Then one day Emily came rushing home from school all out of breath, her eyes as bright as stars, and her cheeks like roses. "Mrs. Barlow came to our school today and talked to the teacher, and I heard her say she was going away for the winter. She's going to store her goods in the service company barn, but she wants to get somebody to take care of her piano. I stepped right up and told her my mother was looking for a piano, and we'd be real careful of it, and she's just delighted; and—it's coming tomorrow morning at nine o'clock! The man's going to bring it!"

She gasped it out so incoherently that they had to make her tell it over twice to get any sense out of it; but when Bob finally understood he caught his little sister in his arms and hugged her with a big smacking kiss:

"You sure are a little peach, Em'ly!" he shouted. "You're a pippin of the pippins! I didn't know you had that much nerve, you kid, you! I sure am proud of you! My! Think of havin' a pianna! Say, Betty, I can play the base of chopsticks now!"

The next evening when Betty got home from the Hathaways there was the piano standing in the big space opposite the windows in the dining-room. Ma had elected to have it there rather than in the front room, because it might often be too cold in the front room for the children to practice, and besides it wouldn't be good for the piano. So the piano became a beloved member of the family, and Betty began to give instructions in music, wondering at herself that she knew how, for her own music had been most desultory, and nobody had ever cared whether she practiced or not. She had been allowed to ramble among the great masters for the most part unconducted, with the meagerest technique, and her own interpretation. She could read, and her sense of time and rhythm were natural, else she would have made worse work of it than she did. But she forthwith set herself to practicing, realizing that it might yet stand her in good stead since she had to earn her living.



Down at the Fire House which was the real clearing house of Tinsdale for all the gossip that came along, they took up the matter in full session several evenings in succession.

Little Emily and Bob stood one on either side and watched her as she played, with wondering admiration, and when Betty went to help their mother Bob would sit down and try to imitate what she had done. Failing, he would fall headlong into the inevitable chopsticks, beating it out with the air of a master.

It was the piano that brought to Betty's realization the first real meaning of the Sabbath day. Bob came down early and went at the piano as usual, banging out chopsticks, and a one-fingered arrangement of "The Long, Long Trail," while his mother was getting breakfast. Betty was making the coffee, proud of the fact that she had learned how. But Bob had accomplished only a brief hint of his regular program when the music stopped suddenly and Betty glanced through the kitchen door to see Ma standing with her hand on her son's shoulder and a look on her face she had not seen before: It was quite gentle, but it was decided:

"No, Bob! We won't have that kinda music on Sunday," she said. "This is God's day, an' we'll have all we can rightly do to keep it holy without luggin' in week-day music to make us ferget it. You just get t'work an' learn 'Safely Through Another Week,' an' if you can't play it right you get Betty to teach you."

Bob pouted:

"There ain't nothin' wrong with chopsticks, Ma. 'Tain't got words to it."

"Don't make any diffrence. It b'longs to week-days an' fun, an' anyhow it makes you think of other things, an' you can't keep your mind on God. That's what Sunday was made fer, to kinda tone us up to God, so's we won't get so far away in the week that we won't be any kind of ready for heaven some time. An' anyhow, 'tisn't seemly. You better go learn your Golden Text, Bob. The minister'll be disappointed if you don't have it fine."

Betty stood by the window thoughtfully looki out. Was that what Sunday was made for, or was only a quaint idea of this original woman? Sh wished she knew. Perhaps sometime she would kno the minister's wife well enough to ask. She woul have liked to ask Ma more about it, but somehow fe shy. But Ma herself was started now, and when sh came back to the kitchen, as if she felt some explanation was due the new inmate of the family, she sa

"I don't know how you feel about it. I know ci folks don't always hold to the old ways. But it alway seemed to me God meant us to stick to Sunday, an make it diffrent from other days. I never would le my children go visitin', nor play ball, an' we alway tried to have something good for supper fixed th night before. I heard somebody say a long time a that it says somewhere in the Bible that Sunday w meant to be a sign forever between God and folk The ones that keeps it are his'n, an' them as don' aren't. Anyhow, that's the only day we have got t kinda find out what's wanted of us. You wouldn' mind just playin' hymns and Sunday things t'day would you?"

"Oh, no," said Betty, interested. "I like it. I sounds so kind of safe, and as if God cared. I neve thought much about it before. You think God really thinks about us and knows what we're doing then, don't you?"

"Why, sure, child. I don't just think, I know he does. Hadn't you never got onto that? Why, you poor little ducky, you! O' course he does."

"I'd like to feel sure that he was looking out for me," breathed Betty wistfully.

"Well, you can!" said Ma, hurrying back to see that her bacon didn't burn. "It's easy as rollin' off a log."

"What would I have to do?"

"Why, just b'lieve."

"Believe?" asked Betty utterly puzzled, "Believe what?"

"Why, believe that he'll do it. He said 'Come unto me, an' I will give you rest,' an' he said 'Cast your burden on the Lord,' an' he said 'Castin' all yer care 'pon him, fer he careth fer you,' an' a whole lot more such things, an' you just got to take it fer straight, an' act on it."

But how could I?" asked Betty.

Just run right up to your room now, while you're in' that way, an' kneel down by your bed an' tell what you just told me," said Mrs. Carson, stir- the fried potatoes with her knife to keep them burning. "It won't take you long, an' I'll tend coffee. Just you tell him you want him to take of you, an' you'll b'lieve what I told you he said all in the Bible, an' you can read it for yourself, I wouldn't take the time now. Just run along speak it out with him, and then come down to akfast."

Betty was standing by the kitchen door, her hand her heart, as if about to do some great wonderful ng that frightened her:

'But, Mrs. Carson, suppose, maybe, he might not pleased with me? Suppose I've done something t he doesn't like, something that makes him amed of me."

"Oh, why, didn't you know he fixed for all that en he sent his Son to be the Saviour of the world? all do wrong things, an' everybody has sinned. t ef we're rightly sorry, he'll fergive us, and make his children."

Betty suddenly sat down in a chair near the door: 'But, Mrs. Carson, I'm not sure I am sorry—at st I know I'm not. I'm afraid I'd do it all over in if I got in the same situation."

Mrs. Carson stood back from the stove and surveyed thoughtfully a moment:

"Well, then, like's not it wasn't wrong at all, and it wasn't he ain't displeased. You can bank on it. You better go talk it out to him. Just get it your mind. I'll hold up breakfast a minute while u roll it on him and depend on it he'll show you in nty of time for the next move."

Betty with her cheeks very red and her eyes shining rried up to her little cot, and with locked door knelt d tried to talk to God for the first time in her life. seemed queer to her, but when she arose and hurried k to her duties she had a sense of having a real iend who knew all about her and could look after ings a great deal better than she could.

That night she went with Bob and Emily to the ung people's meeting and heard them talk about rist familiarly as if they knew him. It was all ange and new and wonderful to Betty, and she sat tening and wondering. The old question of whether e was pleasing her earthly father was merging itself to the desire to please her Heavenly Father.

There were of course many hard and unpleasant ings about her new life. There were so many things learn, and she was so awkward at work of all kinds! r hands seemed so small and inadequate when she ed to wring clothes or scrub a dirty step. Then, o, her young charge, Elise Hathaway, was spoiled d hard to please, and she was daily tried by the cessity of inventing ways of discipline for the poor tle neglected girl which yet would not bring down protest from her even more undisciplined mother. she had been independent she would not have re- ained with Mrs. Hathaway, for sometimes the ild was unbearable in her naughty tantrums, and it ok all her nerve and strength to control her. She ould come back to the little gray house too weary en to smile, and the keen eye of Ma would look at r wisely and wonder if something ought not to be ne about it.

Betty felt that she must keep this place, of course, cause it was necessary for her to be able to pay some oard. She could not be beholden to the Carsons. nd they had been so kind, and were teaching her so any things, that it seemed the best and safest place e could be in. So the days settled down into weeks, nd a pleasant life grew up about her, so different om the old one that more and more the hallucination as with her that she had become another creature, nd the old life had gone out forever.

Of course as striking-looking a girl as Betty could ot enter into the life of a little town even as humbly s through the Carson home, without causing some omment and speculation. People began to notice r. The church ladies looked after her and remarked n her hair, her complexion, and her graceful carriage, nd some shook their heads and said they should hink Mrs. Hathaway would want to know a little ore about her before she put her only child in her ntire charge; and they told weird stories about girls hey had known or heard of.

Down at the fire-house, which was the real clearing- ouse of Tinsdale for all the gossip that came along nd went the rounds, they took up the matter in full ession several evenings in succession. Some of the ounger members made crude remarks about Betty's ooks, and some of the older ones allowed that she was ntirely too pretty to be without a history. They ook great liberties with their surmises. The only two, the youngest of them all, who might have defended her, had been unconsciously snubbed by her when they tried to be what Bobbie called "fresh" with her, and so she was at their mercy. But if she had known it she probably would have been little disturbed. They seemed so far removed from her two worlds, so utterly apart from herself. It would not have occurred to her that they could do her any harm.

One night the fire-house gang had all assembled save one, a little shrimp of a good-for-nothing, nearly hairless, toothless, cunning-eyed, and given to drink when he could lay lips on any. He had a wide loose mouth with a tendency to droop crookedly, and his hands were always clammy and limp. He ordinarily sat tilted back against the wall to the right of the engine, sucking an old clay pipe. He had a way of often turning the conversation to imply some deep mystery know only to himself behind the life of almost any one discussed. He often added choice embellishments to whatever tale went forth as authentic to go the rounds of the village, and he acted the part of a collector of themes and details for the evening conversations.

His name was Abijah Gage.

"Bi not come yet?" asked the fire chief, settling a straw comfortably between his teeth and looking around on the group. "Must be somepin' doin'. Don't know when Bi's been away."

"He went up to town this mornin' early," volunteered Dunc Withers. "Reckon he was thirsty. Guess he'll be back on the evenin' train. That's her comin' in now."

"Bars all closed in the city," chuckled the chief. "Won't get much comfort there."

"You bet Bi knows some place to get it. He won't come home thirsty, that's sure."

"I donno, they say the lid's down pretty tight."

"Aw, shucks!" sneered Dunc. "Bet I could get all I wanted!"

Just then the door opened and Abijah Gage walked in, with a toothless grin all around.

"Hello, Bi, get tanked up, did yeh?" greeted the chief.

"Well, naow, an' ef I did, what's that to you?" responded Bi, slapping the chief's broad shoulder with a folded newspaper he carried. "You don't 'spose I'm goin' to tell, an' get my frien's in trouble?"

"Le's see yer paper, Bi," said Dunc, snatching at it as Bi passed to his regular seat.

Bi surrendered his paper with the air of one granting a high favor and sank to his chair and his pipe.

"How's crops in the city?" asked Hank Fielder, and Bi's tale was set a-going. Bi could talk; that was one thing that always made him welcome.

Dunc was deep in the paper. Presently he turned it over:

"Whew!" he said speculatively, "If that don't look like that little lollipop over to Carson's I'll eat my hat! What's her name?"

They all drew around the paper and leaned over Dunc's shoulder squinting at the picture, all but Bi, who was lighting his pipe:

"They're as like as two peas!" said one,

"It sure must be her sister!" declared another.

"Don't see no resemblance 'tall," declared the chief, flinging back to his comfortable chair. "She's got short hair, an' she's only a kid This one's growed up!"

"She might a cut her hair," suggested one.

Bi pricked up his ears, narrowed his cunning eyes, and slouched over to the paper, looking at the picture keenly:

"Read it out, Dunc!" he commanded.

"Five thousand dollars, reward for information concerning Elizabeth Stanhope!"

There followed a description in detail of her size, height, coloring, etc.

An inscrutable look overspread Bi's face and hid the cunning in his eyes. He slouched to his seat during the reading and tilted back comfortably smoking, but he narrowed his eyes to a slit and spoke little during the remainder of the evening. They discussed the picture and the possibility of the girl in the paper being a relative of the girl at Carson's, but as Bi did not come forward with information the subject languished. Some one said he had heard the Carson kid call her Betty, he thought, but he wasn't sure. Ordinarily Bi would have known the full name, but Bi seemed to be dozing, and so the matter was finally dropped. But the hounds were out and on the scent, and it was well for Betty sleeping quietly in her little cot beneath the roof of the humble Carson home that she had committed her all to her heavenly Father before she slept.

CHAPTER VIII

"WELL, he gave me notice t'day," said James Ryan sadly as Jane and he rounded the corner from her boarding-house and turned toward their favorite movie theater. "I been expectin' it, an' now it's come!"

Jane stopped short on the sidewalk appalled:

"He gave you notice!" she exclaimed, as if she could not believe it was true. "Now, Jimmie! You don't mean it? Did he find any fault? He'd better not! B'leeve me, if he did he gets a piece of my mind, even if I am a poor workin' girl!"

"Oh, no, he didn't find any fault," said Jimmie cheerfully. "He was awful nice. He said he'd recommend me away up high. He's gonta give me time every day to hunt a new place, an' he's gonta recommend me to some of his rich friends."

"But what's the matter of him keepin' you? Did you ast him that?"

"Oh, he told me right out that things wasn't working the way he hoped when he started; the war and all had upset his prospects, and he couldn't afford to keep me. He's gonta take an office way down town and do his own letters. He says if he ever succeeds in business and I'm free to come to him he'll take me back. Oh, he's pleased with me all right! He's a peach! He certainly is."

"Jimmie, what d'you tell him?"

"Tell him? There wasn't much for me to tell him, only I was sorry, and I thanked him, and I told him I was gonta stick by him as long as I didn't have a place. Of course I can't live on air, but seeing he's willing I should go out and hunt a place every day, why I ain't that mean that I can't write a few letters for him now and then. He don't have that many, and it keeps me in practice. I s'pose I've got to get another place but I haven't tried yet. I can't somehow bring myself to give him up. I kind of wanted to stick in my first place a long time. It doesn't look well to be changing."

"Well, if it ain't your fault, you know, why you can't help it," advised Jane.

They were seated in the theater by this time, and the screen claimed their attention. It was just at the end of the funny reel, and both forgot more serious matters in following the adventures of a dog and a bear who were chasing each other through endless halls and rooms, to say nothing of bathtubs, and wash boilers, and dining tables, and anything that come in their way, with a shock to the people who happened to be around when they passed. But suddenly the film ended and the announcements for the next week began to flash on the screen.

"We must go to that, sure!" said Jimmie, nudging Jane, as the Mary Picford announcement was put on.

Then immediately afterward came the photograph of a beautiful girl, and underneath in great letters:

"Five thousand dollars' reward for accurate information as to the present whereabouts of Elizabeth Stanhope."

There followed further particulars and an address and the showing stayed on the screen for a full minute.

Jane sat gripping the arms of the seat and trying to still the wild excitement that possessed her, while her eyes looked straight into the eyes of the little bride whom she had helped to escape on the night of her wedding.

Jimmie took out his pencil and wrote down the address in shorthand, but Jane did not notice. She was busy thinking what she ought to do.

"What do you s'pose they want her for?" she asked in a breathless whisper, as a new feature film began to dawn on the screen.

"Oh, she's mebbe eloped," said the wise young man, "or there might be some trouble about property. There mostly is."

Jane said no more, and the pictures began again, but her mind was not following them. She was very quiet on the way home, and when Jimmie asked her if she had a grouch on she shivered and said, no, she guessed she was tired. Then she suddenly asked him what time he was going out to hunt for another job. He told her he couldn't be sure. He would call her up about noon and let her know. Could she manage to get out a while and meet him? She wasn't sure either, but would see when he called her up. And so they parted for the night.

The next morning when Reyburn entered his office Jimmie was already seated at his typewriter. On Reyburn's desk lay a neatly typed copy of the announcement that had been put on the screen the night before.

"What's this, Ryan?" he questioned as he took his seat and drew the paper toward him.

"Something I saw last night on the screen at the movies, sir. I thought it might be of interest."

"Were you thinking of trying for the reward?" asked Reyburn with a comical smile. What is it, anyway?" And he began to read.

"Oh, no sir!" said Jimmie. "I couldn't, of course; but I thought mebbe you'd be able to find out something about her and get all that money. That would help you through until you got started in your own business."

"H'm! That's kind of you, Ryan," said the young lawyer, reading the paper with a troubled frown. "I'm afraid it's hardly in my line, however. I'm not a detective, you know." He laid the paper down and looked thoughtfully out of the window.

"Oh, of course not, sir!" Jimmie hastened to apologize. "Only you know a lot of society folks in the city, and I thought you might think of some way of finding out where she is. I know it isn't up to what you ought to be doing, sir, but it wouldn't do any harm. You could work it through me, you know, and nobody need ever know 'twas you got the reward. I'd be glad to help you out doing all I could, but of course it would take your brains to get the information, sir. You see, it would be to my interest, because then you could afford to keep me, and—I like you, Mr. Reyburn, I certainly do. I would hate to leave you."

"Well, now, I appreciate that, Ryan. It's very thoughtful of you. I scarcely think there would be any possibility of my finding out anything about this girl, but I certainly appreciate your thoughtfulness. I'll make a note of it, and if anything turns up I'll let you know. I don't believe, however, that I would care to go after a reward even through some one else. You know, I was at that wedding, Ryan!" His eyes were dreamily watching the smoke from a distant funnel over the roof-tops in line with his desk.

"You were!" said Jimmie, watching his employer with rapt admiration. He had no higher ambition than to look like Warren Reyburn and have an office of his own.

"Yes, I was there," said Reyburn again, but his tone was so far off that Jimmie dared approach no nearer, and presently resumed the letter he was typing.

About noon Jimmie called up the factory while Reyburn was out to lunch and told Jane that he expected to go out at two o'clock. Could she meet him and

A NATION DRUGGED

China, In A New Fight Against Forcible Degradation, Appeals To The World For Help From Her Friends

By RAE D. HENKLE

"I'M not afraid of my enemies for a minute, but the fates protect me from my friends!" was the cynical comment of a well known statesman-politician at a national convention a few years ago. And never was the sentiment echoed more earnestly than in the appeal that is coming from China today: "God, protect us from our friends!"

You see, the whole world now is China's friend. Japan, the United States, England, France, Italy—all the allied and associated powers—and even Germany and Austria, are pledged in their diplomatic exchanges to the most altruistic, unselfish friendship, in which the good of China is the first and only consideration. We may wonder at the queer methods some of the powers—if not all of them— take to show their spirit of benevolent interest in the development of the young republic but we are enjoined that no suspicion should be permitted to mar the beauty of international accord. Officially and theoretically, everything that is done vis-a-vis China, is done for China's good.

For nearly one hundred years the Chinese people have been compelled to submit to aggressions on the part of foreign powers—aggressions committed under the cover, for the most part, of protestations of a genuine desire to promote the country's well-being. Recent history has been quite informative on the sincerity of these protestations.

Aggressions, however, while they belie friendship and goodwill, fall in the category of international politics, which cloak a multitude of sins. It is the tendency to excuse them, except when they violate some obvious rights of weaker people, as involving only material things. In other words, they may be debated from the standpoint of ethics or expediency, rather than that of morals.

There is one form of aggression against China, however, which strikes at the very root of morality and which the world, and particularly the people of the United States, should thoroughly understand. When it is understood, I am certain such a voice will be heard in Washington that our government will be compelled to take immediate steps for reform in line with China's appeal.

We may, as we have done and are doing today, consent to or tolerate the spoliation of 40,000,000 Chinese but we CANNOT, and as a nation WE WILL NOT consent to the systematic debauchery of this whole country of 400,000,000 beings when the facts are plainly presented.

THREE brief paragraphs will be sufficient to sketch the historical background of a situation which contains the most vital moral and religious issue in all the Far East:

1. In 1839 China fought a war with England to prevent the importation of Indian opium into Chinese territory. China lost and her people were actually coerced into becoming slaves to the drug.

2. From the day of the Opium War, the Chinese authorities fought the increasing use of the drug. They conducted a widespread and effective propaganda against it and so interested the right-thinking people of other countries that popular opinion forced the calling of a conference in Shanghai in 1909 which resulted in the Opium Convention to which the United States, England and Japan, among other countries, were signatories. This convention provided for a yearly decrease in opium imports for ten years, when they should cease altogether. The ten-year period has now expired and by international agreement no opium or its derivatives can be taken into Chinese territory.

3. So determined was the Government of the Republic of China to hasten the suppression of the traffic that it bought up more than $25,000,000 worth of the drug three years ago and publicly burned it with much ceremony.

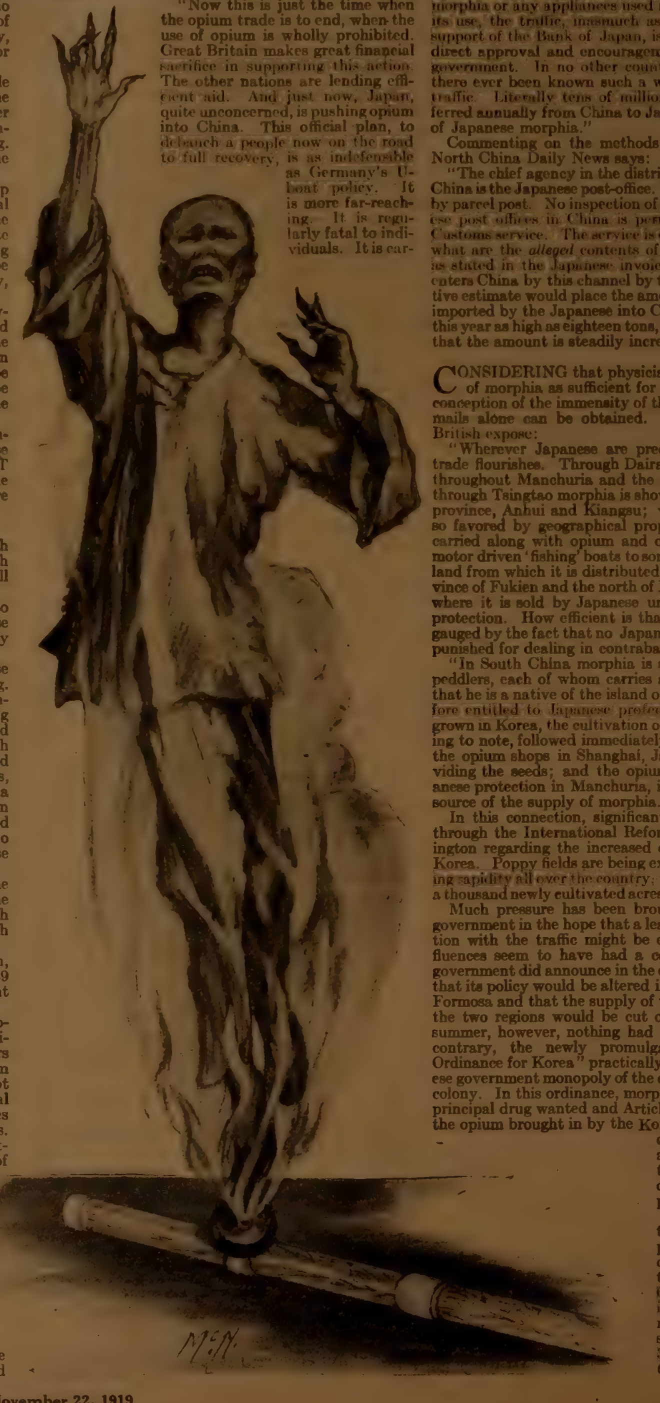
What has been the result of this long campaign, extending not only to 1839 but as far back as 1789 when the fateful juice of the poppy was first brought overland from India?

China and her government have absolutely suppressed the traffic in the drug by Chinese and in territory under Chinese control. BUT, friendly powers in years past have persuaded China to grant them concessions of territory in which their subjects are not amenable to Chinese law. These extra-territorial rights are an integral part of most of the treaties entered into by China at the urge of the great powers. Coupled with extra-territoriality, some powers, notably England and Japan, are in exclusive control of customs and post-offices. Goods shipped through these offices are subject to inspection only by English or Japanese officials. Obviously the Chinese government can have no control over such imports. And there is the crux of the whole matter. Let us see how these territorial and customs rights are being used to the terrible social degeneration of the Chinese people.

A FEW weeks ago in Paris, Kong Siang Ko, head of Confucianism and seventy-fifth in lineal descent from Confucius, ex-president of the Council to the Provincial Parliament of Shantung and envoy to the Peace Conference for the 40,000,000 inhabitants of the province, issued a statement in which, after reference had been made to the cession of Shantung to Japan, these sentences occurred:

"The obvious and usual advantages of this strange hold are not all. The Japanese are making heavy importations of opium and morphine. Much comes in boxes as 'military supplies.' The drugs even pass on into China through parcels-post, for in large sections Japan controls the postal service.

"Now this is just the time when the opium trade is to end, when the use of opium is wholly prohibited. Great Britain makes great financial sacrifice in supporting this action. The other nations are lending efficient aid. And just now, Japan, quite unconcerned, is pushing opium into China. This official plan, to debauch a people now on the road to full recovery, is as indefensible as Germany's U-boat policy. It is more far-reaching. It is regularly fatal to individuals. It is carried on incessantly in times of peace."



The North China Daily News, published in Sha hai and the oldest British organ in China, recent published an exhaustive analysis of Japan's activiti in morphia traffic.

"Morphia," it says, "can no longer be purchased Europe. The seat of industry has been transferred Japan and morphia is now manufactured by the Japa ese themselves. Although Japan is a signatory to th agreement which forbids the import into China morphia or any appliances used in its manufacture its use, the traffic, inasmuch as it has the financ support of the Bank of Japan, is carried on with th direct approval and encouragement of the Japane government. In no other country in the world ha there ever been known such a wholesale contraban traffic. Literally tens of millions of yen are trans ferred annually from China to Japan for the paymen of Japanese morphia."

Commenting on the methods of distribution, th North China Daily News says:

"The chief agency in the distribution of morphia i China is the Japanese post-office. Morphia is imported by parcel post. No inspection of parcels in the Japan ese post offices in China is permitted to the Chin Customs service. The service is only allowed to know what are the alleged contents of the postal packag as stated in the Japanese invoices, and yet morphi enters China by this channel by the ton. A conservative estimate would place the amount of morphia thu imported by the Japanese into China in the course of this year as high as eighteen tons, and there is evidence that the amount is steadily increasing."

CONSIDERING that physicians regard one ounce of morphia as sufficient for 1,000 doses, a better conception of the immensity of the traffic through the mails alone can be obtained. But continuing the British expose:

"Wherever Japanese are predominant, there the trade flourishes. Through Dairan morphia circulates throughout Manchuria and the provinces adjoining; through Tsingtao morphia is showered over Shantung province, Anhui and Kiangsu; while from Formosa, so favored by geographical propinquity, morphia is carried along with opium and other contraband by motor driven 'fishing' boats to some point on the mainland from which it is distributed throughout the province of Fukien and the north of Kwangtung. Everywhere it is sold by Japanese under extra-territorial protection. How efficient is that protection may be gauged by the fact that no Japanese has ever yet been punished for dealing in contraband in China.

"In South China morphia is sold also by Chinese peddlers, each of whom carries a passport certifying that he is a native of the island of Formosa and therefore entitled to Japanese protection. . . . Opium grown in Korea, the cultivation of which, it is interesting to note, followed immediately upon the closing of the opium shops in Shanghai, Japanese officials providing the seeds; and the opium grown under Japanese protection in Manchuria, is an ever-expanding source of the supply of morphia."

In this connection, significant information comes through the International Reform Bureau in Washington regarding the increased opium production in Korea. Poppy fields are being extended with increasing rapidity all over the country. One traveler reports a thousand newly cultivated acres in one district alone.

Much pressure has been brought to bear on the government in the hope that a least its official connection with the traffic might be ended, but these influences seem to have had a contrary effect. The government did announce in the early part of the year that its policy would be altered in both Tsingtao and Formosa and that the supply of the drug destined for the two regions would be cut off. As late as midsummer, however, nothing had been done. On the contrary, the newly promulgated "New Opium Ordinance for Korea" practically establishes a Japanese government monopoly of the drug in that unhappy colony. In this ordinance, morphia stands out as the principal drug wanted and Article 4 stipulates that if the opium brought in by the Korean farmer does not contain the required amount of morphia the opium shall be destroyed without payment.

The extent of the traffic through Japan proper may be appreciated from the fact that in 1917 some 600,229 ounces of opium were imported to meet a home consumption of between 30,000 and 40,000

"MY use of Goodyear Cord Pneumatic Truck Tires shows me that pneumatics not only travel better on our clay roads but also are better for the roads. Solids have a hard time in the soft ruts and they are hard on the roads. I have observed that others here are taking note of this."—A. J. Emmerton, Farmer, Bloomer, Wisconsin

THERE is scarcely any work done on the Emmerton Farm near Boomer, Wisconsin, that is not aided directly or indirectly by a motor truck on Goodyear Cord Pneumatic Truck Tires.

Their traction enables this truck to haul fertilizer over plowed ground, to carry feed to livestock wherever located, to deliver oil to tractors and to distribute fencing.

For the same reason the truck easily transfers corn from binder to silo filler and grain from separator to bins—all off-the-road work.

Mr. Emmerton's experience, however, equally emphasizes the advantage of the Goodyear Cords over solid tires on the local clay roads, noting that the pneumatic-shod truck overcomes conditions impassable to solid-tired trucks.

Still another important significance attaches to his statement that the pneumatics are regarded with growing favor in the surrounding community because their cushioning action saves roads.

It prompts the observation that this particular virtue of the pioneer Goodyear Cord Pneumatic Truck Tires also is a factor in their rapid and broadcast rural adoption.

THE UNWELCOME GUEST

A SERMON By REV. B. Z. STAMBAUGH, D.D.*

Text. Luke 9. 53—"They did not receive Him, because His face was as though He were going to Jerusalem."

EVEN after Jesus had bidden farewell to Capernaum for the last time, and had steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem, I do not think that his progress covered very many miles a day. There were so many things to hinder him,—so many villages and cities whose diseased and suffering people claimed his ministrations by the way. It was, therefore, certainly not less than two or three days after the beginning of this final trip, that he led his disciples over the border into Samaria, and sent some of them on ahead, to prepare for the accommodation of the company for the night in the little village of En-gennim.

En-gennim was one of those wretched Samaritan towns in the hill country, where poverty, ignorance, and superstition ran rife, and where religious bigotry was most intense. It is not hard to imagine how very much that little village needed the ministry of Jesus, to its sick, crippled, disheartened, and sinful people. But we learn that when the disciples came to make arrangement, at the miserable little khan, for the Master to spend the night, they were met with incivility and rebuff. It seems to me that I can picture in my own mind the small mob that gathered,—the heavy browed malignity and fanatical hatred in the rage-distorted faces that gleamed in the torch-light of early evening. I fancy that so great was their hatred of Jews, and especially of Jewish rabbis, that they even followed the disciples up the road until they met the Lord and his other followers, and that they even cursed and threatened Him. I can imagine how they finally turned back snarling to their town, like ill-natured dogs to the kennel, at nightfall. For Jesus had paid no further attention to their vicious inhospitality, but had turned aside out of the way, and prepared to spend the night in the forest under the stars,—far removed from the hideous little community.

Now the reason for this bitterness on the part of the people of En-gennim is to be found in the 53rd verse of the 9th chapter of St. Luke's Gospel: "And they did not receive him, because his face was as though he were going to Jerusalem." But as I have meditated on what the people of that miserable little Samaritan town did, and why they did it, I have realized that there was more behind it all than one would gather superficially from the words of the writer. And the thought has persisted in my mind, "How like people of our own age they were!" The Jerusalem-bound Christ could find no welcome with them, and Jesus Christ finds no welcome in many hearts today because His face is the face of One going to Jerusalem.

TO the people of En-gennim, a Messiah who was going to Jerusalem was a Messiah of Humiliation. For centuries Samaria had proclaimed its religious independence of Jerusalem,—and blind local pride was strong, even in such a wretched place as En-gennim. They maintained that the true worship of God was carried on in the mountain of Samaria, while the Jews insisted that Jerusalem was the proper place for making sacrifices. No doubt the report had come from Sychar, of how Jesus had come thither more than two years previously and had so worked upon the heart of a wicked woman and her friends that they had repented of their sinful manner of life and had begun to make sacrifices at Jerusalem. And perhaps the priests of the Samaritan religion had already warned all their towns and villages against having anything to do with this Nazarene. So the people of En-gennim, proud and self-deceived, ignored the filth, disease, suffering and sin in their midst, and turned away the only One on earth who could help them.

Among the phenomena of religious and doctrinal tendencies of the past half century, one of the most impressive has been the attempt to do away with the virtue of humility, and to make repentance seem a matter of small importance. We have been very conscious of our own moral rectitude, and of the superiority of contemporary standards over those of past ages. Our respectability before men has blinded us to our position before God. Our prayers have been filled with thanksgiving, praise, and petition,—but there has been little sincere expression of deep consciousness of sin. Among people on a lower scale of civilization than that of America there is less doubt about personal guilt,—more consciousness of unworth. But, as some one has well said, the great offense of the Cross in cultured ages is the fact that it demands humility. It goes against the grain of a respectable churchman to say: "We have done those things that we ought not to have done, and we have left undone those things that we ought to have done, and there is no health in us." Or, "have mercy upon us, miserable offenders." Or, again, "....the burden of them is intolerable." As a matter of fact, the average man has not been made to feel that he is a "miserable sinner," and there has been nothing intolerable to him in the recollection of his mistakes. Oh yes, of course, we know we have all done wrong occasionally,—but we average up pretty well with other folks,—and think what a lot of good we have done, after all! And we are so self-confident, so self-satisfied, that our growth in grace becomes very slow indeed.

That is one reason why penitence has no greater part in modern religious life. That is why men try to avoid Jesus Christ, and prefer to make their religion out of a system of respectable business and social ethics.

How the war has cleared our vision in matters of this sort! We see now how much the world might have escaped if men had been more concerned with rectifying their mistakes and escaping from the bondage of sin. And many of us who had been expurgating the General Confession of its most significant phrases, have been led to restore them with trembling hands,—filled with shame at our presumption in setting up our own individual judgment against the wisdom of nineteen hundred years of Christian experience. It is disagreeably humiliating for men to accept the Jerusalem-bound Christ.

THERE is another reason, however, why the people of En-gennim refused to receive Jesus,—and why many modern people would like to find a different way of salvation. For a Jerusalem-bound Messiah is a Messiah of Self-Sacrifice. Jesus was leading his disciples to Jerusalem,—going to almost certain death. Here was a man who was setting himself against the established conventions of his age,—a man who was antagonizing the authorities in religion and government. It was dangerous to be allied with him, for he could not be dissuaded from his mad course. He refused absolutely to make any compromises with the social order already established and powerful. This intrepidity of his was at once a challenge and a rebuke to the men of En-gennim. They knew he was right and that the world was wrong, and the very recognition of their own culpability in conforming to the world's customs provoked them to anger, so that they would not receive him.

I think sometimes that there is no other cause of hostility to the Church of Jesus Christ quite so common as that which comes of its sacrificial demands. People want to be religious, of course,—that is, they want to keep on good terms with God,—if they can do it without much trouble to themselves. They are like the Samaritans, who wanted to worship Jehovah, but did not wish to risk political and financial loss by going clear to Jerusalem to do it. And life had become so secure in the world, up to a few years ago, and the high moral standard had become so opular, that many have hastened to assure us that there is no real antagonism any more between Christianity and the world. People have been urged to join the Church on the ground that it is so easy. "You don't have to change your ways any," they are told. Christians are no longer thrown to the lions or burned at the stake; people have lulled themselves into the fancy that self-sacrifice for the Kingdom of God is no longer necessary. Even the persecutions in foreign missionary fields have largely passed away, we are informed.

THE call of Christ is a call to self-sacrifice. In the luxurious age which preceded the war, men seemed unable to comprehend that fact; the Church was unpopular in the ratio with which it enforced and emphasized the Cross. But with the coming of this demand for sacrifice in the cause of human liberty, there arose a great sacrificial impulse. Men gave themselves whole-heartedly to the cause of democracy and mercy,—heeding the call to follow their ideals even into the Valley of the Shadow. And I believe the call of Christ to follow Him up to Jerusalem was given a better hearing. We came back to an appreciation of the meaning of the Atonement, and to a realization that all blessings must come by sacrifice,—often vicarious sacrifice.

THE Pharisee went home to continue his life of ease and plenty,—a just man in the eyes of the law and of his neighbors, but a man who was perfectly satisfied with the unjust social system which made him rich and starved his neighbor. His religion was a great source of comfort to him.

The publican, like Zacchaeus of Jericho and Matthew of Capernaum went forth to interpret in self-sacrificing service the lesson of godliness that had come to him. He went forth to quit the wretched business that had enslaved his soul, and to live a life of service. His religion was not a comfort to him, but a cause of much dissatisfaction.

Jesus' religion did not make Him comfortable. It drove Him to Calvary. If you accept Him you accept the leadership of One who will tear you away from much that is pleasant and comforting in life,—One going to Jerusalem. Are you man enough to follow Him thither?

THE NEED OF REVIVAL

AS the days and weeks pass, the evidence of a general desire for nation-wide revival increases. There are urgent calls from every side for united supplication that a great outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon this nation may take place. We need wiser counsels than those of men to meet the emergency. Prayer circles make this need the theme of their supplications. Faithful ministers, observant of the unrest that is spreading throughout the country, the sharp antagonism of material interests and the tense struggle over the rewards of industry, feel the growing conviction that what is needed to solve these problems is something which cannot be reached through customary channels. They feel, too, that the confusion can be changed to order, the wranglings to harmony, the bitterness to brotherliness, only through divine intervention, and that when as a nation we appeal in faith and sincerity for aid from the Source of wisdom and helpfulness, it will not be denied or withheld.

If, then, such be the conditions and convictions, why do we hesitate? We have the days appointed for prayer, the week of prayer, and similar calls, all of which will doubtless be duly observed; but if the need of divine wisdom, and guidance during these critical times be imperatively urgent, as we all admit, why delay applying the only remedy? And if we feel, as every believing Christian holds, that God is waiting to be gracious, let us lift up our voices and our hearts and invite the waiting blessing.

The Spirit can be repelled by indifference or won by sincere solicitude.

God's hand is needed at the helm. And if we plead with Him, He will not refuse to answer.

In a recent address by Rev. Milford H. Lyon, President of the International Association of Evangelists, he presented the petition of this nation for a gracious revival in these words:

"Is it not time for prayer, and plan and project to plead for a genuine revival? Without it, everything else must prove futile and unavailing. We need revival not only for the sake of the Church, but also for the safeguarding of civilization itself.

Back of all laws, leagues, treaties and governments, you must reckon with the motives and desires of the individual man. You cannot build a good building with poor material. Good men will make a good state. The arch-enemy of brotherhood is selfishness. Wealth, comfort, culture cannot effect a cure. There is but one adequate antidote for selfishness, and that is the influence and power of the living Christ in the individual heart.

"Does the Church of Christ really want a revival? Separate denominational efforts can never effect the result. It is going to require the united prayers and endeavors of all Christians. The present restless, expectant condition of society is not only ominous with danger, but it is also in a plastic, receptive state, capable of untold possibilities for betterment. An entire interdenominational evangelistic program covering every section of America. city and country, including personal evangelism, special campaigns ought to be planned at once. From thence, let it spread to the uttermost parts of the earth.''

"Prove me now herewith, saith the Lord of hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it.''

RARELY in national legislation has a shock been so quickly followed by the reaction as happened in the case of the Presidential veto of the Volstead Bill for war-time enforcement of prohibition, and the overriding of the veto by an overwhelming vote in both Houses of Congress. For months the liquor interests throughout the country had flouted the suggestion of war-time prohibition being maintained during the period that must pass before prohibition by constitutional amendment goes into effect on January 16. The saloons had kept on selling, and had even planned to test the constitutionality of the measure in the courts. Now, however, that Congress has spoken and the Bill has been repassed, they have come to regard the situation as a finality—for a time at least.

In proportion as it brought gloom to the saloons, it gave cause for jubilation among the "drys," to be assured that the ban against liquor would not be lifted until the Peace Treaty is ratified. The net result of the action of Congress is that from the date on which the Presidential veto was overridden, it is a crime to sell beverages containing more than ½ of 1 per cent. of alcohol, and this condition will so remain until peace with Germany is officially announced. Indeed, the ban may even be kept in force until peace is signed with Austria-Hungary, and the prohibition leaders are now considering a campaign with that objective in view. Victory on this line would extend war-time enforcement a few days longer, but would still leave a period of several weeks before Constitutional Prohibition becomes the law of the land. That interval includes the Christmas and New Year holidays, which will probably witness a revival of liquor activities before the "wets" settle down to entire compliance with the law.

A BISHOP'S LAST MESSAGE

GREAT events must be measured in just perspective, and this cannot be done until long after the events themselves have passed. It is still too early to estimate the permanent results of the world upheaval. It may be months and years before we can arrive at a true estimate of an event so stupendous. Indeed, some thoughtful writers have suggested that the realization will not come during the present generation.

But after all, it is impossible to avoid forming some conclusions, even if they are felt to be imperfect. During the first year of the war, it was widely proclaimed by thoughtful writers that one of the effects would inevitably be that the nations would be drawn closer to God, and that they were already "finding their souls." That conclusion stands today, and many men have even gone further, and declared that old systems and ideas have passed away and we are living in a "new world."

A new world! What does it mean? What kind of a new world do we want? May it not be easily true that a new world means one thing to one set of men, and quite a different thing to other sets? And if the leading thinkers, authors, statesmen, preachers and other big folks cannot agree about it, with what eyes of discernment can the common folks themselves view it? Premier Lloyd George, in a recent address, asked: "What does the new world mean? What was the old world like?" And then he pictures the old as a place where toil was inadequately rewarded, where squalor and penury and suffering were the lot of millions, where despair was familiar to the multitudes, and where "entrenched selfishness had its seat and shed its baneful, blighting influence over all." But he found the new world indescribable, if we may infer anything from his silence.

Like a voice from the past comes a message written by Bishop Greer shortly before his life closed. It deals with the conditions of the Church and shows a clearness of vision and an apprehension of spiritual conditions that fittingly found a place in a farewell greeting. "We hope for a better world," he wrote, "and yet, if it is to be so, how will it come about? Simply by and of itself. By the spontaneous generation of a new and better social life from that which is not new and better. Or if not in that way, then in what other way? . . . One of the greatest forces in changing the world's social order is not an academic or scholastic force—not the force of culture, but in its last analysis it involves or implies a change in human nature. That is not an easy thing to do. . . . Can it be done? Is it possible to do it? . . . Yet that is what religion—I mean the Christian religion—aims and claims to do, and what the Christian Church is supposed to do. Does it do it?" He admits that it does it in individual cases, but asks, "Why not on a larger scale? Why does it not exercise that leadership or guidance in the world's affairs which it should exert and yet does not exert? Why does it not win the whole world—not merely in any part—in truth and fact to Jesus Christ? The Church's membership is large enough, influential enough, nor does it lack the means. Then why does it not do it? Because it does not have faith enough and therefore on the whole does not wish to do it? Yes, partly that, but chiefly because it is not itself and does not feel itself enough of a personality to do it."

And then follows the point of his conclusions, the essence of his thoughts: "If all the Christian forces now operating in the Christian world should in some real and vital way become united and combined; if the entire Christian Church throughout the Christian world should become in practice and in fact a united Church, more clearly and more fully bringing out the personality of Jesus Christ, the Christian Church would then become a personality in the world, energizing it with the personality force of a living Jesus Christ." That was the dying Bishop's thought of a victorious and triumphant Church, able to carry forward its work to success. Instead of being a unit—one victorious army—he pronounced it "simply an aggregation of different Christian parts, different Christian groups or communions," and hence unqualified, if not indeed incapable, for the task before it. "Its influence," he added, "is weakened by the divisions in it. It does not function with the personality power which otherwise it would." And practical men of affairs are saying, "Paul we knew and Jesus we knew; but with your many cleavage lines, and not agreeing among yourselves, who and what are ye?"

WHERE SOCIALISM FAILED

RETURNING after an exhaustive investigatio in Allied, enemy and neutral countries, fro the fundamental basis of food and productio Mr. Herbert Hoover may be regarded as competen to speak with a degree of authority. In his addres a few days ago at the dinner tendered to him by th American Institute of Mining Engineers in New York he gave an enlightening view of the conditions i Russia. He had found that the leaders of Socialis realized the bankruptcy of their experiment and a now striving to cover their failure by complaints concerning the influence of conditions in other nations. He believes, however, that the tide has turned in Russia, and that if she can only get peace, through whatever means, the road will be open to economic recovery. In his view the fundamental question involved is: the better division of the products of industry and the steady development of higher productivity. Socialism, which "was brought in overnight" by a small but tyrannous minority of intellectual dilettantes and criminals in Russia, has in two years failed to convert that country to its theories. Two-thirds of the railways and three-fourths of the rolling stock are inoperative. The population is suffering from famine, and die by hundreds of thousands every month from starvation. Disease is unchecked; populous cities have lost from one-half to two-thirds of their people. The land is sick of violence and executions.

Socialization of the land has now been abandoned; the differential wage to attract skilled labor has been established, and an effort made to stimulate agricultural production. His main conclusion is stated in a single sentence: "Although Socialism has now proved itself on the rock of production. I believe it was necessary with rivers of blood and suffering, to be an economic and spiritual fallacy, and to have wrecked itself for the world to have had this demonstration." Mr. Hoover looks to the effect of this tremendous object lesson on other lands, our own included, and deduces this: "A definite American attitude is needed for these disintegrating theories of Europe. It must be founded on our national instincts and on the normal development of our national institutions," and that workers of every sort here are absolutely interdependent in the task of maximum production and better distribution. "We have in the United States today a better division of wealth and a greater equality of opportunity than any other nation in the world, and we thus have better foundation upon which to build."

There is still a task left for America to do in Europe. The many new democracies we have inspired are striving toward our ideals, Mr. Hoover asserts, and we alone have the economic and moral reserve to carry our neighbors back to strength. To accomplish this task he believes to be the true Americanism.

Mr. Hoover's vivid sketch of economic and political conditions in Russia is in sharp contrast with the report brought by W. C. Bullitt after a comparatively brief inquiry in his capacity as a representative of our government. Even while admitting the demoralization and suffering in Russia, the Bullitt report was in a general sense a defense of the Lenine tyranny, which he asserted would yet demonstrate its success if it had "the United States on its side." As to the comparative value of the two reports, there cannot be a moment's hesitation. The first is the production of a broad-minded American observer, competent to judge, and with no interest beyond bringing the actual truth to light; the other, the plea of a pacifist who, even admitting the frightful conditions in Russia, yet had the assurance to urge American support for the very causes which had driven the country to the verge of ruin.

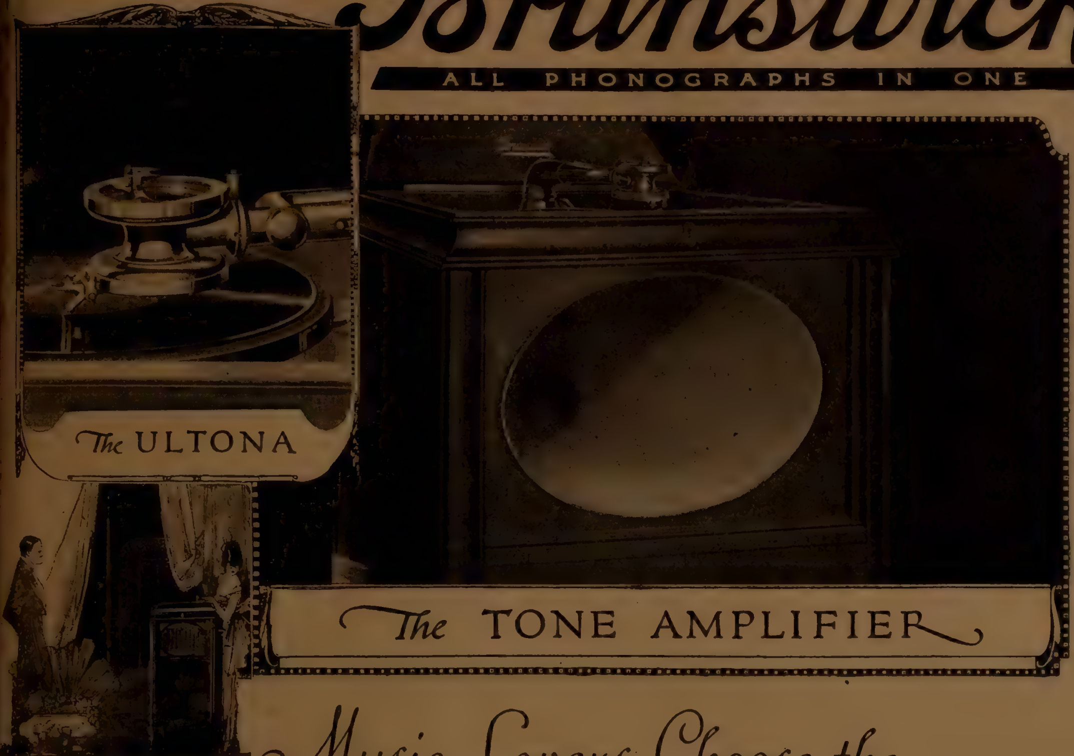
IN these days of world disturbance, when life is a hard struggle to multitudes, and when suffering is universal, Christ is knocking at the door of the hearts of men and women. He seeks to be admitted that he may heal their wounds, comfort them in their sorrows and bring peace and happiness where now all is apprehension and uncertainty.

One of the famous pictures which ought to be in every home in America, is Holman Hunt's representation of Jesus standing at the door of a house, and patiently knocking, his face expressing tender solicitude and his whole attitude one of kind entreaty. This painting expresses more than words can tell the need of the world and its opportunity. It needs Christ in the hearts of men.

We have secured a number of these pictures, printed in beautiful colors. It will be the front page of a Calendar for the coming year. This we intend as a gift to every subscriber, new and old, who pays the full subscription price to the Herald during the months of November and December. It is a beautiful gift and goes with our hearty good-will, in the hope that it may bring a ray of cheer and Christian comfort into every home it enters.

The Brunswick

ALL PHONOGRAPHS IN ONE



Music Lovers Choose the BRUNSWICK

MUSIC lovers choose the Brunswick Phonographs to play their favorite records, for it plays all records at their best.

The Brunswick Method of Reproduction makes this possible. It consists of two outstanding, exclusive features—the Brunswick Ultona and the Brunswick Tone Amplifier.

The Ultona

The Ultona is a scientific creation which enables one to play all records with faithful regard for the requirements of each make. It is not in any sense a combination contrivance, but involves a fundamental principle of sound reproduction.

Nor is the Ultona a complex mechanism. By a slight turn of the hand it is adapted to any make record, instantly supplying the correct position on the record, the proper needle and diaphragm and the precise pressure or weight necessary to play that particular record.

The Tone Amplifier

The Brunswick Tone Amplifier is another improvement of fundamental importance. As the name implies, it amplifies the tone, making it richer, sweeter, truer.

This vibrant tone chamber, constructed entirely of moulded hollywood, free from metal, provides the requisite resiliency that unfolds and projects true tone. Like a fine violin or the sounding board of a piano, it complies with the approved laws of acoustics.

HONEY

With a Shortage in Sugar the Busy Little Bee Finds Himself Regarded With Increased Respect—Here Are a Few Uses to Which Product May Be Put

By Julia W. Wolfe

WE are being told to use honey if we cannot obtain sugar, and do you know that beyond the art of the confectioner there are many ways of using this delicacy which the busy bee provides for our table? Honey was doubtless the first sweet substance known to the human race, for the bees had learned how to store up the nectar of the flowers long before man devised means of gathering the maple sap or of extracting the sweet juices of the sugar cane or beet root and reducing them by evaporation.

Because it was known in the childhood of the race, honey became associated with many rites in ancient times. Its use was forbidden in Jewish sacrifices, perhaps because it figured in heathen ceremonies. Among different ancient peoples honey was used in the sacred water sprinkled on the newborn baby; was combined with the refreshments offered to guests; appeared in wedding ceremonies; figured in New Year festivals and was offered as a libation to the dead.

The folk lore associated with the bee is interesting. The insects are regarded with superstition by the uneducated people of all countries. The custom of "telling the bees" of death in the family is prevalent in many sections of England and similar ideas are found elsewhere.

Honey bees were brought from Asia to Europe, and thence to America. The wild bees in the woods are supposed to have escaped from the settlers of early days. The Indians called the bee "the white man's fly," looking upon it as an advance courier of the civilization which they dreaded.

It is said that a hundred years ago there were no bees west of the Mississippi, and that they were not found in California until after the gold seekers went there.

Honey was the first basis of many of the beverages of the ancients, as may be recognized from the Latin mel and Greek meli, meaning honey, which form a part of the names of many drinks, as hydromeli, opomeli, oxymeli, etc.

The ancients placed high value on the honey obtained from Mount Hybla, in Sicily, and also from Mount Hymettus, in Attica, and certain provinces in Southern Europe have the reputation of producing honey of exquisite flavor.

In this country California seems to be taking the lead as a honey producing state, if we may judge from the labels on much of the honey displayed in the markets.

The total annual yield of honey in the United States is sufficient to furnish each inhabitant with at least a half a pound, while the wax is no small item of trade. If the future America will probably become still more the "land flowing with milk and honey."

It is quite possible to secure special varieties of honey of different texture, flavor and color by supplying the bees with different kinds of food.

A French scientist is planning to supersede medicines by medicated honey. The bees delegated to furnish a certain variety are obliged to put all their efforts to plants of the right kind, and the honey is duly labeled.

As the season passes bees from the North gather honey from the blossoms of the maple, the apple, the raspberry, the linden, the buckwheat and the wild asters and the golden-rod. In the South the cotton, palmetto and orange are among the principal honey producers.

The flavor of the different flowers is often apparent in the honey. The bee-keeper places his main dependence upon clover for the finest grade of honey.

Golden-rod also is a valuable aid to the apiarist in some parts of this country. The honey made from it is about the same grade as clover honey. The pollen of the golden-rod adhering to the bees inparts a yellow tinge to both comb and honey. Golden-rod honey is said to be thicker than that made from other flowers and to granulate more readily.

Rare cases have been reported of honey with poisonous ingredients when bees have had access to mountain laurel or other poisonous plants. The flavor of wild onion and similar plants naturally is not desirable in honey.

Honey should be reckoned as a food and not merely as an accessory to give relish. It is considered a more desirable food than cane sugar for persons whose digestive organs are weak. The nectar of the flowers resembles cane sugar but by the aid of the bees becomes somewhat easier of digestion.

The wax is not digestible but becomes softened in the stomach and is practically harmless.

Children seem instinctively to prefer sweets to fats, and the occasional dose of honey in moderation is not objectionable.

To clarify honey when the comb is broken, warm it slightly and strain. The wax will form a cake on top and may be removed when cold. If the honey be heated too much the flavor will be changed.

A small quantity of honey is an agreeable addition to candies or to the frosting for a cake. Sugar and water are boiled together in the usual fashion for fondant, and as it cooks the honey is beaten in.

Some recipes for honey cakes recommend boiling the strained honey till it becomes brittle and then working it quickly into the eggs, butter, etc. Others use the honey in place of molasses or other liquids. Honey is delicious for combination with nut meats or with popcorn.

"Bread and honey" was the queen's diet according to Mother Goose, and with a glass of milk is good enough for king and queen.

What Can A Poor Girl Do?

REV. A. L. WARD, pastor of a church in Franklin, Ind., in an address to young women on marriage, gave these don'ts. He said:

"Don't think you can not be happy unless you are married.

"Don't jump at the first offer of marriage because you fear you will not get another.

"Don't marry a man unless he is well spoken of at home.

"Don't marry a man for whom you do not have the highest respect.

"Don't marry a man simply because he is gallant, and dashing.

"Don't marry a man because he remembers you with beautiful flowers.

"Don't marry a man who neglects his mother or sisters.

"Don't marry a man to reform him.

"Don't marry a man who is selfish.

"Don't marry a man for his money.

"Don't marry a man who ridicules your religion.

"Don't marry a man who is cruel.

"Don't marry a man to spite another man or women.

"Don't marry a man about whose habits you are not quite certain.

"Don't get the foolish and fatal notion that a rogue makes the best husband."

How I invested in health

By DOROTHEA ADAMS

Illustrations by George Winemiller

ON this page are some of the health helps that I call my "investments n health" because they have brought my whole family dividends in the form f much happiness.

Do not think that we use them to ake the place of the physician. When ou are seriously ill, I firmly believe hat you should see a doctor immeditely. In fact, many of these health helps were recommended to me by my doctor. They aim more to prevent ickness than to remedy it.

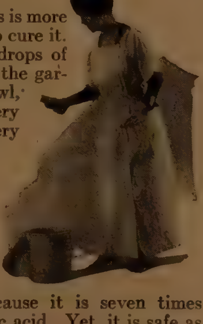
I say, with Izaak Walton:—"Look o your health and if you have it, praise God and value it next to a good conscience."

HERE is the way we prevent acid stomach gas, and constipation. We get a pint or half-pint bottle of McK & R Milk of Magnesia and put one tablespoonful in every quart of cow's milk you use — whether for drinking or cooking. The kiddies like their milk just as well with the milk of magnesia in it because the cow's milk is not altered a particle in taste. By doing this regularly we prevent accumulating waste matter in the bowels and the magnesia sweetens the stomach, thus preventing belching, indigestion and constipation.

COLDS are more dangerous than they seem. A cold leads to some more serious sickness so easily. As soon as any members of my family get a cold, I have them slip a box of McK & R Cold & Grippe Tablets in their pocket or purse and take one tablet every two hours until the cold goes away.

WHEN my boy was about 15 months old I took very sick and had to have a nurse. One day, when I was on the way to recovery, I was changing the baby's dress and began to shake some talcum powder on him. The nurse saw me. "Don't use talcum," she said, "use McK & R Stearate of Zinc. It does all that talcum will do and in addition it is waterproof and healing." I tried this and the baby's diaper rash disappeared entirely and his skin is much clearer than it ever was. I suggest that you write the manufacturers — McKesson & Robbins, New York, for a free trial can.

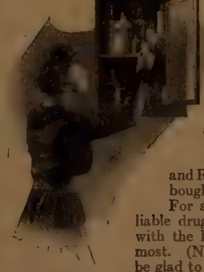
WHEN I wash the children's hair or my own, I always use McK & R Cocoanut Oil Shampoo. It combines a cleanser, a hair tonic and dandruff eliminator. I find I can work up a wonderfully creamy lather in a minute by simply wetting the hair and pouring on about a tablespoonful of the shampoo. I find that this brand makes the hair heavier — and thicker-looking and imparts a wonderful gloss and sheen.



TO prevent sickness is more important than to cure it. I pour two or three drops of McK & R Pinotol in the garbage pail, toilet bowl, and ice box about every other day. Also, to every bit of cleaning water you use — whether for dishes, clothes, floors, woodwork, your bath — I add a few drops of Pinotol. It destroys the invisible dangerous germs because it is seven times stronger than carbolic acid. Yet, it is safe as water and has a delightful pine odor.

THE mouth is the entrance-way to the body, and if you do not keep your mouth clean you cannot expect your body to be as healthy as it might. "See a dentist at least every six months and brush your teeth morning and night," is the motto of every member of our family. (After trying a large number of dentifrices we now use Calox — and have for several years. It whitens the teeth, corrects mouth acids, removes the glue-like film, destroys decay-germs, and tastes good.)

INSTEAD of dosing your children with castor oil, calomel or cascara when their stomachs are out of order and the bowels clogged up, try giving them a half a pastille of Analax. It tastes like delicious raspberry-flavored gum-drops. Not only is McK & R Analax much better for them but they like it immensely. As a matter of fact, my husband and I like Analax just as much as the kiddies do.



Health is one of the things that money cannot buy.

I found that my druggist carried almost the entire line of "health helps" made by McKesson and Robbins. A few dollars bought the ones I needed. For a few dollars any reliable druggist will supply you, with the health helps you need most. (Note: Miss Adams will be glad to send you a complete list of the articles you should have if you will write her. Room 702, 89 Fulton Street, New York.

The Spirit of Tears

SUNDAY. Psalm 119: 136. "Rivers of water run down mine eyes because they keep not thy law." Here is a man before whose eyes the law of the Lord is blazing in incomparable splendour. In this wonderful Psalm, in all its windings of thought and adoration, the law of God is shining in every verse. There is not a single step in all its long journeyings where the Lord passes out of sight. We are never made to say, "It is gone for a moment, but it will soon return," as though it were a temporarily clouded moon emerging again in the bare heavens. It is always there. It is like as it is in some parts of Switzerland where you can wander for a whole day, and the Matterhorn is never out of sight. "O, how I love Thy law!" His eyes were continually filled with the glory.

And just because the law of God was continually shining before him, he was painfully awake to the presence of lawlessness. That is one of the divine ordinances of life. Refinement in one direction implies a corresponding exquisiteness in another. To be very sensitive to harmony, involves equal sensitiveness to discord. To be alert to the beautiful is also to be startled by the ugly. The great artist has to wear a crown of thorns. To respond to the noble means that one sickens at the shameful. If I glory in the law of the Lord, I must necessarily be deeply troubled when the law is broken. This is the order of life. Fine chords have a two-fold responsiveness, they are the ministers of joy and they are the ministers of pain. To enter into the joy of the Lord is, in some degree, to enter into the sorrows of Gethsemane. There are light and dark sides to the same shield. Morning and evening make the one day.

And therefore I am not surprised that the Psalmist, whose soul is so sensitive to the law of the Lord, who delights in that law, and meditates upon it day and night, should weep when he looks around upon the lawlessness of men. It is like turning the eyes from spiritual order to carnal riot, or from some winged presence, fair and delicate as Ariel, to a coarse and grovelling presence like Caliban. And the Psalmist wept. How could it be otherwise? Josephine Butler was born and bred amid manifold types of order and beauty. Nature spread her glories outside her home; grace spread her glories inside the home. She gazed into the face of her Saviour and adored. And one day she saw the fallen womanhood of her country, and her heart was sick and troubled. "I felt that unless I went into the streets and cried aloud, my heart would break!" The very strength of her faith was the cause of her sorrow. It was because she knew Him in whom she had believed that the wrongs of this blighted sisterhood scorched her soul like fire.

And therefore, "O, for a closer walk with God!" That is the preparation for a more vitally human communion. All our springs are in Him, even the springs of our tears. Our power to weep, with a Crusader's pity, belongs to the manifold power of the Holy Spirit. It is only by seeking a rarer spiritual refinement and a more appreciative realization of the Lord, that our senses will be wakened to the sins and sorrows of the world for which He died. J. H. J.

Christ, the Power of God

MONDAY. 1 Cor 1:24. "Christ the power of God." Only five words but three of them almost as large as any three we can find in the Bible: they are "Power," "Christ" and "God." Today, we know that power is a familiar word, Christ is a great name, and God is being talked about as never before. We have often thought of Christ as the love of God and the wisdom of God, but we have not always conceived Him as the power of God.

Christ is the Power of God as the Revealer of Truth. His very words show His power. His enemies acknowledged that "never man spake like this man." He is the incomparable Teacher of the ages, revealing truths about Sin, Salvation, God, and Immortality.

Christ is the Power of God as the Imparter of Strength. He possessed a God-like power Himself. The winds and waves obeyed Him; demons fled at His touch and even death listened to His command. When we submit Christianity to the test of power, we find that Christ alone had all power both in Heaven and on earth. He has never lost this power, and can still impart His strength to the weak and needy.

Christ is the Power of God as the Source of Comfort. Jesus was the one who showed that God cared not simply for men in general but for man in particular. All the love of the Heavenly Father is revealed in the words and deeds of Christ. The Holy Spirit, who is the Comforter that Christ promised, is present to help, strengthen and keep. If all the world would but turn to Jesus, it would find in Him the Comfort and the Power which it needs today. W. W. B.

A Gospel of Deliverance

TUESDAY. Psalms 74:5. "A man was famous according as he had lifted up axes upon the thick trees." Once men were famous for felling the big cedars of Lebanon in order to build the temple. Enemies and infidels have been renowned for the destruction of what the heroes have founded. To-day, Americans are leading the nations of the earth in laying the axe at the root of the trees of evil. Washington and Lincoln and a host of others gave their lives to strike down the thick trees of oppression and iniquity among the peoples of all the earth. The great foundation principles of patriotism, purity and justice that were incarnated in the hearts of the Pilgrim Fathers are growing everywhere to-day. The upas tree of African slavery fell before these devoted patriots.

The lofty, kingly tree of aristocratic rule which has overshadowed the race for ages, shutting out the sunlight of freedom, has fallen before the axes of democracy. The soil of Europe has been cleared for the development of government by the people and for the people. The banyan tree of intemperance that has extended its roots into every land on the globe, is being cut down by the axes of the army of prohibition. Soon the world will be free from the night shade of the rum power.

A glorious morning has dawned upon the race! The hate of war, the lust for power, all tyrannous rule, is giving way. The fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, the sacrifice of Christ and a world living for one another, is the spirit of the age.

E. W. C.

Glorifying Christ

WEDNESDAY. I John, 1:1. "That which was from the beginning." Scholars tell us that the first written of all Christian documents were Paul's letters to the Thessalonians. In both of them the opening verse couples together "God the Father" with "Our Lord Jesus Christ." To the Galatians, also, Paul wrote of "Jesus Christ and God the Father," thus actually giving precedence on this occasion to the Son; while, to Timothy, the ascription was "God Our Saviour and Lord Jesus Christ."

So absolutely did these, His followers believe that all power had been given to Him, in heaven and earth; so fully did they accept His Word for it, that they preached, not only Christ the Redeemer, but Christ the Creator and Upholder of the Universe. In their earliest anthem there was, perhaps, a distinction drawn between the Almighty and the Holy Child Jesus; and, in Paul's addresses, both to the people of Lystra and to the people of Athens, there was not, in set terms, a reference to the creative work of the Messiah. But, in his epistles—for instance, to the Colossians—he tells us explicitly that "God's dear Son" made "all things that are in heaven and that are in earth, visible and invisible"; indeed, "He is before all things and by Him all things consist." In the hour of death, Stephen so saw Him, standing in the plenitude of His active authority.

The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, like John in his vision, also reveals these surpassing glimpses of Christ in glory. And, so impressed were the disciples with His omnipotent majesty, that they were in danger of forgetting Him as the One Whom they actually heard—saw with their eyes—looked upon and handled. The first heresy to be denounced was not a denial of His Divinity—that aspect shone forth unmistakable—but of His actual, personal humanity. P. W. W.

A PRAYER

By ROBERT CUNNINGHAM MILLER

GOD grant that I may know Thy Will;
My heart goes out in prayer to Thee
That, in the strength Thou givest me
Thy purposes I may fulfill.

God grant that I may know Thy Ways
As best befits a finite mind;
And, e'en in ignorance, may I find
A willingness to trust and praise.

God grant that I may know Thy Love;
In some remote, finite degree,
As Thou hast loved, may I love Thee
And serve Thee as Thy hosts above.

In Name Only

THURSDAY: Rev. 3:15. "I know thy wo that thou art neither cold nor hot." There a those who are rightly known as "nominal Christians They wear the sacred name, but do not honor They are listed in the roll-call of the churches as "me l in good and regular standing." They sit in th pews, and say their prayers, and read their Bibles a observe all the conventionalities of a moral li But between times they are "slackers." Lord, th believe, help thou their unbelief!

When the truth of their religion is called in que tion, do they stand for it? When God's name is pro faned, His word derided, His church assailed, His hol Sabbath turned to secular uses, do they lift up the voices in protest? Do they prove their faith by thei works? When the Lord's armies go forth to mak prisoners of hope from among those who dwell in th regions of darkness and the shadow of death, d they fall into line, or do they cry, "God speed you"

No, these are they that "take no stock in missions." They stand with folded hands in the market-plac while the fields are white unto the harvest.

Will they be saved? That is for the God of salvation to say. Certain it is that they will never go swinging through the gates of Heaven, as veterans with dented shields to receive the service-chevron from the Captain of their salvation; but perhaps as belated laggards, knocking at eventide and crying, "Lord, Lord, open unto us!" D. J. B.

Something Better Than Wealth

FRIDAY: Prov., 22:1. "A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches." These words seem to contradict present theories, for we have almost reached the point in our American life where great riches are rather to be chosen than anything else. Most of us wish we were rich and many of us are working to be rich. The one thing we need to remember now is that there are other things of more value than wealth.

Everyone has a fortune in his character. For we can all be rich in what we are and in what we do for others. A good name is the result of our own exertions. It is not the result of the name our father had, or the good example our mother left. You can inherit it, but you may lose it. The only way you can make it yours is to make it for yourself.

This is a world of struggle, and out in the open men make character and attain the name which is greater than riches.

The question comes, what constitutes a good name? And the answer naturally depends upon our idea of excellence. Among the things of intrinsic moral worth are Truthfulness, Conscience and Faithfulness. These are the things that help us to attain that good name which a man ought to have while he lives, and leave behind when he dies.

Religion is at the bottom of character. We talk about building a character; but character, like everything else, has to have a foundation and religion is the foundation upon which character is built. There can be little goodness without some godliness, and, as McKinley said, "Religion is a good thing for any man to have." W. W. B.

The Invisible is the Real

SATURDAY: II Cor., 4:18. "While we not look at the things which are seen." Driftwood floating by the ship Santa Maria convinced Columbus that he was nearing a new world. So voyagers over life's ocean have been invigorated by the Paradise land breeze, and cheered as they heard the waves breaking on the everlasting shores. Waters we have passed over are gone forever, but God's invisible ocean of love affords an endless "Sailing On."

Historians, scientists and others deal so continually with the things seen that the grander unseen is often obscured. When the eye of faith is opened, the beauty of the invisible swings into vision and fills the horizon with splendor. In our present life, beauty fades, age deforms, winter blasts, war destroys and death removes, till life seems hardly worth living, but when we look up through the sky window, our real life, brilliant with blessing, shines everywhere around us. Our visible deeds are not as lasting as the invisible principle that prompts them.

How narrow the vision that accepts only what it can see. In our little earthly childhood, we see the man that is to be, who, when full grown, will be called to stand with the tallest angels among immortals. Things seen here are but symbols of the unseen, where sorrow, trouble and death never come. Thousands of ages from now we shall know and enjoy what we now believe. In the night of time we may walk in the light of God. E. W. C.

In Wrong Ways—Find Out Your Mistake

Look at Your Teeth Today

Look Again In Ten Days

You Omit the Film

This will reach countless men who clean teeth daily, but who fail to prevent discolorment, tartar and decay.

We ask them to prove a better way—a new, scientific way. And to show their wives and children the result.

A ten-day test will be supplied to every man who asks. And the proof will appear in your mirror.

Film Is What Discolors

You can feel on your teeth a slimy film. It clings to the teeth. It gets into crevices, hardens and stays. And it causes most tooth troubles.

That film is what discolors—not the teeth. It is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. So all these troubles are largely due to the film which is not removed.

The tooth brush, under former methods, leaves much of that film intact. The ordinary tooth paste cannot dissolve it. So millions of teeth brushed daily still discolor and decay. And statistics show that tooth troubles have been constantly increasing.

Dentists long have known the reason, but they could not find an efficient film combatant. Now science has supplied it—a method which all people can every day apply. After convincing tests it has been embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And we ask you to compare the results it brings with the results you are getting now.

How to Prove This

Pepsodent has been proved by authorities in many clinical tests. Thousands of dentists have proved it, and hundreds of thousands of people. The results can be seen, and quickly seen, so there need be no question about them.

They are vitally important. It is believed that they mean a new dental era. So we urge you to find them out, by a simple 10-day test.

The Basis Is Pepsin

Analysis shows that the film is albuminous. Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The object is to dissolve the film, then to constantly combat it.

But this is not so simple as it seems. Pepsin must be activated, and the usual method is an acid harmful to the teeth. So pepsin long seemed impossible.

Pepsodent employs a new discovery—a harmless activating method. Patents have been granted by five governments already. It is that discovery which makes possible this method of fighting film.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Use like any tooth paste. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the slimy film. See how the teeth whiten as the fixed film disappears.

You will quickly see that Pepsodent does what nothing else has done. That difference lies in combating film which the old ways failed to end. And film is the great tooth wrecker.

Let these results show to you and yours the way to safer, whiter teeth. Cut out the coupon so you won't forget.

THE FLOWER OF ROMANCE

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

IT blossomed there in the sunlight, defiantly, almost—a little geranium plant in a cracked flower pot. Against the weather-beaten brick of the window sill it glowed with a certain unmistakable air of triumph. And the flower that it bore seemed redder than any other geranium flower in the world—it seemed to have caught some of its warm color from a sunset cloud or from a girl's laughing lips.

The geranium had seen pitifully few sunset clouds—had seen no great number of laughing girls. For it bloomed on the window sill of a city tenement, and a pale woman kept it alive by bringing cold water to it twice a day in a little tin cup. She had raised it from a slip, she often boasted, a little slip with only one faded leaf upon it. “And,” she was wont to add, “will you look at it now? It's as beautiful as a whole garden!”

Some of the people who lived in the same tenement house thought that the woman was queer.

“What's she know about gardens!” they had a habit of saying. “She's never seen a real garden. Why does she waste any time fussin' wit' an old flower when she might be goin' to th' movies 'r trimmin' over a hat?”

But the woman looked at it very differently.

“No, I ain't never seen a garden,” she once said, very softly, when she was questioned. “But I know that they're somewhere. I know that they're full o' color an' sweetness. I know that birds come to 'em—an' sing. My g'ranium plant (ain't it pretty, though?) is just a sample of other gardens. I don't have to see 'em t' think about 'em an' dream about 'em!”

AND yet a man, a few days ago, told me that romance was dead—that people were too busy to think in terms of beauty and sentiment and chivalry. He told me that people didn't have much time, nowadays, for dreaming dreams and building air castles and playing at make-believe.

We were sitting in his expensive Japanese garden as he told me. It was moonlight, and directly in front of us a little artificial pool lay, like a sheet of silver, at the foot of three curiously twisted fir trees. The iris glowing in clumps were faintly silver too, and from somewhere came the vague perfume of blue oriental lily. And yet the man said, as one stating an indisputable fact:

“Romance is dead! There are no real people who believe in it any more. It's like fairies and Santa Claus—soft stuff for children.”

I looked with appreciative eyes at the garden glimmering like some misty jewel through the dark.

“How,” I questioned at last, “can you make such a statement—when you own this?”

“I paid for it,” he told me. “You'd never guess how many cool thousands a garden like this can cost! I paid for it—and skilled workmen planned it out mathematically and charged me so much per hour for its making. It dresses the house up, doesn't it—adds to the value of the place? But it ain't romance; You can't buy romance.”

And he was right. One can't buy with dollars what the little woman of the tenements, with only a red geranium for a garden, had in her heart.

FOLK say romance is dead, that love and laughter
Are make-believes, that dreams are silly things—
They tell us that the realm of Ever After,
Is only moonshine on a fairy's wings.
They tell us that the knights who rode with lances,
Were quite forgotten many years ago—
They look at us with coldly scornful glances,
And quote their figures at us—but we know.
We know that romance lives on every corner,
We know that love still smiles into love's eyes—
We know that laughter sounds, despite the mourner
Who tells us blandly that all romance dies.
We know that knighthood's brave ideals still live
Triumphant in the folks who give.

THERE'S chivalry, too. Maybe you think, after rush hour in the subway, that it went out of fashion with chain armor and soft velvet shoes and lutes. Maybe after a business conference you come to the conclusion that no knight ever did ride to battle with his lady's favor pinned to his sleeve. But it's not true.

I know a girl who has always wanted to sing. She has the foundation of a good voice and she has the ability to study and to concentrate until that voice might mean something. But she has a younger brother who is going to school and a little, semi-invalid mother who must be taken care of.

And so the girl teaches music lessons. She shows the monotonous scales to small beginners; she guides chubby fingers until they can rattle out chopsticky waltz tunes and the polkas of a yesterday. She works hard at her teaching and does not, aside from the fact that she loves children, find much pleasure in the work.

“But,” she said once, “it's not a hard way to earn money. And we must have money for Jack's education and for mother's doctor.”

“I should think,” I ventured in answer, “that they'd rather hate to accept the sacrifice you're making for them. If you were only a free lance you could study, and then ——”

For only a moment I saw a gleam of wistfulness in her eyes. When she spoke her voice was carefully steady.

“Why, they don't know about any sacrifice,” she told me. “They wouldn't dream of letting me go on helping out if they thought I wanted to—sing. Brother'd work first. And mother would do—she'd take in sewing or boarders. I've never told them that I want to be a singer. I've never mentioned that I don't love my teaching, that it doesn't quite satisfy me. It would make them so unhappy if they guessed . . .”

CHIVALRY dead? I don't think so. Not while girls and boys, not while men and women, all over this land, are giving up dreams, are tumbling beautiful cloud castles in the dust rather than cause unhappiness to others. Not while there are great campaigns going on against poverty and disease. Not while physicians are finding new cures for the body, and ministers of the Gospel are healing sick souls. Chivalry—the air is all a-tingle with the breath of it!

There are people in the world, ever so many of them, who will tell you, as the owner of a certain Japanese garden told me, that romance is a make-believe. There are other people, pitifully many of them, who will assert that folk no longer live by a beautiful creed, that love is a matter of cold-blooded science. They will sew a brown muslin cover over the gayety of the green and gold book; they will, if you let them, take the rhythm away from poetry and the throb out of music. They will—if you let them!

BUT don't you let them. When you feel your faith in miracles wavering—for romance and chivalry and ideals and other beautiful things are the real present day miracles—get away from the sort of people who are likely to put the weight of their disapproval upon the faith that you have. Get far away from them.

That's the first step. The second step, after you've gone far away from them, is to look for the romance and the adventure, and the dream castles that they don't believe in. You'll find every bit that you look for.

You'll glimpse perhaps a little kiddie laboriously spelling out the verses on a valentine. You'll see a girl and a boy stopping in the middle of a city street to pick up a pin, not because they're superstitious but because of the sheer joy of youth that is in them. You'll see a woman waiting in a window for her man to come home through the soft twilight of the day. You'll see a ragged child with the eyes of the baby Christ and an old man and woman perhaps sitting upon a park bench who are quite openly holding hands.

You'll find folk who are making sacrifices for others—there is one of them everywhere that you turn. You'll find folk who are giving up money because they would rather have clean hands instead of dollars. You'll find women who are making gardens on tenement window sills and other women who are making gardens in weary hearts.

Romance is alive and singing. It will never die, not while God gives us scarlet sunsets and pink dawntimes, not while trees come to life after a winter of sleep, not while there are kittens and puppy dogs and flowers and babies in the world.

Romance and chivalry and all the rest of them will never die. Not while red blood runs warm in human veins.

The Rise of the Woman Physician

THERE never was any great prejudice against women entering the commercial world, but when it came to some of the professions they were looked at askance. The first woman who tried to enter the realm of medicine was regarded as having wandered far from her proper field of feminine effort. She was placed in the freak class and was charged with not having a proper degree of feminine modesty, in addition to being impertinent for presuming that it was possible for women to have mentality enough to become physicians. The name of Dr. Elizabeth Blackwell is written large in the history of women in the medical profession. She was the first woman in the United States to receive a medical diploma and it represented years of struggle. She went to Philadelphia in the hope of being admitted to one of the medical schools in that city, but found that all doors were closed to her by reason of her sex. She went abroad in the hope of continuing her studies in some of the schools of Europe. Again she met with strong opposition.

In Paris she was told that if she were allowed to enter one of the medical schools in that city she would have to wear men's clothing. Later she was admitted to one of the medical schools.

Returning to America she opened an office in New York City in 1851. In 1868 she and her sister Emily founded the Women's Medical College of the New York Infirmary.

The oldest Women's Medical College in the land is the Women's Medical College founded in Philadelphia in 1850. Among the first who were to apply for admission was Harriet Hunt of Boston.

The New Car

Three-Point Suspension Springs Give New Riding Comfort on Rough Roads

THE real test of a car is how it stands up over bumps and rough roads.

The new Overland 4, the Four-Door Sedan, is the one car that combines riding ease on all roads with light weight economy and driving ease. In this unusual car, road blows are cushioned; jolts and vibrations are absorbed; sway and rebound are reduced to a minimum.

This results from Overland 4's Three-Point Suspension Springs, the greatest contribution to motoring comfort since the introduction of pneumatic tires.

Overland 4 has a wheelbase of 100 inches. Yet diagonal spring attachment at the ends of a 130-inch Springbase gives it long wheelbase steadiness and balance with light car economy of operation and ease of control.

Three-Point Suspension Springs cushion the car itself against the wear of repeated road blows. Upkeep expense is thus reduced. Tires wear longer. Light weight gives further economy in saving oil and fuel.

Added to these practical advantages are Overland 4's attractiveness and beauty. It has the look of thorough quality, the refined furnishings and pleasing color scheme which make it ideally suited to all occasions and all seasons.

You should see Overland 4 the Four-Door Sedan. Examine its standard equipment. complete from Auto-Lite Starting and Lighting to Tillotson Carburetor. It will arouse your interest and instant appreciation. Overland 4 Touring, $845; Roadster, $845; Sedan, $1375; Coupe, $1325; f. o. b. Toledo.

THE EMPLOYER'S RESPONSIBILITY

By E. P. CORBETT

THE final cure for all forms of unrest, industrial or otherwise, is to insure that every child has the right upbringing—that every child enjoys its God-given heritage of health, training and cation.

ere is where our big employers of labor have a t responsibility on their hands. It rests with them a great extent to determine whether or not the dren of their various communities shall live under right conditions and in the proper environment.

his is true for two reasons. The first is that the loyers determine the rate of pay of the parents of children, and the weekly wage largely rmines what sort of upbringing the dren of a family shall receive. Slum es mean slum life. Low wages mean y nourished children, a miserable e with nothing to make it attractive the going to work of the child at a fully early age in order to eke out the y income.

he second reason why it is true that ployers hold in their hands the future he children is that employers are the uential men of the country. Con- ted interest and action on their part ld take the schools out of politics, e a non-partisan school board and rantee to the rising generation the teaching and the best education ainable.

is an encouraging sign of the awaken- interest in child welfare and the recog- ion of its importance to our country, that some of greatest captains of industry are taking very ctical steps to promote the interests of the children their communities. The name which most readily es to mind when considering this subject, is that John H. Patterson, president of the National Cash gister Company, of Dayton, Ohio. Mr. Patterson an original thinker. He thinks directly to the nt sought. He is not sidetracked by precedent, ch often is merely the mistaken conclusion of he n the early days of the N.C.R. Company Mr. tterson was faced with the problem of the so-called ad boy." The factory was located in what was own as Slidertown, at that time a very undesirable tion of Dayton. It was said that everything bad in yton slid down to Slidertown. The people of the ighborhood lived in tumble down shacks and no rt was made to keep things clean. In the sheds out could be found thieves, gamblers and even rs

As was naturally to be expected, the boys reflected e character of the neighborhood. The coming of N.C.R. factory added a new interest to their lives. ere was constant competition to see who could ak the most windows. When the company erected igh board fence, the boys first broke the fence and en the windows. Something had to be done. At t Mr. Patterson decided to appeal to local pride d to set a good example by cleaning up his own emises and making them more sightly. A landscape rdener was called in, the unsightly fence removed, ass seed sown, flowers and shrubs planted, and the tory buildings painted. But this did not have the sired effect. The boys simply pulled up the flowers d shrubs as fast as they were planted. Then, when ost men would have appealed to the police for pro- ction, Mr. Patterson proved his deep humanity and owledge of human nature. He reasoned that boys not inherently bad, but that most of them are imful of animal energy. That energy must have an tlet, and failing a legitimate outlet, is bound to ex- ess itself in mischievousness and destructiveness. he boys of Slidertown had never been taught to turn eir attention to useful or constructive effort— nsequently they turned their energy into destructive annels which required no effort or training.

Obviously, Mr. Patterson reasoned, the thing to do as to give the boys an object in life; to keep them terested and to lead them to use their energy ward a worthy object. A small house was secured d fitted up as a house of usefulness. The boys were vited to visit it as the guests of the company. They ere suspicious, but came through curiosity. Classes ere formed in wood carving, clay modeling and rawing. The boys became greatly interested and the ovement was a success from the start. Later, classes cooking and sewing were formed for the girls.

However, much as the boys liked the new move- ent, it did not altogether satisfy the natural boy raving for the great outdoors. Then again, Mr. atterson had himself been brought up on a farm, and e wanted not only that the boys should enjoy the bene- t of outdoor work, but that they should have oppor- unity to develop in themselves the creative instinct, nd the love of order, industry, and nature.

A plot of land was secured, cleared and prepared for ardens. The boys were furnished with seeds and ools and set to work raising vegetables, under a com- etent instructor. It was a remarkable fact that those ho had been ringleaders in every mischief among the oys, now became their leaders in the work of the ardens. Responsibility sobered them, and they worked harder for a good cause than they had in the past for a bad one. The garden movement was a huge success. To make a long story short, the movement grew by leaps and bounds. First it was made to include the girls in Slidertown, then neighborhood gardens came in and school gardens started. In fact, it is probable that the school and backyard movement which has spread all over the world had its origin in Slidertown.

> EVERYONE knows the old saying that "the boy is father to the man." But how few there are that appreciate the full significance of that. The world today is aflame—torn and rent with dissension. Yet the very men who are today spreading death and misery throughout many lands, were once innocent, harmless boys. The most bloodthirsty anarchist living undoubtedly thinks his point of view is right. He has a distorted viewpoint, and he got it because as a boy his thoughts were not directed along the right lines. As a man, he is simply a boy gone wrong.

The N.C.R. Company gave illustrated lectures on landscape gardening, and distributed seeds to the people of the vicinity. Soon the neighborhood took on a new look. Fences were done away with and rows of flower-beds separated homes. Slidertown became South Park, one of the show sections of Dayton. The boys organized a company known as the Boys' Garden Company, incorporated under the laws of Ohio. Soon another company was organized. This was the Boys' Box Furniture Company After two years in the gardens the boys are eligible to become members of the Boys' Box Furniture Company, which makes furniture and useful things for the home, as well as doing repair work. The company furnishes the necessary lumber. Both companies are still in existence and each has a waiting list of boys who seek entrance.

The Boy Garden movement was the start of a wonderful system of factory welfare work and community betterment. It is a favorite saying of Mr. Patterson's that "Make the man right and the product will be right." But in his practical application of his own precept, Mr. Patterson has gone a step further back than that and started by making the boys right. Many of the leading officers of the National Cash Register Company are graduates of The Boys' Garden Company. The lessons which they learned in their early days molded their characters and made them so much more valuable in the world that they quickly rose to the top in their chosen work.

Every consideration is paid to the wants and needs of the employees. There are dining rooms for all and good meals are served at less than cost. Every possible safety device is employed to minimize the danger of injury. A beautiful assembly hall, called the Schoolhouse, with a seating capacity of 1,200 is furnished for the use of employees. Each day during the noon hour an interesting program is given. From time to time, when it is possible to secure interesting lecturers, they are brought to the Schoolhouse and talk to the employees, often on the company's time. Elevator service is provided throughout the factory buildings so as to avoid the expenditure of strength in climbing stairs. The old style uncomfortable stool for employees who work sitting down was replaced by the high back chair with foot rest. Each morning and afternoon there are ten-minute rest periods for the women. There is a finely equipped emergency hospital with doctors and nurses in constant attendance. Visiting nurses call on those who are sick. There is also a dental clinic which is open to employees without cost. In addition to this, there are special treatment rooms where competent practitioners give general treatments to those who, while not sick, yet are not feeling quite fit. These treatments embrace almost all forms of drugless healing.

The wash rooms are scrupulously clean and sanitary. Brushes and combs are sterilized daily. The public drinking cup has been abandoned for the modern fountain, and unsanitary roller towels replaced by individual hand towels. Employees are privileged to enjoy two hot or cold baths a week on the company's time. A modern ventilating system is used and the air in all buildings is changed every fifteen minutes.

In the departments where there is considerable dust, exhaust systems carry it all away. In the Polishing Department about nine barrels of metal dust are carried out through the exhaust system each week. A monthly paper is edited by the employees in their own interest, and is printed by the company and distributed to all without charge. There is also an N.C. R. Relief Association.

For the past two years an exceptionally generous profit-sharing plan has been in operation, through which every employee is guaranteed a large proportion of his yearly wage.

In addition to all this, employees have the privilege of enjoying a city club and a country club, both of which are the property of Mr. Patterson. In the city club is a large hall, in which are given regular Saturday evening dances, and other entertainments and also where are held the Owl classes. The Owl classes have been responsible for the rise of many an ambitious N.C.R. man. They teach all branches of business and salesmanship and every employee is encouraged to attend. At the close of the season diplomas are given to those who have completed the various courses. At the country club, known as The Hills and Dales Club, the dues are only one dollar per year, yet the members enjoy all the privileges of the finest country clubs. There is a golf course, tennis courts, etc.

Saturday mornings in the N. C. R. Schoolhouse and at the N.C.R. City Club may be seen interested audiences of children, ranging from six to twelve years of age, eagerly listening to the illustrated talks which are regularly given by the Company. These talks are illustrated by moving pictures and are largely educational and instructive.

Now then, assume that in every community in the United States where work and play was carried on, attention was paid to the children of the neighborhood and their play as well as their work was directed along constructive lines. Is it not certain that the percentage of loafers and worthless men and women would be greatly decreased? If, besides that, in every place of business of any type, the working conditions of employees were made as perfect as possible; they received good pay and a share of the profits; were treated as self-respecting men and women instead of industrial wage slaves; is it not entirely probable that there would be little industrial unrest? Again, if the working conditions in this country were so ideal that all the workers were contented, is it conceivable that there would be any room for the entrance of the Anti-American propaganda of destruction of family.

There is the connection between the boy of today and the man of tomorrow. It comes back to the statement that the boy is father to the man.

A Remedy for Empty Pews

ADVERTISING the Gospel is not a new idea—it goes back to Bible times. Moses, Jeremiah, Amos and other prophets believed in publishing the name and greatness of God and his goodness to the sons of men, and Jesus himself laid it down as a duty for his followers to publish the Gospel among the nations.

In recent years we have seen a good deal of effective Gospel advertising, which resulted in crowding the churches and giving the ministers greatly enlarged opportunities. Bishop Taylor, forty years ago, sang hymns to gather his audiences. Now, we make the music of the printing press draw the multitudes.

Perhaps the greatest Gospel advertising plan yet devised was outlined in a recent address by an army Y. M. C. A. chaplain, Mr. A. C. Fegert, before the church section of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, at a recent session in San Antonio, Texas. Mr. Fegert, who is a business man, told his audience that the Protestant churches of America, with their two billions of invested capital, had thus far made no systematic appropriation toward advertising the Message of Salvation to the millions who never go to church. Only 30 per cent of our population are church goers, he said. In the business world, with such a field open, the opportunity would be regarded as inviting an unusual effort. If the business of 60,000,000 persons is worth bidding for, according to the worldly view, how much more is their spiritual enlightenment worth securing, if an effort by the Church could assure it.

He outlined his conception of a great, nationwide, continuous publicity campaign, not to take the place of the preaching of the Gospel, but to supplement it. Such a campaign, he said, should not merely announce that in certain churches the people would hear good sermons and fine music; the press should set forth succinctly and in the most persuasive terms, the advantages of the Christian life and how it results in blessing to the community as well as the individual. Is there any good and sufficient reason why the pure and desirable things of life should not be benefited by the publicity the press affords? We see in the daily prints worthy enterprises, big moral crusades, great philanthropies carried to success. The honest tradesman finds his reward largely through the same channel. We also see that the press furnishes a tempting field for the profitable promulgation of pleasure, of extravagance and vanity. Once let it be demonstrated that it can be used widely and wisely for the propagation of the Gospel, and it may mark the beginning of a new era in attracting the churchless millions to the Christian life.

THE CONQUEST OF MEXICO BY LOVE

Consecrated Work for the Spiritual Rehabilitation of Our Southern Neighbors United in by Eight Denominations

By H. C. REYNOLDS

Latin-American education seldom pays attention to the proper upbuilding of the body. This "gym" class at Guanajuato shows what the Protestant teachers are doing in the line of physical education.

FORTY-FIVE years ago a fanatical Mexican mob swarmed around the house of a pioneer missionary, John L. Stephens, in the town of Ahualulco. As Stephens climbed to the roof, Bible in hand, the liquor-inflamed peons broke in at both front and rear.

Seeing some members of the town guard in uniform in the crowd, Stephens came down and appealed to them for protection. Almost immediately he was cut to pieces with the blows of machetes, and a Mexican helper, Jesus Islas, together with a blind boy whom Stephens had befriended, met like fates.

What difference between the Mexico of 1874 and the Mexico of today! It is true the government executed eight men and imprisoned fourteen others for life after Stephens' murder, but the activities of men from the States in educating the people, in distributing books, and in preaching a better life were then severely frowned on officially and made slow progress among the populace.

Today sees the American idea making great headway, pushed not by bayonets nor even to any great extent by missionaries, but by the young Mexicans who have obtained their inspiration from training in the mission schools started by Stephens' successors.

The government openly fosters Protestant mission activities. Many leading officials are the boys to whom the American missionaries gave their start in life.

Mexico is trying to rebuild herself after many years of civil conflict more devastating than the war in Europe.

And here is the program of American contribution to this rebuilding:

Eight agricultural schools.

A school of the mechanical arts in every important centre.

A normal school in every district not now possessing one.

A community centre or institutional church in each important centre.

A campaign to popularize medical knowledge.

A union university, a union hospital, and a union publishing house, weekly newspaper and bookstore in Mexico city.

That is the plan of the mission boards of eight American Protestant evangelical denominations.

In addition, the American Protestant Episcopal church and the Northern and Southern Baptists, who have not yet joined in the union agreement, are gathering large funds through special campaigns and will do their share for the rejuvenation of our next-door neighbor.

Is not this better than battering Mexico into submission and then attempting to improve her civilization?

Protestant missions have an investment of $2,000,000 in Mexico. The new projects call for many times this sum. The union university in Mexico City alone will mean $5,000,000.

But what is this compared with $200,000,000, the lowest possible figure given for what intervention in Mexico would cost!

And in lives lost, either American or Mexican in the process!

The influence of the missions is seen in the development of the play instinct in the Mexican children. These little girls are playing "ring-around-a-Rosy" at the Puebla district institute.

A group of Mexican Exhorters who attend the Methodist Episcopal Institute at Puebla.

The Methodist Episcopal hospital at Guanajuato is the only hospital in an area two hundred and fifty by four hundred miles with a population of 1,100,000. Its opportunity for service to humanity would be hard to surpass. Such is the intervention that is actually going on in Mexico, while editors and propagandists and politicians speculate over the morality or immorality of "going down and settling the thing once for all."

The program outlined above is being pushed by the Committee on Co-operation in Mexico, and part of the funds to carry through the work, especially the union projects, undoubtedly will come from the Interchurch World Movement of North America. The latter is founded on the idea of getting the churches to co-operate in all fields, as they have done with such striking success in Mexico.

Eight denominations co-operating there have entered what is known as a comity agreement, by which they divide up the territory so that their efforts do not conflict. The Congregationalist organization is responsible for 1,880,000 persons; Methodist Episcopal South, 1,610,000; Friends, 285,000; Disciples of Christ, 1,005,000; Associate Reform Presbyterians, 550-000; Methodist Episcopal, 3,900.000; Northern Presbyterian, 2,125,000 and Southern Presbyterian, 3,050,000. Mexico City is common ground.

If any one belittles the efforts of missions in Mexico, let him step into Epigmenio Velasco's Methodist Episcopal church in Calle Gante, Mexico City. There he will find the largest congregation in any church, Protestant or Catholic, in the capital.

He will immediately notice the large proportion of men, if he has any knowledge of Latin-America, for in almost any capital south of the Rio Grande you can canvass all the churches of a Sunday morning and not find over a dozen men at devotions.

The Gante church has a pastor and ten assistants, all Mexicans. The minister is a full-blooded Mexican Indian. His fame as a preacher is wide spread. And right here is the place to note the Methodist Episcopal Church with all its splendid enterprises in Mexico only has six missionaries from the home base. This does not look exactly like forcing something on the Mexican!

Missions in Mexico mean a clean uplifting religion, but they mean something more than that. Here is one thing, in the words of Dr. Harrry Farmer:

"For many years our work was at a standstill. The common people were so held down and so browbeaten that we could not get at them.

"Then came the revolution. The peon found a new dignity. No one can kick a peon today if he doesn't want to be kicked!

"But the peon is a bit demoralized. He thinks that revolution is the only way to get a thing he wants.

"We have got to show him he can get things in other ways. We have got to teach him the real meaning of Democracy."

With the revolution and the freer life has come a new approachableness on the part of the Mexicans.

Before the upset, one family owned 21,000,000 acres in Chihuahua and proprietors owned nine tenths of the farming property in Morelos.

No Compromise in the Coal Strike

COMPROMISE proposals to end the strike by the bituminous co miners have been rejected, the national and district leaders of th workers are restrained by federal court order from directing advising the men in the conduct of the strike, and everythin points to a prolonged struggle between miners and operators. Samu Gompers, as head of the American Federation of Labor, made the las effort to effect a compromise. Characterizing the restraining order directe against the miners' leaders as "not only a great wrong but a gross blunder, he said he was confident an agreement for a reopening of negotiations coul be reached if the government would consent to vacate the court orde John A. Lewis, Acting President of the United Mine Workers of America says the machinery for negotiation is still intact and will function if th court's hand is withdrawn. Attorney General Palmer refused to act t withdraw the order.

The Federal Courts at Indianapolis enforced its injunction to the extent of commanding the miners' leaders to order the strike off. This wa complied with so far as the leaders had power.

Washington continues to see a chance to bring the walkout to an end but just what methods have been devised for the purpose have not been disclosed. In the meantime, the first week of the strike has shown complete solidarity between the miners and all organized labor. Approximately 425,000 men have deserted the pits and in only a few minor fields have any of them returned to work. It is agreed among the operators that there are no material breaks in the ranks of the men and on the other hand the operators thus far have made no attempt to resume work in the pits with non-union labor. The United States Coal Administration, acting under provisions of the Lever Food Control law, has tightened its hold on the coal above ground and is strictly adhering to the priority rules put into force the day before the strike was declared. With three to four weeks reserve supply in sight and with careful distribution the pinch of want, up to this time, has been felt nowhere.

As the newspapers see the situation, the gravest danger now lies in the attitude of the great body of union labor toward the miners. Organized wage earners have resented the government's call on the courts to enforce what they insist is "government by injunction." Unqualified support is given to the mine workers by all the organizations affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, in many instances this active support being the admitted outgrowth of distrust originating in the disbandment of the National Industrial Conference. The collapse of the conference also had another and immediate effect in that the A. F. of L., heretofore lukewarm in its support of the steel strike, has come out openly in favor of the steel workers and is conducting a strong campaign for funds with which to aid the strikers.

MRS. JEAN NORRIS

Mrs. Jean Norris, the first woman i New York state to be named to the bench is wearing her judicial robe. Sh was appointed a city magistrate i New York City and is sitting in th Woman's Court and the Court o Domestic Relations.

The International Labor Conference in session in Washington, and in which employers are represented, has struck its first snag in a disagreement over the eight hour day. While the principle of the forty-eight hour week is accepted, the employers oppose the designation of a maximum number of working hours a day. They prefer to make the week the standard while the workers insist on the day, basing their demand on the possibility of an employer requiring his employes to work forty-eight hours in two or three days unless there is some restraint on him. Despite this disagreement it i regarded as probable that the conference will work out an international eight-hour day program to which all countries signatory to the treaty of peace and the league of nations covenant will subscribe.

The November Elections

EFFORTS are being made by liquor interests to attribute the election of Edward I. Edwards, democrat, as governor of New Jersey to his pronounced "wet" sympathies. During the campaign newspapers quoted Edwards as favoring a "New Jersey as wet as the Atlantic Ocean." The liquor issue, however, is not generally regarded as having any great influence on the result. His election is attributed largely to traction and other public service difficulties in the state where one corporation has a monopoly of all the public services. Increased fares on electric railways especially have caused discontent and in some places serious rioting.

The result of the election in Massachusetts was a distinct victory for law and order as enforced by Governor Calvin Coolidge, Republican, who was re-elected over his democratic opponent, Richard H. Long, by about 125,000. A bitter fight was waged against Coolidge because of the stern measures he used to suppress the policemen's strike in Boston early in the fall.

While in a few sections the election involved some national questions, in the main the issues were purely local and no attempt was made to obtain either endorsement or repudiation of President Wilson's handling of federal problems. Governor James D. Black of Kentucky, however, made the League of Nations one of the issues in his campaign and was defeated by Edwin P. Morrow, Republican, by about 20,000.

One of the most interesting results of the election in New York State was the choice of Lieutenant Colonel Theodore Roosevelt as a member of the assembly, by the largest plurality ever given to a Republican in the Oyster Bay district.

Fresh Coffee? Fresh Coffee Pot!

WHEN the insides of coffee and tea pots become discolored and "rimmed" with deposits and the spouts become clogged, you will never have coffee and tea at their best. Here is a good recipe for always fresh coffee and tea pots: Place a teaspoonful of Gold Dust in the pot, fill almost full with cold water. Let come slowly to a boil. If badly stained allow to boil slowly for a few minutes. Pour out part of water and scrub with small brush or dish mop. Because Gold Dust so thoroughly cleanses—so completely rinses out—it makes the insides of the pots absolutely pure and sweet. (Adv.)

The Christian Herald Bible Course

Lesson IV. The Tower of Babel and Its Later Significance. Read Genesis 10 and 11.

WE are moving swiftly in this first series of lessons, with their significant and far-reaching events; but the ground will be covered again in other ways as the Course proceeds.

You have doubtless fixed in your mind that the first great outline fact of the Bible is Creation, the second the Fall of Man, and the third the Deluge.

Concerning the last, please look again more attentively at the conclusion of chapter 4. The last clause of verse 26 seems to indicate that the world at that time was divided into two kinds of worshippers, men of faith, the Sethites, and men of the world, the Cainites.

It is the generation of the latter that is given in chapter 5, and for the purpose of leading up to the story of Noah, who was a descendant of Seth.

One is struck with the longevity of men in those days, which was a means of preserving a knowledge of God in the earth, since tradition could thus be handed down for centuries from father to son.

Observe that neither the Enoch nor the Lamech named in chapter 5 are the same as those named in chapter 4. See what Heb. 11:5 and Jude 14 say about this Enoch.

What do the opening verses of chapter 6 indicate about an apostasy among the Sethites, as well as the Cainites? There are mysteries in those verses which we must reserve for subsequent instruction.

What two charges does God make against the earth in verses 12 and 13? The Christian Worker's Commentary says that the geometric cubic may be meant (verse 15), which is six times the common cubic of 18 inches, so that the ark would be as large as some of our ocean liners. It also says that the ark in all its three stories,. contained probably 100,000 square feet of space.

The sevens of clean beasts (7:2) were doubtless for sacrifice in the ark and after leaving it. Verses 19-23 of chapter 7 seem to teach the universality of the deluge.

"Ararat" (8:4) is rendered "Armenia" in 2 Kings 19:37 and Isaiah 37:38.

Notice the magisterial functions now bestowed on man for the first time (9:5, 6).

How does the closing part of chapter 9 indicate that the deluge did not wash away man's sin?

What are the prophecies pronounced by Noah on his sons? Which son of Ham is singled out for the curse? Just why, we do not know, but it is significant in the light of the subsequent history of the Canaanites.

Note that the Jews, and hence Jesus Christ, came down in the line of Shem, and that the European peoples for the most part, came from Japheth. A study of the next chapter in the light of ancient geography helps to establish this. Examine map number 1 in the back of your Bible.

The new lesson presents us with another great crisis in the history of the world, the effects of which are still felt today, and also will enter into the crisis of judgment at the end of this age (see Revelation, chapters 17 and 18).

Chapter 10 has been spoken of as the most important historical document in the world, for it is more than a mere list of individuals' names. Tribes, families and nations are referred to with few, if any exceptions, other than that of Nimrod (8-11). The land of Shinar, where his kingdom—the first world-monarchy—was begun, is identical with that named Babel, or Babylon, in chapter 11.

What a large place this same Babylon holds in the political and religious history of the race, will be developed as we proceed; but the chapters in Revelation mentioned above will afford some hint of it. See also Isaiah 13 and 14, Jeremiah 27 and Daniel 2.

The contents of Chapter 11 seem to precede in time those of chapter 10. In chapter 10 we are told how the nations were divided, but in chapter 11 we are told why they were divided.

This chapter and this lesson bring to an end God's third experiment with the fallen race. Men had again turned their backs on God, forgetting the terrible lesson of the flood, and therefore, with the confounding of their speech, He delivered them up to the lusts of their own hearts (Rom. 1:28).

In our next lesson we reach the fourth experiment, which shall not ultimately be the failure which the others proved.

Now follows a list of questions with the use of which you are expected to review the four lessons, and from which a certain number will be sent you through the mail, which you will be expected to answer in view of the certificate to be obtained at the close of the Course.

Questions.

1. What is the object of this Course of Bible Studies?
2. What pedagogical mistake is sought to be avoided?
3. Have you read the Bible text of a lesson every day since the Course began?
4. What four rules of study were laid down in lesson i?
5. Can you give from memory the substance of 2 Peter 1:21: and John 15:13?
6. Try to recite from memory the order of the six days work of Creation.
7. Have you a Bible with marginal references and maps?
8. What does Genesis 1:1 teach concerning matter?
9. What is meant by "Pre-Adamites?"
10. What is the meaning of the words "waters" and "firmament" in Genesis 1?
11. For what purpose were sun, moon and stars created?
12. What hint of the doctrine of the Trinity does lesson 1 suggest?
13. What leads to the belief that man has a threefold nature (Gen. 2)?
14. What in the same chapter proves that he has a free moral choice?
15. Can you give Scriptural proof for the identification of the serpent with Satan?
16. Did you read I John 2:16?
17. Who are intended by the seed of the serpent and the seed of the woman?
18. Can you name the four great facts of chapter 4?
19. Do you see the bearing of Hebrews 11:4 and 9:22 on the acceptance of Abel's sacrifice?
20. Name the four great outstanding facts of Genesis 1 to 11.
21. What particular value is attached to the early longevity of men?
22. Did you read Hebrews 11:5 and Jude 14?
23. What magisterial function was bestowed on man in Genesis 9?
24. In what line of Noah came Jesus Christ?
25. Who apparently established the first world monarchy, and where?
26. What is the substance of Revelation 17 and 18?
27. What distinction do you see as to the reasons for chapters 10 and 11 of this lesson?
28. Speaking after the manner of men, how many experiments has God now made with the race?
29. Quote from memory Roman 1:28.
30. Are you working for the Christian Herald Certificate?

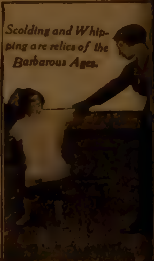
The New Method Places Confidence as the Basis of Control.



Scolding and Whipping are relics of the Barbarous Ages.

Right and Wrong Methods in Child Training

Many loving parents with the best interests of th children at heart have worked irreparable harm throug the use of old haphazard methods of child trainin Unknowingly they commit crimes against their childre almost daily, due to a lack of any concrete, scienti method for handling disobedience, wilfulness, untruthfulness and the hundred other damaging traits that a apt to wreck a child's life. Harsh punishments an angry words simply drive bad traits deeper and pav the way for later and greater faults

But now a new method of child training has supe seded the old and the immediate and permanent r sults are nothing short of marvelous.

BASED ON CONFIDENCE

Under this new system children grow up in comrad ship with their parents. A loving mutual respect gov erns each word and act. Youthful ideas are built an strong little characters moulded. The child remai forever free from such traits as disobedience, jealousy, fear and deceit. The true confidence that parents win from their children under this better method smoothes out every tendency to rebellion, to evasion and to many bad qualities that develop so quickly and easily in children

Do You Know How---
- to instruct children in the delicate matters of sex?
- to always obtain cheerful obedience?
- to correct mistakes of early training?
- to keep child from crying?
- to develop initiative in child?
- to teach child instantly to comply with command. "Don't touch"?
- to prevent quarreling and fighting?

These are only a few of the hundreds of questions fully answered.

HIGHEST ENDORSEMENTS

This new system, which has been put into the form of an illustrated Course prepared especially for the busy parent is producing remarkable and immediate results for thousands of parents in all parts of the world, and is also endorsed by leading educators. It covers all ages from cradle to eighteen years

Jesus Teaches Peter True Greatness

ternational Sunday School Lesson for November 30, 1919.
John 13:1-16 and 36-38.

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

HOW often Jesus had to rebuke his disciples for their selfishness and pride! Again d again we find Him trying to ach them the true greatness of rvice, the dignity of ministering others. They were not worse an other men, not worse than His esent-day followers. It is the ntrast with His wondrous humil- and selflessness that makes eir failure look more glaring than us.

Such a contrast we have in this ene from John's heart-moving count of the incidents of the st Supper. It is a striking objectsson, an acted parable. It is quite ely that on their varied journeygs it had been customary for one another to perform the lowly e of washing the dusty and aching feet of his comrades. They had en disputing with one another as which was the greatest, so when ey entered the Upper Room of e house of Jesus' friend in Jerulem, they sat about stiffly aloof om one another, each pointedly noring the pitcher of water and e towel hanging by the door. ach was too proud to stoop to so wly a task and this manifestation folly was on the night which was be the last feast of comradeship th the Son of God!

With quick understanding Jesus ticed the situation. Girding mself after the manner of a houseve, He filled the basin, and then ing from one to another, refully washed their feet. How hamed they must have been, yet ey dared not say one word, until came to bluff, outspoken Peter. Thou shalt never wash my feet,'' ied the apostle drawing back. ith gentle tone Jesus rebuked m, "If I wash thee not, thou hast part with me.'' Peter realized ickly the ungraciousness of his rds. "Lord,'' he cried in sudden bmission, "not my feet only t also my hands and my head.''

What a contrast, again, there verses 3 and 4: "Jesus knowing at the Father had given all things to his hands, and that he was me from God, and went to God,'' shed His disciples' feet! Eternal, t He stooped to lowliest service; vine, He was still the readiest to w Himself to the earth.

TOUCHY people, conscious of their real unworthiness, are ways afraid to stoop. The truly eat never think of being ashamed serve. It does not lower Lincoln our estimation to read the story his first visit to Washington, here he ran across a girl in tears cause it was traintime, and the pressman had not called for her unk. The tall rail-splitter at ce flung the trunk upon his shoulr and walked with her to the ilroad station. Some one was in ouble and he could help,—it never curred to him to be ashamed to seen in such an attitude. Dr. uhlenburg, the prominent rector a great church, was visiting St. uke's Hospital one day, when there emed to be a shortage of helpers. izing a tray he went about the uty of carrying their luncheons to rious patients. Someone was ncerned about the matter and gan to apologize, but he answered, I am glad to be a waiter in the ord's hotel!" In Donald Hankey's ook written from the trenches, he as a chapter on "The Beloved aptain" that is worth rereading a modern parallel of our lesson ory. This fine aristocratic officer could be humble without loss of gnity" and often tended the stered feet of the common soliers most tenderly. "There was in our eyes something almost religious about this care for our feet. It seemed to have a touch of Christ about it.''

Let us ask ourselves fairly this question, "Am I ashamed to be seen doing some lowly service for another?'' One of the finest American poems about Christlikeness represents the Master as saying,

> "I walked with the beggar along the road,
> I kissed the bondsman stung by the goad,
> And I bore my half of the porter's load."

Would we dare to do any of these things?

There are two conceptions, then, of greatness, the heathen one of "great ones who lord it over them and exercise authority upon them," and the Christian conception "whosoever will be great among you shall be your minister and servant of all." In government, there is the old despotic notion of a monarch dominating over his subjects and the new democratic idea of a "chief servant" elected to serve the common citizenship of a free nation. In industry, there is the plutocratic ideal of a man who corners markets and compels myriads to toil for his gain, and the stewardship of the man of talents, who affords useful occupation to thousands and organizes production for the supply of human need. In the Church itself, there is the ecclesiastical conception of priest and prelate as princes of the church and lords of the flock, and the Gospel conception of "ministers" who are "pastors," that is, shepherds who feed and care for the sheep.

MARTIN LUTHER, in the same tract in which he set forth so gloriously "The Freedom of a Christian Man," rightly placed on an equal plane the corresponding obligation of a true disciple to be "subject to all and a servant of every one." Now we seem to have come to a time when men forget that every privilege has a corresponding obligation. They are insistent on their rights but careless of their duties. During the Great War we seemed to be learning to think less of our rights and more of our responsibility for the common good. It became a disgrace to take without giving, to be idle, to be a consumer and not a producer of something worth while. The reaction has come and heathen ideals of life threaten to dominate once more. America needs to emphasize the dignity of service, and the disgrace of a life that does not minister to the common good.

The character of Jesus makes the act of washing the travel-stained feet of His comrades a beautiful thing, that touches human hearts and makes that page of the Gospel of John precious. If foot-washing can be transfigured into a "sacrament of service," so can dishwashing or any other lowly thing. Red Cross women of refinement do not lower themselves by bathing little war-orphans, nor helping tired, discouraged mothers in a storm-swept American city. Yet somehow we have kept the word servant on the heathen plane. Many girls would die rather than to go in service. It has become a social disgrace for young women of refinement to choose housework as an occupation. Hence we have a servant-problem. Has our lesson any bearing on this matter? Is it less dignified in Christ's eyes to care for children and serve a family in a home than to sell goods in a shop?.

> "Who sweeps a room as for His sake > Makes that and th'action fine."

"My Throat Hurts"

YOUR physician will tell you that sore throats are due to germs which children catch from one another in school or at play—that the germs multiply quickly if the child happens to be a little run-down, causing swelling and inflammation, and frequently tonsillitis, measles, etc. Formerly we tried to subdue these germs by means of gargles, but the modern physician advises the use of

Formamint

THE GERM-KILLING THROAT TABLET

Mothers will hail with joy these pleasant-tasting tablets which are ever so much more convenient than the painful gargle. Formamint is simply sucked like candy. As it melts, it sets free a powerful, harmless germicide which mixes with the saliva and thus continuously bathes the inflamed parts, destroying germs and arresting their spread, thereby often preventing serious infection.

Children like Formamint Tablets because of their delightful taste, and for grown-ups and children alike, they are a welcome protection against infections that enter the body through the mouth and throat—influenza, for example. During epidemics, Formamint should be in every household. Medical authorities, both here and in Europe, strongly endorse Formamint. Over 5,000 American physicians have recommended it in writing. 50 tablets for 50 cents at all good druggists.

DO YOU HAV

DOES this title sound impertinent? How common i custom nowadays of daily family devotions? It w be well nigh impossible for the editor of this magazine, to termine the statistics. Well, at any rate, they are known God. That most people, even the careless and the grievo sinful, utter a few words of prayer every day, must be t Perhaps that prayer may be sent up to heaven through medium of a phrase that is read in the newspaper, a book, magazine. It is significant that one of the best five journals the country prints a Scripture passage every day on the e torial page. We note how often a Bible test occurs in the c umns of the so-called sensational press. It may be that ma father who no longer goes to church is glad not only to have children say their prayers at bedtime, but to be present d ing that tender and touching little devotion and to take p in it. But by family prayers of course is meant especially t worship by the family as a unit.

AMONG my best boy friends in the big city were the sons of a university dean, a man well known in the scientific world. I first met the H's at their mountain cottage, and never a morning came, when I was their guest, that the Professor failed to have us all, the servants included, come into the living room after breakfast for prayers. I can see now that kind, bearded face. No doubt we three boys fidgetted, and had our minds somewhat on the tennis court, the bowling alley, and the swimming-hole, but we listened, in our own way, and got down on our knees, and joined in the Lord's Prayer and the Apostles' Creed. Often I was entertained overnight at the H's city home, at a season when the Professor was driven hard by his university duties, but family prayers went on, just the same. The H's were not only fond of each other, but they really liked to do things together—prayers, reading, lectures at the Natural History Museum, walks, games, indoors and out, and the boys, by their own vote, attended their father's Sunday School class, and helped him take up the collection at Church.

The H's had another pleasant custom of being read to aloud after supper by the head of the house. We boys were not bored by the reading. There is always a fascination about hearing something read aloud. The story gains in power and color, somehow, when one is not distracted by the type. At this very moment, I would like nothing better than to throw myself down on the rug, before the fire (which happens to be a steam-pipe), and have some old friend read to me for at least two hours. With most of us grown-ups, being read to is a rare occurrence; perhaps we are night workers, or get home late from work; yet I sometimes come across individuals who are all sitting together after supper, and doing nothing in particular, when some one might just as well be reading aloud. The children who are studying their lessons won't mind. They are used to interruptions. The monks have a way of appointing a reader for dinner and supper. He sits in an informal pulpit, and all the other Fathers and Brothers keep quiet (unless they are eating from pewter dishes). This is rather a clever scheme to stifle gossip, and prevent what has been termed "the carving up of one's neighbors with the roast."

I often think of the dear H's and thank God that I should have known them. The Professor has gone on. I presume that he is either reading to the angels, or they to him. The H's were people of the world, in the best sense, i.e., they were "in" it, but not "of" it, as our Lord said. Both of the parents came of fine old families and were brought up in comfort, and they might easily have fallen into the habit of being polite to almost everybody except the Divine Master; but they did not forget Him. I can see that more plainly as the years go on. He was always their "Unseen Guest"—their "honored guest"—more than th their beloved Companion, for wh a "best room" was always ke ready.

LAST summer I saw again for t first time since my return fr France my dear friend A., a curl haired real estate man who spen his winters in a well known city the Hudson. He has entertain me many times, both at his c and his country places. Perhaps ought to say "they," for he has charming wife and six interesti children, the oldest a boy of abo seventeen. The first time that was the guest of the A's they we spending the summer in a fun little bungalow off in the wood The garage had recently burn down, and altogether it was ve good of them to have me. Mr. and the boys slept on the porch in long, military line, In spite of a the confusion from living in a cotta that was not much larger than th historical shoe (the oldest boy w then only twelve), we had praye every day after breakfast as a matte of course. The children squirme and snuffled, and gurgled, an breathed hard, as children do, bu they offered not the slightest obje tion to taking part.

On Sunday morning we motore to a schoolhouse service. In th afternoon A. took his older boys t one of the porch and taught the questions and answers concernin the Christian religion, and the showed them Bible pictures and rea to them.

I give A. special credit for his keep ing alive the fire of devotion in hi family, because it is a large an unusually restless one, he himsel is of an irritable disposition, and hi real estate business takes up a grea deal of time. His manner, when h he is officiating as lay priest of th home altar, is full of sincerity an simplicity. His voice goes plea santly down a key or so, and lose its usual rasping quality. Mor than once when I have knelt wit the A's I have felt shamed an rebuked to acknowledge that unde far less difficult circumstances I have so often been remiss in my own private devotions.

I have always liked the anecdote that my aunt gave me of a family whom she used to visit when she was a little girl. The youngsters all behaved pretty well at the night devotions with the exception of one small boy. Right in the middle of the long, extempore prayer by Mr, Q. there came an exploded giggle. Mr. Q. paused. There was another giggle, the sound of a large hand coming in contact with the aforesaid boy, then stifled weeping, and the prayer went on leisurely to its conclusion. I like this tale because it shows that religion meant something to the Q. family. I do not suppose that Mr. Q. considered that his little son had committed a serious fault; butthe took immediate advantage of an excellent chance to teach him that there is such a thing as reverence. Sometimes when I ick up a copy of one of our clever omic weeklies, and note that they lace no limit upon their girding t the elementary facts of religion, wish that the editors might have een more thoroughly spanked at an arlier epoch in their careers; or ven now, a carefully chosen com-ittee of readers might wait on hem in the front office.

Several years before the Great War, I was shown through the omestic apartments of Warwick astle. The hall, the minstrel allery, and the armor of the gigan-ic Guy Kingmaker, were an unfor-ettable luxury for the eye and mem-ry but what I liked best was the rivate chapel, with its evidences of requent use, such as the well-worn rayer Books. How many, many rayers had winged to heaven from hat place! Surely there must be ruth in the saying that holy places ave a personality of prayer!

At a Swiss hotel, during the same ourney, I met a French peer, the omte De Chaumont-Quitry, who ad with him an old Abbé, a chap-ain, with a fine spiritual face, who cted as tutor for the young heir, ndalso provided daily devotions for he family, even when they were way from Paris on a pleasure trip n the mountains. The Christian oblesse oblige of the Comte was ob-ervable in his atmosphere of kind-ess and benevolence. He would ever sit down to his coffee before e had shaken hands with every ne in the room, and asked after heir health; and noting that my American friend K., was suffering rom a carbuncle, he asked if he might have the honor of dressing t, since he had once studied surgery.

I have often wondered why more American families who live on anches, and farms, and in isolated places, and are deprived of the min-istrations of a clergyman except on are occasions, do not set apart one little room for the family chapel. Here would be hung the choicest holy pictures. Here the household would gather daily for a quarter of an hour to praise the good God, to thank Him, to express sorrow for shortcomings, to implore His for-giveness and to interceed for speci-fic persons and objects. Even the little children could be taught to jot down the names of persons and places for which prayers could be made. Nor would the leader omit to pray for all poor sinners, and all persons who have none on earth to pray for them. We sometimes have a tendency to be selfish and local in our supplications.

What a good plan it would be for a counry householder to find some dear, mellow old retired pastor who would be only too glad to spend the rest of his days as the honored guest of the family, give a daily ser-vice and act as a beloved counsellor in matters of the spirit. Who is more worthy of our affection and confidence than a holy, aged pastor, ripe in the loving wisdom that has grown from a closer and closer union with the Sacred Heart of Jesus? Such a man is himself nothing less than a prayer.

I SPENT my own happy childhood in a great city with fascinating women relatives who were profession-al writers and painters. And my mother could both sing and play excellently. People of this sort are popularly supposed to be rather careless in their religious duties, but these women happened to be truly devout, and night prayers was an accepted part of the daily program. Nowadays, whenever I return for a brief visit with these dear souls, they ask me to conduct the family prayers, but I always decline in favor of the familiar figures of the days that have gone; and it seems to me that I would be in the same mood, even though I happened to be either a Methodist Presiding Elder, a Presbyterian Moderator, an Anglican Bishop, or the Titular Archbishop of Nicomaedia! I likewise prefer that my relatives should continue to say grace at table. The favorite prayer with them is: "Lord, bless this food to our use, and us to Thy service. Amen." I like also the custom which some people have of closing the meal with the words: "For these and all his other benefits, God's Holy Name be praised." A friend of mine adds to the closing prayer this commendation: "And may the souls of the departed, through the mercy of God, rest in peace. Amen".—a prayer that is often on the lips nowadays of those who have lost loved ones through the Great War.

I KNOW a pastor who formerly worked among the Canadian Indians, but is now settled in a conventional neighborhood of white Americans. Whenever I have visited the C's I have witnessed an affecting series of bed-time adieux. Always before they say "Good night," the two fat, bouncing and vivacious girls, and the slender, sedate, and dignified little boy kneel for their father's blessing, and then ask it of any other clergyman who may be in the house.

Is family prayer becoming a thing of the past? Has it nothing to do with us impulsive, careless, money-making, and money-losing Americans? Does it pay to leave out God or give him the leavings of our energy and our fatigue? The majority of my friends, rich and poor, do not seem to have family prayers; and I know of Christian homes—"Churchgoing families,"—who say no grace before meat except when the pastor is present. But I do recall one delightful family in which each member, including all of the children, take turns at the asking of the blessing upon food. In this household the favorite grace is:

"Be present at our table, Lord.
Be here and everywhere adored.
These mercies bless, and grant that we May feast in Paradise with Thee.
Amen."

One little chap, disappointed at not seeing a viand which he had hoped for, prayed after this fashion: "Lord, we thank You for all these good things to eat, although You know we haven't any honey on the table today."

Last night I came across these sentences: "Religion is necessary to the home. A house where we merely lodge and eat together is not a home; and a home, though it may have all things else—love, friendship, comfort, refinement—does not fulfil its true idea unless the influence of real religion is adequately there. To preserve family life from decay, to give strength and beauty to the domestic relations, to bind the home together and make its circle a unit and a source of elevating influence, nothing helps so much as simple and sincere devotional usages and habits." (J. Hastings: "Great Texts of the Bible.")

I have heard of a good mother who would often break off her prayers and spiritual readings to help her husband and children. One day, according to the legend, in trying to recite the Psalms, she was called away four times just as she was beginning a particular verse. "On returning for the fifth time," goes the old Italian chronicle, "she found the verse written upon the page in letters of gold. Beautiful lesson both for those who whould turn from their prayer to work, and those who would turn from their work to prayer."

ounces. This total of imports does not include the Korean crop, and the shipments of Manchurian and Persian opium to a very large extent do not appear in the customs records for the reason that they are transshipped in the harbor of Kobe without entering the port. Most of this supply ultimately finds its way through Tsingtao into Northern China.

American government agents have been much interested in the development of the Japanese opium and morphia trade with China, and the state department files and the files of the consulates provide frequent comments on the business. In an official report made in September, 1918, on Japanese administration of Tsingtao and the improvements made at the port, is found this reference:

"Known sources of revenue are: (1) 20 per cent of the duty collected; (2) land taxes; (3) business and vehicle taxes; (4) income from public utilities, i. e., railways, mines, electric light, water works, etc. A source of income whose amount has been variously estimated at from $700,000 to several millions per annum, is the importation under Japanese government license of opium."

ANOTHER American consular report, dated July, 1918, reads:

"Regarding morphia and its by-products, it is always possible for the lowest class of Chinese laborers to purchase an injection from any so-called Japanese drug store at a price from 3 to 5 copper cents, say from 1½ to 2½ American cents. In this way the Japanese have accentuated the scarcity of copper coins, and at the same time have ruined many of the lowest class mentally, morally and physically.

"From the stringent orders issued by the Japanese consular authorities regarding the sale of illicit drugs by Japanese subjects it would seem that the authorities in question are not desirous of complying with the wishes of the Chinese authorities in eradicating the opium evil, but their desire is simply to hoodwink the world and go through the motions of suppressing the evil. The fact that opiates are sold openly on Japanese premises which are not under Chinese jurisdiction proves conclusively that the Japanese authorities are not at all anxious to co-operate with China and Great Britain in eliminating the drug evil."

Less than a year ago, Prof. Upton Close, a well known American educator, conducted a survey of conditions in Shantung. In an article published on January 18, 1919, in Millard's Review, of Shanghai, Professor Close said:

"We have now to consider the morphia trade which, although not confined exclusively to Japanese, is inseparable from their penetration and occupation. It may well be questioned what reasons for official Japan allowing its nationals to institute this traffic are sufficiently weighty to justify their running the gauntlet of the public opinion of the world. The writer would suggest the following three reasons:

"1. The profit which, in the absence of real commercial enterprise, finances 'peaceful penetration.' It is a matter of public knowledge in Tsingtao that the profit from the drug traffic has supplied the funds for the campaign of wholesale buying of everything purchasable, the immense building program, and the support of the artificial population.

"2. The poisoning and weakening of the Chinese nation from its official classes down, making it an easy prey to the aggressor.

"3. The unbreakable hold gained on the official class through the narcotic who become bound by a slavery stronger than steel fetters to their Japanese drug-providers, and can be swayed or induced to give secrets. These fetters are faste by two locks: first, the habi ery of the narcotic itself and, seco the fear of the poor user of scan and loss of his position and all t he has should he break with th providing him, or displease th friends or officials."

SOMETHING more definite the huge extent of the traffic indicated in the investigations o reliable newspaper correspond who estimated that in nine mon of 1918 the Japanese governmen Tsingtao received as a "rake-o for allowing large quantities of opiu to come into Shantung through t port of Tsingtao, some $8,000,0 This was not the price of the dru It was the GRAFT or bonus a tached to it.

One more quotation. An em nent English physician writing the Tientsin Times says:

"I know the wholesale debauch ery of the Chinese that is going at our very doors in morphia sho and houses of ill-fame run by Japa ese. Since their seizure of Tsingta they have been transporting lite ally tens of thousands of cases morphia into China through th port, all of them labelled gover ment stores. These are receive and distributed by Japanese agents with the results that hundreds a thousands of Japanese 'drug shops and peddlers are taking this curse drug all over the country. Had not definite evidence of what write, I would not dream of passin on such a charge. But it is prove up to the hilt. In order to mak quite sure that things were as r ported, we have sent out our own confidential agent to the vario Japanese drug shops in this cit and he actually purchased packets of morphia in no less than ninety-four of them. And this is but o center of many. The methods in which this morphia is being used are even more sinister. Everyone of these drug shops and most of these morphia peddlers possess one or more hypodermic syringes, and for the matter of a few cash the poor Chinaman gets an injection. Only two days ago I heard of one shop where for the first few times the injection is given free. Then, when the victim has got the craving, up goes the price at once."

At the beginning of this year the Japanese government and its nationals had in Tsinan-fu, the capital of Shantung, a total of 168 separate "enterprises," including banks, government offices, schools, inns, railway and mine offices, merchandising stores, etc. Of the 168 "enterprises," a census showed 63 were drug shops and 22 were houses of ill repute! Peddlers passing through the country districts not only of Shantung, but the rest of China, sell their wares under such labels as: "white powder," "soothing stuff" and "dreamland elixir," and in some instances under its real name, of opium or morphine.

The reliance of the Chinese people on the United States is inspiring, and at the same time it is pathetic. We are the only important nation that has never sought to take advantage of them. When seemingly the whole world was in a struggle to partition the old empire, when fights for "concessions" or other economic or political benefits were shaking Europe, we stood aloof and as opportunity offered frankly expressed our displeasure and distrust of such policies. We took the lead in the Opium Convention and it was largely through our insistence that the convention was signed. And while the developments in the Paris Peace Conference tended to shake Chinese faith in our continued championship of their cause there remains a deep feeling that after all the hope of China lies in America.

The Democracy of Duty

By Leslie Willis Sprague

"WE must come to the conviction" wrote Mazzini, "that ere are no rights but those which sult from fulfilment of duty." Never was the necessity of this nviction greater than now. For century and a half, culminating the world war, the philosophy, litics and common thinking of e world, has increasingly insisted pon rights as inherent and prior to l claims of duty or service. The emocracy we have known and r which the free nations have ught valiantly and victoriously, the Democracy of rights. It is ly natural that popular forces leased by the chaos wrought by ar, should be animated by the ly ideals and motives which veral generations of mankind ave held to be true and commanding, and that Bolshevism and all cial unrest should now pursue a ad doctrine of human rights without serious regard to duties. Nor it strange that such a pursuit of ghts should result in social upheaval and a threatened anarchy. An interpretation of human life terms of duty is the only power hat can stay a devastating revolution which to-day sweeps the world, nd turn the forces of a liberated human spirit into channels of progress and peace. Revolution there will be, whatever philosophy prevails; but a revolution inspired by devotion to duty will result more propitiously than a revolution whose purpose is to gain but rights.

The hour of the Christian church has surely struck. Its message is imperatively needed. The gospel, with its message of salvation through service, is the only adequate motive for the reconstruction. The spiritual views of life which Christianity in its essence affords, is the only view which corrects the attitude of mind from which spring the impulses dangerously rampant throughout the world to-day.

If the Christian message be not set free from its misinterpreting anachronisms, and spoken in great power, by deed as well as work, the temple of civilization, already shaken, is in danger of collapse. Can the Church of Christ shake itself free from the influences of a discredited culture and a long history of self-engrossment, and with inspiration speak the needed word? The fate of centuries is in the balance, to be determined by the willingness of Christian leaders to hear and echo the call of duty.

WE were going forward on the main highway between Verdun nd Metz,—the road over which he Germans brought their men nd munitions in the titanic thrusts gainst the city that could not evade estruction, but that would not capitulate. Every foot of our journey was through territory that had known mighty wrestlings of great armies.

We reached Etain, fifteen or wenty kilometers directly north of Verdun, before the middle of the morning. Here we found a ruin hat differed from other cities wept by the hot gales of war, in hat its buildings practically all retained their foundation lines and outer walls. The interiors seemed o have been blown through the roofs,—not a house of this considerable little city had been left intact. Bombardment and fire had gutted ll. My first impression on reaching Etain, and later this impression was strengthened in Verdun itself, called up in memory San Francisco as the queenly city by the Golden Gate looked ten days after the disaster of earthquake and flame. Through the silent town we drove our car slowly by bulging walls and ghostlike chimneys. The central streets had already been restored, but not a shop was open, not a house was occupied, and the snow lay as a coverlet upon a bed of death.

The drive from Etain to Verdun was to me a sacred pilgrimage to a holy city. Down an avenue of triumph it led us, by fields that inch by inch had been captured and recaptured. Only a military engineer could have distinguished the lines of the French from the trenches of the Germans. Not even an engineer could name the positions that had been held first by one and then by the other. At first we tried to follow the memorable advance of the Crown Prince by locating the enemy wire, but we gave up the vain effort quickly,—the wire of the two armies was a hopeless jumble.

AMERICAN pioneer troops were working on the roads, and long lines of French artillery and cavalry were passed. Several times we crossed on temporary bridges deep chasms that yet remained from the explosion of sap-heads and mines. The country about us was as the Egypt of the plagues. Hillsides were creased and interlined as by the burrowings of some voracious pest; the hills themselves were flattened and scorched; trees were no longer trees but shattered stumps; meadows were as thickly pocked by shell-holes as a man's face is pocked from a dread disease. They lay under the snow and sun like a softly rippled sea. And graves were everywhere,—they clung to the steep slopes and they nestled in the valleys; their crosses leaned toward us from the roadside and beckoned from the heights. Graves, —graves,—everywhere were graves.

And now the city rises in the distance. First our eyes are challenged by the cathedral and then Verdun in glory, tier on tier of white and noonday gold, looks down upon us. Across the river and up through the gate we rush with passionate eagerness. Our hearts beat wildly; our eyes are as lakes brimming with spring freshets, and we do not speak.

Verdun! I found it a tomb,—a vast sepulchre. Through houses without furniture, by gardens without flowers, in streets without traffic, I wended my way. No children shouted to me, no beggars raised their hands for coin, there were no shops for trade. I went everywhere searching for life, but I found nothing that moved or spoke. I was in a melancholy Sahara of desolation.

But I was not alone. Unseen hosts companioned me. For three hours in Verdun I moved in an exaltation of spirit that left me at the end of my journey in the evening of the day, an irrevocably enriched soul.

Verdun! You have taught us that there is worse than death and that brave hearts never die. Above all the crises of the future years your stout words will shine, and men will fling them back again at selfishness and wrong,—

"THEY SHALL NOT PASS!"

From your graves we go away in the knowledge that some things dare not be surrendered or even compromised while one true man remains alive to place himself between them and their foes.

Verdun! I found an ivy vine at Verdun. It grew above a shattered garden wall. From it I plucked a leaf. And hard by the garden wall, where graceful swans once floated in a quiet pool, I found a broken laurel tree.

A New Book of Poems

"CROSS ROADS"

By MARGARET SANGSTER

THIS is a delightful volume of verse containing over 100 poems of the author, not published before in book form.

It is well printed from new, large type plates, and attractively bound in cloth back and ornamental sides, specially designed for gift purposes.

A copy of this charming collection of poems will prove a most acceptable gift as a remembrance from a friend to a friend.

The verses are divided into five groups —poems of the city, the country, of romance, of home and of war. The verses from France were written when the author was traveling overseas for The Christian Herald.

The price is $1.25 a copy, post paid

First Aid to "His Royal Highness"

THE very first aid to Baby is perfect cleanliness. That means, first his milk bottles must be kept crystal-clear—they must be given a sanitary cleansing after each using. Read what a high authority says: "Simply rinsing feeding bottles in water will not do. As soon as the meal is finished, the bottle should be rinsed with hot water and Gold Dust, otherwise the fatty constituents of the milk cannot be removed from the inside of the bottle." You would do well to use Gold Dust, too, for Baby's tray, High Chair and all of Baby's things which need to be kept clean and free from grease.

OUR MAIL BAG

Who and What Is The Christ To You?

A FEW weeks ago this searching question was propounded to readers of the Christian Herald by a lady in Belton, Texas, a member of the Social Service Episcopal Guild. Many letters have come to us in response to the publication. It is a question which has called forth so many rare and helpful spiritual experiences, that we believe their publication will be welcomed by our readers everywhere.

Mrs. N. H.W., Glens Falls, N.Y., writes: "The thought has impressed me so forcibly, I feel I must reply, though briefly, and tell what the question means to me. First: Who is the Christ? He is my Elder Brother, sent by God our Heavenly Father to redeem me, and by a living example on earth, He has shown me the way to the Home Eternal, where there will be no more sorrow. He has been my guide through a life of near three-score years and ten. So, very naturally to the rest of the question: 'What is the Christ to you?' I answer: He is my ALL in all. Without Him I would be utterly helpless. In sorrow, He has given me strength. While He has chastened, He has comforted. I have felt His very Presence. He has answered my prayers. He has never forsaken me, even though others failed to stand by me in trying times. The thought that when that glorious day comes on which, with our loved ones 'gone before,' we will all be united and to see Him face to face, fills me with joy unspeakable. I trust that many others who read the question may experience the same comfort. It is a question we should ask ourselves in all seriousness."

A Reader in Birmingham, Ala., writes: "If that is an honest enquirer and the writer asks for information, I reply: Read the Book of St. John once or twice again and you will be fully convinced. Christ is all the world to everyone who longs to know more to Him. He is all the world to me, and to every one who is asking in faith and not doubting, for He is able to do greater things for us than we are able to ask or think."

S. A. L., West Point, Ind., writes: "Christ to me is my crucified and risen and exalted Saviour, a present Saviour, who saves me now, this very moment. He is the Saviour of the whole world, if the world is willing to be saved. He is our Intercessor. If we sin, we have an advocate with the Father, even Jesus Christ the Righteous. He is our Good Shepherd. He will never leave us nor forsake us if we trust Him to lead us. He is my all and in all. He is my guide through every day of my life. He has led me through seventy-eight years of my life, and never forsaken me, as long as I have trusted in Him."

F. M. de F., Cavendish, Alta., Canada, sends this reply to the question: "To me, Christ is the second party of the triune divinity who, nearly 2,000 years ago, came to this earth; was clothed with flesh, born into the physical world in the natural way, living here for a period of thirty odd years. He then went back to His heavenly home and to the glory that was His before the world was. Before going back, He left some messages for me: 1. If I wanted the truth—and I certainly do—He would send to me the Comforter who would lead me into all truth. 2. If I will love Him well enough to strive to keep all of His commandments, He will take up His abode with me, and if I not only walk in His steps but follow Him closely, He may perhaps lead me through Gethsemane, even to Calvary, but assuredly to Heaven, to share with Him as a younger brother the eternal happiness He has prepared for those that love Him. To me, His coming to earth was for a three fold purpose: an atonement for the Adamic sin, to teach me the Gospel of the new dispensation, and to show me by His own life just how I should live. I am not a preacher or teacher of the Word, nothing but a poor old homestaker; but the subject is interesting to me and I could not resist the temptation to answer."

Mrs. B. C., Los Animas, Calif., writes this testimony: "For me Christ has truly been a stronghold in the day of trouble. He is my personal Saviour and King, the Anointed of God. His love and strong guiding hand are with me daily, yea hourly. He gives me a peace that nothing can destroy. If you knew Him, as I know Him, you would make my Saviour yours, this very hour.

H. E. B., Valley Junction, Iowa, gives this reply: "I can truthfully say 'He is my life, my light, my all,' "my best friend, my refuge, and a present help in time of trouble. He is the One to whom we can go, assured that He will not turn us empty away. And for His loving care through my life of nearly four-score years, I have been made to rejoice in the Lord always. My faith does not waver for an instant. How any can live without this blessed consolation I cannot understand."

Mrs. J. D., Tyrone, Pa., gives this answer to the question: "I am asked 'Who, and what is the Christ to me?' Through the new birth and a vital acquaintance with Him, I recognize Him to be the Son of God, Christ, the Redeemer of the world, the One altogether lovely, the purest among all the sons of men, the friend who walks beside me in the heat and burden of the day, and holds sweetest fellowship in the still dark hours of night. At such times He is so near, so real, that I reach out to take His hand. It would take many words and much time for me to even try to tell you all that Christ is to me. Twenty-six years He has walked beside me in companionship. I could not live without Him, and without Him dare not die."

J.W.G., Ft. Plain, N.Y., forwards this answer: "To me, the Christ is the Son of the living God, God's great gift to humanity, King of Kings and Lord of lords, a friend that sticketh closer than a brother, my Shepherd, my personal Saviour, my victory through this earthly life and my assurance of Heaven. He keeps me from being tossed to and fro and from being carried about by every wind of doctrine. May God hasten the day, foretold by the prophets, when all shall know Him and nations shall learn war no more.

F. D. H., Concord, N. H., answers: "Christ to me is more than I can express. I have learned by experience to tell Him all my joys and all my sorrows, as my children used to tell me, with trust and confidence. He is able and willing and cares, and He makes me happy as a child as the days go by. He says all things work together for good to them that love Him, and that means me."

Choosing Your Life Job

An Early Start and the Right Selection of an Occupation Are the Best Assurances of Success

By Charles H. Smith

"WHAT am I going to make my lifework?" is a question that every young man and of late years, every young woman, asks himself or hersel sooner or later. And perhaps there is no more important decision they are called upon to make than that of choosing some particular line of future work. Usually this decision is made in the early years of high-school life so that if a college course is required to realize the ambition the person making the choice can meet the entrance requirements of the college. But the importance of a wise choice can hardly be over-estimated, for in this decision, to a great extent, lies the future success of the individual. A wise and early decision makes for success and happiness—an unwise and tardy decision generally means failure and regret.

Notwithstanding the importance of choosing one's life work wisely there are very few aids, at present, to assist a young person to decide just what work he ought to make his own. Some of the universities render assistance to their students in choosing their careers, and of late years the need of vocational guidance is becoming more and more recognized in schools and colleges. In fact it is not too much to predict that every important institution of learning will in time have a course designed to assist its students to decide the work for which they are best fitted. Choosing one's occupation now however is generally left almost entirely to the person making the choice and unassisted he often makes a poor selection. The "square peg in the round hole" is familiar to everyone.

IN choosing a life work there are two factors to be considered: the person making the choice and useful and desirable occupations. The individual is placed first because he is by far the most important. It might almost be said that he is the only consideration. In considering the individual we take into account what he has to offer—that is, his natural ability along certain lines, his likes and dislikes, his physical being. And in considering occupations we enumerate the qualities each demands in order to make him successful in the particular occupation. With these two lists before us we can determine to some extent the prospects for the success of the person making the choice. We can also tell about how much effort and time it will take to prepare for each occupation considered.

A young person about to choose his life work might wisely begin by taking a sort of inventory of himself. Let him ask himself, "What are the things I like to do best? Along what line has my best work been done so far? How do my standings in those school subjects which are most closely related to the things I like to do best, compare with the rest of my standings? Do they seem to bear out my preferences?"

A young man thinks that he would like to be a civil engineer. He thinks he would enjoy this work because it is for the most part out of doors and he likes out-of-door life. If he is not sure as to the exact nature of this work let him talk it over with some successful civil engineer. Most men will be glad to explain just what they had to study to master their profession or occupation, if they know the object of the request. After the young man has found something what is demanded of a civil engineer he ought to be able to tell whether he likes the outlook or not. He likes out-of-door life, now does he like mathematics—algebra, geometry, trigonometry and calculus? Are his marks in mathematics good? Is he physically able to endure the hardships that civil engineers are sometimes called upon to endure when their work calls them to new, unsettled parts of the country? Has he some skill or aptitude for mechanical drawing? If he can answer all of these questions in the affirmative it would seem that his prospects for becoming a successful engineer are good. Even if he is deficient in some of these things he may balance the deficiency by a strong liking for the work. But he should not decide yet.

WITHOUT doubt a person can most successfully do those things that he likes to do. A person of mathematical aptitude will usually not make a good teacher of history or English. This is because his personal likes are not related to the work he is doing. So the first thing to be considered is the person's proclivities or leanings toward certain occupations. Then next as thorough an investigation as is possible should be made of these occupations and a consideration of the desirability and usefulness of the work the individual thinks he would like to take up. And last of all a permanent choice.

When a young person has made up his mind that he is, or can be, qualified for the occupation of his choice let him be sure that the character of the work is such that it will be approved of by all honest people. Let him be sure that this work is of real value to the world so that he can work with a clear conscience and find happiness in it. And then when he has made the decision that his chosen work meets all of these qualifications he should not change to any other work except for the most urgent reasons. The wavering person who changes from one work to another never makes a very big success at anything. Stick to your chosen work.

To conclude then: Select the work that you are best fitted for by a painstaking study of your qualifications in relation to the various occupations; be sure that you choose a desirable and honorable work; prepare thoroughly for it and then stick to it. Having done this you have done your best to insure your success and with continued honest effort can hardly fail to succeed.

walk a little way with him? Jane said, no, she couldn't, but she would try and see him the next day, then he could tell her how he had "made out."

At exactly five minutes after two, Jane, having watched from a telephone booth in a drug store until Jimmie went by, hurried up to Reyburn's office and tapped on the door, her heart in her mouth lest he should be occupied with some one else and not be able to see her before her few minutes of leave which she had obtained from the factory should have expired.

Reyburn himself opened the door to her, and treated her as if she had been a lady every inch, handing her a chair and speaking quite as if she were attired in sealskin and diamonds.

She looked him over with bright eyes of approval. Jane was a born sentimentalist, fed on the movies. Not for anything would she have had a knight rescue her lady fair who did not look the part. She was entirely satisfied with this one. In fact, she was almost tongue-tied with admiration for the moment.

Then she rallied to the speech she had prepared:

"Mr. Reyburn," she said, "I came to see you about a matter of very great importance. I heard you was a great lawyer, and I've got a friend that's in trouble. I thought mebbe you could do something about it. But first, I want to ast you a question, an' I want you to consider it perfec'ly confidential!"

Jane took great credit to herself that she had assembled all these words and memorized them so perfectly.

"Certainly!" said Reyburn gravely, wondering what kind of a customer he had now.

"I don't want you to think I can't pay for it," said Jane, laying down a five dollar bill grandly. "I know you can't afford to waste your valuable time even to answer a question."

"Oh, that's all right," said Reyburn heartily. "Let me hear what the question is first. There may be no charge."

"No, said Jane hastily, laying the bill firmly on the desk before him. "I shan't feel right astin' unless I know it's to be paid for."

"Oh, very well," said Reyburn taking the bill and laying it to one side, "Now, what is the question?"

"Well, Mr. Reyburn, will you please tell me what would anybody want to offer a reward, a big reward, like a thousand dollars—or several of them,—for information about any one? Could you think of any reason?"

Reyburn started. Reward again! This was uncanny. Probably this girl had been to the movies and seen the same picture that Ryan had told him about. But he smiled gravely and answered, watching her quizzically the while:

"Well, they might love the person that had disappeared," he suggested at random.

"Oh, no!" said Jane decidedly, "They didn't! I know that fer a fac'!" "What else could it be?"

"Well, they might have a responsibility!" he said thoughtfully.

"No chance!" said Jane scornfully.

"Couldn't they be anxious, don't you think?"

"Not so's you'd notice it."

"Well, there might be some property to be divided, perhaps."

"I'd thought of that," said Jane, her face growing practical. "I would have to be a good deal of property to make them offer a big reward, wouldn't it?"

"I should think so," answered Reyburn politely, watching her plain eager face amusedly. He could not quite get at her idea in coming to him.

"Would her coming of age have anything to do with it?" put Jane, referring to a much folded paper she carried in her hand, as if she had a written catechism which she must go through.

"It might. "Reyburn was growing interested. This queer visitor evidently had thought something out, and was being very cautious.

"I really can't answer very definitely without knowing more of the circumstances," he said with sudden alarm lest the girl might take some random answer and let serious matters hinge on his word.

"Well, there's just one more," she said, looking down at her paper. "If a man was trying to make a girl marry him when she just hated him, could anybody make her do it, and would anybody have a right to put her in an insane 'sylum or anythin' ef she wouldn't?"

"Why, no, of course not! Where did you ever get such a ridiculous idea?" He sat up suddenly, annoyed beyond expression over disturbing suggestions that seemed to rise like a bevy of black bats all around the borders of his mind.

"See here," he said, sitting up very straight. "I really can't answer any more blind questions. I've got to know what I'm talking about. Why, I may be saying the most impossible things without knowing it."

"I know," said Jane, looking at him gravely. "I've thought of that; but you've said just the things I thought you would. Well, say, if I tell you about it can you promise on yer honor you won't ever breathe a word of it? Not to nobody? Whether you take the case or not?"

"Why, certainly, you can trust me to look out for any confidence you may put in me. If you can't I should prefer that you say nothing more."

"Oh, I c'n trust you all right," said Jane smiling, "I just mean, would you be 'lowed to keep it under yer hat?"

"Would I be allowed? What do you mean?"

"I mean would the law let you? You wouldn't have ta go an' tell where she was or nothin' an' give her away? You'd be 'lowed to keep it on the q. t. an' take care of her?"

"You mean would it be right and honorable for me to protect my client? Why, certainly."

"Well, I mean you wouldn't get into no trouble if you did."

"Of course not."

"Well, then I'll tell you."

To be continued.

Booze Odor in Converted Bar

THE last remnants of the old Eagle saloon, one of the famous drinking places of the San Joaquin valley when Porterville was a cattle town, have been removed. The building was remodeled some time ago into a shoe store and is now being converted into a ladies' goods shop.

After dressing rooms and other fixtures had been put in place some of the patrons complained of the aroma of old bourbon and rye which still clung about the premises.

It was found necessary finally to remove the old floor of the building, which, although covered with new flooring, was so saturated with liquors during its years of use as a saloon, that the odors of alcoholic beverages persisted to the degree that they were annoying to the women patrons.

Religious Council for City

What a Survey of Evanston, Ill., Showed Was Lacking in the Sunday Schools and the Remedy the Churches Have Adopted.

By Rhys C. Thackwell

THE startling discovery that of 5,600 children registered in the public schools of Evan-n, Illinois, only 3,700 attend nday School has led to the for-tion of a Religious Council, com-ed of leaders from the various rches in the Northwestern Uni-sity city of 40,000 inhabitants.

One of the first tasks of this coun- will be to discover why there are ost two thousand children in s city of homes, the seat of the atest Methodist university in erica, and center of culture in Middle West, who do not attend nday school.

Feeling that perhaps inefficiency the Sunday school teachers to vince their students or to hold ir interest has resulted in this vement, arrangements nowhere ing made to establish an in-tute for the training of prospec-e Sunday school teachers. At rthwestern University are many fessors who are qualified to in-uct in this school for Sunday ool teachers.

Garrett Biblical Institute, asso-ted with the university, will d assistance.

A committee of successful busi-ss men will direct the activities the enterprise. By the joint orts of the churches, all of which in the same situation in regard faulty attendance, money will raised to provide equipment for e instruction of teachers.

The necessity of religious and ral education among the chil-en of the city will be impressed on parents by the Religious Coun-l.

Evanston has long prided herself on her culture. The town has en built around the Northwestern niversity, founded in 1857 on the ore of Lake Michigan twelve miles rth of Chicago. She has long ken pride in the large number of urches and the quiet homelike mosphere which they have main-ined for the town. And thus the dden realization that the Sunday hools were not accomplishing their issions and that nearly thirty per nt of the children do not even tend Sunday school came as a stinct shock. And the Religious ouncil is resulting.

One of the facts disclosed in the ligious survey is that there is pparently a lack of knowledge of e Bible and that incompetent in-ructors were hazarding the edu-tion of the young people.

"An unscientific Sunday school acher is as great a menace to the mocracy as an irreligious teacher history or science," reported the mmittee which has just completed e religious survey.

"It is the Kingdom of God enterprise, the sublimest project ever conceived by man, that is rapidly coming to the center of interest, the object of highest devotion," is the way Dr. Norman E. Richardson, of Northwestern University department of religious education, describes this change in church life. Dr. Richardson, who addressed the Religious Council at the preliminary meeting, draws an analogy between the church situation and that in Europe when the armies of the Allies were placed under a supreme commander.

The building of a national system of unified religious education is regarded in Evanston as one of the fundamental problems of reconstruction. The experiments which are being made in this Middle Western city will be watched with interest by the church people of America for they will indicate whether such a proposal is practicable and wise. Churches that concieve their task to be the teaching of limited groups of children whose parents profess a particular denomination are no more in Evanston. Every institution in the city has a representative on the Religious Council, which now has a membership of more than fifty.

Evanston's program is proposed as follows: first, the creation of a city council of religious education composed of a large number of representative citizens; second, the creation by this council of an executive educational board which shall be responsible for the maintenance of a community school of religious education for the training of teachers and other workers of all the church schools in the city; third, the launching of a system of week-day religious schools which will supplement the work which the church schools are attempting but which they are unable to accomplish because of lack of time.

It is pointed out that such a program would in no way interfere with teacher training work now being conducted by denominations independently. It would centralize the educational resources of all the churches and place them at the disposal of each one. It will provide a larger number of better equipped teachers than the Sunday schools have today.

It will add 200 per cent to the time now being devoted to religious training of these future American citizens.

Many churches are just waiting to see how they can improve their contribution to the nation and they will watch with interest the progress of this Religious Council in Evanston.

Little Things Worth Knowing

Charles Dickens was an editor for third of a century. He began with entley's Miscellany in 1837, and as editing All the Year Round hen he died in 1870.

Up to the time when the kaiser arted a regular avalanche of abdi-ations, history shows that from arliest times fifty-six of the world's nportant rulers have abdicated.

According to his Japanese widow, he erratic but brilliant American riter, Lafcadio Hearn, "disliked ars, abuse of the weak, Prince lbert coats, the city of New York, and many other things." He was fond of the sea and swimming, "lonely cemeteries," ghost stories, Martinique and of beefsteak and plum pudding.

The annual freight bill of the lumber industry is estimated at about $215,000,000. Lumber and forest products furnish about 11 per cent of the total tonnage of the American railroads, or about 215,000,000 tons yearly. This is greater than the movement of all agricultural products, and is exceeded only by the tonnage of general manufacturers and mine products.

THE DISEASE AND THE REMEDY

By William H. Sharp

AND now there is being agitated a Minister's Union. And why not? Dr. Charles A. McAlpine, who is one of the prominent leaders of the Baptist Victory Campaign and an advocate of this Union, said in explanation thereof:

"The situation is serious. . . . . . The average pay received by preachers in our denomination is $1.87 per day.

"It stands to reason that no man can support himself, his wife and his children on such a pittance.

"And the ministers of our faith are in no worse condition than those of any other denomination.

"The average yearly pay for the ten largest denominations in this country is only $800."

Regard the matter as we will, it is a self-evident fact that a salary averaging $800 a year is insufficient to provide for the decent support of any family in modern times. Furthermore, this means that there are some ministers who are receiving a salary of even less than $800 per annum.

True, we are ready to admit that there are instances in which $600 with the incidental contributions which go along with a country charge in some communities, is indeed equal to even considerable more than this amount in towns where it is necessary to rent a parsonage and purchase everything which the family needs.

Nevertheless, the condition of the average minister is a lamentable one. The minister is a professional man. Certainly he cannot be regarded otherwise, no matter in what other supplementary vocations he may be forced to engage in order to exist and support his family. Being a professional man, he is therefore obliged to maintain his personal appearance somewhat in keeping with his calling. His family must be kept in presentable condition, somewhere near befitting the family of a professional man and his home surroundings must be in keeping with what is expected of a professional man. In short, his entire family life is expected to be ordered in keeping with the dignity of his calling. How can he do it?

A minister should not be the victim of pinched circumstances. How can a man who must be exercised over the sordid affairs of life give himself to the ministry of the word? How can he hope to give his children even the most meagre educational advantages on a salary so meagre?

And to the Church we should like to ask, "How are you going to persuade young men to enter the ministry on such a salary." Ministerial candidates are human beings and they claim the right to live in a fair degree of comfort, no matter how enthusiastic they may be for the affairs of the Kingdom.

BUT we realize that many churches are contributing what appears to be about their utmost in support of a pastor. Many small congregations are taxed nearly to their limit to support a minister even at their present small salary. What then can they hope to accomplish by advancing their monthly stipend when they can barely manage to raise the present amount? The problem appears to be a difficult one.

But this problem, like many others, might be easily and effectually settled. This could be effected by means of church [illegible]. If instead of the numerous, almost innumerable denominations now existing in the world, these bodies could adjust their differences, there would not only be a more effectual force for good in the world, but there would also be ministers enough and salaries sufficient to support them comfortably, and churches in the rural districts which are now unable to secure pastors would be amply supplied and funds more ample would be available for extended missionary effort.

It has been stated that of all the institutions of our present age, the Christian Church is the most inefficient. Denominationalism has been the subject of reproach by all classes of Church opponents and the favorite contention by multitudes who have sought to justify their aloofness from the Church upon this score. Indeed, we are forced to admit that we do not regard their contentions as entirely unjustified; for, with no reproach upon the true Christian faith, we have been deeply chagrined at the factionalism existing among the multitudes of its adherents.

For instance, what insurmountable differences exist between the various branches of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational or most other evangelic denominations? Very little, except in the matter of church polity. But few material doctrinal differences exist, and the fences between them are becoming more and more broken down every year. Yet so long as these differences remain unadjusted, so long as a semblance of factionalism exists, the same condition of impaired potentiality must continue or rather increase.

What, we should like to ask, could be expected from an army whose soldiers are scattered in small groups, each group claiming allegiance to one commander, yet each contending its right to segregation from the rest and each arguing its right to fight in its own accepted way? Because a soldier in the United States Army may become disgruntled at the acts of some of his comrades, does he forthwith proceed to form a regiment of his own? Yet this is what has repeatedly occurred in the Army of Jesus Christ and it has been the cause of more dissension and dissimulation than can be dreamed of in this present day of ours. It has tended to lessen the influence and efficiency of the Christian Church in inestimable measure and yet in this enlightened and efficient age we still cling to our petty differences. What wonder that the church is regarded as an inefficient organization?

UNITED we stand, divided we ——! No, the Church of Jesus Christ shall not fall, for it is builded upon a Rock; but it is unquestionably true that its efficiency has been sadly impaired because of the differences, the petty animosities of its members. Instead of one great, strong Christian body, it has been broken up into innumerable small bodies whose force for good has been lessened by schisms.

Whatever the objections to a union of the orthodox evangelic churches, the fact remains that such union is the one method which could solve many of the existing problems of church existence. Furthermore, it is scriptural: "One Christ, one faith, one baptism." Still further, it would solve the present salary problem of the ministers. By minimizing the number of ministers in city pulpits it would set free enough ministers to supply the struggling rural churches, thus serving to build up the Christian faith in rural districts from which the city receives its strongest and most stalwart men.

We find some ministers opposed to church union because they believe it would relegate some of them to rural communities. To them the bugbear of life in a rural community looms up dark and hideous. However, paid a living salary, life in a rural community would lose its hideousness and would be found to contribute many blessings which urban life can never afford. Furthermore, the rural church demands our consideration. It dare not be ignored.

In Union There Is Strength!

Russia Needs the Gospel

WE Americans are inclined to think that our own country is the greatest on earth, but Russia is nearly three times as large in area and about twice as big in population. Russia is the greatest white nation on the globe. But it is sick just now—very sick. Nicolai II is fallen. The house of the Romanoffs which has ruled Russia for the last three hundred years, has collapsed like a house of cards. When this last of the Romanoffs declared war against Germany vast multitudes gathered before the Winter Palace in Petrograd and when the Czar appeared on one of the balconies the surging throngs prostrated themselves before him. But not long after the same crowds shouted: "Away with him. We will not have this man to rule over us. Down with the Czar." Sic transit gloria mundi? Yes, the glory of this world passeth away.

Among other causes of the Czar's downfall, historians will point to one outstanding personality, that of the ignorant, immoral monk, Gregory Rasputin. He was in the last years the real Czar of the Russian Empire. But contemporaneously with this evil genius of Russia there lived a personality of another sort; humble, unassuming, unpretentious, but consumed almost by a fiery zeal for the salvation of Russia and of mankind.

It was the simple-hearted Stundist preacher of Petrograd, William Fetler by name. Although of Lettish extraction he was none the less a Russian of the Russians. Returning to Petrograd from Spurgeon's College in London with empty hands, he stood in a few years in the Dom Ebangelia, erected at a cost of $125,000, preaching the everlasting Gospel to an audience of 2000 Russians of all classes. He was a John the Baptist who castigated the sins of the times and of the Russian people without any fear or favor of man.

The congregation of believers grew apace. In eight different local branches, the word of the Cross was proclaimed by the men who were born again by the incorruptible seed of the Word of God. Midnight services for the night-owls of sin were instituted, and hundreds were saved from bondage and freed and fitted for service. In a fashionable Concert Hall, Felter spoke every Wednesday evening to large audiences of the higher society.

But when this work leaped across to ancient Moscow and other cities, the ruling Greek Church could keep silent no longer. The faithful witness was brought before the High Court in Moscow and sentenced to six months' imprisonment in the fortress of the Kremlin. Felter's appeal brought the answer of banishment to Siberia. After other appeals, the sentence was commuted to exile from the boundaries of Russia.

The same judges who were anxious to send the faithful preacher of the Gospel into the tower of the Kremlin, had to famish there themselves during the revolution.

In Philadelphia, Pastor Fetler has two splendid buildings. The students, about 50 in number, some single and some fathers of families, are soundly converted folks whose ultimate aim is to devote their lives to service in their own Fatherland, whither their beloved leader is to take them when they are ready, and when conditions in Russia permit.

There are among them 37 Russian war-prisoners, who were converted in different prison camps in Europe. Through the Gospel literature sent by the Russian Bible Institute in Philadelphia, to the prison camps, they learned of Pastor Fetler's School and from a prison camp in France, they petitioned in a body to be received into the Training School, and be prepared to go back "shod with the preparation of the Gospel" for their stricken and needy land.

Keeping the Children at Home

I AM fortunate to have as friends—in fact, very intimate friends—a family whom I consider the happiest people I have ever met.

What is the reason for their happiness? Of course this is your question and a very natural one, indeed.

Before answering, I want to give you just a bit of information about this family and tell you why father prefers a pair of soft slippers, an easy chair and his family in the evening to the most attractive club house the city affords, and why the children (there are five of them), from a three-year-old baby to a young lady almost sixteen, prefer to have their good times at home to any place they have ever been.

I think it is all due to their mother—a dear, little woman, who places the health and happiness of her husband and children above all social and civic duties she may have to meet. She knows that home must be very attractive, not merely a house with four walls, or growing children will soon learn to seek happiness outside. With this in mind, she has made the dining room a place in which to eat and enjoy one's meals—not a room containing the conventional six oak chairs, a buffet covered with seldom used crockery, and a shining bare table surmounted by a piece of embroidery in whose center rests a piece of cut glass, or some other ornament—while the family eat in the kitchen. Again, this home has no parlor. Instead there is a big roomy living room filled with furniture that is plain and durable. In this room is a piano, a good instrument, even if it is in a cheap mission wood case that fails to register finger marks. The walls are lined with books in open cases, rows and rows of them, and they range in subjects from the "Three Little Kittens" whose loss causes the three-year-old no small amount of anxiety, to the beloved works of Mark Twain, which the oldest boy is reading aloud to his father and mother.

Other children love to go to this home—it may be in winter on account of the fun they have in the living room, playing and popping corn on the open fire—or in summer on account of the shady lawn, on which there is no restriction against tag, and the cooling lemonade and plain cake which seems ever on hand for thirsty callers.

However, I really believe that their reason for loving to go to this house is my reason too and it is also the answer to your question a while ago.

Because this family have such a real home all the occupants are happy in its holy environment.

The Smaller Drives—and Goodyear Belts

The blower, shaker, and augur drives on the separator owned by Oscar Nygaard of Cannon Falls, Minnesota, have all been equipped with Goodyear Klingtite Belts. Mr. Nygaard has been threshing for seven years. This year for the first time he bought a Goodyear Klingtite Belt—8-inch, 5-ply—for his main drive. Its friction surface did away with the slipping that used to cause a lot of trouble. It hasn't shrunk at all, for it is waterproof. It hasn't stretched. And it never needs any belt dressing.

Because the Goodyear Klingtite did away with belting troubles on the main drive, he decided to try it on the smaller ones, also. So he bought a six-inch, 5-ply for the blower drive. That worked so well that he got a 5-inch, 4-ply for the shaker drives, and finally a 3-inch, 3-ply for the augur drive. He says that, as soon as the old belts on the other drives wear a little more, he'll put Goodyear Klingtite on them, too.

So many others have had similar satisfactory experience with Goodyear Klingtite Belts, that some separators are already being equipped by their makers with Goodyear Klingtite on every drive.

At high speeds or low, on small, flat-flanged or crowned pulleys, its friction-surface does away with power-wasting, belt-eating slippage. Its waterproof quality protects the user against the shrinkage, stretching, and trouble encountered when ordinary belts are exposed to rain or dew. Because Goodyear Klingtite is not stitched it is exceptionally flexible and hugs the pulleys as no stitched belt can hug them.

You can buy Goodyear Klingtite Belts from the Goodyear Mechanical Goods Service Station Dealers. They buy direct from the factory, so that they can sell you Goodyear Klingtite for just about the same price as that charged for ordinary belts. Ask for the Goodyear Farm Encyclopedia. Every Goodyear Mechanical Goods Service Station has it, and you can also get copies direct from Akron. This encyclopedia contains a great deal of information about farm belting problems, about figuring the right size of belt for your needs, and about getting the most out of belts and hose.

Making Palmolive 3,000 Years Ago

THIS task fell to the user in the days of ancient Egypt. Palm and Olive oils were blended into a combination that would today seem crude. But this first Palmolive was the greatest toilet luxury this old time civilization knew.

Today these same rare oils, Nature's perfect cleansers, impart their magic qualities to a modern luxury. Their combination in Palmolive Soap has made the name famous, and the soap the most popular measured by actual sales value.

The smooth, creamy Palmolive lather, profuse and fragrant; the wholesome, attractive natural color; the mild yet soothing, cleansing qualities, are due to Palm and Olive oils.

Although 3,000 years have passed since their discovery, the world has found nothing better.

Palmolive Soap heads a line of finest toilet specialties, guaranteed satisfactory by the famous name. Palmolive Shampoo is liquid Palmolive, indispensable for proper shampooing. Palmolive Shaving Cream contains the same rare oils—is both lather and lotion.

THE BOWERY MISSION'S 40th Birthday

THE Bowery Mission has just celebrated — on November 7 — its fortieth birthday. Ten years ago, as the mission reached its thirti- milestone, the beautiful new build- had just been opened, and it had honor to receive as guests, the sident of the United States, Wm. H. t, Bishop Darlington, Dr. Klopsch, own beloved President, and others. s year, the visitors were scarcely s distinguished, the chief among n being Alfred E.Smith, Governor of York State, Right Reverend Charles mer Burch, recently installed Bish- of New York, and Mr. Graham Patter- n, the President of the Christian rald.

large number of sympathetic friends k part in the celebration, indeed more came than could be provided h even standing room, while hundreds Bowery men were unfortunately on the ng side of the door.

ristian Herald readers, who possess real proprietary interest in the fa- s institution, were well represented the large number of members of the torial and Office Staff. Dr. Sandi- n presented greetings from others who re involuntary absentees, and read e Scripture lesson of the evening. & Mrs. Patterson were among the rst to arrive and last to leave.Mrs. opsch came in company with her saint- and venerable mother, Mrs.Stephen rritt, her sister, Mrs.Holmes Craw- rd,and Mr.Garner Palmer, secretary of e Christian Herald. Miss Margaret ngster, Mrs. Wilcox, Miss Goering, s Hannah, Miss Klein, Miss Gailey others were all eager participants the proceedings.

DURING the course of the evening, the story of how the istian Herald became inter- ted in this work was told and was shown how for twenty-four the forty years during which Mission has been in exist- e, the readers of the Christ- n Herald have supplied the nds, and the Officers of the gazine have carefully and pray- ully administered its affairs. Those of the audience who were iliar with the Bowery Mission former years realized at once, looking at the men assembled, radically and rapidly things ve changed. It is not now a ragged, trampish, degraded crowd of drunken loafers that forms the mission congregation. Prohibition, even for the short time it has been in existence, and although only applied in a very qualified manner, has wrought wonders in the appearance of the men. They have entered into a reawakened mental condition. They are now thinking, reasoning, normal human beings. They are cleaner, better dressed, better mannered, more hopeful, more approachable.

When the meeting opened by the singing "All Hail the Power of Jesus Name", neither of the distinguished guests had arrived, but during the preliminary prayer exercises, first the Bishop, and shortly afterwards, the Governor, made their appearance. Then Mr.Hans Kronold rendered Handel's "Largo" and Miss Marie Stoddart sang Handel's aria from "Samson," "Let the Bright Seraphim."

Bishop Burch has, since his first coming to the Diocese as Suffragan Bishop, manifested the deepest interest in the work of the Mission. His speech on this occasion, however, went far beyond anything that has been uttered by anyone of his standing, and will assure Christian Herald readers that their support of the Mission has not been misplaced. The Bishop spoke as follows:

"FIRST of all, I want to congratulate you that Governor Smith is here. Some say there is no such thing as a union between Church and State in these United States of America. That is in a measure true. Now, I don't believe in a close union between Church and State, but when the Governor will come to the Cathedral of St. John to see the Bishop installed, I tell you it shows the right kind of a union. Comparisons they say, are odious. And I don't want to make any comparison exactly, but I do want to say that of all the Governors I have known that have presided over the destinies of this Empire State, and of all those whose work, whose vision, whose example has been before us as citizens of this State, there is none that in my opinion stands as high as Governor Smith."

"I want to congratulate you that on your Fortieth Anniversary the Governor of this State is not too busy with the affairs of state and is not too careful of his own comfort to come all the way down from Albany to greet you and to congratulate you, as I, from the bottom of my heart, congratulate you on reaching this your Fortieth birthday.

"CAN any of us measure the hearts that have been uplifted and the souls that have been saved here during these forty years; the steps that have been righted, and those who have taken those steps found themselves in the pathway of peace, and hope, and encouragement and grace and wisdom. There isn't another work in the City of New York, I believe, that has brought so many despondent hearts and souls to the level of a new courage, a new inspiration, and a new determination to go forward and to be better and live better, than this Bowery Mission.

"Now, I just want to say one word more and then I'm through. If ever you want the help of the Episcopal Bishop of New York, send for him and he'll come. And he won't come just because you send for him, he'll come because he'll get more good out of his coming than you will get out of his coming. For I have never been here in the Bowery Mission but I have gone away with new light, new strength, new grace, and I hope and pray, with new power to go forward in the work that God has committed to my care.

"God bless every one of you, and I would like to pray for everyone of those sick, depressed, in trouble, whose friends have risen here tonight. I do pray for them and I will pray for them and for

Taxicabs use
WEED TIRE CHAINS

Because they can't afford to take chances and because, with Weed Chains, they get greater mileage out of their tires.

It's a business proposition, pure and simple, with taxicab companies. They use Weed Chains for economy and accident insurance.

The main incentive for the use of Weed Chains is the accident-preventing feature—a most important factor as it means the saving of lives and property.

But further than that it is known from bitter and costly experience that the continual, constant and yet hardly perceptible slipping of the rubber tire-surface on wet roads and pavements—only the foot or so of lost traction at a time—is an alarming expense item—wearing out tires just the same as if you pressed them against a rapidly revolving grindstone.

Taxicab companies have learned from experience that only by the use of Weed Chains can this continuous wear on tires be prevented. Their drivers are ordered to put on their Weed Chains "at the first drop of rain" because of the thousands upon thousands of dollars that are thus actually saved every year in tire service and the elimination of skidding accidents. Wouldn't it be well for you to learn wisdom from the fellow who really knows?

Be as wise as the taxi driver and always put on your Weed Chains "at the first drop of rain."

Weed Chains are also made to meet the demand for an efficient traction and anti-skid device for trucks equipped with single and dual solid tires or with the very large pneumatic tires. They are so constructed that they satisfactorily meet the requirements of heavy truck service in mud, sand or snow.

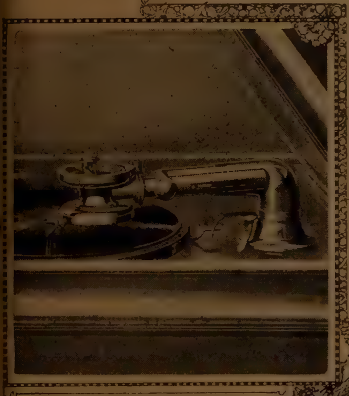
METHOD OF REPRODUCTION

Gives New Beauty to Record Music



The ULTONA

"TONES that are reproduced truer, finer, sweeter." "Music that in both spirit and letter is restated with greater beauty." "All records transcribed with greater fidelity."

Golden opinions like these are showered on The Brunswick by its hearers everywhere. And why?

Because, with its many other betterments, it has an exclusive, new Method of Reproduction.

Method of Reproduction

This Method of Reproduction for which the Brunswick Phonograph is famous, includes two scientific features—the Ultona and the Tone Amplifier.

The Ultona

The Ultona—a new day creation—is a tone arm adaptable to playing any make of record.

With but a slight turn of the hand, it presents the correct weight, precise diaphragm and proper needle.

The Tone Amplifier

The Tone Amplifier is the vibrant all-wood throat of The Brunswick.

It is oval in shape and made entirely of rare moulded hollywood.

No metal touches it.

By it, sound waves are projected into full rounded tones—tones that are richer and more natural.

Brunswick Superiority is Apparent

Proof of the claims made by the many proud possessors of Brunswick phonographs may be had at your nearest dealer. Ask to hear your favorite record played—TODAY.

The TONE AMPLIFIER

Ask your dealer for a free copy of "What to Look For in Buying a Phonograph." You will want this interesting instructive booklet before you buy because it is authentic. It was written by Henry Purmort Eames, LL.B., Concert Pianist and Lecturer, Director Pianoforte Dept., Cosmopolitan School of Music, Chicago.

THE WAKING ORIENT

BY W.G. TINCKOM-FERNANDEZ

AT no time in the World's history has the saying "The victories of Peace are greater than the victories of "War" taken on a more poig- ant significance. Never before has a ar-weary world emerged from a period of tress so heavily freighted with ideal- m and the common human desire for life, liberty and the pursuit of happi- ess"without the perpetual menace of de- potism. At this crucial time, when the ry for help and advice comes from every uarter of the globe, when both lay and vangelical resources have been taxed to he uttermost, it is necessary to meas- re the need and to apportion its mani- ld demands, both spiritual and mater- l, the service that it is our good rtune to render.

Then, too, as a result of the war, ast and West are no longer strange and lien to each other. What a vista of nderstanding and cooperation does this pen up! Oriental prejudice and suspic- n, occidental pride and exploitation, —those racial evils against which the reign missionary has fought the good ight for so long, have been starkly re- ealed. Whatever the results of the ace, the foreign missionary, on all onts a non-combatant and succorer in he great war, may now take comfort af- r his arduous labors in that triumph- t text: "and this is the victory that th overcome the world, even our faith." What are the new factors in a post-war rld that compel our urgent attention? understand and provide for these anges, political, economic, social and ligious, and before the facts are re- rted by accurate observers in the var- us fields, a brief survey of the data, re or less flotsam and jetsam of the r, is necessary.

POST-war conditions are fluid conditions . But while these conditions e unstable and the phenomena they re- l are fleeting, yet they contain nts of enormous importance that are kely to mould the stable conditions of he immediate future. For instance,the ient, while not bearing the brunt of e recent world catastrophe, has re- ted far more violently. Prior to the r the economic pressure of the West d already made itself felt in disturb- g currents in the great religions of e East, Hinduism, and Mohammedanism. the Orient the social and economic bric is entirely based upon the relig- us: as a man believes so is he a rac- l or national entity. In what way ve the war reactions exposed these ces to Twentieth Century ideas, forc- a crisis upon their medieval beliefs, d made them amenable to missionary en- rprise?

When we consider the extraordinary ties that attached themselves during he crisis of the war to the overworked issionary, then we realize the import- nce of analysing the fluid data thrown t by the war in the foreign fields.In istant, inaccessible regions, along e various far-flung fronts, the huge d elaborate philanthropic machinery of e varied relief activities supported public subscription could not pene- rate. It was here that missionary lants, already inadequate, and mission- ry labor, already overtaxed, were call- upon to perform miracles of emergency ork. Mission hospitals, under-staffed nd poorly equipped, already caring for definite clientele on a peace- time asis, were suddenly faced with the prob- em of providing for belligerent wound- as well as for the innocent victims either the fortunes of a cruel and errible war, or of a calculated, cold- looded and cynical persecution through- t the Near and Middle East.

Wherever public and private organiza- on succeeded finally in penetrating, in all cases they were relieving the Soldiers of Christ already in the field. And it is to the credit of these organizations that they had vision enough to avail themselves in these distant fields of missionary advice and direction. They readily saw that the missionary had already established an intimate contact with the victim races, and that the inadequate machinery through which he labored was often the only channel through which their manifold demands could be satisfied.

To both belligerents the missionary was a neutral, disinterested helper of suffering mankind. When they retreated they left their wounded in his hands: when they advanced through a strange and hostile region the missionary was in many cases invested with official, administrative powers in addition to his evangelical work and formed the only means of contact with the natives of the occupied region.

In Mesopotamia a missionary hurriedly wrote an Arabic grammar for the use of British administrative officers. The heroic story of the Christian missionary, and the gallant part he played in the war, remains to be written.

But we have reviewed these war duties merely to point out and emphasize the great problem that the war's aftermath offers to the foreign missionary. It is the keystone of Oriental character that a long-memory is its tremendous asset. The oriental never forgets. Whatever of good he has received is carefully registered with whatever wrong he has suffered. That the East has always been keenly critical of the West goes without saying; but at this time of crisis when East and West have, for the first time in history, established intimate relations, the penetrating observation of the East has been focussed on the West. The missionary has the privilege of presenting and representing the best of our Western ideals and institutions in the East.

DURING the war he proved his worth in an extraordinary manner. In the eyes of the eastern observer the missionary redoubled his activities. But it is not part of oriental logic to see that these efforts taxed missionary resources. Thus we come to the crux of the matter. There is no doubting now that the Oriental will expect these extraordinary efforts in his suffering behalf to continue, especially since it will be long before normal conditions will return. And the East, just like the West, probably will never return to what we are accustomed to call normal conditions.

How is the missionary to continue this unequal campaign on a peace-footing, or on a pre-war basis? This is the problem of the foreign missionary field. Moreover, is there any one denomination able to do full justice to the new situation single-handed? Indeed, to use a terminology forced upon us by the war, never was there a greater need for allied cooperation, and for an allied missionary strategy. This tremendous war was fought and won by hearty cooperation and unselfish material alliances. Is the never-ending war of the soldiers of Christ, complicated by new conditions, by strange social and economic forces of tremendous importance in a new and unfamiliar and widened battlefield, to be carried on under obsolete and wasteful conditions? We do not think that such a hazard should be faced in this hour of our moral strength and spiritual victory. This is the time to consolidate our positions won in the past, and to strengthen those positions thatthe great cataclysm of modern times has delivered into our hands.

While the recent world-war was fought and won by physical forces and agents, the war of to-morrow will be a greater war that must be won through spiritual victories. In those new nationalities that have sprung to life in Europe, those old European civilizations that have been revivified, the church militant must cope with many forces. Consequent to the moral, physical and spiritual stress through which Europe has passed, the inevitable economic and social exhaustion brings its train of evils.

SUCH phenomena have also become increasingly evident in these shores. The period of reconstruction, of social and economic readjustments, cannot fail to touch and profoundly influence our spiritual life. The mere business of living and working has become more difficult and complicated. Capital and labor have yet to reach a common plane of understanding and mutual respect. In all these readjustments and understandings a Christian spirit is essential, to mould and animate the momentous decisions that now face mankind.

In the great homogeneous countries of the Orient, like Japan and China, western ideas and institutions have been adopted, and now are on trial. Democracy is the watchward, but the data from Russia, Germany and elsewhere convinces us that it should be Christian Democracy, for in the spirit of the Master alone shall men see the Truth, that the Truth may set them free.

In heterogeneous India, surely the greatest ethnic and religious laboratory in the world, the Montagu-Chelmsford bill, promising an increased share in the administration of their country to the Indians, follows significantly upon our Jones Bill in the Philippines. If the citizens of to-morrow are to prove themselves in their new executive and administrative roles, there is now a crying need for education and evangelization.

Prof. Max Muller, the great student of India's life and thought, declared that in India "you find yourself between an immense past and an immense future.

SHALL we leave it to the historian of the future to record that we gave them the letter and not the spirit of our institutions? Are we now equipped with the requisite number of self-sacrificing men and women, and are we financially organized to send them as Soldiers of Christ into this enormous battlefield of the new post-war world?

In unity there is strength, and at no other time in the history of foreign missions was the need greater or the moment more propitious. Fields that were hidden yesterday have suddenly revealed themselves. The great,strongly-entrenched religions of the East have been breached, and are now facing wholesale defection and change and dissension. Economic factors, like those operating in South America, have drawn our continents together, and made implicit our Christian duty to our neighbors. And in such potential fields like Africa, where the issue is clear, whose destiny lies either with Christianity or with Islam, nothing but a well-organized and statesmanlike policy will avail because of our slender resources and the magnitude of the demand. The lessons of strength in unity made patent during the war are the lessons to be studied by the entire Christian Missionary enterprise, if at this critical moment in the world's history we are to present a united front, husband and direct our resources to their fullest and farthest effectiveness and realize the victory that hath overcome the world, ever our faith.

Further articles on the Orient by this author will appear in future issues.

MAKING A BUSINESS OF THE FARM

IMPROVED METHODS ADOPTED IN THE NATIONAL EMERGENCY ARE HERE TO STAY.

By ROBERT H. MOULTON.

DURING the last two years the methods of production and conservation employed by the farmers of the country have advanced twenty years. Prior to 1914 and even up to the declaration of war by the United States there were farmers in every community who were not interested in county agents, farmers' institutes, the agricultural colleges,or the United States Department of Agriculture. But when war was declared and Uncle Sam asked the farmers to grow more foodstuffs of every kind, those who had before assumed an attitude of indifference responded to the call. All through the Nation these farmers, with a spirit of patriotism added to inducements of fair prices and an assurance of reasonable compensation for their expenditures, called upon the Federal department and other agencies that could give them information. The attitude as well as the spirit of the farmers changed from peace-time to war-time farming.

Improved methods and practices adopted then and promptly applied have come to stay. In future farming methods there should be little question as to the practice of the man who has treated his oats for smut and has increased his yield; the man who has applied fertilizer to his wheat and has increased his crops 5 to 10 bushels an acre; the man who has sought information on the feeding of cattle and has found that by adding protein to the ration he can produce a pound of beef with 9 pounds of corn where the old ration required 13 pounds; the man who was encouraged to build a silo through which he can feed a carload of cattle with the crops from 16 acres of land when before it required 26 acres. Men who have learned these lessons and have profited by them, are not going back to old-time methods. Farmers are reaching out in a broader way for additional aid.

Last fall farmers planted 49,000,000 acres of wheat and while the early prospective yield was reduced to some extent by reason of adverse weather and insect enemies a crop of approximately a billion bushels is the result. This huge crop is the direct result of the improved methods of farming that were employed in the fall of 1918. There were more tons of fertilizer applied on this wheat than during any previous year. There was more early plowing. There was better cultivation. There was better selection of varieties and better treatment of the seed. There was more top-dressing of the crop with straw and manure than ever was known in any other year. Part of the crop was due to favorable weather in some localities, some just to plain luck, but the big results achieved in the wheat fields all over the country were due to the improved methods employed by farmers.

There is abundant evidence to show that agriculture has made a rapid, sure, and substantial advance. If that is true, then agriculture will not revert to the pre-war basis.

At no time has the farmer been called upon to give greater attention to the business side of his operations. In this day of high-priced land, labor, seed, fertilizers, machinery, and other materials and equipment, careful thought must be given to economical production. Industrial plants have found it necessary to introduce the cost-accounting system in order that the cost of each part manufactured may be determined. In the same way, farmers must conduct their business and know more definitely the desirable and profitable lines of production.

Not every farmer has it within his power to increase his acreage but he can very materially increase his income by judiciously increasing the size of his business. There is one way of doing this that seems to be open to farmers in practically all parts of the country. The simplest and surest way for the land-locked farmer to make more money is to produce more and better live-stock. There is but limited opportunity for expansion in the production of the intensively grown crops, but there is great opportunity for expansion in the production of all classes of live-stock.

If the farmer cannot enlarge his acreage he can increase his yield by careful seed selection and better systems of working his soil.

IN the case of 42 farms surveyed in Henry county, Indiana, by the Department of Agriculture, 11 made an average labor income of $1,423 a year. These farms kept the most live-stock, averaging 62 animal units -- that is, 62 full-grown cattle or their equivalent in smaller animals. Sixteen farms made an average labor income of $479. These farms kept live-stock averaging 19 animal units a farm. Fifteen farms made a average labor income of but $1. Not o of these farms kept more than 15 anima units.

The farmer has learned that the experts provided by the Federal, State or County authorities are well worth consulting.

Dividing the farms in three groups a the number of animals to acre, the same tendency is shown. The more heavily stocked the farm, the larger the labor income.

A specific example of wh can be accomplished by rai ing more and better stock that of a corn-belt farm, formerly managed as a straight-grain farm,that f the last five years has be operated as a hog farm. The system followed is rather usual in that but one litt is raised each year, the s being gilts, which are fattened and sold after their pigs have been weaned. The pigs, put on full feed on self feeders, are sold when from six to seven months ol Enough hogs are bought to u the corn crop. The profits realized are far in advance of those under the old system. For the last three years, respectively, the ne returns from the hog enterprise alone have been $1,25 $1,859, and $3,733.

It should be borne in min in this connection, however that just as a large acreage may be a liability rather than an asset unless use to advantage, so live-stock may be a liability unless the quality of the animals is high. The more scrub cows a man has the worse of he is if he persists in trying to produce milk from them.

THE high-class hog and the high-class cow, each in its own field, has no equal in efficiency in turning raw products into human food, but until we rea ize the wide difference in efficiency between the scrub cow producing 2,000 lbs of milk, and the animal yielding 7, 000 pounds of milk, or between the razorbac hog and the hog that converts corn int pork rapidly and economically,we are no in a position to make the most of this fact.

So the farmer who seeks to increase his business by going into live-stock enterprises will make a grave mistake u less he pays strict attention to the vital question of quality of stock. It is not necessary to begin with expensive r gistered animals, for good grade stock will serve, but it is essential that great care be exercised in selecting the individual animals that are to serve as the foundation of the herd or flock. When such care is taken, however, there is no safer way for the farmer to increase the size of his business than by intensive production of live-stock.

HOUSEHOLD WEIGHTS AND MEASURES

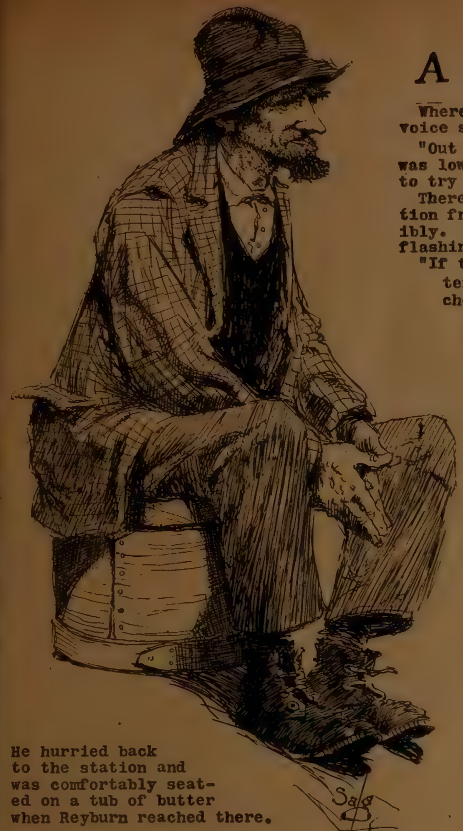
FOR the benefit of the housekeeper,the Bureau of Standards, Department of Commerce, has published a card, to be hung in the kitchen, giving information useful in the household. This includes weights and measures equivalents, weights per bushel of the more common vegetables and fruits, weights per cup of household commodieies, such as sugar , butter, lard, flour, and rice. Much other useful information is condensed upon this card. Until the supply is exhausted, copies of this publication may be obtained by writing to the Bureau of Standards, Washington, D.C. and requesting Miscellaneous Publications--No 39, Household Weights and Measures.

BETTY HOPE 'S

A SERIAL STORY IN SEVEN PARTS

By
Grace Livingston Hill

Illustrated by B. N. Salg



He hurried back to the station and was comfortably seated on a tub of butter when Reyburn reached there.

PART FIVE

THE PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

ELIZABETH STANHOPE, who ran away from her own wedding, found a friend in a Jane Carson. Jane sheltered her for a night, provided her with clothes to take the place of her wedding gown, and arranged for her to go to the Carson home in Tinsdale under the name of Betty Hope where she might hope to avoid recognition. There Betty meets Mrs. Carson and Jane's brother and sisters and finds herself welcomed as one of the family. She learns the real meaning of love and unselfishness, attends Sunday school and is converted. She obtains a position as governess and is settling down into a happy, contented village life. In the meantime, the newspapers announce a reward of $5,000 to anyone who can find Elizabeth Stanhope. Jane is alarmed, goes to Warren Reyburn, a young lawyer who employs her sweetheart and enlists his aid to protect her protege. Reyburn, who had been in the church on Betty's wedding night, has a personal interest in the case and eagerly undertakes the work.

CHAPTER IX

JANE opened a small shabby handbag and took out a folded newspaper, opening it up and spreading it on the desk before him. "There! "she said, and then watched his face critically.

Reyburn looked, and found himself looking into Betty's eyes. Only a newspaper cut, and poor at that, but wonderfully real and mournful, as they had struck him when she lifted them for that swift glance before she sank in the church aisle.

Where did you get this?" he asked, his voice suddenly husky

"Out o' the mornin' paper. " Her tone was low and excited. "Were you wanting to try for the reward?" Reyburn asked.

There was a covert sneer in the question from which the girl shrank perceptibly. She sprang to her feet, her eyes flashing:

"If that's what you take me for, I better be goin'!" she snapped and reached out her hand for the paper.

But Reyburn's hand covered the paper, and his tone was respectful and apologetic as he said:

"Excuse me, I didn't quite understand, I see. Sit down, please. You and I must understand each other or there is no use in our talking. You can trust me to keep this conversation entirely to myself, whatever the outcome. Will you tell me what it is you want of me?"

Jane subsided into a chair, tears of excitement springing into her eyes.

"Well, you see, it's pretty serious business, " she said, making a dab at the corner of one eye. I thought I could trust you, or I wouldn't a come. But you gotta take me on trust too."

"Of course, " said Reyburn. "Now, what have you to do with this girl? Do you know where she is?"

"I certainly do!" said Jane, but I ain't a-goin' ta tell until you say if there's anything you can do fer her. 'Cause, you see, if you can't find a way to help her, I've gotta do it myself, an' it might get you into trouble somehow fer you to know what you ain't supposed to know."

"I see, "said Reyburn, meekly, "Well, what are you going to tell me? Am I allowed to ask that?"

Jane grinned.

"Say, you're kiddin' me! I guess you are all right. Well, I'll just tell you all about it. One night last November,- you can see the date there in the paper, I was goin' home to my boardin' house in Camac Street, an' I was passin' the side of that church on 18th an' Spruce, where the weddin' was - you know, fer you was there!"

Reyburn looked at her astonished.

"How did you know I was there?"

I saw you through the window, over against the wall to the street side of the altar," said Jane calmly.

"How did you know me?"

"Oh, somebody I know pointed you out once an' said you was goin' to be one of the risin' lawyers of the day," she answered nonchalantly, her face quite serious.

A flicker of amusement passed like a ray of light through his eyes, but his face was entirely grave as he ignored the compliment.

"Go on!"

"I saw there was a weddin' an' I stopped to watch a minute, 'cause I expect to get married myself some day, an' I wanted to see how they did things. But I couldn't get near the door, an' the windows were all high up. I could only see folks who were standing up like you were. So I thought I'd go on. I turned the corner and went long-side the church listenin' to the music, an' just as I passed a big iron gate at the back end of the church somebody grabbed me an' begged me to help 'em. I looked round, an' there was the bride, all in her white togs, with the prettiest white satin slippers, in the wet an' mud! I tried to get her line, but she cried out somebody was comin' back in the passageway, so I slipped off my coat an' hat and whisked her into 'em an' clapped my rubbers over her satin shoes, and we beat it round the corner. I took her to my room, an' gave her some supper. She was all in. Then I put her to bed, an' she told me a little bit about it. She didn't tell me much. Only that they had been tryin' fer a long time back to make her marry a man she hated, an' now they'd almost tricked her into it, an' she'd die if she had to do it. She wanted to exchange clothes with me, cause, of course, she couldn't get anywhere togged out that way, so we changed things, an' I fixed her up. In the mornin' I ran out an' got a paper, an' found they was sayin' she was temporary insane, an'stuff like that, an' so I saw their game was tryin' to get her in a 'sylum till they could make her do what they wanted. I fixed her up an' got her off to a place I know where she'd be safe. An' she's got a job an' doin' real well. But now they've got this here reward business out everywhere in the papers an' the movies, she ain't safe nowhere. An' I want somebody that's wiser'n me to take a holt an' do somethin'. I can't pay much, but I'll pay a little every month as long's I live ef it takes that long to pay yer bill, an' I have a notion she may have some money herself, though she didn't say nothin' about it. But there's a ring she left with me to sell, to pay fer what I gave her. It oughtta be worth somethin'. It looks real. I ain't sold it. I couldn't. I thought she might want it sometime-".

But Reyburn interrupted her excitedly,

"Do you mean to say that Miss Stanhope is in the city and you know where she is?

"Now, don't get excited," warned Jane coolly. "I didn't say she was in this city, did I? I didn't say where she was, did I? I said she was safe."

"But are you aware that you have told me a very strange story? What proof can you give me that it is true?"

Jane looked at him indignantly.

"Say, I thought you was goin' to trust me? I have to trust you, don't I? Course you don't know who I am, an' I haven't told you, but I've got a good p'sition myself, an' I don't go round tellin' prevarications! An' there's the weddin' dress, an veil and fixin's! I got them. You can see 'em if you like, that is pervided I know what you're up to. I ain't taking any chances till I see what you mean to do."

"I beg your pardon, "said Reyburn trying to smile assurance once more. "You certainly must own this whole thing is enough to make anybody doubt".

"Yes, it is, " said Jane. "I was some upset myself, havin' a thing like that happen to me, a real millionairess bride drop herself down on my hands just like that, an' I 'spose it is hard to b'lieve. But I can't waste much more time now. I gotta get back to my job. Is there anything can be done to keep 'em from gettin' her again?"

"I should most certainly think so,"said Reyburn" , but I would have to know her side of the story, the whole of it, before I could say just what!"

"Well, 's'pose you found there wasn't anythin' you could do to help her, would you go an' tell on her?"

Reyburn leaned back in his chair and smiled at his unique client:

"I shall have to quote your own language. 'What do you take me for?'"

"A white man!" said Jane suddenly, and showed all her fine teeth in an engaging smile. "Say, you're all right. Now, I gotta go. When will you tell me what you can do?" She glanced anxiously at her little leather-bound wrist watch. It was almost time for Jimmie to return. Jimmie mustn't find here there. He wouldn't understand, and what Jimmie didn't know wouldn't hurt him.

"Well, this ought to be attended to, at once, if anything is to be done", he said eagerly, "Let me see. I have an engagement at five. How would seven o'clock do? Could I call at your boarding-house? Would there be any place where we could talk uninterrupted?"

"Sure," said Jane rising. "I'll get my landlady to let me have her settin' room fer an hour."

"Meantime, I'll think it over and try to plan something."

Jane darted down the long flights of stairs, not daring to trust to the elevator, lest she should come face to face with Jimmie and have to explain.

Reyburn stood with his back to the room, his hands in his pockets, frowning and looking out the window, when Jimmie entered a moment later.

"I hope I'm not late, sir?" he said anxiously, as he hung up his hat and sat down at his typewriter. "I had to wait. The man was out."

"Oh, that's all right, Ryan" said his employer, obviously not listening to his explanation. "I'm going out now, Ryan. I may not be back this afternoon. Just see that everything is all right."

"Very well, sir."

Reyburn went out, then opened the door and put his head back in the room.

"I may have to go out of town tonight, Ryan. I'm not sure. Something has come up. If I'm not in tomorrow, could you—would you mind just staying here all day and looking after things? I may need you. Of course, you'll lock up and leave the card out when you go to lunch".

"Very well, sir."

"I'll keep in touch with you in case I'm delayed," and Reyburn was off again. When the elevator had clanked down to the next floor Jimmie went to the window and looked dreamily out over the roofs of the city:

"Aw!" he breathed joyously, "Now I'll bet he's going to do something about that reward!"

Reyburn hurried down the street to the office of an old friend where he had a bit of business as an excuse, and asked a few casual questions when he was done. Then he went on to a telephone booth and called up a friend of his mother's, with whom he had a brief gossip, ostensibly to give a message from his mother, contained in her last letter to him. None of the questions that he asked were noticeable. He merely led the conversation into certain grooves. The lady was an old resident and well known in the higher social circles. She knew all there was to know about everybody and she loved to tell it. She never dreamed that he had any motive in leading her on.

He dropped into a bank and asked a few questions, called up an address they gave him and made another inquiry, then dropped around to his cousin's home for a few minutes, where he allowed her to tell all she knew about the Stanhope weddingthey had attended together, and the different theories concerning the escaped bride. Quite casually he asked if she knew whether the bride had property of her own, if so who were her guardians. His cousin thought she knew a lot, but, sifting it down, he discovered that it was nearly all hearsay or surmise.

When he reached Jane Carson's boarding house he found that young woman ensconced in a tiny room, nine by twelve, a faded ingrain carpet on the floor, a brussels carpet bed lounge against the bleary wall-paper, beneath crayon portraits of the landlady's dead husband and sons. There was a rocking-chair, a trunk, a cane-seat chair, and an oil stove turned up to smoking point in honor of the caller, but there was little room left for the caller. On the top of the trunk reposed a large pasteboard box securely tied.

Jane, after a shy greeting, untied the strings and opened the cover, having first carefully slipped the bolt of the door.

"You can't be too careful," she said. "You never can tell."

Reyburn stood beside her and looked in a kind of awe at the glistening white, recognized the thick texture, the rare quality of the rose-point lace with which it was adorned, caught the faint fragrance of faded orange blossoms wafting from the filmy mist of the veil as Jane lifted it tenderly; then leaned over and touched a finger to the pile of whiteness, reverently, as though he were paying a tribute at a lovely shrine.

Jane even unwrapped the little slippers, one at a time, and folded them away again, and they said no word until it was all tied back in its papers, Reyburn assisting with the strings.

"Now, ef you don't mind waitin' a minute I guess it would be safer to put it away now," she said as she slipped the bolt and ran up stairs.

She was back in a minute and sat down opposite to him, drawing out from the neck of her blouse a ribbon with a heavy glittering circlet at its end.

"Here's the ring." She laid it in his palm. He took it, wondering, a kind of awe still upon him that he should be thus handling the intimate belongings of that little unknown bride whom he had seen lying unconscious in a strange church a few short months before. How strange that all this should have come to him when many wiser, more nearly related, were tying their best to get some clue to the mystery!

He lifted the ring toward the insufficient gas jet and tried to make out the initials inside, and then copies them down in his note-book.

"Take good care of that. It is valuable", he said as he handed it back to her.

"Mebbe I better give it to you," she half hesitated.

"You've taken pretty good care of it so far," he said. "I guess you've a better right to it than I. Only don't let anybody know you've got it. Now, I've been making inquiries, and I've found out a few things, but I've about come to the conclusion that I can't do much without seeing the lady. Do you suppose she would see me? Is she very far away?"

"When do you want to go?" asked Jane.

"At once," he answered decidedly. "There's no time to waste if she is really in danger, as you think."

Jane's eyes glittered with satisfaction.

"There's a train at ten-thirty. You'll get there in the morning. I've written it all down here on a paper so you can't make any mistakes. I've written her a letter so she'll understand and tell you everythin'. I'll wire Ma, too, so she'll let you see her. Ma might not size you up right."

Reyburn wondered at the way he accepted his orders from this cooly impudent girl, but he liked her in spite of himself.

In a few minutes more he was out in the street again, hurrying to his own apartment, where he put together a few necessities in a bag and went to the train.

CHAPTER X.

IT was one of those little ironies of fate that are spoken about so much, that when Warren Reyburn alighted from the train in Tinsdale Abijah Gage should be supporting one corner of the station, and contributing a quid now and then to the accumulations of the weck scattered all about his feet.

He spotted the stranger at once and turned his cunning little eyes upon him, making it obvious that he was bulging with information. It was therefore, quite natural, when Reyburn paused to take his bearings, that Bi should speak up and inquire if he was look for some one. Reyburn shook his head and passed on, but Bi was not to be headed off so easily as that. He shuffled after him:

"Say!" he said, pointing to a shackley horse and buckboard that stood near belonging to a pal over at the freight house. "Ef you want a lift I'll take you along."

"Thank you, no," said Reyburn, smiling; "I'm not going far."

"Say!" said Bi again as he saw his quarry about to disappear. "Your name ain't Bains, is it?"

"No!" said Reyburn, quite annoyed by the persistent old fellow.

"From New York?" he hazarded cheerfully.

"No," answered Reyburn, turning to go. "You must excuse me. I'm in a hurry."

"That's all right," said Bi contentedly. "I'll walk a piece with you. I was lookin' fer a doctor to take down to see a sick child. A doctor from New York. You ain't by any chance a doctor, are you?" Bi eyed the big leather bag inquiringly.

"No," said Reyburn, laughing in spite of his annoyance. "I'm only a lawyer." And with a bound he cleared the curb and hurried off down the street, having now recognized the direction described in Jane's diagram of Tinsdale.

Abijah Gage looked after him with twinkling eyes of dry mirth, and slowly sauntered after him, watching him until he entered the little unpainted gate of the Carson house and tapped at the old gray door. Then Bi lunged across the street and entered a path that ran along the railroad track for a few rods, curving suddenly into a stretch of vacant lots. On a convenient fence rail with a good outlook toward the west end of the village he ensconced himself and set about whittling a whistle from some willow stalks. He waited until he saw Bobbie Carson hurry off toward Hathaway's house and return with Betty Hope; waited hopefully until the stranger finally came out of the house again, touching his hat gracefully to the girl as she stood at the open door. Then he hurried back to the station again, and was comfortably settled on a tub of butter just arrived by freight, when Reyburn reached there. He was much occupied with his whistle, and never seemed to notice, but not a movement of the stranger escaped him, and when the Philaadelphia express came by, and the stranger got aboard the parlor car, old Bi Gage swung his lumbering length up on the back platform of the last car. The hounds were hot on the trail now.

It was several years since Bi Gage had been on so long a journey, but he managed to enjoy the trip, and kept in pretty good touch with the parlor car, although he was never in evidence. If anybody had told Warren Reyburn as he let himself into his apartment late that night that he was being followed, he would have laughed and told them it was an impossibility. When he came out to the street the next morning and swung himself into a car that would land him at his office, he did not see the lank flabby figure of the toothless Bi standing just across the block, and keeping tab on him from the back platform, nor notice that he slid into the office building behind him and took the same elevator up, crowding in behind two fat men and effacing himself against the wall of the cage. Reyburn was reading his paper, and did not look up. The figure slid out of the elevator after him and slithered into a shadow, watching him, slipping softly after, until sure which door he took, then waited silently until sure that the door was shut. No one heard the slouching

THE INTERCHURCH WORLD MOVEMENT'S

THE CONCEPTION AND THE PROGRAM OF THE GREATEST RELIGIOUS and HUMANITARIAN MOVEMENT OF TODAY

By Arthur H. Howland

CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

FACT STRANGER THAN FICTION

A YEAR ago you were reading in the Christian Herald Dr. Charles M. Sheldon's wonderfully inspired serial story, "All the World" , in which were suggested immeasurable possibilities for world evangelization through united Protestant endeavor.

It seemed all a golden dream, far too good to come true. But it is coming true.

WHAT is the Interchurch World Movement? How did it originate? Who comprises it? What are its objects? Some, or all, of these questions have been reaching us in almost every mail. Here is the answer to them in a concise, comprehensive story of the movement that is attracting more attention today than any other religious or humanitarian activity.

The Interchurch World Movement is a huge organization, big in conception and in its possibilities for good. Its program is world-embracing and its leaders have the vision and the energy to carry it through.

It is indeed a real Interchurch World Movement - a practical, vitalized, humanized, spiritualized realization of Dr. Sheldon's ideal for "All the World".

IF one shall chase a thousand, how many shall 25,000,000 chase? Put into New Testament thought, if one shall help a thousand, how many shall 25,000,000 help?

The Interchurch World Movement of North America means the mustering of the more than 25,000,000 Protestants of the United States and Canada for the brotherly and Christian helping of all the people of the world.

John R. Mott, international head of the Young Men's Christian Association, a man closely familiar with world movements and international affairs for half a generation, said the other day in speaking of the projected activities of the Inter-church World Movement, that it is "possibly the greatest program undertaken by Christians since the days of the apostles."

There have been crusades before, crusades great in numbers and high in purpose. But whenever did 25,000,000 people, living in one corner of the world look out consciously on all the other people of the world and move forward to bless them?

In reality the numbers to be enlisted in this new crusade far exceed the 25,000,000. That is approximately the number of members of Protestant Churches in the United States. But the total number of adherents to Protestantism in the United States, including those not actually church members, runs close to 50,000,000. Including, as the program of the movement does, all the membership and adherents of Protestantism in Canada, as well, the figure 50,000,000 is not beyound the number of those who will feel the impulse of this movement and have some part in carrying it forward.

IT is nearly two thousand years since Jesus of Nazareth came to tell his dream of world brotherhood and lay down his life that the dream might come true. After more than two thousand years of alternating progress and retreat, when his professed followers had come to number one-third of the human race, the non-Christian world was startled to see the great Christian nations leap at one another's throats and set out upon a four year orgy of slaughter. It is significant that the birth of the Inter-church World Movement took place only 36 days from the time the hoarse-throated guns ceased their work of destruction and the armistice went into effect .

On December 17,1918, 135 representatives of the American home and foreign missions boards met in New York City to take the first steps in this crusade for world brotherhodd. The call for this conference had been issued by the foreign missions board of the Presbyterian church (South) from its headquarters at Nashville, Tenn. The New York conference appointed a committee of twenty , of which S. Earl Taylor, now executive secretary of Interchurch, was the chairman, to draw up a plan of inter-church cooperation and report to a number of denominational boards which were to meet the following month. The endorsement of this tentative program by sixty boards, representing most of the great evangelical denominations and associations of the United States marked the beginning of the work of the inter-church World Movement.

On April 30 - May 1 about 500 men and women connected with the home and foreign missions boards of the evangelical churches of North America met at Cleveland, O. to bring to a conclusion the tentative measures to create the organization and set its activities in motion. Among the utterances of this Cleveland conference were the following:

"We are convinced that the spirit of life and of common service which is now abroad among all the churches needs for its expression and for its use such an instrumentality as the Interchurch World Movement provides. It seems to us to be of extraordinary significance that it should come into being at a time when the cataclysm of the world war had prepared the minds of men for religious impressions, thrown down barriers to missionary advance and created an atmosphere favorable to the review and readjustment of industrial, social, and international relations in accordance with the teachings of Chirst."

MEN, money and materials--these three great items are to make the assets of the movement. In the name of Jesus of Nazareth the denominations affiliating themselves with the movement are demanding that the man power, the money power and the property power of their membership be put at the service of humanity.

Coincident with the organization of the movement a number of the leading denominations are launching drives for the collecting of vast sums of money to be used for world evangelization and world betterment. Details are being worked out between representatives of the Interchurch movement and the boards charged with the responsibility of collecting these denominational funds by which all the work shall be done according to a concerted plan. The Methodist churches, North and South, are just completing their Centenary Movement which has secured money and pledges amounting approximately to $160,000,000, to be expended during the next five years. Other forward drives, mounting up to hundreds of millions, are being planned by other denominations. No estimate can yet be made of the total of these Christian gifts which will be collected and expended for the spiritualizing and uplifting of humanity.

The first stage of the movement, already well under way, is a world-wide survey of the field. Questionaires are being hurried to every corner of the earth asking missionaries and welfare workers on the field to report actual conditions and to state the needs of their sections of the field in definite terms of money and persons for the next five-year period.

TO such comprehensive survey of the world field from the standpoint of religion and humanitarianism has ever before been attempted. From the offices of the foreign survey department of the Interchurch movement, at No 894 Broadway, New York, these questionaries are being dispatched not only to the leaders of missionary and welfare activities but of every individual missionary worker. The result of the survey will be a chart depicting the world in terms of work done and work needed.

Hospitals with accomodations for only a small fraction of the sick and hurt of the territory they are supposed to serve; orphanages under-equipped. schools needing teachers, dormitories equipment; great stretches of territory without churches, doctors, nurses hospitals and teachers will be revealed. Everything that has been done during recent years under the auspices of missionary and humanitarian organizations will be recorded and the present needs outlined.

Then the appeal, based on these facts fresh from the field, will be sounded out to the Christians of the North American continent, and they will be asked to answer the needs with their gifts and a select number of them with their lives.

While this world survey is being made a home survey is also under way.The United States has been districted and already district supervisors of the survey are organizing their staffs for the task of finding out precisely what American Protestantism is doing and precisely what are the spiritual and social needs of every state, county and township in the United States. Local clergymen and laymen are rallying to the assistance of these staff surveyors getting ready to find and tally the facts.

WHILE the survey department is at work, the field department of the movement with a staff of some swenty-five men and women is invading the domestic territory with a personal message to the Protestants of America and Canada, explaining what the crusade intends and preparing the way for the concerted drive for dollars and lives which is about to be launced. Already a number of regional conferences have been held at which hosts of the church membership of selected groups of states have gathered to learn of the movement and the part they are expected to take.

CHRISTIAN believers who are inclined to feel apprehensive lest in the furor of so vast an undertaking, involving facts, figures, and deeds, the deeper things of the soul will be neglected, will be gratified to know that one of the leading departments of the movement is named the "Department of Spirtual Resources." Under the leadership of Dr. W. E. Doughty, this department seeks to enlist the prayers of American Protestantism for the world crusade. Every day at noon a gong is rung on every floor occupied by the workers of the movement and all tasks are suspended for a few minutes of silent meditation and prayer, while on Friday of each week a fifteen-minute prayer service is conducted for the workers of each section.

From prayer to moving pictures, from songs to dollars, every wholesome item of human thought and activity is being summoned and utilized to contribute to this world crusade for a better and higher humanity.

There is a graphics department, by which pictures, charts and other exhibits are issued for the use of churches and organizations. A special department has been created for the circulation of lantern slides for lectures. Another Department is organized to teach churches and communities the best that can be learned about song in its uses.

The Life Work Department, under the direction of J. Campbell White, former head of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, is organized to present to the young people of America, in and out of the colleges, the claims of Christian and welfare service, with the aim of recruiting the men and women needed at home and abroad for the carrying out of the rapidly expanding world plans.

THE Industrial Relations department under the leadership of Dr. Fred. Fisher, for fifteen years a missionary in India, is organized to put the church into the arena of industrial strife with the aim of settling industrial disputes according to the standards and in the spirit of Christ.

While the survey department is making its investigations, the industrial relations department is conducting a special survey which will tabulate industrial conditions all over the world.Home denominations and churches are also being urged and instructed by the department to get into first hand contact with industrial situations and help in their solutions.

"We are not going to take sides,"said Dr. Fisher, outlining the plans of his department to a church full of the staff workers of the movement at a recent all-day conference, "unless we find that a principle is involved. But when we do find that a principle is involved we are going to get on the side of the principle and we are going to make all our efforts count for it."

CHURCHMEN, statesmen, labor leaders, workmen, citizens of every grade, realize that industry will have a basic place in the reconstruction that is about to follow the war. In many countries industrial strife rages or impends. The Interchurch World Movement realizes that if the churchs of Christendom are to retain their place as leaders in spiritual matters they must take part in the world settlement of the industrial problem, standing upon the principles of Christ and urging that his spirit and his method shall be applied to this basic human relationship.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD BIBLE COURSE

LESSON V = THE CALL OF ABRAHAM AND ITS WORLD MEANING.

IN our last lesson this one was spoken of as another experiment on God's part in dealing with man. But we must not misunderstand that word, as tho God's previous plans and purposes had failed. "Known unto God are all His works from the beginning of the world" (Acts xv.18) This meant only that God was giving man every opportunity to learn what sin is, and how hopeless were his own attempt to overcome it.

The Bible,in other words,is the history of the redemption of the human race

Thus far we have heard of but one instrument or servant which God purposed to use in bringing about that result - the seed of the woman who should bruise the serpent's head, our Lord Jesus Christ. (Gen.3:15);but now we come face to face with another instrument, the nation of Israel, which was to come forth out of the loins of Abraham.That is what gives to this lesson its world-meaning.

IT is running ahead of the lesson a little,but it seems desirable at this point to inquire for what purpose God intended to use Israel?

The purpose was three-fold: (1) as a repository for His truth in the earth (the sacred oracles of the Old Testament were committed to Israel.) (2) As a channel for the incoming of the seed of the woman to the earth Israel gave birth to the Redeemer). (3) As a national witness to Himself before the other nations of the earth.

This last purpose Israel has never yet faithfully fulfilled,with the consequences we see all around us in the world today in the history of the nations and in that of Israel herself.

It is in God's mind,however, that Israel shall yet fulfill this purpose when penitent and restored to her own land in the time to come.

The prophets are filled with predictions and promises of this kind and it is the fact that explains the Old Testament and the place which Israel's history occupies in it,and which gives to it its great interest for all generations.

READ the following chapters in Genesis, making about seven divisions of them, one division for each day of the week, thus:

12:1-10 and 13:1-18; 15:1-20 and 17:1-22; 21:1-5 and 22:1-19; 25:19-34 and 32:24-32; 37:1-36; 46:1-34; 49:1-33.

WITH these words of introduction let us give attention to the present lesson.In Gen.12:1-10 we have Abraham's call. Note the threefold promise given him, a personal blessing, a national blessing, a world blessing . The first two were for the sake of the last.Note the promise of the land(7)

In chapter 13-1-18, especially the last five verses, note a renewal of the promise of the land in perpetuity.

In Xv.1-20 there are three great facts to note:(1) The imputation of a legal righteousness to Abraham through the exercise of his faith in the testimony of God (compare verses 1-6 with Romans iv., 18-25). (2) The confirmation of the promise of the land to him and his seed by a covenant sealed by sacrifice(7-21) (3) the boundaries of the land (18-21).

In chapter xvii. we have the important outward seal of the covenant(9-14).

In chapter xxi, we have the fulfilment of the promise of the seed, in the birth of Isaac but it is to be remembered that he was only the forerunner and the type of the greater seed, Jesus Christ, (see Gal. iii.16).

THE startling event in chapter xxii is explained so far as Abraham is concerned by two circumstances.In the first place it was not exceptional for fathers so to sacrifice their children to their pagan Gods; it was something with which Abraham was not unfamiliar. In the second place, he fully expected that if Isaac was slain, he would be raised up from the dead (Heb.xi.17-19).

We would have you read chapter xxv.to obtain the connecting link between the history of Abraham and that of Jacob which is furnished by "the generations of Isaac" (10),and also to become acquainted with the beginning of Jacob's history.

Verse 23 of that chapter, "the elder shall serve the younger", is a stumbling block to some, especially in the light of Malachi 1.2 Rom.ix.6-13 related scriptures. But it does not mean that God had any partiality for Jacob, or that Jacob merited the choice which was made of him It is obvious that a choice must be made as to the one through whom the promised seed (Christ) should come. And there was no "unrighteousness with God"in determining that it should be Jacob. Esau be it remembered, had a good time in this life, in certain respects better than Jacob and moreover had he believed the promise of God concerning a coming seed,his future life would have been as secure and blessed as that of Jacob.

Read the chapters giving the history of Jacob, till you come to xxxii.24-32, where you find the circumstances under which his name was changed to Israel and the reason for or meaning of that name. The mystery in that transaction we can not pause to consider at this time.

Chapter xxxvii. furnishes the connecting link with the history of Joseph who, at its close is found in Egypt,the forerunner of his family's settlement in the land, where they grow into a great multitude.

The story of their going down into Egypt is given in chapter xlvi. note particularly verses 25-27, and 33,34.

Chapter xlix., which reveals the close of Jacob's life is important from both historic and prophetic points of view.

Observe especially verses 1 and 10 having Messianic references and carrying forward even to a time yet future.

CUTTING DOWN FUEL COSTS

By Robert H. Moulton

WOOD has always been of considerable importance as fuel in this country, and the present coal shortage greatly increases its comparative value for this purpose.

Wood is now being cut for fuel in places where for many years it had practically gone out of use. On farms where coal had become the ordinary fuel and was brought in from great distances while wood suitable for fuel went to waste in the neighborhood, wood is now coming into its own again. It is being more used in churches, schools and homes and even in factories. Its use saves transportation, it utilizes fuel that would otherwise go to waste and it releases coal for ships and railroads which are needed to transport food products.

A load of stove wood in Northern Michigan.

Heretofore wood has supplied between 10 and 15 per cent of the total amount of fuel used in the United States. The wide distribution of wood fuel supplies, and the fact that they are so located as to save transportation should, therefore, under present conditions, lead to a considerable increase in the proportion of wood burning.

That the farmers of the country helped materially in conserving coal during the critical period of 1918 by substituting wood as fuel is shown by statistics gathered by the department of Agriculture. An average of 11.5 cords of wood, or a total of 77,092,000 cords, were burned on the farms of the country during 1918. The total production of cordwood during the year, which includes that burned on the farms and sold by farmers to city dwellers, amounted to approximately 102,903,000 cords. The average farm value in 1918 was $4.73 a cord. On the basis of estimates for 1918 the farm fuel-wood crop is one of the important crops of the farm, inasmuch as only five crops - corn, wheat, oats, rye and cotton - exceeded it in value in 1918.

Some of a party of 400 men who cut and piled 150 cords of wood in one afternoon in Boone County, Missouri.

In the utilization of the forests of the country, including farm woodlands, a great deal of wood material is produced for which no use can be found except as fuel. While some of it is utilized for acid wood, charcoal, etc., most of it is left for fuel or wasted. Since many trees are fit only for fuel, they will not be cut unless there is a demand for fuel wood. Improvement cuttings which take the small, diseased or defective trees, can not be profitably made in many cases unless there is such a demand. Thinnings can frequently be made to pay for themselves if the material goes for fuel. As proper thinnings and improvement cuttings are a great stimulus to increased production and at the same time improve the quality of the timber, a fuel wood demand opens up a great opportunity for forest improvement and, if widespread and continued, will greatly improve the character and quality of the forest resources.

The great bulk of the wood-fuel supply in farming regions should come from thinnings and improvement cuttings on farm woodlands. Except under stress of emergency, trees which will produce lumber or other material of higher value than cordwood should not be cut for fuel. Trees better suited for fuel than for any other purpose, and whose removal will be of benefit to the remaining stand, are: sound standing and down dead trees; trees diseased or seriously injured by insects' attacks; badly fire scarred trees; crooked and large-crowned short-boled trees which will not make good lumber and which are crowding or overtopping others; trees which have been overtopped by others and their growth stunted; trees of the less valuable species where they are crowding more valuable ones, as beech, block oak, birch, hard maple, white oak, or white pine, slow-growing trees which are crowding fast-growing species of equal value.

On many farms former pastures have become overgrown with red cedar, gray birch, aspen, pine, or other trees. The trees came in slowly and through neglect were allowed to steal much of the pasture. If fuel is to be cut somewhere on the farm, such land as this should be drawn upon first of all and redeemed by removing all the trees and restoring the land to grass. Also, uncleared corners of fields or patches of agricultural land within the border of the wood lot may be cut clean, the wood used for fuel and the land eventually farmed. The expense of clearing is thus largely or entirely met by the value of the fuel produced.

With the increased use of wood fuel which is likely to continue for several years, it is important to know how much fuel wood ther is in the country. On the farms alone the total area is approximately 143,392,000 acres. The first tier of states just west of the Mississippi has a great deal of timber. In the West the wooded areas are for the most part restricted to the mountains. An average of 10 cords and acre, which seems reasonable, would give one and one-half billions of cords for the region east of the Mississippi At the average rate of consumption on the farm itself, 12.6 cords a year, 739 cords will last 58 years. On the average this would be ample time to replace the stands and thus continue the supply indefinitely.

A standard cord of firewood is a pile 8 by 4 by 4 feet, which contains 128 cubic feet of stacked wood. It is customary to pile green wood 2 or 3 inches higher than 4 feet to allow for shrinkage and settling as it dries. Though a cord contains 128 cubic feet the space occupied includes air as well as wood. The actual solid contents of a cord is only about 70 per cent of this amount, or 90 cu. feet for wood of average size.

THE great demand for fuel wood and the high prices during the winter of 1917-18 brought out plainly the inadequacy of the cord for measuring wood. The purchaser of fuel wood buys it not for its bulk but for its heating value, which depends not upon the volume of wood but upon its weight. A pound of dry wood of one species has about the same number of heat units as a pound of any other species; but a cord, assuming the same solid volume of wood in each case (90 cubic feet) of basswood, for instance, yields but 12, 600,000 British thermal units, while a cord of black locust yields 25,000,000 British thermal units.

A better way to sell fuel would be by weight, which is entirely independent of species, shape, or size of sticks, or of method of piling, and is a very good measure of the fuel value of thoroughly seasoned wood. Green wood, of course, varies considerably in water content and therefore in fuel value per unit weight, and naturally would be sold at a price different from that for dry wood. If weight instead of volume is adopted as the standard measure, it will be necessary to fix certain standards as to time of seasoning of wood offered for sale. The change may seem radical, but buying fuel has become a practical question of value for money, and the time may very quickly come when it will sound old-fashioned to speak of a cord of wood.

Coal has been so generally used in recent years and furnaces and stoves have become so adapted to its use that it seems impractical to many persons to burn wood without going to great expense This is not usually the case, as simple adjustments will allow wood to be used with coal-burning equipment. The size of the firebox, of course, is the

J. H. JOWETT, D. D., P. W. WILSON, REV. E. W. CASWELL, D. J. BURRELL, D. D.

SPIRITUALIZING LIFE

SUNDAY. Gal. 5:25: "If we live by the Spirit, by the Spirit let us also walk." The great secret of Christian consistency is spiritualizing all along the line. When we have had some great spiritual experience, and life has found new spiritual springs, there is always a peril of reaction when we pass the ordinary things and concerns of the world. We have been lifted up into the seventh heaven, and it seemed as natural to rejoice and sing as for a lark in its privacy of glorious light. And then the ecstasy passes, the lark-experience is left behind, and we are face to face with the long drab streets of common life. Ours is now the apparently harder task of "walking by the Spirit." It is really our blessed calling and the calling can be fulfilled. To transfer our spiritual communion from the realm of ecstasy to the realm of drudgery, to carry the serenity of our lofty communion into the ordinary intercourse of life, is a very real and advanced way of glorifying God. To walk by the Spirit is to spiritualize everything.

But the peril is that, when we get into the common streets of life we lose our lofty vision and our fine spiritual ideas and we walk according to other standards. We walk by the flesh. We walk by small calculations, petty prudences and ignoble compromises. We lose the great faith and the mighty venture. We keep what we call a "firm control over ourselves." We say we must on no account over-do it! A little alloy makes gold more durable! After all, it is better to do in Rome as Rome does! We spoil our religion when we make it too aggressive! We must be good mixers if we would be good winners! And by this kind of reasoning we water the fine wine of the Kingdom. Life loses its high light. We walk by worldly maxims instead of walking by the pattern which was given to us on the Mount. The Holy Spirit is exiled, and we accept the motives and counsels of the world. We pass from the holy to the profane. J,H.J.

THE UNCERTAINTY OF LIFE

MONDAY. Jere. 28:16. "This year thou shalt die." All know that death is possible at any time, but few have the period of departure revealed to them. The prophet Hananiah had led the people to trust in a lie; therefore, God gave him the warning. It is natural to consider the hour of death so far away that often the fact has little affect upon the life. But when death is probably only a day away, the soul begins to prepare for the long journey. Alexander Hamilton knew Aaron Burr was a sure shot and that he, Hamilton, intended to fire into the air. Therefore he anticipated but one more day of life. John C. Hamilton, his son, says that the night before the duel his father remarked, "My son, you will sleep with me to-night. When we retired, he clasped me to his arms and pressed me to his heart, kissing me over and ever. Then he said, 'My darling, we will say that Lord's prayer together now." He realized it was the last time he would embrace and pray with his boy and the child wondered why his father showed so much feeling. What a moment of mingled agony and hope of eternal reunion must have filled the father's heart!

Do not soldiers leaving for the front, as well as going into battle, feel the same powerful emotions as they realize that the border of eternity is just before them? What thoughts of home, what prayers of penitence are theirs!

May we not forget to give to those in stress and trial our loving sympathy and to join with them in their prayers. Let us act the part of the Good Samaritan towards a wounded world, and not that of the formal priest or the cold, indifferent Levite. E.W.C.

JESUS STILL THE DIVINE PHYSICIAN

TUESDAY. Oct. 10:38 "Who went about doing good." He healed the sick, cleansed the lepers and opened the eyes of the blind. Not only so; he had power over the elements. To the stormy waves he said, "Peace, be still," and like children rebuked for naughtiness, they sobbed themselves to sleep.

And he is performing miracles to-day. Miracles of healing? Certainly. Why not? The prayer for healing is subject only to the same conditions as other prayers and a like promise is affixed to it. He who asks reverently, with a due regard to the divine will and the superior wisdom of God is always heard and answered. Let it be remembered, however, that if all the sick people got well, nobody would die; and that is manifestly not the divine will. But the Great Physician is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever.

The Divine Physician is all the while healing more people than we know of, in his own gracious way. D.J.B.

SPIRITUAL PRETENDERS

WEDNESDAY. Oct. 19:15. "Jesus I know, and Paul I know; but who are ye?" The temple of Ephesus has long since disappeared. If the goddess Diana survives, it is because she is a much more recent and attractive personage than her wooden prototype. But the name of Ephesus lives on, like the name of Gettysburg or Verdun, because here was fought to a finish one of the decisive battles in this planet for human happiness. The Jews who lived by exorcism were doubtless vagabonds, but at least they understood the issue. They did not go about pretending that all the devils had died with Darwin. And they knew that Jesus, as preached by Paul - Jesus in the fullness of His Divinity- could alone eradicate diabolism from men's hearts. They realized that a change of system hardly affected the inner evil.

The only thing wrong with Sceva and his seven sons was that they tried to do Christian deeds without possessing the Christian power. And confronted by such well-meaning impotence the devils leapt on them, tore the clothes from their backs, and left them naked of all pretensions to influence. Society turned them out of the house, wounded and helpless, so rebelling against an idealism which challenged abuses only to leave abuses triumphant.

The devils were candid enough. Jesus they knew and Paul they knew, but who are ye? Who is Lenine? Who is Gorki? Who is Trotsky? Who is Robespierre? Who is Karl Marx? What soul have they ever delivered? Face the reckoning- who are they? P.W.W.

THE SOUL'S GUARD

THURSDAY: Phil. 2:12: "It is God that worketh in you, both to will and to do of his own good pleasure."

Christ paid our ransom on the Cross "once for all;" so that one who wholeheartedly accepts the benefits of his sacrificial death is freed forever from the penalty of sin.

But this is only the beginning of the Christian life. It enters us as athletes in a life-long race for a victor's crown and this is the race that is now set before us.

It is for us to say whether we will be satisfied with a negative salvation of mere deliverance or whether we shall work out for ourselves that positive and larger salvation which, by realizing all the possibilities of character and usefulness, assures for us abundant entrance into the Kingdom of God.

At conversion we are mere "babes i Christ:" the years are given us wherein to exercise ourselves in the hope of arriving at "the measure of the fulness of the stature of a man."

The high calling of God in Christ Jesus is a clear call to come up higher, higher, always higher, until we reach that perfection which is the heavenly summit of the Christian life. D.J.B.

DIVINE STRENGTH OUR SUPPLY

FRIDAY. Psa.18:2 "The Lord is my rock, my fortress and my deliverer." There is no ground for fear or trembling when we lean hard on God. Observe the clarion note in the voice of that same diffident Paul when he turns his face Godward: "I know whom I have believed and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day!"

What am I? A cipher. But God is the great Unit. When that Unit is put before a cipher you have the beginning of the decimal system of the Universe. Add other ciphers and you have the Church, an aggregation of decimals so strong that the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And if you keep on adding men and nations- which, but for the buttressing of the great Unit, would be all ciphers- you have the sure prophecy of the Golden Age when the glory of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea.

It was with something like this in mind that Paul was moved to say, "Of mine own self I can do nothing," and again, "I take pleasure in mine infirmities; for when I am weak then am I strong;" which he clarifies and emphasizes in these exultant words, "I can do all things through him that strengtheneth me!"

What encouragement have we here! "One shall chase a thousand and two shall put ten thousand to flight." What stimulation to holy endeavor! Wherefore let us patiently continue in well doing. D.J.B.

LOOKING BEYOND TIME'S HORIZON

SATURDAY. Eph. 2:7- "That in the ages to come." Nearly two millenniums of these "ages to come" have passed. What wonders of grace have been displayed in the partial overthrow of paganism, heathenism, atheism and pantheism. What marches of civilization, science, education, art, poetry and music have been enjoyed! The advancement in knowledge of the laws of nature, and of the Bible, has kept pace with the development of noble character and pure living in the lives of those who have partaken of the riches of God's grace.

Have we not entered a more hopeful age since the closing of the war? Churches are uniting instead of fighting each other; nations are working for the peace of the world; and all the lands are urged to join the procession of freedom from the slavery of drink. Labor and capital seek a common ground, and millions of money are being poured out for the evangelization and reconstruction of the world. We are saved by hope, and we hope soon to see the day when righteousness will everywhere prevail.

Should we not pity those who never gaze further than the horizons of earth; who see nothing beyond age and death, no reunions of loved ones, no likeness to Christ, no glorified body free from the ills of flesh and blood, no sitting together with friends in heavenly places in Christ Jesus, no mingling with angels of the heavenly Father, who hath brought us to his family bosom through his Son, Jesus Christ, and welcomed us into his glorious presence forever?

WHAT I OWE TO MY MINISTER

PRIZE CONTEST LETTERS = NOT NECESSARILY WINNERS.

MOST OF ALL FOR HIS EXAMPLE

MY Minister is a real man — God bless him! — none of your long-faced, "I am a Minister" type. He has sincere blue eyes that look straight at you, a healthy complexion and a fine physique. When in college he was on the foot ball team, also a champion tennis player; now he plays golf as often as his many duties permit, that he may keep his body a fit temple and his mind clear to do the biggest possible work for his Master.

Optimism is his creed; he considers worry and the blues a libel on his Lord whom he believes directs his life.

For many years I had looked upon the communion service as a place and time in which to think of all my past sins and to raise my thoughts in prayer for their forgiveness, a service of sadness and of contrition over my unworthiness.

My Minister has changed all that for me to a time of sweet communion, so earnestly has he besought us to forget for that one short hour ourselves, in our greater thought of Him who came to bring life more abundantly, who has already forgiven and blotted out our sin forever and who is waiting for us to show our joy in our faces and in our lives.

Every child on the street has a "Hello, Dr. S—" for my Minister. They are all his chums. I have seen many a bad boy — you know the kind mother doesn't want her boy to play with — go to my Minister's study door, sure of a welcome, and when he came away he had a different look on his face; no one but God knew what had passed between them; but I know what happened to one boy who found he had one friend at least — I know for I was one of those bad boys myself. That is the biggest thing my Minister did for me. He made me believe in myself and in my right to eternal life.

My Minister is flesh and blood, but I have never known a man so careful in his deportment with the opposite sex as he. He is the type of man to inspire hero-worship, which so many women are addicted to, making it hard for a man to resist what is really only a harmless attraction. But My Minister is jealous of even a hint of something that might link his name with another's in that way.

I owe him the greatest respect and gratitude for this example.

My Minister might have had a large bank account if he had wished it. Not that we were so generous with him; but he had other sources of income with his pen and lectures. His example has made me know that the greatest happiness is not found in unnecessary wealth.

I owe to him the fact of having known a great man and a real Christian. I recall many a business man who has neglected to enter the Church as a boy or young man who has late in life come to this great-hearted man to learn the way of eternal life, and as I have seen the tears fill his eyes as he has received them into his Church as little children I have given greater thanks for what he has done for them and for me. My Minister! I can never tell in words what I owe to him. S.M.M.

OWES HIM UNTIRING EFFORTS

I OWE to my minister a debt of gratitude for helping me to see the light of salvation and for the joy I have had in the service of the One whom we both serve. I owe him the best that is in me in the service of God.

I owe my minister the building of a good character and the development of a clean body and a strong mind. I owe him the choice of clean and wholesome pleasures and the association of companions whose reputation is above reproach. I owe him the avoidance of anything that might hinder my spiritual, mental, or physical growth. I owe my minister the pledge to do all that works toward true and noble young manhood.

I owe my minister encouragement by cheerfully performing my duties in the Church and Sunday School. I owe him reverent attention to his sermons. I owe him an intimate knowledge of the Bible so that I may better understand his teachings from the Word of God. I owe him my earnest prayers for the successful administration of the Gospel.

Prize Contests for Readers

THE Christian Herald will give a prize of $25 for the best 500-word article on each of the following subjects:

"The Best Charity I Know"
"The Most Wonderful Answer to Prayer I Have Ever Known"
"How Religion Has Helped Me in this War"
"The Greatest Moral Struggle I Ever Had"
"What I Owe to My Minister"
"What My Church is Doing for the Community"
"A Noble Life: the Story of the Best Man (or Woman) I Know"
"My Favorite Pet" (photo and story)
"My Husband's Hobby"
"My Wife's Best Quality"
"How My Wife Has Helped Me to Success"
"The Girl's Ideal Husband"
"The Best One-Dollar Investment I Ever Made"

Every Christian Herald Reader is urged to enter these contests at once.

Contestants may write on each topic or on every topic. A $25 Cash Prize will be paid to the winner on each topic —$325 in all.

Many letters will be published as fast as received, but decision as to the winners will not be made until December 15.

I owe my minister the readiness at all times to do all in my power for the advancement of God's work throughout my community. I owe him active support in making any improvement he may deem necessary for its moral or civic betterment. I owe him my untiring efforts to make my community a cleaner, better place in which to live.

As a leader of our Young People's Christian Endeavor Society, I owe my minister a good example of clean living before my fellow Christian Endeavorers and a faithful fulfillment of its Pledge. I owe him all the influence I have in promoting an earnest Christian life among them and in helping them to be more useful in the service of God. I owe him the inspiration which youthful activity in the work of the Lord alone can give. I owe it to my minister to speak kindly to my friends who have not accepted Christ as their Savior, about their soul's salvation so they may know and feel the happiness that such a step would bring into their lives. I owe him the promotion of a spirit of friendliness and co-operation within my Christian Endeavor Society so that their efforts may count for most in the Lord's work in the Church, Sunday School and throughout the community.

I owe my minister loyalty to Christ at all times. I owe it to him to take Jesus with me as my daily companion wherever I go. I owe it to my minister to take my Christian principles into my business life and to guard them zealously.

Years have passed and my Minister has been my constant inspiration in many hours of weakness and doubt.

I owe to my minister the good will and comradeship that exists between us, and, in the words of Tennyson, I owe him the fulfillment of my vow as a true knight of Christ to "Live pure, speak true, right wrong, follow Christ, the King; else, wherefore born?"

I owe my minister all these things, and more, as a debt of gratitude which I can only partly repay. E.H.S.

CHRIST THE CENTER OF HIS TEACHING

I AM thinking about one minister in particular. He was my pastor in my very young manhood. It would be difficult indeed to put down all that I owe to this one man.

He guided my footsteps on the hard beginnings of the long road of preparation for the Christian ministry. I can see him now in his study where I met him week by week while he patiently helped me lay the foundation of what knowledge I have. Time has abundantly proved how wisely he directed me. He had a class of young business men to whom he could make theological and Biblical studies of such fascinating interest that seven out of about twelve of them became preachers of the Gospel. I wonder now how he found time to help us so much.

He led me into a personal religious belief that is absolutely Christ-centered, and all the storms of theological discussion and change only strengthen the structure built upon the foundation that he helped me lay, for such was his also. In later years when some of my friends were feeling the disturbance of new lines of thought I found onlyconfirmation and upbuilding — so wise had been his teaching.

Christ was not only the center of his teaching; He also reigned supreme in his life. To me this minister always will be one of the chief channels of the Master's inspiration. When I desire to do my work well I find I am desiring to do it as he did his.

Some men are too easy in their pious wishes. Their glibness suggests superficiality. Not so with him. Only four times in a long acquaintance do I remember him saying to me, "God bless you," but every time was a vital occasion and his saying it nerved me for the task ahead. I would walk many miles today to hear it again.

If ever I write a book I shall dedicate it to, "John Gough Williams, the minister and teacher to whom I owe the most." J.R.H.

FULLEST LOYALTY AND SUPPORT

THIS is a subject of vital importance and one upon which I have thought deeply.

I owe my minister whole-hearted loyalty at all times, and a willingness to co-operate with him in his work.

I owe him a faithfulness in attendance upon all church services as far as possible.

What an inspiration to a minister and what a source of encouragement to see well-filled pews and feel the warmth of brotherly love! I owe him a regular attendance at the Prayer Meetings each week and at these meetings I should be ever ready and willing to participate in the worship. My influence may arouse and stimulate others to greater activity. W.

THE PATHS OF RIGHTEOUSNESS

A Sermon by Rev. J. H. Jowett, D.D.*

Text Psalm 23:3. "He leadeth me in paths of righteousness for His Name's sake."

THERE is an insinuating and perversive calmness in the very words, and the leisureliness of the long vowels induces something of the serenity which breathes through the entire psalm. We cannot read them at a gallop. The words are gracious sedatives; and minister to the fretful and irritable spirit. And therefore it is well to have such restful passages ready at hand.

Some people have little medicine chests which they carry about on their journeys, and to which they can turn in moments of sudden ailment or accidents, and would it not be possible for us to have an analagous ministry for the spirit? Words for times of panic; moral sedatives when we are inclined to become feverish; spiritual refreshers and restoratives? I think that to just repeat them to ourselves very quietly is a helpful means of grace

And yet, although the words are very restful, the particular passage I have quoted is descriptive of life which is on the move. We are on the open road. We are in the midst of the ministry of change. We are leaving one thing for another. The tents have been struck, and we are on the march.

I must not forget what immediately precedes the words of our meditation. That is ever the difficulty of an expositor who seeks to sever a portion of this psalm from the whole. Every part belongs to every other part. It is dependent upon every other part for its true interpretation. If we cut out a bit it will bleed. So we must take it in its vital relationships.

Look back upon what precedes it. "He maketh me to lie down in green pastures." How rich is the significance! It speaks of treasure, and leisure, and pleasure. It is a combination of sustenance and rest. It is a stretch for the weary limbs amid fat and juicy nutriment." He leadeth me beside the still waters." Again, how rich is the significance! We are fed by waters of stillness where there are no dangerous floods, where the cattle can stand knee-deep on the feverish day and slake their thirst. And so this is the environment of our text

And what is the purpose of the rest? It is just that we might be prepared for a more valiant walk in the "paths of righteousness." We have been taken to the field of rest, in order that we may be equipped for the roads of activity.

And now for the trackless wilderness! But there are "paths" known to the leader's eye. It is marvelous how the expert eye can see the way across the waste. On a very memorable day last year, I crossed the Yorkshire moors and for an hour or two lost my way. But I caught sight of a leisurely rider directing his horse where there was apparently no path, but moving with quiet and restful progress. He knew every token which suggested the trend of his journey. And so it is with my Lord; He sees the path when I see nothing but waste. My life with God is not an aimless loiter, a fruitless wandening, a tiresome roundabout. My Lord knows the paths, and "He leadeth me!"

And is not that evangel full of inspiration, that when it seems all dry, trackless desert, the eye of our leader sees the way to the other side? Within these last few days I have been to see a dying woman, and she quietly turned her head, and said to me, " He knows what he is doing!" There is everything in that! When we are sure that the Leader has a plan, we can be perfectly calm in the fellowship.

And these sometimes invisible paths are "paths of righteousness." They are made and appointed by the holy will of God. There is nothing of caprice about them and therefore nothing of cruelty. The absolutely righteous God hath said, "This is the right road for me". The road hath been ordained by righteousness for righteousness. The path has been chosen by the righteous Lord, in order that we may become righteous too.

Says an old expositor, "What good is it to have green pastures and black souls still waters and turbulent spirits?" And so the Lord leads us into these paths of His own choice, in order that, by the journey, we may attain unto a pure and holy life.

After what I have said it is almost needless to add that these paths are frequently very unfamiliar and strange. "I will bring them by ways that they have not known." Even when the Lord is leading us, we shall frequently have to say, "I cannot understand it!" We had better not try to explain it. Our attempted explanations often deepenour confusion. We had better not remonstrate the leader, or question the wisdom of His doings. Far better to confidently rest in our Leader's love with perfect assurance.

SOMETIMES the Lord's paths appear to be very "roundabout." We are so fond of short cuts, and if we were only left to ourselves, we should soon arrive! It was the one temptation which afflicted Christian in the early stages of his p gress. But he discovered by painful experience that the short cut is by n means the shortest way to the goal.

I was crossing the Gemmi, in Switzerland, a few years ago, and I left the a pointed path because I thought I saw quicker way to my destination. But the short way involved a multiplied expendi ure of strength, and I was glad to g back to the beaten road. We are often tempted to cry out, "Lord, how long, how long! "And if we only knew it, the lead is taking us the shortest way to His o gracious ends.

And what shall we find in the paths?

"All the paths of the Lord are mercy and truth." We are to find mercy upon the road. We are to have a gracious surprise in the desert. We are to discover wonderful things on the apparently unattractive waste. "The Lord refres ed me by the coming of Titus!" What tender surprise for Paul. And so everywhere Bunyan's Pilgrim had manifestations of mercy. At the foot of the Hill Difficulty he found a spring. Half way up the slope he found a restful arbor. In the valley of Humiliation, refreshing flowers grew about his feet.

And not only am I to find mercy, I a also to find "truth" in the Lord's ways My mind is to have the gift of illumination and vision. I am to have an increasing knowledge of God, glimpses into the Infinite. Some turn of the dreary road will bring unexpected revelations, and I shall know the secret of the Lord.

And in the third place, I am to have food when I follow the leadings of the Lord. "All thy paths drop fatness." That is very gracious to tell me that I shal find fat things in the dry place. Honey is to come out of the rock. Water will break from flint.

Such are His paths, strange, roundabout, and difficult, but with surprises of mercy and truth and sustaining food The paths are often adorned with trees of holiness, and washed with fountains of consolation, and they always terminate in everlasting rest."

"He leadeth me." And let me alter the emphasis again: "He leadeth me." That is the supreme wonder, the infinitely gracious God takes charge of thee and me! We are neither of us overlooked in the vast crowd. " I know my sheep."

"He calleth His own sheep by name, and leadeth them out." So let me step out without fear, "Wherever He may lead, through the thirsty desert or the dewy mead.

greatest difficulty, since in many cases it may make it necessary to cut the wood into very small blocks. This trouble, however, is not insurmountable and is not so expensive as it might seem.

A coal-burning stove can be converted into a wood-burning stove by removing the fire brick and substituting lighter bricks at a cost of about $1.25. Most country cook stoves can burn wood with little trouble. If a stove grate is too coarse for wood, a sheet-iron cover over a good part of the surface will make it suitable, or a few fire bricks can be used. Wood grates made in two pieces which can be inserted through the fire door and placed on top of the regular grate are on the market.

Where a fireplace is available wood can be used to good advantage, affording both heat and ventilation. Its value is to supplement a furnace, although it may replace the furnace in fall and spring with decided economy. It is not generally realized that a wood fire can be kept burning night and day in a fireplace with very little attention and with small consumption of wood. One user reports the continuous use of a fireplace in this way for over a month, with dry chestnut wood, where the amount of ashes formed by a month's use was not enough to require removal.

The secret of fireplace management is a plentiful supply of ashes, kept at the level of the andirons. As the blocksburn an accumulation of glowing charcoal forms in the ashes. This keeps on burning slowly and assists in igniting the fresh blocks on the andirons. A pocket may be formed in the ashes into which the hot charcoal may fall, forming a heat storage. Two or three blocks on the andirons with the hot charcoal in the ashes will provide an excellent fire. To check the fire, ashes are shoveled over one or more of the blocks, covering lightly all the burning wood. This will not put out the fire; it will only check the rate of burning, so that red charcoal will be found when the ashes are removed for the addition of fresh fuel.

Another point worth bearing in mind is connection with the burning of wood in place of coal is the difference in the amount of ash produced. A cord of hardwood will make only about 60 pounds of ashes, while a ton of hard coal will make from 200 to 300 pounds. Since, however, potash is now greatly in demand, the quantity which may be obtained from wood ash is worth consideration; the ashes of coal, of course, yield no potash. Stove ashes contain from 10 to 15 per cent of the valuable fertilizer potash. The present price of commercial potash, about 25 cents a pound, or $500 a ton, almost prohibits its use in fertilizers.

It is important always to keep wood ashes under cover, as they leach rapidly if allowed to become damp.

THE MISSION ON THE NIGHT OF ITS FORTIETH BIRTHDAY

you and for the continued success of this Bowery Mission, and for Superintendent Hallimond, for whom I hope many, many years of usefulness here in this work to which he has consecrated himself."

"BISHOP Burch was followed by Governor Smith. The latter is well known on the Bowery. As he said himself, in a parenthesis of his speech, he "was born just around the corner", and his home is but a stone's throw away today. The men manifested a delicious familiarity with him, which he seemed to enjoy. When he entered cries were heard of, "Here comes Al" and "Well done, Al", and as he left, hands were outstretched in familiar greeting and "Good Night, Al" "God bless you" were the last words he When Governor Smith was introduced, he was greeted with three hearty Bowery cheers and a"tiger". His address follows:

"WE are here to-night to celebrate forty years of active work on the part of the Bowery Mission, in a section of this city misunderstood throughout this country; in fact, throughout the world. When this Mission was established, there was not very much to New York by comparison with today. The great residential section of this city was south of Twenty-third Street. The Bowery was a very popular thoroughfare. It was the natural place for men from other parts of the country, coming to our city as strangers, to find their way, because from the earliest day Park Row and the Bowery contained the "poor man's hotel", commonly known and commonly referred to as the "lodging-house".

"It would be impossible for me, or for any other man, to estimate the great good that grows from an institution of this kind in all these forty years. What does a man need more than the knowledge that somebody is interested in his welfare, particularly if he is a stranger? Bring it home to yourself. It is a hard, cruel world that a man faces, in a strange land, far from home and far from friends, if there is not somebody to evince a little bit of interest in his welfare. From my own personal knowledge and my personal observation, that has been the particular and special function of this Mission during all of its useful lifetime. While it has catered to the spiritual needs of men, it also catered to their temporal needs, to the end that the body may be in that healthy condition that would give the strength, the power, the force and the vigor to withstand temptation.

"Our Divine Lord, during his lifetime on earth, preached not only the theory of charity, but by His own action He demonstrated it as an actuality.

"ON the many cold nights, the cold winter nights - when I came down to the Bowery myself, I saw the long line of homeless men, waiting for coffee, and waiting for a sandwich, and waiting for the warmth and the consolation that came from this Mission. I have had men from other parts of the state visiting me in my own home, but a short distance from here, who remarked to me that this is an institution which, while preaching the Word of Almighty God, is doing that practical thing that makes a man think that somebody in this world is thinking about him.

" The Reverend Bishop spoke about the relationship of the Church and State. The Church and the State are divided only in theory. It is a constitutional division, prescribed by constitutional law; but in reality they are one, because what the Church does for the individual that makes him a better citizen—that makes him a God-fearing man—is really the greatest and highest work that can be done for the State. And as I sat in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, witnessing the very impressive ceremony that installed Bishop Burch as the Episcopal Bishop of this diocese, I thought of the field of opportunity that was opened to him, to work not only for the state, but for that flag (pointing to the Stars and Stripes), because the man who really and earnestly studies the history of this country and studies it right and looks at it properly, must believe that it is God's own country!

" The student must have read in history how God answered the prayer of the immortal Washington at Valley Forge when he appealed to the Almighty that the Continental army might live over another winter. He must have read in that history that it was the sustaining spirit of Divine Providence that kept the soul in the great Lincoln during the four years of trial in the Civil War. He must have read in that history that the same divine providence was behind Dewey; and right here in our own time, when the impartial pen writes the history of this latest war, he will have to read that Almighty God selected this country for the salvation of the civilization of the world!

" You must read in that history that Almighty God intended this country to be a haven of rest and a harbor of refuge for the down-trodden, the poor and the oppressed of every land, and if so, He must be heart and soul behind the institution that extends that practical idea to those who arrive upon our shore. It is for that reason, I firmly believe, that He has guided the success of this Mission during its long forty years of activity. And it is that feeling within me that makes me feel proud not only as a citizen of the city, not only as a resident of this immediate neighborhood, but as the Governor of this State, to come here and congratulate your Superintendent, his force of assistants, and everybody that during these forty years have kept this old Mission going with so much success and to express to you the hope that it may have years and years of usefulness ahead not only to the City and to the State, but to the nation itself."

All through his address the Governor was applauded and the cheering continued as he left the hall to return to Albany.

Mr. Graham Patterson here took occasion to express his appreciation of the Mission and its work in a few brief remarks He was cordially greeted by the audience In the course of his address he said:

"I can't let this occasion pass without expressing to you the love which the 300,000 readers of the Christian Herald have for the Bowery Mission. And I want to assure you of their continued interest and support. It will give me pleasure to take back to them your greetings.

"We all know how much Dr. Hallimond has done for the Bowery Mission. I know the Christian Herald does, and I think everyone else feels how much we owe Dr. Hallimond for all he has done. Will you not join me in three cheers for Dr. Hallimond?"

The cheers were given with a will by the big audience.

THE Bowery Mission is launched on another decade of uplifting and saving work. We are all wondering what kind of a world this will be when it reaches its fiftieth - its Jubilee - year!

THE MOTION PICTURE IN CHURCH WORK

HOW THE MOTION PICTURE HAS HELPED ME IN MY CHURCH

By Rev. Chester C. Marshall D.D.

Pastor St. James Methodist Epis-Church, New York City.

WHEN pastor of a church in a city up the Hudson River I gave a series of stereopticon sermons on Christian biography. Instead of empty pews the church was filled and sometimes crowded to capacity.One night I preached on David Livingstone.Two years later a prominent lawyer, a member of the church was walking down the street when a street cleaner looked up from his work and said, "Say, that man, Livingstone was a wonderful fellow, was'nt he?" "Why,what do you know about Livingstone?" was the surprised rejoiner of the lawyer. "Well,I heard that sermon the dominie once preached about him down at Trinity."While engaged in his unattractive work,long months after that sermon was delivered his mind was dwelling upon it. It is possible that he would have vividly remembered if he had just heard the sermon, but in my estimation he remembered so stronglybecause he no only heard but visualized.

'In college one of my professors used to tell us when we wanted to impress anything indelibly on our minds we should write it in heavy, black ink and look at the writing until it sank into our memory That is what pictures should do when used as an accessory in church work. We remember something of what we hear, and something of what we see, but we will remember more when we both hear and see.

If nine-tenths of the impressions of life are received through the sense of sight, is it not strange that for religious education, appeal and worship we should utilize the sense of hearing almost to the exclusion of all others?

I am asked how pictures have helped me in my church work. The help has been twofold. First, it has most certainly guaranteed a much larger hearing for the gospel I have preached, — and I have never yet used a picture on Sunday nightthat I did not also preach. I am quite apt to preach longer with a picture than without one. Some time ago I announced a sermon on "Joan, Saint and Warrior." To illustrate the salient points of the sermon I used three reels of the celebrated picture "Joan the Woman." It was a very stormy, wintry night and I did not anticipate enough of an audience to hold a service. What was my surprise to find gathered one of the largest congregations of the year! After the sermon half a dozen people raised their hands to ask for prayer.

Secondly, I find pictures a great asset in pressing home the truth in a way to be remembered. This statement is powerfully substantiated in the case of my friend, the street sweeper.

ONE may ask how to use motion pictures in connection with a church service. I shall indicate a few methods apparently equally successful. " From the Manger to the Cross" is a picture of the life of Christ, in five parts. The treatment of the theme is sincerely, reverently and naturally life-like, and from the Protestant viewpoint. The pictures are carefully studied in advance,and copious notes s made. A series of sermons is decided upon, based each upon one part of the picture. Just before the sermon the reel is shown, accompanied by the singing of hymns and portions of cantatas and oratorios appropriate to the scene.When the sermon is started the foundations for the sermon have been laid, the introduction and exegesis made. The atmosphere is electric, for eyes are glistening and hearts subdued and receptive. By such treatment conversions are much more apt to follow. One who sees and hears that first sermon is coming to church the next four Sunday nights, without a doubt.

Sometimes the picture may best be used at the beginning of the service. Without announcement the lights fade into darkness and the picture flashes on the screen. When it is finished the service proceeds in the usual order. But there are many more people drawn to participate in it, and an atmosphere has been created that every preacher seeks before he preaches. For instance, a picture of mountain or sea, of which there are hundreds of superb selections, seems to quiet and subdue all discordant notesand a sermon on God's design for humanity has a powerful background. Such a glorious, majestic, aweinspiring world was not created by God to be the scene ofthe supreme tragedy of failure and defeat.

A picture may be used at the close of the service. A sermon on the rigorous demands of Christianty for sacrifriceand heroism followed by the three reel picture," The Sign of the Cross" which vividly portrays the persecutions of the heroic Christians under Nero will heighten the effect of an appeal as nothing else the writer has ever found.

A series of sermons on the characteristics and virtues of Abraham Lincoln may be given in connection with the extraordinary Lincoln Cycles. No one who has seen and heard such sermons are likely to forget them readily, and far larger numbers of people are attracted to such services than to the usual Sunday evening service.

So, whether one be preaching on missions or Biblical subjects, there is an adaptation of the picture method thatthe pastor will find of great assistance.

I HAVE not touched upon the recreational side of pictures , but here again,churches can give to a community a form of recreation more popular than any other of the age but of a quality above reproach.If we remain passive while hurtful pictures are shown, the responsibility is heavy upon us. In communities where pressure will not cause a clean-up in the movie shows what better can we do than invite people to see wholesome pictures and secure wholesome amusement under the direction of the church? The ministry of Jesus Christ was very broad and inclusive, and that of the church should be no less so.

Some will object that the selectionof wholesome pictures is too limited to make this practical. The writer had a part in giving a Motion Picture Demonstration at the Methodist Centenary Celebration at Columbus, Ohio, last summer in which over eight hundred reels of film were shown. Of course all was carefully edited, and all objectional features cut, but the delightful discovery was madethat there are hundreds of clean, sweet elevating, educational, inspiring pictures.

Film companies are ready to cooperate; the assistant manager of one of the largest companies told the writer that all changes and eliminations from their pictures would remain out. When told that there were very extensive changes, he replied that his company had decided they did not care for anything we deemed unfit to show to bear their name. Moreover he added," Whenever you see one of our pictures anywhere with an objectionable feature, write us and it will come out."

If the church has such a power in determining the kind of pictures millions of people see, it lays a heavy responsibility upon us, and we cannot be silent whether we would or no.

When Biblical pictures, properly produced and in profusion,are accessible(and they are on the way), few Sunday Schools will long be without them. They will owe this great instrumentality to the children.

My strongest plea for years has been for the production of vital, virile stories arranged as serials for use on Sunday evenings, in connection with sermon series. Such pictures as that of the Rev.Jas. K. Shields, "The Stream of Life,"presage the coming of that day.

MOTION PICTURES AND THE CHURCH

By Rev. Wm. N. Whear

Lanesboro
Iowa

WE have been using motion pictures in our church work for several months. It is a part of our effect to serve the community by providing for its needs. Our community needed wholesome amusement and recreation. No provision had been made for these very necessary aspects of community life. The public dance hall was discontinued by the influenza epidemic, and we did not want to see it start again. Bootlegging and gambling were very plainly in evidence. The only place of meeting for the men and boys was the pool-hall. The women and girls had no meeting place. The church was silent and still the greater part of the week. The situation was rather bluntly stated by one of the residents when he said "It was nip and tuck with the bootleggers and the church members, with the bootleggers one in the lead". This was the condition in Lanesboro, a rural town, in Iowa nearly a year ago.

The first step was to stop the evil. The second step was to provide something worth while and attractive. The first step was made possible by the employment of a detective who secured the evidence which led to the arrest and prosecution of lawbreakers and the removal from the community of some of the worst offenders. The second step was provided for by adoption of a community service program by means of which the church should be made to minister to the needs of the community.

We purchased motion picture equipment and installed it in the church auditorium. We secured the best films we could obtain. The films distributed by the Famous Players Lasky Corp. we found to be the best for our purpose. One night a week we showed a program of the best feature pictures such as The Old Homestead, The Blue Bird, The Dawn of a To-Morrow, The Sign of a Cross,Rags, Fires of Faith, Puddin' Head Wilson, and others. We organized a Community Club which met on Friday nights. At these meetings we exhibited films furnished by the Visual Instruction Service of the Iowa State College. These were educational pictures and were both instructive and entertaining.

When the weather grew warmer we built an open air motion picture park and on Saturday nights we exhibited programs made up of drama, comedy and educational pictures. The local band furnished music for these programs. The people responded splendidly and gathered in large numbers for the entertainments. As a result we were able to keep our people and particularly our young people home from the neighboring towns,thus avoiding the possibility of social evils which arise from uncensored "movies" and also the long joy rides home.

Not all who come to the pictures will attend the church services, but if it were not for the pictures, we could not reach them at all.

The pictures are secondary, the main business of the church is to exalt the Christ, and we believe that motion pictures in our church and in our community, is a form of real Christian service. We hope to build a plant which will provide for the social and recreational life of the community, a part of that equipment will be a motion picture projection apparatus. We have kept out a cheap commercial picture enterprise, we have lengthened the arm of the church.

Consequently we are convinced that the church which uses motion pictures as a part of its service to its community, is rendering a definite good to that community. Not how much we can abstract from but how much we can add to our community is our ideal and motion pictures help us in this direction.

"What a beautiful Rug!"

"YES, isn't it a beauty! It's a Congoleum Art-Rug. It's nine by twelve feet and I paid only nineteen dollars for it!"

"No! Only nineteen dollars?"

"Yes; and you have no idea how convenient it is and how much time and work it saves me. You see it doesn't gather grime or dirt at all. To keep it clean all I have to do is to go over it with a damp mop.

"And see how it stays down. It doesn't curl up at the edges, and the children don't kick it up as they did my old rugs. It always lies flat, just as you see it—no; it isn't fastened down."

"How do you suppose it will wear?"

"Oh, they wear splendidly. I've had one in my bedroom for over a year. Isn't this a beautiful pattern? Don't you love the soft colors?"

"Yes; and I like the way it fits into your room."

. . . .

That's the way women talk when they get acquainted with Congoleum Gold Seal Art-Rugs. They come in various sizes and patterns, so that you can find a size and pattern for any room where a moderate priced rug is required. They are a great "find" for women who wish to cover their floors attractively at small expense.

ISAIAH 61 The Mission of the Lord's Anointed One

22 A [b] little one shall become a thousand, and a small one a strong nation: I the LORD will hasten it in his time.

CHAPTER 61

The Redeemer Comes to Zion with Blessings.

THE [a] Spirit of the Lord GOD is upon me; because the LORD hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me [b] to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim [c] liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound; ★
2 To [d] proclaim the acceptable year of the LORD, and [e] the day of vengeance of our God; to [f] comfort all that mourn; ★
3 To appoint unto them that mourn in Zion, [g] to give unto them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness; that they might be called trees of righteousness, the [h] planting of the LORD, [i] that he might be glorified. ★
4 ¶ And they shall [j] build the old wastes, they shall raise up the former desolations, and they shall repair the waste cities, the desolations of many generations.
5 And [k] strangers shall stand and feed your flocks, and the sons of the alien shall be your plowmen and your vinedressers.
6 But [l] ye shall be named the Priests of the LORD: men shall call you the Ministers of our God: ye shall eat the riches of the Gentiles, and in their glory shall ye boast yourselves.
7 For [m] your shame ye shall have double; and for confusion they shall rejoice in their portion: therefore in their land they shall possess the double: everlasting joy shall be unto them.
8 For I the LORD love judgment, I hate robbery for burnt offering; and I will direct their work in truth, [n] and I will make an everlasting covenant with them.
9 And their seed shall be known among the Gentiles, and their offspring among the people: all that see them shall acknowledge them, that they are the seed which the LORD hath blessed.
10 I will greatly rejoice in the LORD, my soul shall be joyful in my God; for he hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as [o] a bridegroom decketh [1] himself with ornaments, and as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels.
11 For as the earth bringeth forth her bud, and as the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth; so the Lord GOD will cause [p] righteousness [q] and praise to spring forth before all the nations.

CHAPTER 62

The Redeemer Calls the Watchmen to Awake.

FOR Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest, until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth.
2 And the Gentiles shall see thy righteousness, and all kings thy glory: [a] and thou shalt be called by a new name, which the mouth of the LORD shall name.
3 Thou shalt also be a [b] crown of glory in the hand of the LORD, and a royal diadem in the hand of thy God.
4 Thou [c] shalt no more be termed Forsaken; neither shall thy land any more be termed [1] Desolate: but thou shalt be called [2] Hephzibah, and thy land [3] Beulah: for the LORD delighteth in thee, and thy land shall be married.
5 For as a young man marrieth a virgin, so shall thy sons marry thee: and [4] as the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee.
6 ¶ I [d] have set watchmen upon thy walls, O Jerusalem, which shall never hold their peace day nor night: [5] ye that make mention of the LORD, keep not silence,
7 And give him no [6] rest, till he establish, and till he make Jerusalem [e] a praise in the earth.
8 The LORD hath sworn by his right hand, and by the arm of his strength, [7] Surely I will no more give [f] thy corn to be meat for thine enemies; and the sons of the stranger shall not drink thy wine, for the which thou hast labored:
9 But they that have gathered it shall eat it, and praise the LORD; and they that have brought it to-

7 But when he saw many of the Pharisees and Sadducees come to his baptism, he said unto them, O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from [k] the wrath to come?
8 Bring forth therefore fruits meet for [1] repentance:
9 And think not to say within yourselves, [l] We have Abraham to our father: for I say unto you, that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham.
10 And now also the axe is laid unto the root of the trees: [m] therefore every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire.
11 I [n] indeed baptize you with water unto repentance: but he that cometh after me is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear: [o] he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost, and with fire:
12 Whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly [p] purge his floor, and gather his wheat into the garner; but he will [q] burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire.
13 ¶ Then cometh Jesus [r] from Galilee to Jordan unto John, to be baptized of him.
14 But John forbade him, saying, I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?
15 And Jesus answering said unto him, Suffer it to be so now: for thus it becometh us to [s] fulfil all righteousness. Then he suffered him.
16 And [t] Jesus, when he was baptized, went up straightway out of the water: and, lo, the heavens were opened unto him, and he saw the [u] Spirit of God descending like a dove, and lighting upon him:
17 And [v] lo a voice from heaven, saying, [w] This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.

AFTER doing much of the market hauling of thirty-two farmers around Eden Prairie, Minnesota, with a motor truck on Goodyear Cord Pneumatic Truck Tires, Mr. C. P. Page states: "I would not use solid tires again under any consideration. Hills, mud and storms don't stop the big, tractive Goodyear Cords. Their cushioning is saving truck repairs and depreciation. They also are saving gasoline and oil. I now haul more milk and other loads in less time, find the work far easier, and note that the pneumatics save our roads. Several people have adopted them as a result of my experience with Goodyear Cords."

THE experience described above affords an excellent example of what pneumatic truck tires are accomplishing for farmers. Every limitation hitherto placed on the farm use of motor trucks by solid tires has been removed with the perfected pneumatic tire. For this reason, Goodyear's pioneer work in developing cord pneumatic truck tires has been extremely opportune; it has led to the more extensive use of farm trucks during a serious scarcity of farm labor. Now farmers are finding it extremely advantageous to employ Goodyear-Cord-equipped trucks with other time-saving motor units and, thus, to motorize their work quite completely. Special information concerning the use of pneumatic-tired trucks on farms may be obtained from The Goodyear Tire & Rubber Company, at Akron, Ohio.

CHRISTIANITY THE CORNERSTONE

AT a great congress of the magnates and leaders of the Church of England recently— the first national assembly of the Church since the year before the world-war — the Bishop of Peterborough made an urgent plea for Christian Unity, which has attrached wide attention on both continents. In his opening address, he used this remarkable passage:

"Unless we rebuild civilization on a Christian basis, its break-up will be assured. Our business is to Christianize the new outlook, to anchor the community sentiment to the firm ground of Christian principle."

'Most thoughtful men who read such a declaration, while agreeing with the general statement, will naturally inquire: "How does the Bishop of Peterborough mean to bring this about?" Appeals have already been made in England for Church Unity, and in this country also, probably to a greater extent than anywhere else. Public sentiment has given wide and cordial expression in support of the proposition. There has been no lack of enthusiasm either, and many of the grandest and ablest leaders in the Church on both continents have come out in frank acknowledgement that the Unity of the Church was essential to its efficiency, and was demanded by the new situation and conditions.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, at the congress in question, appealed not only to the Church of England, but to the Non-Conformist churches and to all others throughout the world, his appeal being on similar grounds. He regarded the present time as the most important in human history, with the sole exception of the first Advent. He believed that if the world is to be won to Christ it must be through the closer union of the Churches, a result for which all believers should constantly pray.

In his address already referred to, the Bishop of Peterborough regarded as significant the increasing number of suggestions of policies and programs submitted, some political, others industrial. He talked of the "reservoir of service and sacrifice" which only waits to be captured for the Kingdom of God.

All this, though eloquently spoken, has a familiar sound. We have heard the same thoughts expressed time and again, and even the Bishop's words recall similar passages heard repeatedly: "Never has the Church been faced with a task so colossal or an opportunity so superb." He then goes by straight line, to the real root of the matter, and this is what is stirring the churches abroad to-day. He says:

"The very mention of so great a task recalls us at once to our limitations, and most of all to the weakness which arises from our unhappy divisions. The unification of the Christian Church would probably do more to convert the world than all our competing missions put together. The walls that divide us will not be demolished by a few well-meaning individuals pulling out a brick here and there. They can only be swept away by such a rising tide of spiritual life as will come to a Church that, through prayer, has reached a greater knowledge of God."

It would be folly for anyone to belittle the value of organization. It means order, power, efficienty; but as far as any human observation can reach the multiplied organizations of the Church of Christ, owing to their divisions, their rivalries, their antagonisms, and their lack of co-operation, constitute a positive detriment, if not an impossible barrier. An army or a political party which has a single great objective in view could never hope to attain it divided into wrangling factions or regiments. And the result of these conditions he finds to be that "Our people at large do not know what God is or what God can do... In the Church we have been too prone to harp on obsolete phrases and quote authorities when we ought to have been opening the door and showing the way to the living God... The whole organization of our worship should be lifted clean out of the slough of controversy and viewed solely as a means of revealing God to men. . . The challenge that comes to the members of Christ here and elsewhere is simply: Are they prepared to make this enterprise of the Kingdom literally the first consideration in their Church life, the aim of all their energies, the test of all their methods?"

We submit these plain and bold words, necessary at such a time, to the careful consideration of everyone who is interested in the Church Unity question. There is more strength than weakness in the Bishop's words.

PRINTERS' STRIKE ENDING

THE printers' strike which has caused great annoyance to the periodicals and their patient patrons, is breaking up.

The last four issues of the Christian Herald were printed in Chicago, but this issue is run on our own presses in New York.

Compositors being still on strike, the typing of this number is done on Oliver typewriters, and the sheets are reproduced by the photo-engraving process.

As this issue goes to press, the compositors are returning to their posts, and our Christmas number, December 20th, will appear in its regular manner and old-time form.

GETTING BACK TO BUSINESS

ELECTION is over, the annual national November spasm has safely passed, unworthy ambitions have been rebuked, and in the main, the good, common-sense of the American people has again asserted itself in choosing deserving and reliable men to hold the reins of authority in the various states. It is true, all the ideals have not been attained. There have been "wet" victories and "dry" victories, but nothing to materially shake the confidence of the friends of prohibition. As for the women voters, they did remarkably well everywhere. In New York, the women's vote overcame the dickerings of the political factions, and their use of the ballot showed the discrimination of veterans in helping to make the best men win.

THEY KNEW THE BOWERY MISSION

AT was a very notable as well as gracious tribute that was paid t the Bowery Mission by the Governo of the Empire State, when he spoke fro the platform at the recent celebratio of the Mission's fortieth anniversary He had made a special trip from th Capitol in Albany to perform what b regarded as a duty. Born "just aroun the corner from the Bowery," he knew th neighborhood well, and his vivid description of the famous old thoroughfare and its surroundings in his boyhood days, was an effective part of hi address. But what surprised and delighted his audience was his familiarity with the work of the Mission and it transforming influence upon the moral and social character of the Bowery an its population. "This," he said, "speaking from my own personal knowledge and observation, has been the particular and special function of this Missio during all of its useful lifetime. While it has catered to the spiritua needs of men, it has also catered t their temporal needs." Jesus had taught charity not only in his preaching while he lived among men, but had demonstrated it in action. The Governor had personal knowledge of the Bowery Mission' charity. He had seen the "Bread Line" in the cold nights of winter; had personally witnessed the feeding of multitudes of hungry and homeless. Friends who had seen it also had told him "That is an institution which, while preaching the Word of Almighty God is doing that practical thing which makes a man feel that somebody in this world i thinking about him."

No finer testimonial was ever paid t the work of the old Bowery Mission than Governor Smith expressed in these simple words. He regarded the Mission in its helpful efforts in behalf of the poor, the homeless, the wrecks of humanity as a practical interpretation of the Great spirit of America which "the Almighty had intended to be a haven of rest and a harbor of refuge for the down-trodden, the poor and the oppressed of every land." It was a demonstration of Christian Americanism in action, and had been so through all the years of its existence. And in this work, the Governor firmly believed, it had been Divinely guided and blessed from the beginning.

Bishop Burch's beautiful address was no less congratulatory. He believed that no other work in the great city had "brought so many despondent hearts and souls to the level of a new courage, a new inspiration, and a new determination to go forward and to do better and live better, than the Bowery Mission." He had been at its meetings and had "always come away with a new light, new strength, new grace and new power to go forward in the work God has committed to my care."

These gracious and stimulating testimonies, coming wholly unsolicited and unexpected from such distinguished sources, are deserved tributes to that great body of Christian men and women who have stood so faithfully by the Mission, and who have unfailingly supplied its needs by their contributions through the Christian Herald. Such generosity brings a double blessing. As in "The Vision of Sir Launfal," the voice of Christ comes softer than silence, saying:

"Who gives himself with his alms, feeds three-- Himself, his hungering neighbor, and me."

Have Created a New-Type Six

OUR VICTORY MODEL
A TWO-YEAR REVISION
SCORES OF IMPROVEMENTS

There are numerous improvements shown in the new Mitchell Six. Not novel features and minor attractions, but changes based on new ideas and standards.

The great object has been to add strength and endurance—to cut down upkeep and operating cost. And to offer a car which will remain silent and new and efficient.

Where Cars Differ Cars of the same class don't differ much in original performance or in appearance. The great difference shows in the way a car stays new. Most of these Mitchell advances aim at lasting satisfaction.

That means greater strength. We are using larger parts, better steels, new heat treatments. The rear axle is much larger.

It means minimized wear. We are using larger bearings. Cylinders are ground to utter smoothness—pistons are perfectly fitted. Crankshafts are twice balanced on two new-type machines. The axles have both roller and ball bearings.

Finer Workmanship This new Mitchell has a new-style body. The lines are new, the color, finish and equipment. There is also a stauncher body frame. There is a finish that keeps its lustre. There is a new-grade top which stays new.

The upholstery is high-grade leather. The hair filling is interlaced so the cushions keep their shape.

The steering gear is ball bearing. A new disc clutch is adopted. Brake efficiency is increased by new design. Long cantilever rear springs give matchless riding comfort, yet ample tests have proved them unbreakable in use.

The Years Will Show Not all these gains are apparent when the car is new. But every year will bring them out more clearly. You will realize that when you study the details and compare the new type with the old.

In our opinion, this new Mitchell is the future type of Six. Men who pay today's car prices will demand these higher standards. Go see them and judge this for yourself.

MAKING THE HOME ATTRACTIVE

By Mrs. Nestor Noel

SO many things have been written about making the home attractive to the country boy and girl that I shall not say anything about them here. Every farmer wants to keep his children at home. Perhaps they do try, but not always successfully. There are so many attractions outside the home, even in a small town, and when it comes to the big towns they are innumerable.

Girls put up with almost any kind of a home whilst they are very young. They do not mind what it is like. They play and sleep and eat and do little else. If they have had an untidy home from the start, they get so used to it that they do not know it is untidy. But wait until these girls grow a little older, go about and see other houses; and now the discontent begins. Once children come to the school age, they make comparisons, and this is the cause of trouble.

Therefore one of the first things we must do to keep our girls at home is to make the house itself tidy and attractive. What are girls, after all, but miniature women? And most of them have the home-keeping instinct. So they like to have a tidy, pretty house. This need not cost too much money. Curtains well laundered, table cloths and pretty cushions, here and there, help make the home attractive.

But it is not only the house that girls look at. They like to see their mothers well dressed. Some women seem to think that because they have reached middle-age, they can go about all day in kimonos and look more or less neglected. But there is no age at which a woman can afford to neglect her personal appearance. She owes it to her children to keep tidy and well dressed. Girls go to see their girl friends and often they meet other mothers who, whatever their work, somehow manage to look always nice and neat. Then they return to their own homes and see their own mothers look slovenly and untidy - their hair twisted in an ugly knot at the back of the head and shoes all worn out and down at the ankles. Now, these girls want their friends to find their mothers well dressed. So when they know they cannot do this they meet their chums elsewhere, and the home life is broken up, the mother stays lonely and miserable at home while her girls are enjoying themselves elsewhere, sometimes in amusements which are not always innocent.

Thus, the second condition to keep our girls at home is for the mother to be tidy. This does not mean extravagantly dressed, but well and suitably.

A third thing which will make the home attractive for girls is to have amusements for them in the house. Gramaphones, pianos and other musical instruments are not within the reach of all. But there are games which do not cost much, and every house where there are girls should be provided with some of these.

A fourth way to make the home attractive is to allow our girls to bring their friends, now and then, and to try to show them they are welcome when they come. And here we must be careful, because girls quickly abuse this privilege and may wear us out waiting on their friends. They should have a certain day for visitors, say, once a week or once a fortnight. For they will not like to go everywhere and never ask their friends in return. This is not natural. We do not do it ourselves. We ask our women friends when we choose and we make them comfortable. So there is no reason why our girls should not ask their girl friends too. We must be fair to our girls. If we do not consider them now, neither will they consider us later on.

The 5th and perhaps the best way to make our homes attractive to our girls is to make our lives and our interests one with theirs. If we show them that we do not care for the things they like and want to live our lives outside theirs, they will take us at our word and soonfind other interests. Women who spend too much time at clubs cannot have it to give to their girls. We must be "pals" with our growing girls and enter into their interests as they change from year to year. Nor must we be astonished if they change. What they like one year they will not like the next. We must not blame them for this, nor must we call them inconstant. They are of the growing, changing age. We forget that we were once there ourselves. We are so settled now - some of us!

I have seen mothers blame their girls because they had a different friend every year. I would not blame a girl for this. She is feeling her way; she is studying her world. It may be that she is gaining by these constant changes.

I like to see mothers who keep their hearts young with their daugheers. A girl whose best chum is her mother will not go far wrong.

I remember knowing just such a family. There were only two girls; but girls and mother seemed to have the same interests in common. At Christmas time, it was beautiful to watch them. The mother, as she arranged the presents for the next day, and decorated the house, seemed to enjoy the fun as much as her daughter. It was my first insight into a beautiful, real home; for I, alas, never had one of my own as a child, though I am thankful to say I have one now.

O, if only mothers realized how lucky they are to have daughters!

There isn't a thing in the whole, wide world that should interest a mother like her own growing girls. I cannot imagine why it is that some women do not take more interest in their own children. They'll belong to clubs and societies and go about to theatres and operas; but what becomes of their daughters meanwhile they do not seem to care. Yet there will surely come one day when these same women would give all they have to get back their daughters' love and confidence. But it will be too late then! To be interested in our girls now - to give them our full attention is the most important thing we have to do. Afterwards we will be very sorry if we have not done this.

So let us do our best to make our homes and ourselves as attractive as we can, for the sake of our growing girls. We shall have our reward for it afterwards - never fear. If we did not, it would be our own fault. A growing girl with her new interests, her ever-changing friendships and her enthusiasms is most attractive to the woman who loves children. And as for those extraordinary women who do not like them - ah, well, I have nothing for them but a great pity! They do not know all they have missed in life!

DRESSING the WINTER BABY

By Elizabeth FitzHugh

THE baby's clothes should be as simple and as comfortable as it is possible to make them. Pinned bands are worn first, and these may be made from the remnants of flannel that are left when the flannel petticoats are cut out. They are torn lengthwise of the material, and measure 7x18 inches. The edges are raw.

Three or four of these bands are enough. At about six weeks the child becomes more active and puts on woven bands with shoulder straps that are easier to keep in place. Size 1 is needed, in either a mixture of silk and wool or of cotton and wool.

The first shirts, or vests, button all the way down the front to avoid drawing them on over the head. There is a double-breasted style that has an extra thickness in front and is excellent for the Winter baby. Size 1 in shirts is usually outgrown in about three months, so it is wiser to get size 2 in cotton and wool. Three or four shirts will be needed. It is a good plan to have a wooden drying frame for them to prevent shrinkage.

Birdseye is a very satisfactory material for diapers. It is slightly more expensive than flannelette or daisy cloth, but less heating and therefore less irritating. Birdseye diapers may be bought readymade by the dozen in sanitary packages already laundered, or the material may be bought by the ten-yard piece. It must be washed with a mild soap until soft. Two dozen of the first size, 18 x 36 inches, are needed, and two dozen of the larger, 22 x 44 inches. When the smaller size have been outgrown they may be folded within the larger.

The Winter baby will need four flannel petticoats, made of wool in the Gertrude style and fastening with a single small button on the shoulders.

THE WORLD NEWS OF THE WEEK

THE TREATY IS REJECTED.

THE Senate, on November 19, flatly rejected the Treaty of Peace with Germany which President Wilson brought home with him from Versailles. The vote was 38 for ratification and 53 against. Preceding this final action, two other votes had been recorded: 39 for ratification with the so-called Lodge reservations and 55 against, and 41 for and 50 against on the same resolution, a motion to reconsider. Immediately after the rejection Senator Lodge introduced a concurrent resolution declaring peace to exist between the United States and Germany. This is intended to pave the way to an independent peace treaty.

The last day of the debate, which has continual without intermission, since early July was one of intense excitement during which feeling ran high. It began with a conference of the administration Senators, who listened to a letter from President Wilson to Senator Hitchcock in which the executive urged a united vote against the majority program. Adoption of the Lodge reservations, the President declared, would mean nullification of the treaty. He expressed the hope that by its rejection some parliamentary means would be found to bring it back for further consideration at the new session of Congress, "when the door will then probably be open for a genuine resolution of ratification."

GOVERNOR CALVIN COOLIDGE

Booms for the nomination for the Presidency and Vice Presidency already have been launched in behalf of Mr.Coolidge as a result of his victory in Massachusetts on a law and order platform.

The line-up of Senators followed closely the forecasts that have been public for several weeks. The last vote showed seven Democrats aligned with the Republicans and one Republican-Mc Cumber--recorded with the Democrats. The President failed, at the last minute, to get support from a group of Republicans known as "mild reservationists" who really wanted to save the treaty but at the same time wanted reasonable safeguards for American interests. Effort was made by some of the President's friends to have him officially informed of the action of the Senate, but Senator Penrose objected. "He'll hear it soon enough anyway," declared the Pennsylvanian. And on motion by Senator Lodge, the Senate adjourned sine die, overlooking a long-time precedent of informing the President of such intention and formally inquiring of him if he had further business to be brought before the Congress before adjournment.

The last days of the debate were devoted to consideration and votes on between thirty and forty reservations proposed either as a part of the majority program or by individual members. All the latter were voted down with one exception, and all the Lodge reservations with one exception were approved. The determination of the Senate to insist on radical reservations or absolute rejection of the treaty seriously disturbed many of the adherents of the League of Nations in Europe and interviews and editorial expressions appeared in the news despatches obviously intended to influence the action of the ratifying body.

Just what will be the next step in the treaty fight is uncertain. Senator Lodge's resolution paving the way to a separate peace has the right of way when Congress reconvenes. In this connection it is recalled that the President, on his western tour, declared that if the treaty was rejected by the Senate, he would appoint Senators Lodge and Knox on a commission to conclude a separate peace.

The statement was not taken seriously at the time, however, and perhaps should not be taken seriously now. In the view of the observers in Washington, every effort will be made by the administration leaders to get the treaty back before the Senate in the new session, maneuver a deadlock, and then depend on being able to obtain ratification with such reservations as they will be forced to accept which, in the President's mind, do not nullify the treaty.

D'ANNUNZIO ANNEXES DALMATIA.

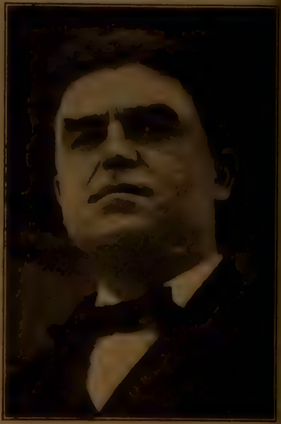
COLONEL Gabriele d'Annunzio, from his strong hold in Fiume, has declared a good part of Dalmatia under his jurisdiction following a sensational cruise along the Eastern Adriatic coast aboard an Italian destroyer when he called at Zara and several other ports. Word was sent out from Fiume that the commander was going to Rome for a conference with the government on the final disposition of Fiume. He went aboard the destroyer Nullo with his staff. Instead of crossing the Adriatic, however, he proceeded down the coast where other warships met him and acted as escort to Zara. On his return to Fiume he took the title of "Commander of Fiume and Commander of Dalmatia." At Zara he was warmly welcomed by the commander of the Italian forces of occupation. The latter swearing allegiance to de'Annunzio, was placed in command of the d'Annunzio forces in the district.

THE THREE BANKHEADS

Rarely is the distinction accorded one family to have two members serve in the same Congress but the Bankhead family is a notable exception. Not only is Senator John H.Bankhead a member of the upper branch of Congress but his son William B. Bankhead, represents the Tenth Congressional district of Alabama. The third member of the distinguished trio is Colonel Henry M.Bankhead, another son of Senator Bankhead, whos is stationed in Washington with the Quartermaster.

COAL MINES STILL IDLE.

OFFICIALLY, the strike of the United Mine Workers of America was called off by order of the United States courts. Actually, the miners continue on strike, and in the meantime the leaders of the miners and the committee of the owners have been meeting with Harry A. Garfield Federal fuel administrator, and Secretary of Labor Wilson in an effort to reach some kind of agreement. Thus far all these efforts have been without result. The only definite offer made by the operators provided for substantially twenty percent increase in wages on a contract running to March 31,1922. The workers indignantly rejected it as "too preposterous to answer" in the words of John L. Lewis, their chief. Lewis did not even consider it seriously enough to make a counter proposal.



(Copyright International)

This is the man who organized the coal strike as acting president of the United Mine Workers of America, and directed it until enjoined from activity by the Federal Court in Indianapolis.

While the conferences are in progress in Washington, the coal situation all over the country has reached an alarming stage. Several states have taken arbitrary action to put the mines in operation and others are contemplating similar steps unless the government intervenes, as Britain did during the recent railway strike, and undertakes to assure operation. The Kansas Supreme Court has taken over the mines in that state and placed them in the hands of three receivers. If the miners will not return to work the National Guard will be used, the court says. North Dakota has taken over one mine and a request has been made of the Ohio Supreme Court that it take similar action in regard to all the workings in Ohio. The Railway Administration forecasts a radical reduction in train service. As this is written, the roads leading out of Chicago have less than one week's reserve fuel supply.

ARRESTING THE RADICALS.

FEDERAL and State police authorities have conducted scores of raids on headquarters of radical organizations and at the last estimate nearly 400 men and women were under arrest. The majority of these persons are members of the Union of Russian Workers. The others are affiliated with the I. W. W. and other lesser organizations which footsteps come down the marble hall. Bi Gage always wore rubbers when he went anywhere in particular. He had them on that morning. He took careful note of the name on the door: "WARREN REYBURN, Attorney at Law," and the number. Then he slid down the stairs as unobserved as he had come, and made his way to a name and number on a bit of paper from his pocket which he consulted in the shelter of a doorway.

When Warren Reyburn started on his first trip to Tinsdale his mind was filled with varying emotions. He had never been able to quite get away from the impression made upon him by that little white bride lying so still amid her bridal finery, and the glowering bridegroom above her. It epitomized for him all the unhappy marriages of the world, and he felt like starting out somehow in hot pursuit of that bridegroom and making him answer for the sadness of his bride. Whenever the matter had been brought to his memory he had always been conscious of the first gladness he had felt when he knew she had escaped. It could not seem to him anything but a happy escape, little as he knew about any of the people who played the principal parts in the little tragedy he had witnessed.

Hour after hour as he sat in the train and tried to sleep or tried to think he kept wondering at himself that he was going on this "wild goose chase," as he called it in his innermost thoughts. Yet he knew he had to go on. In fact, he had known it from the moment James Ryan had shown him the advertisement. Not that he had ever had any idea of trying for that horrible reward. Simply that his soul had been stirred to its most knightly depths to try somehow to protect her in her hiding. Of course, it had been a mere crazy thought then, with no way of fulfilment, but when the chance had offered of really finding her and asking if there was anything she would like done, he knew from the instant it was suggested that he was going to do it, even if he lost every other business chance he ever had or expected to have, even if it took all his time and every cent he could borrow. He knew he had to try to find that girl! The thought that the only shelter between her and the great awful world lay in the word of an untaught girl like Jane Carson filled him with terror for her. If that was true, the sooner some one of responsibility and sense got to her the better. The questions he had asked of various people that afternoon had revealed more than he had already guessed of the character of the bridegroom to whom he had taken such a strong dislike on first sight.

Thus he argued the long night through between the fitful naps he caught when he was not wondering if he should find her, and whether he would know her from that one brief sight of her in church. How did he know but this was some game put up on him to get him into a mix-up? He must go cautiously, and on no account do anything rash or make any promises until he had first found out all about her.

When morning dawned he was in a state of perturbation quite unusual for the son and grandon of renown lawyers noted for their calmness and poise under all circumstances. This perhaps was why the little incident with Abijah Gage at the station annoyed him so extremely. He felt he was doing a questionable thing in taking this journey at all. He certainly did not intend to reveal to this curious old man who he was or what he wanted in the town.

The little gray house looked exactly as Jane had described it, and as he opened the gate and heard the rusty chain that held it clank he had a sense of having been there before.

He was pleasantly surprised, however, when the door was opened by Emily, who smiled at him out of shy blue eyes, and stood waiting to see what he wanted. It was like expecting a viper and finding a flower. Somehow he had not anticipated anything flower-like in Jane's family. The mother too was a surprise when she came from her ironing, and, pushing her wavy gray hair back from a furrowed brow lifted intelligent eyes that reminded him of Jane, to search his face. Ma did not appear flustered. She seemed to be taking account of him and deciding whether or not she would be cordial to him.

"Yes, I had a telegram from Jane this morning," she was scanning his eyes once more to see whether there was a shadow of what she called "shiftiness" in them. "Come in," she added grudgingly.

He was not led into the dining-room, but seated on one of the best varnished chairs in the "parlor," as they called the little unused front room. He felt strangely ill at ease and began to be convinced that he was on the very wildest of wild goose chases. To think of expecting to find Elizabeth Stanhope in a place like this! If she ever had been here she certainly must have flown faster than she had from the church on her wedding night.

So, instead of beginning as he had planned, to put a list of logically prepared keen questions to a floundering and suspecting victim, he found the clear eyes of Ma looking into his unwaveringly and the wise tongue of Ma putting him through a regular orgy of catechism before she would so much as admit that she had ever heard of a girl named Betty Hope. Then he bethought him of her daughter's letter and handed it over for her to read.

"Well," she admitted at last, half satisfied, "She isn't here at present. I sent her away when I found you was comin'. I wasn't sure I'd let you see her at all if I didn't like your looks."

"That's right, Mrs. Carson," he said heartily, with real admiration in his voice. "I'm glad she has some one so careful to look out for her. Your daughter said she was in a good safe place, and I begin to see she knew what she was talking about."

It was then the strong look around Ma's lips settled into the sweeter one, and she sent Bob after the girl.

"Are you a friend of hers?" she asked watching him keenly.

"No," said Reyburn. "I've never seen her but once. She doesn't know me at all."

"Are you a friend of her -family?"

'Oh, no!"

"Or any of her friends or relations?" Ma meant to be comprehensive.

"No. I'm sorry I am not. I am a rather recent comer to the city where she made her home, I understand."

Ma looked at him thoughtfully for a moment. It wouldn't have been called a stare, it was too kindly for that, but Reyburn thought to himself that he would not have liked to have borne her scrutiny if he had anything to conceal for he felt as if she might read the truth in his eyes.

"Are you- please excuse me for askin'- but are you a member of any church?"

Reyburn flushed, and wanted to laugh, but was embarrassed in spite of himself:

"Why, yes--I'm a member," he said slowly, then with a frank lifting of his eyes to her troubled gaze, "I united with the church when I was a mere kid, but I'm afraid I'm not much of a member. I really am not what you'd call 'working' at it much nowadays. I go to morning servce sometimes, but that's about all. I don't want to be a hyprocrite."

He wondered as he spoke why he took the trouble to answer the woman so fully Her question was in a way impertinent, much like the way her daughter talked. Yet she seemed wholly unconscious of the fact.

"I know," she assented sorrowfully. "There's lots of them in the church. We have 'em too, even in our little village. But still, after all, you can't help havin' confidence more in them that has 'named the name' than in them that has not."

Reyburn looked at her curiously and felt a sudden infusion of respect for her. She was putting the test of her faith to him, and he knew by the little stifled sigh that he had been found wanting.

"I 'spose lawyers don't have much time to think about being Christians," she apologized for him.

He felt impelled to be frank with her:

"I'm afraid I can't urge that excuse. Unfortunately I have a good deal of time on my hands just now. I've just opened my office and I'm waiting for clients."

"Where were you before that? You did not just get through studying?"

He saw she was wondering whether he was wise enough to help her protege

"No, I spent the last three years in France".

"Up at the front?" The pupils of her eyes dilated eagerly.

"Yes, in every drive," he answered, wondering that a woman of this sort should be so interested now that the war was over.

"And you came back safe!" she said slowly, looking at him with a kind of wistful sorrow in her eyes. "My boy was shot the first day he went over the top."

"Oh, I'm sorry," said Reyburn gently, a sudden tightness in his throat.

"But it was all right." She flashed a dazzling smile at him through the tears that came into her eyes. "It wasn't as if he wasn't ready. Johnny was always a good boy, an' he joined church when he was fourteen, an' always kep' his promises. He used to pray every night just as faithful, an' read his Bible. I've got the little Testament he carried all through. His chaplain sent it to me. It's got a bullet hole through it, and blood marks, but it's good to me to look at, 'cause I know Johnny's with his Saviour. He wasn't afraid to die. He said to me before he left, he says: 'Ma, if anythin' happens to me it's all right. You know, Ma, I ain't forgettin' what you taught me, an I ain't forgettin' Christ is with me.'"

Mrs. Carson wiped her eyes furtively, and tried to look cheerful. Reyburn wished he knew how to comfort her.

"It makes a man feel mean," he said at last, trying to fit his toe into the pattern of the ingrain carpet, "to come home alive and whole when so many poor fellows had to give their lives. I've often wondered how I happened to get through."

She looked at him tenderly:

"Perhaps your Heavenly Father brought you back to give you more chance to do things for Him, an' get ready to die when your time came."

There was something startling to this self-composed city chap in hearing a thing like this from the lips of the mother whose beloved son was gone forever beyond her teaching but had "been ready." Reyburn looked at her steadily, soberly, and then with a queer constriction in his throat he looked down at the floor thoughtfully and said:

"Perhaps He did,"

"Well, I can't help bein' glad you're a church member, anyhow," said Mrs. Carson, rising to look out the window. "She needs a Christian to help her, an' I'd sooner trust a Christian. If you really meant it when you joined church you've got somethin' to fall back on anyhow. Here she comes. I'll just go an' tell her you're in here."

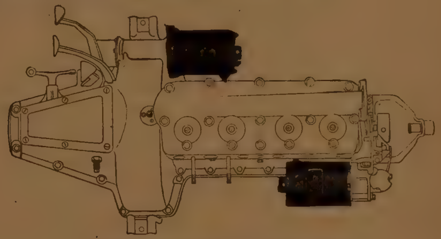
Better Lighting and Easier Starting for the Ford

ATWATER KENT

STARTING AND LIGHTING for the 1919 FORD

Touring Car or Roadster
(Not suitable to old style Ford Cars)

THIS equipment has been produced to meet the large and growing demand for a high-grade, dependable starting and lighting system for the new style Ford.



Atwater Kent Starting and Lighting System installed on new style 1919 Ford motor

Consider these advantages:

1 Standard six-volt, single wire design as used on the highest-priced cars.

2 A starting motor that will crank the stiffest engine on the coldest day.

3 In the Atwater Kent System, when the lights are thrown on, the generator automatically delivers a larger current supply and the battery gets under all conditions its proper charge. This one feature ensures long life for the battery and low upkeep cost.

4 Exide storage battery, high-grade ammeter and specially designed, extra-heavy carburetor choke lever.

5 System is furnished complete from the tail lamp and bulb to the smallest washer required for installation. There are absolutely no extras of any sort to buy.

6 Easy to install. Carefully prepared instruction book with twenty illustrations is packed with each outfit.

7 Requires little attention. Oil starter and generator every 2000 miles and follow directions for care of storage battery.

8 Increases resale value of your car to such an extent that its installation is really an investment.

Last, but by no means least:

9 Atwater Kent quality. Careful design, skilful workmanship, rigid inspections have held this new product to the highest Atwater Kent standards of the past.

What 15c Will Bring You from the Nation's Capital

Washington, the home of the Pathfinder, has become the World's Capital and reading the Pathfinder will be like sitting in the inner council with those who will mold the world's destiny for the next generation

The little matter of 15c in stamps or coin will bring you the Pathfinder 13 weeks on trial. The Pathfinder is an illustrated weekly, published at the Nation's center, for the Nation; a paper that prints all the news of the world and tells the truth and only the truth; now in its 27th year. This paper fills the bill without emptying the purse; it costs but $1 a year. If you want to keep posted on what is going on in the world, at the least expense of time or money, this is your means. If you want a paper in your home which is sincere, reliable, entertaining, wholesome, the Pathfinder is yours. If you appreciate a paper which puts everything clearly, fairly, briefly—here it is. Send 15c to show that you might like such a paper and we will send the Pathfinder 13 weeks. The 15c does not repay us; we are glad to invest in new friends. Pathfinder, Box 70, Washington, D. C.

OUR MAIL BAG

MISS E.D., New Village, N.J. Since your Christian Endeavor Society is composed of Presbyterians, Methodists, Lutherans and Baptists, it would be difficult to satisfy all of these with a denominational mission study course. You can obtain from the Missionary Education Movement, 160 Fifth Ave., New York City, complete courses which are entirely interdenominational. The movement prepares mission study courses for all denominations, which cover the whole field of missions. They also have stereopticon lectures and various other helps toward missionary interest.

Mrs. N.M.J. The passages you mention (Hebrews 10:26-27 and 12:17), refer to those who have deliberately turned away from Christ,-thus crucifying him afresh. There is a question as to whether these may hope to return, but God's love is boundless and his mercy unfettered except by an unworthiness or lack of faith. These verses do not apply to the weak one, whose profession is sincere but who falls before temptation and comes anew, repentant and believing, to seek pardon and restoration. The Master who forgave Peter three denials waits for the repentant sinner with full pardon and with the promise that He will give you His strength to add to yours so that you need not fall again. It is the fault of our little faith that we fall into sin. It is not necessary for pardon to confess a sin publicly, if the sin has wronged no one; but public confession often helps the confessing one to avoid repeating the sin.

Mrs. M.A.C., Little Fork, Ill. Sunday is the old heathen appellation; Sabbath is the Jewish, and the early Christian Church simply used the term, "Lord's Day," which was the first day of the week and honored as the day of the resurrection.

E.B., Cleveland, O. Hypnotism is regarded as somewhat of a pseudo-science. There are many so-called records of wonderful hypnotic powers, but they are not well authenticated.

M.M.B., Grand Rapids, Mich. Yes it is a joyful duty we owe to God to acknowledge before men His goodness to us, and particularly on special occasions. Many urgent requests for prayer come to us from those who are in sore trial of some sort, and who ask God's people to join with them in prayer for their deliverance. Such requests are laid before the Prayer League of the Bowery Mission. It may be weeks or even months afterward that we are gladdened by the news that relief has come. And surely one who has received such blessing should be willing to acknowledge it before the world, and to give God the glory.

C.W.R., Elizabeth, Ill. 1. "To esteem others better than ourselves," is a familiar maxim, intended to convey the suggestion of modesty. Most of us are apt to overvalue our own good qualities and abilities, and underestimate those of others. 2. Matt. 15:11 and Mark 7:15-both verses dealing with the same idea should be read in this connection, and as an explanation of the Saviour's meaning, verses 17, 18, 19, and 20 of the same chapter in Matthew. 3. Your other questions assume that the world is more given over to sin today than at any previous time in its history. Many will not agree with you, holding that the works of evil are more manifest and more widely known, but refusing to admit that evil has stronger power.

P.F.Y., Hoopeston, Ill. 1.-The early fathers never claimed that the Apostles' Creed, so-called, was framed by the apostles themselves, but that the document, as we now have it, was formulated later as a concise statement of the apostolic faith, based upon their writings. There is a tradition which attributes the Creed to the apostles, each of whom is credited with having contributed a clause to the declaration. 2.- That certain of the nations had dim perceptions of immortality long before the Christian era is recognized as true, but it was not until Christ came "bringing life and immortality to light," (II Tim. 1:10) that the race of men began to relize the truth. Jesus lifted the veil that we might see more clearly the "gift of God," which He bestows upon those who are forgiven and accepted, and who believe on and follow after His Son. 3.-The expression "The day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die," is rendered more clearly in the Hebrew: "dying, thou shalt die," the meaning being: "While thou art faithful, I shall give thee an exemption from death, but if thou transgress, this exemption shall be withdrawn, and from that hour thou shalt be subject to death like the lowest animals."

J.W.Y., Covington, Ky. The opening verses in Hebrews 6, and especially verses 4,5 and 6 have been much discussed. "Those who were once enlightened," that is, who received a vivifying knowledge of the truth and who had taken satisfying yet incomplete steps towards the heavenly life, even awakening the first impulses of faith, had hesitated and at the call of the world had deliberately turned away, thus rejecting anew the power of Christ's sacrifice which was drawing. It is to such as these- whose faith had been temporarily awakened - that the apostle applies these despairing words (V.6), "It is impossible to renew them again unto repentance." What is humanly impossible, however, is possible with God, and it is only through the miracle working power of the Holy Spirit in the heart that such a one can be turned again from the world and turned in the right direction. Every Christian minister and Gospel worker knows how difficult it is to win a backslider. Such a one seems impervious to the Gospel truth. There is hope, however, when the person is distressed about his spiritual condition, as it gives evidence that the spirit is still striving with him to turn him again. Peter's backsliding and denial was most flagrant, and yet, through divine mercy, he became repentant, was forgiven and restored.

H.W.K., Georgetown, O. "Divine" means pertaining to, or derived from, or of the nature of God. "Divining" is the art of foretelling, discovering or presaging, a term applied to waterfinders, stargazers and persons who pretend to possess magical powers.

W.E.L., La Mesa, Calif. We have no available statistics as to the comparative seating capacity of the amphitheaters of the U.S., but should think 40,000 an extreme figure. Certainly it seems almost incredible that the human voice could reach the fringes of such an audience.

J.E.McL., Yorkton, Sask., Can. We are well pleased with the general and religious news of your paper. We have just before us a picture, Chateau-Thierry, where the Americans turned the tide of war. You forget those who broke the Hindenburg Line and fought many a hard battle before the Americans entered the war. We are pleased that the Americans came to help and give them great praise for hard fighting, but there were others. We want to be on friendly terms. The Anglo-Saxons must stick together like brothers or let Christian civilization be wrecked and ruined. Get behind the President and show the world that the soul of the American nation is true.

HOME for the GROWING BOY and GIRL

By Kitty Parsons

IF more people realized the advantages of making home attractive to the growing boy and girl, there would be fewer young people haunting the "movie" houses and generally looking for entertainment and amusement elsewhere.

Of course youth must have recreation of some sort and a wholesome harmless variety, which at the same time may be largely satisfying, can be offered in the home if parents will only give the matter their serious attention. At least, is certainly well worth the effort.

No boy or girl of fourteen or fifteen can be expected to stay at home and study six nights out of the seven and not have some change on the seventh night. Some long to be out six out of the seven and if their studying is done in the afternoon they soon tire of watching mother and father read and sew, or perhaps start off for the theatre or the "movies" with some other mothers and fathers.

Now, it is not really hard to make home attractive to the younger members of the family. We may dislike to have our peace disturbed but after all we do owe them something, and a reasonable amount of noise is necessary to all normal young people. I have been in homes where the piano was always kept locked so that the children---not infants at that---could never touch it. Most people have a piano or at least a talking machine of some sort and if no one in the family can play, there is usually some girl or boy friend who can. Encourage him to come to the house and keep up to date with some of the best popular music. You may not care for some of it, but much is pretty and tuneful, and a great deal can be purchased at the 5 and 10. Have some good song books there too, but don't cover the music rack with the pieces of twenty five years ago unless their particular beauty makes them worth it. Even at that the modern young person cries out for all things modern. Variety is the spice of life--especially of their lives! Encourage games and singing of all kinds. Nothing is so helpful in allowing people to get rid of superflous energy--"Let off steam," so to speak-- as singing. Almost everyone loves to sing, whether he will admit it or not.

One never failing attraction for all young people is food! The house where cookies are not always locked out of sight and where a possible pan of fudge is not an unheard of thing, is sure to be popular. It isn't very much trouble for mother, on a hot summer night to have a large pitcher of lemonade or some other cooling drink in the ice chest.

Let them play, let them sing, let them play games and eat and drink lemonade or hot chocolate on a cold winter night; let them do anything in reason, if they pick up after themselves and do not needlessly drive everyone else out of the house because of the racket they are making.

Haven't you heard someone say:" We can't go over to my house because company disturbs mother and father. Let's go up to Emma's"

It is the right of every growing boy and girl to have a place to bring his or her friends at any reasonable time. They will be better men and women with a more healthy outlook on life in general than if they spent the same amount of time in moving picture places and ice-cream parlors and nobody-knows-where. It really is very little effort for any parent and it is an effort which she will be repaid all the rest of her life.

The Week in the World's News

have for their object the overthrow of government.' An outrage on Armistice Day when a group of I.W.W. fired into a parade of veterans of the World War and killed three and wounded several more men is the most flagrant of radical crimes since the bomb plot of mid-summer. The ex-soldiers lynched one of the leaders of the demonstration and sixteen were put in jail. New York was threatened with serious trouble over a proposed "Red" meeting in one of the parks, but raids by secret service officials and police broke up the plans for it. More than 150 agitators from New York City and the territory surrounding it were taken to Ellis Island to await trial and possible deportation. A New York State Committee investigating radical propaganda had before it Ludwig A.C. Martens, self-styled Soviet Ambassador to the United States, and learned from him that much of the Lenine propaganda for the United States has been passing through his Office. His expenses, amounting to $15,000 a week, have been cared for by remittances from Russia brought over by courier. He says he is negotiating with 25,000 American business firms for contracts for Russian business when the embargo on Soviet Russia is lifted. As one result of Martens' testimony the committee has decided to ask the Federal government to deport him.

ANOTHER NOTE TO MEXICO.

WILLIAM O. Jenkins, American Consular Agent at Puebla, Mexico, captured by bandits and released on the payment of a ransom of $150,000 has been arrested and imprisoned by the Carranza government on the charge of being a party to his kidnapping. The State Department promptly dispatched a note to Mexico City demanding Jenkins' release and warning Carranza that any further molestation of the consular agent would "seriously affect the relations between the United States and Mexico, for which the Government of Mexico must assume sole responsibility." The arrest is characterized as "absolutely arbitrary and unwarranted." Jenkins declares he was kidnapped because he was a representative of the United States, that he was taken from the consular office and that the bandits stole the money in the office, including consular funds. He says the Mexican Government did nothing to obtain his release, but on the contrary caused"him every possible inconvenience."

BOLSHEVIST SUCCESSES.

ALMOST co-incident with the evacuation of Omsk by the Kolchak government and the severe defeat of the Denikine Army in Southern Russia by the Bolsheviki, Premier Lloyd George announced in the House of Commons that an agreement had been reached with France to withhold further supplies from the Anti-Bolshevist forces and to stop all aid to the Russians. He declared he would no longer undertake responsibility for the restoration of order in the old empire. "In whichever direction we go", he said, "we are marching into a fog."

The failure of General Yudenitch of the Northwestern Army to recover his losses in front of Petrograd and reform his forces brought about his removal from command and the appointment of General Laidoner, commander-in-chief of the Esthonian army, to succeed him. Laidoner has devoted his time to extricating the army from danger and preparing for another campaign, which, however, is not probable before spring. In fact, the withdrawal of Allied aid combined with winter conditions will effectually stop all operations on a large scale until warm weather and give the Moscow Government another five or six months to strengthen itself at home.

THE RAILROAD BILL.

CONGRESS has virtually decided that the country's railways shall be returned to private ownership with some scheme of federal assistance until they are able to get on their financial feet. The House, by passing the Esch bill by a vote of 203 to 159, has taken the first step in the process of surrendering the roads. The Senate, at the time of its adjournment, had before it the Cummins bill, which is the result of the deliberations of the upper house committee on interstate commerce. The Senate is expected to pass its own measure when it reconvenes and then will come the task of reconciling the two measures in conference. Much criticism has been made of the Esch bill because it provides no method of preventing strikes either by compulsory arbitration or other method, and according to the general interpretation, makes no provision for conciliation unless such an effort is demanded by the employees. The bill continues the Interstate Commerce Commission with rate-making powers already possessed under the law by that body.

DRY ENFORCEMENT MACHINERY.

JOHN F. Kramer, of Ohio, has been appointed as National Prohibition Commissioner to enforce the national prohibition law. He will have a mobile force of agents to move about the country as necessity requires in addition to supervising agents in each of the nine districts into which the country has been divided. The Government is placing much dependence on state and municipal police officials to aid in enforcement of the law.

MORE PAY FOR MINISTERS.

THE Centenary Conservation Committee of the Methodist Episcopal Church announces a general increase of ministers' salaries amounting in some cases to 100 per cent. A sub-committee making a canvass of the country found that salaries have been ranging Harold Bell Wright knows life and how we live it or he could never have created Brian Kent. And how we should love to meet dear old Auntie Sue, the sweetest and most charming character it has ever been our good fortune to know. You come to love Judy, too. Poor, twisted, mountain-bred Judy. She will touch every sympathetic heart. And Betty Jo! She is just—well! just Betty Jo. She just naturally lives in the pages of the book. There are thrilling incidents related with such vivid realism that one reads with breathless interest. And yet the fascinating power of the story is rather in the skillful visualization of the clash and conflicts of life's invisible forces out of which the thrilling incidents come.

The Parting

LONG before that boy of yours shall finally go out to make his own way he has started to leave home mentally.

At this vital period, especially now at this glad Christmas season, you can do Your Boy no greater kindness than to put into his hands The American Boy, the one all-boy magazine that supplements home and school as friendly companion and wise counsellor of more than 500,000 spirited American boys. Without preaching, without moralizing, but through live, healthy, clean and intensely interesting stories The American Boy gives boys a previous understanding of the world they can get in no other way.

More than ever before The American Boy for 1920 has been planned to entertain and develop your boy. THIS Christmas gift is the QUICKEST to buy, EASIEST to send, SUREST to please, CHEAPEST in the long run. Repeats itself every month.

THE AMERICAN BOY

"The Biggest, Brightest, Best Magazine for Boys in All the World"

Give yourself an idea of the sparkling quality of the features that will make The American Boy entertaining and helpful. No greater exponent of the joyous outdoors exists than Enos A. Mills, naturalist, lecturer and "Father of the Rocky Mountain National Park." Every month in 1920 he will delight The American Boy's readers.

"Boys Who Used Their Brains" is a fascinating series about boys who have overcome handicaps and won success. Inspiring and helpful to any boy.

Departments on fine, helpful hobbies.

Boys rarely get early in life a clear idea of the world as it is, to help them begin to plan their way. So, The American Boy will publish articles that explain government and public affairs: that will help your boy find where his abilities lie: that clearly define the relation of his school to later life: and many others that will aid in making him strong and clean-hearted as he enters manhood.

➔ Prof. Brander Matthews of Columbia, says: "The American Boy's fiction tends to inculcate independence and self-reliance. It shows the value of character as well as cleverness. It would help a healthy boy become a healthy man."

from $200 a year in some rural communities to $6,500, the highest paid. The average pay under the new plan will be $1,500 a year as against $1,111 in 1918. In working out the scale, the committee considered size of family, the location of the charge, the prices of commodities that prevail and other necessary items. Efforts are being made to persuade the individual churches to take care of the increases, but where local conditions make this impossible, the committee is guaranteeing the increase.

CLEMENCEAU FOR PRESIDENT.

THE French general elections, the first to be held since before the war, resulted in an overwhelming victory for the adherents of Premier Clemenceau. The Extreme Socialists especially suffered a heavy loss. The wide-spread support of the premier and his policies has started a nation-wide boom for him for the presidency of the Republic to succeed Raymond Poincaré. Generally the result is taken to mean that radical activity is under thorough control in France and that the swing is strongly against anything that would tend to delay rapid recovery from the effects of the war. On the other hand, in Italy, the radical wing of the Socialists have made such big gains they even threaten the life of the dynasty.

FOREIGN

STUDENTS STRIKE AGAINST AMERICANS— Students at Peiyang University in Tien-tsin objected to an American professor on the ground that he was incompetent. Feeling grew against all the American instructors and the students body went on strike. The dean of the University resigned in consequence.

BUELOW GOING TO ROME—Prince von Buelow, formerly German ambassador to Italy, has gone to Rome on a special diplomatic mission.

BULGARIA WILL SIGN—Bulgaria has sent word to the Peace Conference that the Bulgar delegation will sign the Treaty of Peace.

GERMANY HAD 810 U-BOATS—Admiral Capelle, formerly German Minister of the Navy, told the War Investigation Commission in Berlin that Germany built 810 submarines before and during the war. The investigation has revealed a deep-seated feeling of animosity toward the United States on the part of the German Leaders.

HORSES BACK ON ST. MARK'S — THE Venetian authorities have replaced the famous Four Horses over the portal of St. Mark's. Elaborate ceremonies marked the restoration. The group was removed early in the war to avoid danger from aerial bombs.

ROOM FOR 150 PERSONS—Italy is building a huge dirigible, designed for trans-Atlantic service, which will accomodate 150 passengers.

WILHELM AT DOORN— The ex-Kaiser has taken possession of the House of Doorn which he purchased some time ago but he will not move into the house until early in 1920. His first act was to raise the wages of the gardener forty cents a week.

CHINA WILL NOT NEGOTIATE— China refuses to enter into negotiations with Japan over Shantung. She will refuse to take any action in reference to the peninsula until the league of Nations begins to function.

VON MACKENSEN IS FREED— Field Marshal von Mackensen, one of Germany's most famous commanders who has been a prisoner of the Allies since the armistice, has been released from internment in Salonica and permitted to return home. He was a prisoner for several months in Hungary before he was transferred to Salonica.

CUTS SHORT VISITING— The British Food Ministry has issued an order forbidding in a private house the entertainment of guests for a longer period than four weeks.

HUGO HAASE DEAD—Hugo Haase, President of the Independent Socialist Party in Germany, who was shot by an assassin in October as he was entering the Reichstag building, has died from his wounds.

LETTS TAKE RIGA—The Lettish army has driven the Germano-Russian forces out of Riga and taken over the city. A fleet of Allied war ships off the coast aided in the operations.

SPANISH LOCKOUT ENDED— Employers and workmen in Spain have reached an agreement on an eight-hour day and the lockout which had paralyzed industry for some time has been ended.

DOMESTIC.

PLAN $30,000,000 DRY FUND— Representatives of the Anti-Saloon League in conference in Montgomery, Ala., have planned to raise a fund of $30,000,000 with which to wage a world-wide prohibition fight.

SOCIALISTS RENOMINATE BERGER —The Socialists of Milwaukee, the day after Victor Berger was excluded from the House of Representatives by a vote of 309 to 1, renominated him as the party candidate to stand at a special election on December 19 for his vacated seat.

THE AMERICAN LEGION'S FIRST HEAD—The American Legion has elected Franklin D'Olier of Philadelphia as its first National Commander. He was demobolized as a lieutenant-colonel in the quartermaster corps.

SENATOR MARTIN DEAD— Senator T. S. Martin, of Virginia, one of the best known members of the Upper House, died after a long illness at his home in Virginia. Carter Glass, Secretary of the Treasury, was named to fill his unexpired term, leaving the Treasury portfolio vacant.

TOLEDO WITHOUT CARS—On last election day Toledo, O., voted to remove the street cars from the street, because of a disagreement between the city and the company over fares. The company thereupon took every piece of rolling stock across the state line into Michigan and for weeks the people of Toledo have been either walking or riding to work in automobiles and buses.

WETS WON OHIO— The final count of votes in Ohio where ratification of the prohibition amendment to the constitution was the important question in the election showed the proposal for ratification defeated by 641. The "drys" have asked for a recount. The state prohibition enforcement law also was defeated. The liquor interests are expected to seize on this in a final effort to delay constitutional prohibition.

5,000,000 FARMERS UNITE—Delegates representing the farm bureaus of thirty-three states meeting in Chicago have organized the American Federation of Farm Bureaus representing about 5,000,000 farmers. Its purpose is to promote and protect the social, economic, business and educational interests of the farmers of the nation.

FORTUNE FOR THE CHURCH—Mrs. Margaret Zimmerman of New York City left $1,700,000 in her will to the Episcopal Church and philanthropic organizations. St. Michael's Church receives $570,992 and the Cathedral of St. John the Divine receives $140,000.

RELIGIOUS

201 DENOMINATIONS IN AMERICA-- The Church Year Book of the Federal Council of Churches furnishes many interesting facts of church life. There are 201 denominations in America; 41,926,854 members; 191,796 ministers and priests, and 203,432 church buildings, valued at $1,676,600,582. The total expenditures for last year was $328,809,999. There are 207,294 Sabbath Schools with 2,042,583 officers and teachers and 20,557,560 scholars.

500,000 MINUTE MEN-- During the month of November the Interchurch World Movement employed throughout the country an army of 500,000 minute-men to explain to business men the object and purposes of the organization and the methods of its work. Speakers were sent to business and fraternal gatherings and to mid-week meetings in all Protestant churches interested in the movement.

FORWARD MOVEMENT IN CANADA--The Presbyterian Church in Canada is pushing a "Forward Movement" with the motto: "Forward! In Congregational Life! In Missions! In Community Service!"

FIRST MISSIONARY TO INDIA--One hundred years ago in response to an advertisement of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions for"a pious physician for India," Dr. John Scudder of New York, presented himself to the Board and was accepted for service. This was the beginning of medical missionary work. The centennial of the departure of Dr. and Mrs. Scudder on their pioneer mission was observed on November 2, in the Old South meeting house, Boston, in which historic building the farewell services were held. There are now 100,000 baptisms a year in the field in which the Scudders were pioneers.

BIG PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES--The minutes of the Presbyterian General Assembly for 1919 shows that forty-one of the churches have a membership or more than 1,500 and ten a Sunday School membership of more than 1,400.The ten largest churches in point of communicants are:Seattle First,6,390; Brooklyn Central, 3,177; Los Angeles Immanuel,2,804;Rochester Brick, 2,557; Pittsburgh First, 2,482; Brooklyn Lafayette Avenue, 2,406; New York Fifth Avenue, 2,400; Denver Central, 2,377; Rochester Central,2,296; Philadelphia Bethany, 2,287.

DR. KELMAN INSTALLED — Dr. John Kelman,called from abroad to succeed Dr. J.H.Jowett as pastor of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church in New York City, has been installed in his pastorate. It was announced that his salary will be $12,000 a year and suitable quarters.

SOME TRADE FACTS

THE Department of Commerce at Washington has just issued an extremely interesting table of imports and exports, for the nine months ending September 30 and for the month of September which shows the rapid growth of trade with Central Europe and other regions involved in the war. For the first nine months of the year, for instance, we imported $1,132,748 of goods from Austria-Hungary as against $50,878 for 1918.The samemonths for Belgium show, respectively, $2,901,644 and $12,924, while the figures for Germany are $2,757,179 and $15,663. We bought more goods from Germany in nine months in 1918, then, than we did from Belgium. Trade with Holland for the same months increased from $6,391,651 to $52,080,393 and with France from $48,084,494 to $73,283,556.

Exports to Austria-Hungary for the first nine months of the year were $26,059,308 and to Germany $31,756,574. There were no exports to either country for the same months in 1918. Exports to France and Italy fell offthis year but to Holland they increased from $4,588,181, in 1918, to $176,980,904.

Of our total exports from January to September of $5,869,647,541, food-stuffs in crude condition or in some stage of manufacture amounted to $2,085,112,223. The balance of all trade in our favor, or balance of exports over imports, was $3,172,674,280.

The Gift of Gifts

The Gift of Perfect Writing

Perfect pencil writing is embodied in Eversharp—always sharp—never sharpened.

Perfect pen writing is found in Tempoint—the pen with the tempered point.

Singly, or together, they constitute the Christmas gift of gifts that will win hearts and hands—and for all time.

EVERSHARP carries enough lead for a quarter million words, and provides a clean point for every word. Always sharp—never sharpened. No whittling.

TEMPOINT has a hand-hammered gold nib, impervious to the harmful effects of caustic ink acids. Unaffected by hard, continuous writing. Never becomes "sprung." Always writes just like the owner.

Eversharp and Tempoint are sold separately, or may be had together in a handsome jewel case. Pencil prices start at $1. Pen prices at $2.50. Dealers everywhere.

Does It Pay To Keep Chickens In Winter?

ANOTHER day without an egg!

Mary Crouterfield sighed as she scattered grain to her flock of hungry fowls. They had done fairly well all summer, and she had high hopes of sending the children to school in shoes bought from egg money, of getting a washing machine to make her own work easier, of buying a dress for the Thanksgiving dance, of——but what was the use? No eggs today—none yesterday—and only two the day before! At this rate, it would take all the money she had made in the summer to keep her chickens alive till spring.

But some people make money from their hens, she thought despondently. Fresh eggs were in the market, even in winter when prices went sky-high. Where did they come from?

So absorbed was she in thinking of it that she did not see her friend, Olive Preston, till she leaned from her buggy, reining in her horse by the fence.

"Want anything from town?" she asked. "I'm taking in some eggs to sell."

"Eggs! Where on earth did you get them? I've just about made up my mind it doesn't pay to keep chickens in winter."

It Does Pay

"Pay? I should think it does pay! It pays better in winter than it does in summer, because eggs bring such high prices. But, of course, it can't pay if the hens just gobble up their feed without paying for their board."

"That's just it! How do you get the eggs? It seems as if my hens just go on a strike as soon as the damp, cold weather sets in."

"Oh, my dear, that's a mistaken idea that most people have, that hens won't lay in winter. They can lay and will—if you know the secret."

"What is the secret?" asked Mrs. Crouterfield anxiously.

"It's really very simple," answered her friend. "I used to have the same trouble. A lot of hungry hens and one or two eggs every other day or so. It surely was discouraging. Then one day, when I felt about as you are feeling now, I stopped and asked myself the reason. 'Winter is surely a hard time for hens,' I thought, 'just as it is for humans. Must keep their bodies warm, no chance for exercise—no wonder it takes all the feed they can eat just to keep their bodies in condition, let alone laying eggs.'

"Then the secret dawned on me. A tonic, to be sure—to keep the hens healthy and vigorous, so that the feed they ate could make eggs.

"I had heard of the 'More Eggs' Tonic put up by E. J. Reefer, the poultry expert of Kansas City, Missouri, so I sent a dollar at once for a package and started feeding it to my hens. What a wonderful change took place! Where I was getting one or two eggs before, now I get fifty a day! And my hens are in such wonderful shape.

"That's the way I am making my chickens pay in winter. Really, I wouldn't be without Reefer's 'More Eggs' Tonic for a single day. You are foolish, dear, to let your chickens eat you out of house and home when you could be making so much money now that eggs are so high!"

"I guess I'd better get some right away," said Mary slowly. She did—and that was how Mary Crouterfield started making good money from her hens in winter.

They can lay and will if you know the secret

There are 400,000 poultry raisers, dear reader, who have learned from Mr. Reefer, America's poultry expert, the secret of making hens pay in winter. He has received thousands of thankful letters in praise of his wonderful "More Eggs" Tonic. You'll be interested in reading a few of these letters.

160 Hens—1500 Eggs

I have fed two boxes of "More Eggs" to my hens and I think they have broken the egg record. I have 160 White Leghorns, and in exactly 21 days I got 125 dozen eggs.—MRS. H. M. PATTON, Waverly, Mo.

"More Eggs" Paid the Pastor

I can't express in words how much I have been benefited by "More Eggs." I have paid my debts, clothed the children in new dresses, and that is not all—I paid my pastor his dues. I sold 42½ dozen eggs last week, set 4 dozen, ate some, and had 1½ dozen left. — MRS. LENA McBROON, Woodbury, Tenn.

One Package "More Eggs" Quadruples Egg Yield

Dear Mr. Reefer: I am well pleased with your "More Eggs" Tonic. Was getting only four eggs a week; now I am getting 1½ dozen each day, and have fed only one package of "More Eggs." It is certainly fine. — Yours respectfully, MRS. W. S. MULLINA, Statesville, Tenn.

"More Eggs" Puts Hens in Fine Condition

Dear Mr. Reefer: Your "More Eggs" Tonic is wonderful. I never saw such a change in poultry as your "More Eggs" makes. It is fine.—Yours respectfully, F. E. SCHAMP, Minnie, W. Va.

15 Hens—310 Eggs

I used "More Eggs" Tonic, and in the month of January, from 15 hens, I got 310 eggs.—MRS. C. R. STOUGHTON, Turners Falls, Mass.

1368 Eggs After One Package

Last fall I bought a box of your "More Eggs" Tonic, and would like to have you know the result. From January 1st to July 1st, my hens laid 1368 eggs.—A. E. WHITE, Scranton, Pa.

"A Godsend"

"More Eggs" Tonic is a great Godsend. I was getting only 12 eggs a day, and am now getting 50 a day.—MRS. MYRTLE ICE, Boston, Ky.

20 Times as Many Eggs

Dear Mr. Reefer: The one-dollar size of "More Eggs" Tonic you sent me was a success from the start. From one and two eggs a day from about 40 hens I brought them up to 22 a day.—Yours very truly, LOUIS H. HILL, Letway, Fla.

27 Eggs Instead of 1

I began feeding "More Eggs" Tonic to my flock of hens in November. At that time I was getting one egg every other day. Then on December 5th I brought in 27, which is very good for that time of the year. I think "More Eggs" Tonic is fine.—MRS. E. H. PALMER, Dundee, Mich.

Surely, when thousands of people take the trouble to write Mr. Reefer such enthusiastic letters, this must be true: Reefer's "More Eggs" Tonic does increase egg production; it does bring bigger egg profits. And if it has done this for 400,000 chicken raisers all over the country, it can do the same for you. "More Eggs" is a scientific tonic. It revitalizes the flock and makes the hens lay all the time.

If you wish to try this great egg producer and profit maker, send $1.00 to E. J. Reefer, the poultry expert, 8499 Reefer Building, Kansas City, Missouri, and he will send you a generous, full size package. The results of a few cents' worth will amaze and delight you. So confident is Mr. Reefer of the results that the million-dollar Merchants Bank guarantees that if you are not absolutely satisfied your dollar will be returned on request. So there is no risk. Send a dollar today and profit by the secret which has taught 400,000 poultry raisers how to make hens pay in winter.

FOR A NATION-WIDE REVIVAL

A General Evangelistic Effort Is Demanded, in Which All Churches and Communities May Join—"Back to Christ" the Only Remedy for the World's Unrest

DURING the last few months God's people in America have been praying earnestly for a spiritual revival. Now that the nation is facing one of the most serious crises in its history, they are all the more earnest and importunate in these petitions. Many intimations of such a general desire have reached us. The writers point to the deep social and industrial unrest, the disturbances fomented by subtle revolutionary propaganda, the dangerous plots that have come to light, disclosing the hand and brain of anarchy at work, planning the destruction of our government and the substitution of a reign of the Red Terror. We have been sleeping on the edge of a volcano. Anarchy's trail leads everywhere. Nothing is too sacred for it to attack.

These misleaders of the people, men who live by agitation, stirrers up of strife, would pull down the Temple of Freedom to attain their object. Their propaganda includes the blowing up of buildings, the shooting of police, the putting an end to religion, and the merciless destruction of all who oppose them. Even labor, loyal as it has been, finds traitors among its leaders. Its organization has been honeycombed by propagandists of destruction. And so the situation has gone from bad to worse until our people are sick of strikes, surfeited with agitation, weary of unrest and plotters, and ready to turn to God as the only Source whence real help can come.

These are some of the reasons why the Christian men and women of America who love their country, and whose sons and brothers gave their lives that the world might be safe for democracy, are convinced that the time has come to appeal for help to a higher Power than that of man to save America from this new peril. They write us: "We won a victory for right and freedom in the great war; now we must plead mightily with God to help us to triumph over those hostile elements that threaten us at home. He alone can give us a peace that will abide."

THERE are other reasons, also, why they should now desire to see the nation on its knees in prayer. Last year, the churches of America made the smallest gain recorded in twenty years, the net membership increase being only seven per cent.—284,540. Including Roman Catholics, the total of active Christians in the United States cannot be estimated at more than 40,000,000. It is accepted as a very moderate estimate that at least 30,000,000 of the remaining 60,000,000 are unevangelized. Thirty millions unreached by the Gospel! We claim to be a Christian nation, but the figures themselves stand as a contradiction of such an assertion. Until these millions have been reached by the Word of Life, the task of the Church at home remains uncompleted.

But there is need for more than a revival among our neglected churchless population. The Nation itself, deeply stirred as it was by the trials and sorrows of the last five years, needs a new spiritual awakening. We have set up idols and forgotten the worship and loyal service we owe to Christ, our rightful Lord and King. Claiming to be his followers, we have followed after power and pleasure and wealth and indulgence. It is a time when, as a Nation, we must look to Divine counsel and wisdom, not only to lead us out of our immediate troubles, but to renew within us the Spirit of Christ and the passion for his service.

Writing of the crisis that faces our churches, Rev. Charles L. White, D.D., says: "The slogan of the churches of the present century may well be: 'Have the tools ready; God will give thee work!' If America can be made thoroughly Christian, its influences will carry more weight than hitherto among the non-Christian nations, and will counteract the evil tendencies of militarism, autocracy and social degeneracy in so-called Christian nations. America is the place where the forces of evil are doubtless massing to make their attempt to destroy the present economic order. The touch of Christ alone can settle the industrial unrest in our land."

May God give us the courage and the wisdom and the holy resolution to take up this great task now, leaving the results wholly in His hands.

THAT eloquent Methodist, Bishop Luther B. Wilson, in a recent address said: "If St. Paul were walking today the streets of London, or Paris, or New York, as in the old days he walked the streets of Athens, he would be looking into the faces of men, rich and poor, wise and unlettered, saying to them: 'You do not see. You do not understand. You miss the great understanding fact of the age. You must not think of it simply as a day of agitation, of unrest, of partisan ambition, of profiteering, of ecclesiastical exploitation. It is the day of salvation!' He would be saying to the leaders of the world's thought: 'See if this is not true.' Everywhere humanity is hunting for the way toward that which it thinks will be better than what it has known. If we saw more nearly as Paul saw, as his Master and ours saw, we should be calling out to disappointed men, 'This is the hour when the night begins to wane. Look, the hills are blossoming with dawn.' ".

This is indeed the goal for which all the world is now seeking—Jesus Christ and his salvation. They feel that nothing else can quell the turbulence of the times, or calm the unrest of the peoples; nothing save Christ in business, Christ in labor, Christ in legislation, Christ in all of the mutual relations of man and man, can bring back peace and contentment and a measure of happiness. They feel that there is no other cure for the world's sickness.

The Greater War, the war that is to win America and the world for Christ, is only beginning. It is to be the logical corollary of the war just closed. Leaders of the Church, and Christian men and women everywhere, feel this to be true deep down in their hearts. They feel that the coming of the Kingdom, not only in our own lives, but in those of all the peoples of the earth, can be either delayed or hastened by our neglect or fulfilment of our duties in this Greater War. This is the undertaking for which all real Christians now burn with ardor to begin.

IN THE emergency that we are facing today, the churches and communities might call to their aid the trained evangelist. Whether the field is new and hitherto unevangelized, or whether it be the quickening of the old, which has degenerated into worldiness and indifference, the evangelist's work is indispensable. His methods are searching and thorough. Churches need to be reawakened, reconsecrated, energized anew for Christian service. Communities need the forceful presentation of the Gospel Message to call the sinners to repentance, and to quicken lives that need divine purpose and direction; the stranger among us needs the friendly invitation which induces the first step toward the Christian life. All need the message of repentance and the pledge of forgiveness.

David Livingstone, the great missionary, when asked where he wanted to go to serve God and win souls, replied:, "I am ready to go anywhere, so it be forward!" So with our spiritual workers today. In the great mission of soul winning, they stand ready to go anywhere—to the crowded cities, the smaller towns and villages, the rural communities, the mining districts, the lumber camp, the shop, the factory —if by so doing they can win souls and impress upon the people the need of "getting right with God" and of seeking assurance of salvation through Jesus Christ. The evangelistic workers are "the minute men" of the great Gospel army, to carry the word of Life to the multitudes, and prepare the way for the Church to receive many into the Christian fold.

Responding to the "many suggestions" that have reached us, urging that an effort should be made at helping the beginnings of revival work, the Christian Herald has arranged with the Interdenominational Association of Evangelists for filling all demands that may be made by pastors, churches and religious organizations throughout the country, where the services of an evangelist are desired. Such requests may be sent to the Christian Herald by mail, and will be forwarded by us to the General Secretary of the Association. That organization will make the usual arrangements and undertake to supply the type of evangelist needed. It will also outline the preparatory work, including a week, or if necessary two weeks, of prayer and preparation, cottage meetings and other work. These latter arrangements will be made direct between the Association of Evangelists and the pastors, churches and communities which have sent in applications. This is the organization of which such well-known evangelists as Rev. W. E. Biederwolf, Rev. Milford H. Lyon, Rev. Wm. A Sunday, Rev. Charles R. Scoville, Rev. Clyde Lee Fife, Rev. M. B. Williams, and several hundred others are members.

We invite all who feel the need of a revival in their community to take advantage of this offer of services. Set the wheels going; the Evangelistic Association will do the rest. Further, the Christian Herald will invite contributions to an Evangelistic Fund, to be applied in localities where the people are unable, on account of poverty, to secure the services of an evangelist under ordinary conditions. We look forward to the hearty cooperation of our readers in this movement, and trust that they may make it available wherever practicable. All communications at the outset should be addressed to the Christian Herald, Bible House, New York. We have the assurance of the Evangelistic Association that they will respond to all applications passing through our hands under this arrangement, and we hope that the widest advantage may be taken of their services by many churches and communities throughout the country.

Americanized Kiddies

Lucy and Ruth Lem

THERE is one home in Stratford, Conn., that the apostles of Americanization can pass by in perfect safety. Mr. and Mrs. David L. Lem are the Chinese parents of three very thoroughly Americanized kiddies. English is their real mother tongue and the two older girls, Lucy and Ruth, are constant in their attendance at Sunday school. They haven't yet reached the age of public school, but they are fascinated by the Bible stories and the fairy-tales that are such a big part of the indoor life of normal American children.

THE STORY OF OUR STRIKE

Six Weeks of Publication Difficulties End with Unique Issue and Now Christian Herald Is Bigger and Better Than Ever

WHEN the printers employed by the Paris newspapers went on strike early in November the publications combined what forces they had left and produced one great daily paper which they called the Paris Press. The Paris Press had a circulation each day of about 7,000,000 copies and filled the journalistic gap for three weeks until the labor differences were adjusted.

When the printers employed in the New York book and magazine plants walked out, were locked out or took "vacations" on October 1 the Paris makeshift obviously was impossible and the two hundred and fifty publications affected faced the alternatives of suspending or leaving New York City for some place where printing plants were being operated. It is probable that never in the story of industrial disputes in this country has the innocent bystander—in this instance the publishers of books and magazines—been so severely mauled as he was during the seven weeks the strike continued. Suspension meant complete temporary loss of revenue and possibly some permanent loss, while the transfer of printing to other cities meant a greatly increased cost of production.

The magazines in particular keenly appreciated their responsibilities to their subscribers and readers. In only a few instances was there even a thought of suspension, but the difficulties attending production in the circumstances could scarcely be exaggerated.

The Christian Herald congratulates itself that it emerged from the strike with a record equaled by but one weekly magazine of general circulation, and that one found itself in a situation where its facilities for printing were almost entirely intact. In so far as the monthlies were concerned their troubles were small compared to those of the weeklies, for the reason that they go to press a long time in advance of the date of publication and the period between issues gave them opportunity to arrange a comparative leisure to meet their needs.

In the case of the Christian Herald, each week must see some 300,000 copies printed, bound, addressed and mailed—each copy containing from thirty-two to sixty-four pages. This is a task colossal in itself when conditions are normal, and it was generally thought to be an impossible one under the abnormal conditions of a strike. The readers of the Christian Herald, however, will agree that in this instance the impossible was accomplished, at least in a commendable good part. But to begin at the beginning and let you all in on the story of seven weeks' effort to provide you with your magazines and the features you all look forward to from week to week:

On the morning of October 1, every printing plant of consequence in New York City ceased operation. The Christian Herald for October 4 was on the presses with the edition only partially completed when the wheels stopped turning. It was literally a mechanical impossibility to run off the remainder of the edition and some of our subscribers missed their copy of this number.

As soon as the strike was a certainty members of the Christian Herald staff began scouring the country for a plant which could undertake a contract as large as this magazine presents. They were in touch with nearly a dozen cities which offered some facilities for printing on a large scale, but the scale was not large enough. Printing plants capable of producing a 300,000 edition of a large magazine each week are not to be found everywhere. Usually they are especially constructed and their capacity is absorbed under long-time contracts.

At last a company was found in Chicago which had some idle time on a group of its presses. The latter could be adjusted to approximate the Christian Herald form and style. Graham Patterson, the president, and Charles Grant Miller, the Managing Editor, hurried to Chicago, established themselves in the print shop, overcame numberless obstacles of a mechanical and editorial nature and soon the edition for October 25 was on the way. Then there was another unavoidable gap of a week when the issues for November 8, November 15 and November 22 were produced.

It seemed now, however, that nothing more could be done, for the facilities we had been using in Chicago were needed for work on a long-standing contract of a commercial character. It might be possible to print just one more issue of the magazine, we were told, but no one could guarantee that it would be bound, addressed or mailed. So Mr. Patterson and Mr. Miller returned to New York and the canvass began all over again.

More presses were found, but they were useless unless the editorial material could be set up in type. Here, the way was clear. The result of the expedient resorted to reached your hands as the issue for December 13—certainly as novel, interesting and valuable a copy of the Christian Herald as you have ever read. Your first question, of course, was: "How was it done?" And like most all big and valuable ideas it is simple. We just used the typewriter!

As a starter, a battery of a dozen Oliver typewriting machines was brought to the office, each accompanied by an expert typist. Instead of sending the manuscripts to the printing office, they were given to the typists who transcribed them on long sheets of paper ruled in narrow columns. As fast as these sheets left the typists they were corrected for any typographical errors and pasted on a large piece of cardboard in the exact proportions of the pages of the Christian Herald, but some 25 per cent. larger. Headings, drawn by hand, page numbers and illustrations were added, and the page, complete, was sent to the photo-engraver, who made a reproduction of it in zinc the size in which it appears in print. So instead of type, the whole magazine was printed from zinc plates.

The experiment of "making up" a magazine or book by this typewriting process has aroused a great deal of interest among all persons interested in the printing industry and inventive minds already are at work endeavoring to perfect the method to the point where the present system of typesetting can be done away with entirely. At present, however, the expense of typing as compared with typesetting is one vital factor against it.

With this issue we return to the style in which you have been accustomed to read the Christian Herald. The strike is over and while the old routine of production is not yet altogether possible, and may not be for some days to come, your magazine will reach you again regularly, and on time.

And one other assurance may be in place: it will be bigger and better and you are going to get more out of it the next twelve months than ever before.

Great as were the issues involved in the world war, those the people of the United States are facing in this period of reconstruction are equally vital. There are questions to be solved of an importance which cannot be exaggerated, and they cover the scope of human interests. Political, economic, moral and religious problems of lasting significance are facing us. Movements that will leave their impress on the country for a full century to come are gathering momentum.

All of these things the conscientious man and woman must know about. The time has gone by when any individual can seclude himself and unconcernedly watch the world pass by. The interests of one man are the interests of every man. And the Christian Herald will provide you with just the facts and just the inspiration you need to keep you in active touch with the great, all-engrossing world moves. The Church has never had such an opportunity for real constructive work. Leading churchmen, in and out of the pulpit, are in the forefront of campaigns for political and economic righteousness and new moral and religious awakenings. The next year will be epochal, and the Christian Herald will chronicle its developments fully, broadly, by the best and most authoritative writers.

A Mother of a Prison Camp

Prison road camp established by Salem County (N. J.) for minor offenders

EVERY woman with a garden rejoices in picking flowers for her friends, but none gets so much joy from this fragrant friendliness as does Mrs. A. T. Beckett, of Salem, N. J., who gathers blossoms, not for acquaintances who can return her gifts in kind, but for down-and-outers in the county prison road camp.

Prison inmates have been accustomed to gifts of socks, articles of clothing, tobacco and sometimes candy and books from charitable organizations, but very few of them ever get flowers, says Mrs. Beckett, whose bouquets for the prisoners are only one of the many ways she has tried to win back for them their self-respect.

"Help a transgressor to win back his self-respect and the problem of getting him on the right path again is quickly solved," declares Mrs. Beckett, who goes out of her way to speak to ex-prisoners on the streets of her home town, or to write friendly letters to those who have gone elsewhere to start life over again after being released from jail.

Mrs. Beckett became interested in prison work some years ago when she was regent of the Salem Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution. It was as chairman of the Americanization Committee of that organization, however, that she became more actively interested in local jail problems.

In 1915 the New Jersey legislature passed a bill authorizing the use of county prison labor for the building and repairing of county roads. About the same time the war boom hit Salem County. One of the largest powder plants in the country was at Carney's Point, and the demand for munitions brought 15,000 men of all colors and creeds into the county. Scenes rivaling those of the wildest Western boom days were common around the big powder camps, and the old-fashioned county jail soon was filled with prisoners.

These two factors—the new state law permitting county prison camps, and the overcrowding of the old jail at Salem—were used effectively by Mrs. Beckett in making her plea for improved prison conditions. It was either a case of building a $30,000 addition to the old jail or adopting the more economical plan of a prison road camp, and the county officials chose to do the latter. That was four years ago, when eight prisoners were taken from the jail under guard to the open country to build and repair roads.

In the four years since the camp was established, individual prisoners have put in a total of nearly 20,000 working days on the roads. Mrs. Beckett finds a striking contrast between men who serve out their terms behind the stone walls of the old jail and those who are committed to the road camp where life in the open air, regular habits and hard work put them in physical condition for earning an honest living after they receive their freedom.

Mrs. Beckett points out the corrective effects of the camp by showing from the records that in the 728 commitments in four years, only twenty-five men have been recommitted.

Much of the success of the prison road camp is attributed to the more practical method of punishing petty offenders, but a lot of the credit for its reforming influences must be given to Mrs. Beckett. Her motherly interest in what she terms her "boys" has won for her the name of "Mother of the Prison Camp."

Mrs. A. T. Beckett, mother of a prison camp

She makes frequent visits to the camp, carrying gifts of flowers, books or dainties to the inmates. More acceptable than the gifts, however, is her personal interest in the problems of men. Among other things, she found that many foreigners were getting their first impressions of America through the camp as the result of getting into brawls at the powderworks. She decided then that Americanization might well begin in the prisons. One of the prisoners she met at the camp was an apparently cultured and intelligent Russian. He knew little of the new country and could not speak its language, and great was his joy when "Mother" Beckett found for him some Russian and French literature to read during the rest hours. Now the camp has a library of its own, with books in six different languages.

At her home at Salem, "Mother" Beckett cherishes a bulging box of letters from "her boys" whom she has helped to honest jobs. J. G. Sholl, Jr.

THE WAR MEMORIAL

A Living Home of Service

By MARTHA CANDLER

COUNTRIES from the beginning of civilization have devised war memorials expressing the spirit of their own times. Naturally enough there has grown up in the minds of the American people in the past months a strong conviction that no mere physical symbol can adequately perpetuate and interpret to posterity the exalted spirit of service—which was the spirit of1917.

Since before the signing of the armistice, a movement has been under way for the erection of memorial buildings which shall perpetuate the ideal of service, and shall serve the living while honoring the heroic dead; where the democratic social and artistic aspirations of the community shall take root and grow. Hundreds of such buildings are under way in all sizes and sorts of towns and cities, the construction and facilities incorporated varying in kind almost as much as do the communities themselves, but all striving after architectural beauty and appropriateness to their memorial purpose.

The Englewood (N. J.) Neighborhood House was built by a church and is a particularly fine type of community building

THE most generally adopted type of building includes an auditorium and general assembly room, a group of smaller social rooms with library, game rooms and a community kitchen, in addition to the commemorative features, such as a Hall of Fame or memorial chapel. Ordinarily a gymnasium and swimming-pool are added, and facilities for whatever other sort of community activity is not already provided for. Some of the buildings combine social and dancing rooms with facilities for concerts and art exhibitions.

Smaller communities are combining the community house with a new town hall. In some larger cities the memorial takes the form of a civic auditorium; and in rural communities or smaller towns, as well as in residential neighborhoods of larger cities, a community church and community house combined have been decided upon. A public library might advisably be incorporated into such a project, where no such institution already exists.

The Locust Valley Community House, one of the first and most successful civic recreation and social centers

To Christian Herald readers the peculiar fitness of this church and social center combination will be apparent. The church and the school have always been the centers of social life in the average rural community and village of America. The social vision of country ministers in one part of our land and another has been the means of forming some of the soundest local community organizations we have yet developed. Today, in many progressive rural communities, the members of the locality come together on a free and easy footing for religious, social, and political meetings, formal and informal, and the great demand is for suitable community buildings. The memorial building movement furnished the incentive for immediate action in obtaining the buildings.

A SUFFICENT number of community houses have been erected and are being operated successfully to serve as examples for almost any size or kind of community in the matter of equipment, facilities and government. One of the oldest of these is that at Locust Valley, Long Island, a little village of 1,200 inhabitants. It was erected some ten years or more ago mainly through the efforts of the minister of a local church and secretary of a non-sectarian association devoted to community welfare. So strong was the spirit of cooperation which he had aroused, and so great the demand for a community house, that an old barn was rented and remodeled for the purpose until the funds could be raised for the permanent structure.

This minister relates that on the night of the opening fully four hundred persons, rich and poor, old and young, crowded into the house. On the main floor they found a good-sized auditorium, equipped for moving pictures, and a smaller social room separated from it by a movable partition. In the social room was a pool table, a library substation, various small game rooms, and the office of the secretary. Across the front of the house was a wide veranda. The basement, in addition to bowling alleys, storage, furnace, and dressing-room facilities, housed the local fire company. This was the town that two years before had had little to compete with the seven saloons! Nor had the town been free from the usual number of conflicting interests and elements, which made every inch of the progress a fight.

THE enthusiasm with which Platteville, Colorado, a village of only 350 people, is carrying out the plans for a non-sectarian memorial church and community building combined demonstrates that no community is too small to undertake some form of memorial building.

Sentiment everywhere is not equally agreed as to the community church, but there has been a much closer association of late between those two most profound and most primitive of our emotions—love of God and love of country.

"The business of the church," one minister has said, "is the salvation of the community—not salvation from hell fire in a world to come, but salvation from uselessness, from low ideals, and from selfishness."

The workableness of this ideal has been nowhere better demonstrated than in one section of Newark, where the Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church has under way plans for the erection of the Bethany Community Center. The building is being carefully planned to meet the non-sectarian community needs not filled by other social and educational agencies in this part of Newark.

One of the most comprehensive memorial building plans is the vast central civic auditorium which is also being planned for Newark, largely through the efforts of the American Legion, and to be dedicated to their fallen comrades.

Another view of the Englewood Neighborhood House. It contains a combined auditorium and social rooms, gymnasium, class rooms and living quarters for the superintendent

A $3,000,000 auditorium that has been suggested for Dallas, Texas, the funds to be raised by public subscription, but the building to be erected by the Board of Trustees of the Southern Methodist University, will be the first memorial actually to be erected in Dallas to the men who fought in the World War. The auditorium will be the second in size in Dallas and is designed to provide a center for Methodist movements for the city and county. Five thousand names of men in the service have been collected and will be given individual mention in the memorial hall of the building.

If the plans proposed by Seattle's memorial committee are realized, Seattle will have the largest enclosed auditorium in the world, upon which it is proposed that several million dollars shall be expended. This auditorium will be set in a "Victory Square"—a magnificent court around which, and on the main axis of which at a later time, other public buildings, such as a fine arts building and a city hall, shall be placed. Delegates from three hundred civic, social, religious, fraternal, and other organizations have closely collaborated on the plans, local labor groups and musical bodies being actively interested.

Birmingham, Alabama, also has a million dollar civic auditorium under way. Denver has planned a vast auditorium and art gallery combined to occupy the city's civic center, the project providing for the remodeling of the public library to harmonize with the architectural scheme.

The little town of Catasauqua was the first in Pennsylvania to plan a memorial building and begin its campaign for funds. The money has been subscribed on the "penny a day" plan, every man, woman and child being asked to pledge from one to twenty-five cents a day for a period of years, thereby becoming a stockholder in the building. Dozens of Pennsylvania towns have followed Catasauqua's example with building projects that vary as much in character as do the towns.

NONE has a plan more interesting than that of Johnstown, which provides a memorial to all the men of Cambria County. There will be an auditorium seating 5,000, social rooms, art, recreation, and civic service rooms, memorial hall, war museum and library. All these will be incorporated into a great solid building resting upon concrete arches that span Stony Creek, forming a bridge.

The brief reference to these few projects will serve to illustrate the energy that is abroad everywhere, and that the movement has actually become nation-wide in its appeal. The National Committee of Memorial Buildings which was formed last winter to advocate this type of building, and which was composed of one hundred representative citizens and leaders in educational, civic and art matters all over the country, has recently merged its activities with those of the Community House Bureau of War Camp Community Service, in order to become a more effective service bureau. The combined records showed, up to the first of August, 244 cities and towns that had definitely adopted memorial schemes of the building type, and 450 cities and towns that were considering memorial buildings but whose committees had not definitely announced a decision.

THE INWARD URGE

By Harlan L. Feeman

TO plow and sow and toil and save,
To eke out strength for bread and things,
A livelihood to gain—no more?
This is but the drudgery of the slave.
Soul was not born to be in bondage to the clod.
It is its bent to rise with all that thrills and sings,
To fill the world with love and peace and flowers;
A Paradise of God.

Y. M. C. A. LEGIONS STORM DETROIT

Fortieth International Convention Sounds the Call to Still Greater Service. A Wonderful Gathering, Dealing With a New World and With Christ as Leader

By WILLIAM D. MURRAY

WHOEVER was fortunate enough to be among the five thousand who packed the Arena Gardens in Detroit on November 22 saw a memorable scene. Side by side on the platform, filled largely with soldiers and sailors, sat the Secretary of the Navy, Mrs. Daniels, and General Summerall, of the Army, who had come to this Fortieth International Convention of the Young Men's Christian Associations of Canada and the United States to tell the largest number of delegates ever gathered at such a convention, how greatly the Army and Navy appreciated the service rendered by the Y. On the same platform sat E. C. Carter, who so gloriously carried the load as leader of the Y work in the A. E. F., and D. A. Davis, who in an equally glorious manner conducted the work for French soldiers. Colonel Birks, of Montreal, for four years the leader of the work with Canadian soldiers in France, was also present. Here also sat William E. Sweet, of Denver, who presided over the convention sessions with grace and decision, Alfred E. Marling, Chairman of the International Committee of Y. M. C. A.'s, William Sloane, chairman of the National War Work Council, Dr. John R. Mott and a host of other leaders.

These delegates, representing 968 Y. M. C. A.'s, had come from every state in the Union and every province in Canada, and forty-six of them were foreigners. Among them was a Greek soldier, S. S. Papadakis, sent to this country by the War Department of Greece that for a period of months he might study Association methods, and so be better fitted to continue this work in the Greek army.

The world wide interest in this great meeting was shown by the cables of greeting which came from the Association movements in England, Sweden, France, and Italy; from Howard Williams, the son of the founder of the Y. M. C. A., and from David Lloyd George, thanking the American movement for services rendered to British troops.

The address of the Secretary of the Navy must have surprised any critics of the Y. M. C. A. who may have been present. "I come," he said, "to voice the thanks of the United States Government for the splendid and efficient services the Y rendered to the men of the Army and Navy. Your work was ninety per cent. good." He told of a great merchant who had said to him that it was the most remarkable percentage of any business with which he was acquainted. "Thank God," this Christian Secretary of the Navy exclaimed, "for criticism of the Young Men's Christian Association as being too religious."

General Summerall spoke in the same strain. He reviewed the work of the Y in the A. E. F., as one department after another was opened to meet the needs of the men, and spoke in the highest terms of the efficiency of the workers.

THE program provided for a meeting of the whole Convention each morning and evening, while in the afternoon it broke up into sectional meetings, in which those interested in particular phases of Y. M. C. A. activities met and discussed their own peculiar problems. In this way the city associations talked about business administration and the students about their summer conference. Army and Navy men listened to Lieut. Col. Jason S. Joy, U. S. A.—who has been selected to lead the work which the Army is taking over from the Welfare Organizations—and to Commander Claude B. Mayo, U. S. N. In like manner the Industrial, Railroad, Boys, County and Community Work Departments met day by day.

There were numberless luncheon and dinner meetings not on the program. One evening the men and women War Workers met and resolved to form a permanent organization. At this dinner a number of decorations from England, France and America were bestowed upon men and women War Workers by representatives of these countries. The report of the War Work Council showed that eleven War Workers had been killed in battle, ten died of wounds, sixty-two died of accident or disease, one hundred and twenty-nine were wounded, three made prisoners, and one hundred and twenty received medals and two hundred and seven citations or honorable mention.

The National War Work Council met at luncheon, at which time Mr. William Sloane, the Chairman, announced that owing to the great need of work for soldiers, notably among the 1,000,000 men in the Polish army and the great host of desperately needy men in the Czecho-Slovak army, the Council would continue for the present; that there would be some surplus of funds (how much no one could yet tell), and that it had not been decided yet what disposition should be made of the surplus.

On Sunday the delegates gave Evangelistic messages in fifty churches, nearly two hundred meetings being held in all.

A memorable breakfast was the one at which the International Committee and its staff of secretaries met to do honor to Robert Widensdel, its oldest secretary, just completing fifty-one years of service, and Richard C. Morse, who finished that day fifty years of service.

THE executive body of the Young Men's Christian Associations of the United States and Canada is the International Committee, elected by the Convention, which is made up of delegates from the more than 2,000 independent local associations. To the Convention the International Committee reports, and from it it receives its instructions. The report this year was made by Vice-Chairman William Sloane, of New York, the Chairman, Mr. Alfred E. Marling, President of the New York Chamber of Commerce, having been detained in New York by the Chamber's luncheon to the Prince of Wales. This report, covering the three years, 1916, 1917 and 1918, showed a total expenditure by the International Committee of $1,332,115 for home work, and $2,187,221 for work in twenty foreign mission lands. Over 5,000 men are employed by the local associations as secretaries of various kinds, ministering to a membership of 750,000 men and boys, at a cost in 1918 of $29,000,000, and owning property valued at $121,787,000. 129,000 were enrolled in Bible classes, over 8,000,000 attended the religious meetings and Bible Classes in that year and nearly 40,000 men and boys decided for the Christian life.

In reporting for the War Work Council Mr. Sloane made it plain that the opportunity to do religious work had been the impelling motive of the Y. $100,000,000, the full amount asked for in the united drive had been paid in. Some idea of the size of the work overseas is given when it is remembered, that the Y turned over to the U. S. Government at the close of the fighting $16,000,000 worth of canteen supplies at cost, and that during the war 337,000 remittances to America, totaling $20,720,000, were made for soldiers.

The work of the Y in the war, at home, and abroad was shown by a full-sized hut, such as was used in the camps, built in one of the most prominent spots in the city. Here you could see at almost any time a group of soldiers and sailors gathered around the piano, singing the now familiar war songs, while a Y girl played. There too was the writing-room, the library, the counter and all the appliances which made the hut the soldiers' home.

Just outside the hut was a replica of a shell-torn building, which had been used at Varennes in the Argonne drive. Every afternoon the Y girls served cocoa and there were sing-songs and talks just as there had been in the real hut overseas. The cold wind that whistled through the bulding made it very realistic.

IT IS always customary at these conventions to have an exhibit of the various forms of Y. M. C. A. work. At this convention the exhibit, or at least part of it, was housed in the Model Hut. In one room an immense globe revolved, illuminated from the interior, the light shining through pinholes, each of which designated an Association. This contrasted strikingly the home and foreign work. Here was a map of the United States on which small electric lights indicated spots where railroad Associations existed. Around the edge of the map a miniature train of cars ran. In another room models of the three floors of an up-to-date Y. M. C. A. building showed the delegates the features which every such building should have. Besides all this, there was a series of splendid paintings on the walls, illustrative of the war work; there were models of camps with Y huts, including a snow scene from Siberia; and there were daily lectures, generally illustrated. Two of the lecturers were Dr. Peter and Prof. Robertson, both of China, who gave to interested crowds the same lectures on health and modern science which they are giving to the Chinese.

This hut was one of many evidences of the careful and adequate arrangement which Detroit had made to entertain the convention. No city could have extended a heartier welcome, which of course was to be expected from such active Christians as Philip Gray, president of the local Association and Dr. Studer, for over thirty years its secretary.

Vice-Chairman William D. Murray, speaking for the Foreign Department, called attention to the annual report of the Y. M. C. A. Secretary at Beirut, Mr. Bayard Dodge, son of Mr. Cleveland H. Dodge, in which he said the following races had attended the meetings of the Y. M. C. A.: British, Americans, Australians, Egyptians, Malayan, Indians, Persians, Tartars, Arabs, Syrians, Turks, Armenians, Greeks, Albanians and men of other races. A veritable League of Nations at work for the Kingdom of God! Mr. Dodge also reported that their Association has during the year ministered to Protestants, Catholics, Maronites, Greek Catholics, Syriacs, Gregorians, Armenian Catholics, Copts, Coptic Catholics, Greek Orthodox of the Syrian, Greek and Albanian Churches, Druses, Bahais, Sunni, Moslems, Matawalis, Shi'ite Moslems, in addition to many sects of Jews.

THERE are now 434 Associations under the leadership of 196 American secretaries, who are associated with 445 native secretaries. This work cost the American Associations in 1918 $953,000, and during the same year, there was raised on the field by the foreign Associations for their own expenses $1,097,000. Shanghai, China, has nearly the largest boys' membership in the world with actually the largest enrollment in Bible Classes; while the education work of the Osaka, Japan, Association is about the same size as that of Yale University, and Kobe has 3,000 students in its night and day schools. An earnest plea was made for financial help, so that the custom of no deficit might not be broken in this most difficult year. At a breakfast held at the Hotel Statler, addressed by Dr. Mott and Sherwood Eddy, over $50,000 was subscribed towards the expenses of 1919. Later on, the budget of the Home Work for next year was approved at $750,000 and for the Foreign Work at $1,000,000.

All through the Convention deep interest was shown in the Foreign Work of the International Committee. This culminated in a great meeting Sunday afternoon, when men from many lands, Indians, Chinese, Japanese and Mexicans, occupied the platform while D. A. Davis, J. C. Ewald and Sherwood Eddy told of the needs of the world.

The method adopted of bringing before the Convention the business for which it was called together was through the reports of eleven Commissions which had been appointed months ago. That on the Practice of Prayer, reported by Pres. Charles R. Watson, was a review of the prayer life of the members of the Young Men's Christian Associations. "We find that the Association abides in prayer," they reported.

many thousands of delegates

Mr. L. A. Crossett presented the report of the Commission on the Occupation of the Field. Thirty-seven recommendations were adopted looking to the extension of the work for the young into the occupied places in America, and also for a finer personnel, simplification of financial appeal and certain changes in the organization of supervisory agencies.

PERHAPS the report which had been most eagerly awaited was that on the relation of the Association to the churches. Of the twenty-five members of this Commission eleven were ministers of various denominations, and had as chairman Dr. W. Douglas Mackenzie of Hartford, and as vice chairman, Dr. Wm. P. Merrill of New York. Dr. O. E. Brown of Nashville, presented the report, while Robert E Speer, President King, and Bishop Nicholson supported the recommendations, all of which were unanimously adopted. While they contained some confession of failure of the Church and the Y. M. C. A. to see eye to eye at all times, it was pointed out that from the beginning the Association "has consistently maintained the rule that its active members shall include only those who are members of churches known as evangelical, and that it has from the beginning claimed that it is no substitute for the Church." There was no indication at any time of any desire to depart from this historic basis: in fact it was practically reaffirmed by the adoption of the report of the Committee on Codifications. The final recommendation was, "That the Convention resolved that the time has come to open quiet negotiations with the denominations known as evangelical, for a careful study of the relations obtaining between the Evangelical Churches and the Association; and that it authorize the International Committee to appoint a Commission that shall enter into these negotiations." Bishop Nicholson closed his stirring address by exclaiming, "It's time to throw away your hammer and get a horn."

Feeling that advantage should be taken of the experience in the war, a commission of twenty-five, headed by Mr. Joseph T. Alling, of Rochester, was appointed to study the subject. They reported, and their recommendations were adopted, among other things, that the hut idea could be used in certain conditions; that while doing everything to lead young men to attend church services, more use could be made of the Association buildings on Sundays; that greater use be made of moving pictures and that "in view of our experience in the camps, the Association be urged to promote an enlarged program of religious work, in which the teachings of Christ shall be presented and illustrated in a sane, practical manner, attractive to young men." Considerable discussion arose over the use of the term "Women Secretaries" to designate those who are working in the West Side Branch in New York.

At all the meetings of the Convention, music played a large part, under the able leadership of Mr. Bartholomew, who has been the head of the Music Department in the War Work.

THE Convention voted unanimously for closer and more complete cooperation with the church, and recommended that "each Association, each State Committee and the International Committees shall, before projecting plans and work for the year, enter into counsel with representatives of the churches concerned." It endorsed the work in penal institutions, ordered "an intensive study of the present race relations in a number of typical communities," and called upon the Association everywhere through all their agencies "to make a prompt and united effort to expand the plans, enlist the resources and provide the leadership with which to enlarge its service to industry, and thus to further in every way the expression of the Christian spirit in a genuine brotherhood among all who have a part in the industrial life of the nation."

A remarkable series of addresses was given before the entire Convention. The high-water mark was struck by Dr. John Timothy Stone in the opening address, at the Quiet Hour, on Rom. 1:16, especially the words, "It is the power of God." He told how God sent Moses on a great mission, but first took him up into the Mount for meditation and to receive God's plans. "If God is going to use us, we must be ready to wait before him that we may learn how to serve." From that hour on to the close, a deep spiritual feeling took possession of the Convention, so that one often heard men, who feared the Y. M. C. A. was being secularized, say they were falling in love with the Association again.

All the addresses showed the reaction from the war; the notes of sacrifice, unselfishness, internationalism sounded clear and loud. This was especially true of the address of Hon. N. W. Rowell, K. C., of Ottawa, when he spoke on what is essential on the part of a nation for largest spiritual leadership and influence. He pointed out some obvious lessons from the war: the essential unity of our humanity, right and justice are fundamentally and eternally stronger than might, and if the cause is big enough, and if it appeals to the heroic, there is no limit to the response on the part of young men. He warned us lest our countries would be found playing the part of the priest and Levite toward the countries that had fallen among thieves.

President King of Oberlin, sounded the same notes as he called for deeper views of progress, and the need of a clear knowledge of what Christianity is, and reminded us again of the supremacy of intangible values and "the inescapable Christ."

Bishop McConnell, of Denver, confessed that he was skating on thin ice as he urged upon the Churches and the Y. M. C. A. the duty of acting and preaching the gospel of reconciliation. He roused the great gathering to enthusiastic applause as he pleaded for an interest by America in the less favored nations of the world. He told of a man who in a religious meeting suggested that war might be a good thing; "yes," responded another, "let us amend the verse to read 'Go ye into all the world and shoot the Gospel into every creature.'"

Dr. Robert E. Speer gave one of his persuasive addresses on "The Larger Christ." Without Mr. Speer's voice, it seems as if no convention of Christian men is complete.

The application of Christian principles to the industrial situation was discussed from different angles by Warren S. Stone, of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, Homer L. Ferguson, President of the U. S. Chamber of Commerce, and Bishop Charles D. Williams. They differed somewhat as to the causes of the unrest: the too small pay envelope, the lowering of production and the breaking down of the wage system. All, however, agreed on the great challenge which the times give to the church, and that there was no solution but the Christian solution. Mr. Stone said, "We are not going to settle these problems until we get the spirit of Christ in both laborer and capitalist." Bishop Williams asserted that the war has taught us that materialism will surely go to smash, and Mr. Ferguson urged that the way out was through work. At a labor meeting, the creed of the Federal Council of Churches was adopted.

There was not a little disappointment on the part of many delegates, when they failed to find Dr. Mott's name on the program, but when, after being requested by a great many, he consented to speak, he was received with an enthusiasm which showed how the men of the Association love him. What he said gathered up in a concrete expression the reasons which had brought us together. We are dealing with a new world, a shaken, impoverished, exhausted, torn, embittered, suffering world. This convention has a unique opportunity to determine much as to what this world shall become. For it is a humbled and teachable world: it is an expectant world. All are looking to America. America is the land of hope. We meet in one of the great days of our Lord. Old things are passing away, all things may become new. We must give ourselves to reconstruction. It is for us to sound out the note of hope, for we have a Christ who teaches that love can conquer hate. We are summoned to make good the ends for which our boys sacrificed in the war.

The Industrial Problem from the Christian Standpoint

By OSCAR NEWFANG

THE Christian standpoint in industrial relations, as in all other human relations, was expressed by the founder of Christianity in a single sentence: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." The worldwide industrial unrest which exists in the present reconstruction period following the war is at bottom a blind, groping effort to substitute the law of warm-blooded love for the law of cold-blooded justice in the relations between employer and employed.

Love demands not only that you refrain from injuring your fellowmen, but that you actively promote their welfare in every way in your power.

Applying the law of love to industry, it demands at least this:

1. Hours of labor not longer than are consistent with sufficient production to meet all human needs.
2. Wages at least sufficient to cover the cost of living for the worker and his family.
3. Steady employment to the utmost limit consistent with the solvency of an industry, not merely with the point of highest profit for the business.
4. Technical instruction to workers in each business and regular promotion as opportunity offers.
5. A fair return for the capital invested, which makes industry possible or increases its output.
6. Sharing among the workers all the excess profits above a fair return on capital.

While persons actuated by Christian love will probably agree with most of these general principles there will, of course, be a divergence of views when the attempt is made to put them into concrete terms. The writer submits as his own ideas regarding an industrial platform the following:

1. In the present state of mechanical invention an eight-hour day in industry, or a forty-eight hour week comprised in six days, seems sufficiently long to meet human needs. Excessive hours and night work should be discouraged by making a rate one and a half times the regular rate of wages applicable to overtime or work between 10 P. M. and 6 A. M.
2. The minimum wage allowable in industry should be the cost of living for an average family of five persons, with a reasonable margin of safety for sickness or other emergencies; such cost of living to be determined annually by competent public authority and its money equivalent made the minimum wage for the following year.
3. The employment period should be the year—not the week, the day, or the hour. Labor is not a commodity. You cannot lay away the workman on a shelf for six months, like merchandise when it is not needed, to be employed again when needed. He will die of starvation in the meantime. It is more humane to put the burden of providing steady employment upon the employer, than to put the cruel hardship of prolonged unemployment upon the worker.
4. Every employer of large numbers of men should be required to furnish them technical training in the business, to grade the working positions according to their value to the business or the wage attached to them, and then to advance workers regularly from grade to grade as vacancies occur, thus assuring the faithful worker advancement and increase of pay according to his length of service.
5. A fair return for capital invested without any active services in the business would seem to be a cumulative dividend sufficiently higher than the return on bonds or preferred stocks in an industry to compensate the investor for the additional risk in a common stock investment. In the writer's opinion, a rate about 2% to 3% above the average bond yield in an industry is a fair return for capital invested in that industry.
6. The profits of an enterprise in excess of this fair return for capital should be divided among all the active workers, brain workers as well as brawn workers, in the percentage that the wage or salary of each worker bears to the total pay-roll.

ADVENTURES IN THE HIGH ANDES

By Rev. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

President of the Christian Endeavor

FOR a few years before 1907, numerous invitations began to come, asking me to visit South America, especially Brazil, where the Christian Endeavor movement had already developed considerable strength.

The most feasible plan to reach any considerable portion of South America seemed to be to sail down the west coast as far as Valparaiso, visiting Peru and Bolivia on the way, then crossing the Andes from Chile to Argentina, spending a little time in that republic, in Uruguay and Brazil, thence to America by way of Lisbon and Southampton. Literally "the longest way round was the shortest way home."

The mountains around Rio de Janeiro

The Panama Canal was then being dug, and it was a most interesting time to cross the Isthmus, where ten thousand men of many languages and colors were cutting the Siamese American twins apart, while at the same time they were uniting more closely the Occident and Orient. Every shovelful of dirt thrown out of the canal made less true Kipling's famous lines about East and West, for, as never before in the history of the world, the twain have met.

Those first days after reaching the Pacific Coast were hot and steamy, and the water was tepid. Moreover, the yellow fever was raging in Guayaquil, the port of Quito, so that no one was allowed to go ashore unless he wished to stay there and brave the plague. The mosquitoes, too, were intolerable as we lay at anchor in the Guayas River, and the white woodwork of the steamer was actually black with the pestiferous insects. But the next morning after steaming out of the Guayas River, presto, change! The water in the bath was cool and refreshing, and put new life into every bather, for the Antarctic current which flows up the west coast of South America tempers the climate and cools the water, just as the Gulf Stream of the Atlantic tempers the cold regions of the north and makes Britain and Norway habitable. Thus does the Creator care for his creatures, who are so often unmindful of him.

The west coast of South America cannot be called beautiful, but it is certainly interesting. After leaving Ecuador, so called because the equator cuts it through near the center, the sterile Andes approach the shore, and for two thousand miles rear their tremendous peaks until they sometimes seem to pierce the sky. There is a sublime grandeur about them.

OUR first intimate acquaintance with the high Andes came after we landed at Callao, the chief port of Peru. Lima, the capital, is only a half hour's journey by a rapid trolley from Callao. In Lima the best and worst of the old Spanish civilization is found. Perhaps less than almost any other country has Peru felt the admixture of other races.

In this brilliant little capital—which vies with Bucharest to be considered a second Paris—it has not rained for a hundred years, and it is said that if it should rain for twenty-four hours the gaudily painted cathedral and the fine business blocks would dissolve into the original mud of which they are composed. But the rushing Rimac supplies the city with an abundance of pure, cool water from the heart of the Andes, and irrigates the fertile soil, which yields an abundance of fruits, vegetables and flowers.

The object in the cathedral which interested me most was the skeleton of old Pizarro, enclosed in a glass case. There lies the last of this bloody tyrant, whose abominable treachery and cruelty have made his name forever infamous—"now none so poor to do him reverence."

The Andes were more inviting than the modern city, and my daughter, who was traveling with me, and I soon joined a little party of our fellow travelers for an excursion on the Aroya railway, the road which reaches the highest point on the habitable globe to which steam and rail can carry one. This road is a marvel of engineering skill, and was built by an American. There are few tunnels, but by zigzags and switchbacks the mighty mountain is conquered, until we stand at the rich copper mines, 17,000 feet above the sea. Half the time we seemed to be on the brink of an unfathomable precipice, and some of the awful chasms spanned by cobweb-like iron bridges almost make one's hair stand on end.

I WAS greatly interested in the remains of Inca civilization which we saw, for here before the Spanish conquest lived doubtless the most highly civilized of all aboriginal American peoples. The historian Prescott gives us a vivid picture of their manners and customs, their arts, their wealth, their government, before the butcher Pizarro slaughtered or enslaved them. Wonderful evidences of their industry, thrift and skill are given by the long terraces which rise one above another for three thousand feet on the sides of the Andes. To these terraces with infinite patience they carried the soil after building up the walls tier on tier, and here, with the aid of irrigation, great quantities of the finest fruits of the soil were raised. So honored was agriculture that the emperor himself, with a golden plowshare, turned the first furrow in the spring.

Relying upon the supposed rainlessness of the region, our party took neither umbrellas nor raincoats. To our surprise and discomfort, we soon found that though it never rains on the plain of Lima, the mountains are a far different proposition. As we neared the summit it began to drizzle and then to pour. The return journey seemed most perilous, for the little engine and car were controlled only by hand brakes, and as the train shot around the curves or hung over a precipice we would scarcely have insured our safe return for a sixpence. Suddenly, as we rounded one of the sharpest zigzags, there came a tremendous bump that threw us out of our seats, and we found that our engine had buried its nose deep in the débris of a landslide which towered above it, from which it would take a large crew of men hours to free it.

Colporteur in a discussion with a friar in Lima before St. Augustine's Church

The accident, moreover, had occurred on the edge of a chasm a thousand feet deep. There was nothing to do but to make the best of it, and to walk down the track, wet and bedraggled, to the next station, five miles distant. We passed frequent landslides, large and small, and were thankful enough to reach shelter and, after a time, the dry plains of Lima.

Our next adventures in the high Andes took us from Mollendo, on the Peruvian coast, to a height of twelve thousand feet on the vast tablelands of mountain-girt Bolivia. On this road moving sandhills threatened our progress. So inexorable is their advance, driven by prevailing winds, that no army of workmen can shovel them away, and sometimes the rails have to be taken up and relaid around them.

AREQUIPA, the principal Peruvian city, is on this route. It is "beautiful for situation," if not "the joy of the whole earth." It lies on a fertile plain, eight thousand feet above the sea, and is dominated by snow-capped Mount Misti, which rises twelve thousand feet higher, as perfect a cone as Fujiyama itself.

In Arequipa Harvard University has a fine observatory, with a telescopic camera to photograph the southern stars, and our brief stay in the astronomer's charming home was an oasis in our journey. Mr Frost, who was at the head of the observatory, showed us a single negative, seventeen by fourteen inches in size, on which he had caught the pictures of four hundred thousand stars! It would take two thousand plates of this size to photograph the heavens as seen from the Arequipa observatory, such marvels is this great telescope constantly bringing to light, and peopling our universe with hitherto unseen worlds.

I know of no place so good for a conceited man to visit as the Arequipa observatory. First, Misti and Chachani must dwarf him in his own eyes, if he has any sense of proportion; then, as he goes into the observatory and sees the starry wonders reflected on the photographic plate, his mind is staggered at the vastness of the universe; and with a sense of his own insignificance it would seem that he must cry out:

> "When I consider the heavens, the work of thy fingers,
> The moon and the stars which thou hast ordained;
> What is man, that thou art mindful of him?
> And the son of man, that thou visitest him?"

Twelve thousand feet above the sea, on this route, lies Lake Titicaca, the highest large body of water in the world. Over this lake we journey for a whole night, then a few hours by rail on the other side, and we come to a vast hole in the ground that looks like an enormous crater. We peer over the side, and there, at the bottom, are the red-tiled roofs of a large city, La Paz, the capital of Bolivia. A trolley car takes us swiftly down the crater's side and lands us in the center of this unique city, a thousand feet below the plain above, yet eleven thousand feet above the sea. The great hole, however, is not really a crater, but is formed by the erosion of a little stream that tumbles through the city and down the sterile mountain-side, until it comes to a beautiful land of fruits and flowers, which supplies the mountain capital of this mountain republic.

BOLIVIA has been called "a table of silver on legs of copper," for its mines, which are now being developed by American capital, are of fabulous wealth. Some of them have been worked for hundreds of years, seemingly with no diminution of their treasure, and are now only awaiting foreign money and machinery for their full development.

La Paz (The City of Peace) is a bigoted place, 99 per cent. Catholic, but it is a city of flowers and gaiety, and is about the most inaccessible capital on the face of the earth. Extensions of the railway, however, are constantly bringing it nearer to the centers of civilization.

Once more we climbed the Andes on this interesting journey, this time starting from Valparaiso. It looked like anything but the Vale of Paradise, as the name signifies, when we saw it, for it had been wrecked a few years before by a terrible earthquake, and the ghastly ruins were still very much in evidence.

On the uplands of Chile lies her beautiful capital, Santiago (St. James in English), one of the most charming of cities, with the most lovely park (Santa Lucia) I have seen in any part of the world. In those days there was no railway tunnel beneath the crest of the Andes, and one had to make his way across in one of many wretched little stage-coaches, which, except in favorable seasons, were often blocked by the snow. At the terminus of the railway on the Chilean side, more than twenty of these coaches, each drawn by three horses hitched abreast, awaited about a hundred passengers. There was a grand scramble for a seat, and when the passengers were once inside the fun began. The coaches belonged to two rival lines, the Yellow and Black, and the drivers of the Black tried desperately to get ahead of the Yellow, and the Yellow were equally determined that they shouldn't. As the road was narrow, this rivalry resulted in frequent accidents. The driver of our Black coach, spurred on by the racing instinct, tried to pass a Yellow by cutting a corner on a piece of rocky territory where there was no road. As a natural result of his temerity the Black tipped over, and the cooped-up passengers had to scramble out as best they could, until the coach was righted. By that time we were left far in the rear.

When we reached the Argentine border, the most nerve-racking moments began, for the road descended steeply by short zigzags. The driver whipped up his horses, and down we went at breakneck speed, a steep mountain-side on the left, and a yawning chasm on the right. The horses hugged the mountain-side,

THE WORLD'S NEWS OF THE WEEK

The Coal Crisis

A BITTER fight in the cabinet extending over two days in which the administration sought to agree on a policy to be adopted toward the coal strike found its reflection in a final protracted meeting of the mine operators and the workers on Thanksgiving day. The operators finally consented to the program accepted by the majority of the cabinet calling for an increase in wages of 14 per cent. to be paid by the operators other than by an increase in the cost of the product to the consumer. The miners flatly rejected the offer and stood firm for the 31.61 per cent. increase promised to them by Secretary of Labor William B. Wilson. The joint meeting of employers and workers deadlocked over the question and the conference adjourned without date.

As this is written, the bituminous coal situation is reaching an acutely dangerous stage. Mild weather throughout the Eastern section of the country has prevented real suffering and industry has been but slightly crippled. The middle west and the northwest, however, have been less fortunate, and arbitrary measures have been necessary to obtain any improvement in conditions. The action of Governor Lynn J. Frazier of North Dakota in declaring martial law and seizing all the lignite mines in the state has been upheld by the Federal Court at Fargo. Judge Charles J. Amidon, in announcing his decision, prefaced it with these words: "Nearly half a million miners continue the strike. As the winter advances, the crisis in the East deepens. It needs only the presence of North Dakota temperatures in the East to call into immediate action something besides injunctions."

Slowly but convincingly all but essential industries are being shut down in almost every part of the country, while the Railroad Administration continues to curtail train service. Schools are being closed and churches are forbidden to heat their buildings except on Sundays. In Kansas City, Mo., all places for public gatherings have been closed. The State of Kansas is attempting to operate the mines under a state receivership plan, but the result, thus far, is unsatisfactory for the reason that the workers are inexperienced. The United Mine Workers of America have declared the men who have volunteered to get out coal for the state are strikebreakers. A meeting of the governors of all coal-producing states has been called to take joint action on the question of opening the mines.

Washington agrees that the situation growing out of the strike is the most important facing President Wilson. The Government obtained an order from the Federal Court in Indianapolis directing the mine workers to call off their strike. The order was issued from union headquarters, but the men refused to return to work. The meeting between operators and miners, held under the auspices of the Department of Labor, produced nothing but bitterness inside and outside the government. Now that a settlement of the dispute has proved impossible all eyes are on the administration watching for the next move. The earlier plea that the Federal authorities take over and operate the mines has been virtually denied, and at this moment it seems probable that the War Department will offer to protect the mining companies in any efforts they may make to resume working.

William G. McAdoo, formerly Secretary of the Treasury, has contributed to the controversy by a statement in which he declares the soft coal companies, under the increased prices of war-time, made from 50 to 2,000 per cent. profit. In a supplementary statement, he says some companies during 1917 paid three times over in profits for the capital they had invested in their property.

Mexico

THE Mexican question is seriously in the news again as the result of the Mexican Government's refusal to interfere in the local court proceedings against William O. Jenkins, American Consular Agent at Puebla, who is accused of being an accomplice to his own kidnapping. Jenkins has remained in jail in Puebla rather than put up a $500 bond for his appearance in the court. The State Department made very vigorous representations to Mexico City on the occasion of Jenkins' arrest. He was released and rearrested, whereupon the State Department filed a "demand" for his liberation and that "persecution" be stopped. The Carranza foreign office, after several days' delay, replied that the matter was one for the local courts and that the Mexican Federal authorities could not interfere. The answer cited precedents in the United States to justify the attitude Mexico was taking. Secretary Lansing, in a sharp note, declined to accept the Mexican argument and reiterated his request for Jenkins' immediate release. No acknowledgement of this note was expected inside a week. In the meantime Congress has shown a disposition to back the administration in whatever move it makes.

More internal trouble has been caused in Mexico by the execution of General Felipe Angeles on order of a court martial formed of Carranza officers. General Angeles was probably the best friend the United States had among Mexicans. He was a brilliant soldier, a member of the French Legion of Honor—a decoration bestowed on him for his work in perfecting the famous "75" of the French army—and during the war was an inspector of ordnance in New York for the Allies. Last spring he returned to Mexico for the purpose of composing the differences between the various factions opposed to Carranza. His efforts were unsuccessful and he suffered much hardship until late in November when he was captured by Carranzistas. Taken before a military court his trial was concluded about midnight and he faced a firing squad at seven o'clock in the morning. Pleas for clemency reached Carranza from all over the United States and Europe, while Angeles' death promises to bring together rebel parties that he was unable to reconcile in life.

Bulgaria Signs Her Treaty

M. STAMBULLWSKI, Premier of Bulgaria, has affixed his signature to the Treaty of Peace between the Allies and Bulgaria. While the United States was not at any time at war with the Bulgars, Frank L. Polk signed the document as the chief of the American peace delegation, and he was followed by General Bliss and Mr. White. The Supreme Council forbade Rumania and Serbia to sign until they subscribe to the Austrian treaty. Officially, then, these three bitter enemies of the Balkans are still at war. The treaty assesses against Bulgaria a reparation fund amounting to $445,000,000. The state loses Thrace and Strumitza, the latter district being assigned to Serbia. The question of a Bulgar corridor through Thrace to the Ægean is left to the future disposition of the powers. Conscription in Bulgaria is abolished, the army is limited to 20,000 and the police force is cut to 10,000. The peace is to be known as the Treaty of Nuilly, for the town in which it was signed.

Dr. Ballard Is Dead

REV. DR. AARON EDWARD BALLARD, one of the founders of the Ocean Grove Association and its president since 1898, died at his home in Ocean Grove on Thanksgiving Day. He would have been ninety-nine years of age had he lived until Christmas. He was licensed as a Methodist minister in 1844, and from that time until his death he was unceasingly active. Until recently, he rarely missed a day at his desk or failed to preach in some church on Sunday. He was seriously injured by a fall in Atlantic City in 1918, but he recovered and assured his friends he would live to be one hundred.

Organize for World Trade

PROMINENT bankers from all sections of the country have organized a National Committee on European Finance which will work primarily for the economic relief of Central Europe. Men representing the most important banking groups in New York City, at the conference preceding the naming of the committee, expressed the opinion that quick aid must be extended to Germany and Austria if any stability is to be expected in world trade. Conditions in Austria are in every respect growing alarming. Premier Lloyd George, in the House of Commons, paints a very pessimistic picture and declares immediate assistance on a large scale must be sent to Vienna. Urgent representations have been despatched to the United States urging this government to assume its share of the expense necessary to save the lives of thousands of Austrians, he declares. Only a large international credit will meet the demands of the situation, he says.

Trackmen Get More Pay

WALKER G. HINES, railway administrator, and the railway trackmen's organization, have signed a new wage agreement by which the 400,000 employees involved get a basic eight-hour day with time and a half for over time. It is estimated the new scale will add about $25,000,000 a year to the wages for this class of railroad employees. The agreement is to remain in effect as long as the roads are under federal control unless notice of thirty days is given of its cancellation. A conference of the four railway brotherhoods in session in Cleveland to consider the status of employees generally adjourned without taking action.

The sufferer has won the sympathy of the whole of England by his attitude toward the men who were directly responsible for his condition, and many new supporters have been drawn to his cause.

Adriatic and Near East

WHILE there is some slight easing of the tension over d'Annunzio's exploits along the Eastern Adriatic the danger of a new Balkan conflagration is far from removed. Italy, however, is reported to have promised Jugoslavia and the Allies that she will prevent by force any encroachments by d'Annunzio's army on Dalmatian territory east

BETTY HOPE

A SERIAL STORY
IN SEVEN PARTS

By GRACE LIVINGSTON HILL

THE PRECEDING CHAPTERS

ELIZABETH STANHOPE, who ran away from her own wedding, found a friend in Jane Carson, a working girl to whom she appealed on the street for help. Jane sheltered her for a night, provided her with clothes to take the place of her wedding gown, and arranged for her to go to the Carson home in Tinsdale under the name Betty Hope where she might hope to escape recognition. There Betty meets Mrs. Carson and Jane's brother and sisters and finds herself welcomed as one of the family. She learns the real meaning of love and unselfishness, attends Sunday school and church, and is converted. She obtains a position as governess and is settling down into a happy, contented village life. In the meantime the newspapers announce a reward of $5,000 to anyone who can find Elizabeth Stanhope, wealthy heiress who disappeared on the night of her wedding. Jane is alarmed, goes to Warren Reyburn, a young lawyer who employs her sweetheart, and enlists his aid to protect her protégé. Reyburn, who had been a guest at the church on the night when the wedding was to have taken place, has a personal interest in the case and eagerly undertakes the work. He goes to Tinsdale and is followed back to the city by "Bill" Gage, a ne'er-do-well of the village who has suspected Betty's identity.

CHAPTER XI

BETTY, her eyes wide with fear, her face white as a lily, appeared like a wraith at the parlor door and looked at him. It gave Reyburn a queer sensation, as if a picture one had been looking at in a story book should suddenly come alive and wink and stare at one. As he rose and came forward he still seemed to see like a dissolving view between them the little huddled bride on the floor of the church. Then he suddenly realized that she was trembling.

"Please don't be afraid of me, Miss Stanhope," he said gently. "I have only come to help you, and if after you have talked with me you feel that you would rather I should have nothing to do with your affairs I will go away and no one in the world shall be the wiser for it. I give you my word of honor."

"Oh!" said Betty, toppling into a chair near by. "I—guess—I'm not afraid of you. I just didn't know who you might be—!" She stopped, caught her breath and tried to laugh, but it ended sorrily, almost in a sob.

"Well, I don't wonder," said Reyburn, trying to find something reassuring to say. "The truth is, I was rather upset about you. I didn't quite know who you might turn out to be, you see!"

"Oh!" Betty's hand slipped up to her throat, and her lips quivered as she tried to smile.

"Please don't feel that way," he said, "or I'll go away at once." He was summoning all his courage and hoping she wasn't going to break down and cry. How little she was, and sweet! Her eyes pleaded, just as they did in that one look in the church. How could anybody be unkind to her?

"I'm quite all right," said Betty with a forced smile, sitting up very straight.

"Perhaps I'd better introduce myself," he said, trying to speak in a very commonplace tone. "I'm just a lawyer that your friend Miss Jane Carson sent out to see if I could be of any service to you. It may possibly make things a little easier for you if I explain that while I never had heard of you before, and have no possible connection with your family or friends, I happened to be at your wedding!"

"Oh!" said Betty with a little agonized breath.

"Do you know Mrs. Bryce Cochrane?" he asked.

Betty could not have got any whiter, but her eyes seemed to blanch a trifle.

"A little," she said in a very small voice.

"Well, she is my cousin."

"Oh!" said Betty again.

"Her husband was unable to accompany her to the wedding, and so I went in his place to escort Isabel. I knew nothing of your affairs either before or after the wedding, until this announcement was brought to my notice, and Miss Carson called on me."

Betty took the paper in her trembling fingers, and looked into her own pictured eyes. Then everything seemed to swim before her for a moment. She pressed her hand against her throat and set her white lips firmly, looking up at the stranger with a sudden terror and comprehension.

"You want to get that five thousand dollars!" she said, speaking the words in a daze of trouble. "Oh, I haven't got five thousand dollars! Not now! But perhaps I could manage to get it if you would be good enough to wait just a little, till I can find a way. Oh, if you knew what it means to me!"

Warren Reyburn sprang to his feet in horror, a flame of anger leaping into his eyes.

"Five thousand dollars be hanged!" he said fiercely. "Do I look like that kind of a fellow? It may seem awfully queer to you for an utter stranger to be butting into your affairs like this unless I did have some ulterior motive, but I swear to you that I have none. I came out here solely because I saw that you were in great likelihood of being found by the people from whom you had evidently run away. Miss Stanhope, I stood where I could watch your face when you came up the aisle at your wedding, and something in your eyes just before you dropped made me wish I could knock that bridegroom down and take care of you somehow until you got that hurt look out of your face. I know it was rather ridiculous for an utter stranger to presume so far, but when I saw that the sleuths were out after you, and when the knowledge of your whereabouts was put into my hands without the seeking, I wouldn't have been a man if I hadn't come and offered my services. I'm not a very great lawyer, nor even a very rising one, as your Miss Carson seems to think, but I'm a man with a soul to protect a woman who is in danger, and if that's you, I'm at your service. If not, you've only to say so and I'll take the next train home and keep my mouth shut!"

He took his watch out and looked at it hastily, although he had not the slightest idea what it registered, nor what time the next train for home left. He looked very tall and strong and commanding as he stood in his dignity waiting for her answer, and Betty looked up like a little child and trusted him.

"Oh! Please forgive me!" she cried. "I've been so frightened ever since Bob came after me. I couldn't think you had come for any good, because I didn't know any one in the world who would want to help me."

"Certainly!" said Warren Reyburn with a lump in his throat, sitting down quickly to hide his emotion. "Please consider me a friend, and command me."

"Thank you," said Betty taking a deep breath and trying to crowd back the tears. "I'm afraid there isn't any way to help me, but I'm glad to have a friend, and I'm sorry I was so rude."

"You weren't rude, and that was a perfectly natural conclusion from my blundering beginning," he protested, looking at the adorable waves of hair that framed her soft cheeks. "But there is always a way to help people when they are in trouble, and I'm here to find out what it is. Do you think you could trust me enough to tell me what it's all about? Miss Carson didn't seem to know, or else she didn't feel free to say."

"I didn't tell her much," said Betty, lifting her sea-blue eyes. "She was a stranger, too, you know."

"Well, she's a mighty good friend of yours, I'll say, and she's acted in a very wise manner. She took more precautions than an old detective would have done. She told me only that some one was trying to make you marry a man you did not wish to marry. Is that correct?"

Betty shivered involuntarily and a wave of color went over her white face.

"It sounds queer," she said, "as if I hadn't any character or force myself, but you don't understand. No one would understand unless they knew it all, and had been through it for years. At first I didn't quite understand it myself. I'd better tell you the story. I thought I never could tell any one, because they were my father's family, and I know he would shrink so from having it known, but I'm sure he wouldn't blame me now."

"He certainly would not blame you, Miss Stanhope. I have heard that your father was a wonderful man, with high principles. I feel sure he would justify you in appealing to some one who was willing to advise you in a strait like this. You know no woman should marry any man against her will."

"Not if it were her father's dying wish?"

"Certainly not. Miss Stanhope, did your father love you?"

"Oh, I'm sure he did. He was the most wonderful father! I've often thought that he would never have asked it of me if he had realized——"

"Did he ever during his lifetime seem to wish you to be unhappy?"

"Never! That was the strange part of it. But you see he didn't know how I felt. I think I'd better tell you all about it."

"That would be the better way, if it won't be too hard for you."

Betty clasped her small hands together tightly and began:

"My own mother died when I was quite a little girl, so father and I were a great deal to each other. He used to look after my lessons himself, and was always very careful what kind of teachers I had. He was just mother and father both to me. When I was ten years old my governess died suddenly while father was away on a business trip, and one of our neighbors was very kind to me, coming in and looking after the servants and everything and keeping me over at their house for a few days till father got back. She had a widowed sister visiting her, a rather young woman who was very beautiful. At least I thought she was beautiful then, and she made a great pet of me, so that I grew fond of her, although I had not liked her at first.

"After father came home she used to slip over every day to see me while he was at his business, and he was grateful to her for making me happy. Then he found out that she was in trouble, had lost her money or something, and wanted to get a position teaching. He arranged to have her teach me, and so she came to our house to stay.

"Somehow after that I never seemed to see so much of my father as I used to do, for she was always there, but at first I didn't care, because she was nice to me, and always getting up things to keep me busy and happy. She would make my father buy expensive toys and books and games for me, and fine clothes, and so of course I was pleased. In about a year my father married her, and at first it seemed very beautiful to me to have a real mother, but little by little I began to see that she preferred to be alone with my father and did not want me around so much. It was very hard to give up the companionship of my father, but my stepmother kept me busy with other things, so that I really didn't think much about it while it was first happening.

"But one day there came a letter. I remember it came while we were at breakfast, and my father got very white and stern when he read it, and handed it over to my mother and asked whether it was true, and then she began to cry and sent me from the table. I found out a few days after that that my stepmother had two sons, both older than myself, and that she had not told my father. It was through some trouble they had got into at school which required quite a large sum of money to cover damages that my father discovered it, and he was terribly hurt that she should have concealed it from him. I learned all this from the servants, who talked when they thought I was not within hearing. There were days and days when my father scarcely spoke at the table, and when he looked at me it made a pain go through my heart, he looked so stern and sad. My stepmother stayed a great deal in her room and looked as if she had been crying. But after a few weeks things settled down a good deal as they had been, only that my father never lost that sad troubled look. There was some trouble about my stepmother's sons, too, for there was a great deal of argument between her and my father, of which I only heard snatches, and then one day they came home to stay with us. Something had happened at the school where they were that they could not stay any longer. I can remember distinctly the first night they ate dinner with us. It seemed to me that it was like a terrible thunderstorm that never quite broke. Everybody was trying to be nice and polite, but underneath it all there was a kind of lightning of all kinds of feelings, hurt feelings and wrong ones and right ones all mixed up.

"Only the two boys didn't seem to feel it much. They sort of took things for granted, as if that had always been their home, and they didn't act very polite. It seemed to trouble my father, who looked at them so severely that it almost choked me, and I couldn't go on eating my dinner. He didn't seem like my dear father when he looked like that. I always used to watch my father, and he seemed to make the day for me. If he was sad, then I was sad; and if he was glad then I was happy all over, until one day my stepmother noticed me and said: 'See, dear little Elizabeth is trembling. You ought not to speak that way before her, Charles.' And then father looked at me, and all suddenly I learned to smile when I didn't feel like it. I smiled back to him just to let him know it didn't matter what he did, I would love him anyhow!"

During the recital Reyburn had sat with courteous averted gaze as though he would not trouble her with more of his presence than was absolutely necessary. Now he gave her a swift glance.

Betty's eyes were off on distance, and she was talking from the depths of her heart, great tears welling into her eyes. All at once she remembered the stranger:

"I beg your pardon," she said, and brushed her hand across her eyes. "I haven't gone over it to any one ever, and I forget you would not be interested in details."

"Please don't mind me. I am interested in every detail you are good enough to give me. It all makes the background of the truth, you know, and that is what I am after," said Reyburn, deeply touched. "I think you are wonderful to tell me all this. I shall regard it most sacredly."

Betty flashed a look of gratitude at him, and noticed the sympathy in his face. It almost unnerved her, but she went on:

"The oldest boy was named Bessemer, and he wasn't very good-looking. He was very tall and awkward, and always falling over things. He had little pale eyes, and hardly any chin. His teeth projected, too, and his hair was light and very straight and thin. His mother didn't seem to love him very much, even when he was a little boy. She bullied him and found fault with him continually, and quite often I felt very sorry for him, although I wasn't naturally attracted to him. He wasn't really unpleasant to me.

We got along very nicely, although I never had much to do with him.

"The other brother, Herbert, was handsome like his mother, only dark, with black curly hair, black wicked eyes, and a big, loose, cruel mouth. His mother just idolized him, and he knew it. He could make her do anything on earth. He used to force Bessemer into doing wrong things, too, things that he was afraid to do himself, because he knew father would not be so hard on Bessemer as on him. For father had taken a great dislike to Herbert, and it was no wonder. He seemed to have no idea at all that he was not owner of the house. He took anything he pleased for his own use, even father's most sacred possessions, and broke them in a fit of anger too, sometimes, without ever saying he was sorry. He talked very disrespectfully of father and to him, and acted so to the servants that they gave notice and left. Every few days there would be a terrible time over somethng Herbert had done. Once I remember he went to the safe and got some money out that belonged to father and went off and spent it in some dreadful way that made father very angry. Of course I was still only a little girl, and I did not know all that went on. Father was very careful that I should not know. He guarded me more than ever, but he always looked sad when he came to kiss me good-night.

"Herbert took especial delight in tormenting me," she went on with a sad far-away look in her eyes as if she were recalling unpleasant memories. She did not see the set look on Reyburn's face nor notice his low exclamation of anger. She went steadily on: "He found out that I did not like June-bugs, and once he caught hundreds of them and locked me into a room with them with all the lights turned on. I was almost frightened to death, but it cured me of being afraid of June bugs." A little smile trembled out on Betty's lips. "Just because I wouldn't give him the satisfaction of letting him hear me scream." She finished. "Then he caught a snake and put it in my room, and he put a lot of burdocks in my hat so they would get in my hair. Foolish things those were, of course, but he was a constant nightmare to me. Sometimes he would tie a wire across the passages in the upper hall where I had to pass to my room, and when I fell my hands went down against a lot of slimy toads in the dark, for he always somehow managed to have the light go out just as I fell. There were hundreds of things like that, but I needn't multiply them. That's the kind of boy he was. And because he discovered that my father loved me very much, and because he knew my father disliked him, he spent much time in trying to torment me in secret. I couldn't tell my father, because he always looked so sad whenever there was trouble, and there was sure to be trouble between him and my stepmother if my father found out that Herbert had done anything wrong. One day my father came upon us just as Herbert had caught me in his arms and was trying to cut my curls off. I didn't care about the curls, but I knew my father did, and I began to scream, and then Herbert gripped me so I thought I would die with the pain, and put his big strong fingers around my throat and choked me so I could not make any noise."

Reyburn clenched his hands until the knuckles went white and uttered an exclamation of horror, but Betty did not notice:

"There was a terrible time then, and I was sent away to a school, a good many miles from home, where I stayed for several years. Father always came up to see me every week end, for a few hours at least, and we had wonderful times together. Sometimes in vacation he would bring my stepmother along and she would bring me beautiful presents and smile and pet me, and say she missed me so much and she wished I would ask my father to let me come back and go to school in the city. But I never did, because I was afraid of Herbert. As I grew older I used to have an awful horror of him. But finally one vacation father and mother both came up and said they wanted me at home. My stepmother went to my room with me and told me I needn't be afraid of Herbert any more, that he was quite grown up and changed and would be good to me, and that it would please my father to have all his family together happily again. I believed her and I told father I would like to go, and he looked very happy, and so we went. Herbert had been away at school himself most of the time, and so had Bessemer, although they had been in trouble a good many times, so the servants told me, and had to change to new schools. They were both away when I got home, and I had a very happy time for three weeks, only that I never saw father alone once. My stepmother was always there. But she was kind and I tried not to mind. Then all of a sudden one night I woke up and heard voices, and I knew that the boys were back from the camp to which they had been sent. I didn't sleep much the rest of the night, but in the morning I made up my mind that it was only a little while before I could go back to school, and I would be nice to the boys and maybe they wouldn't trouble me.

"I found that it was quite true that Herbert had grown up and changed. He didn't want to torment me any more, he wanted to make love to me, and I was only a child yet. I wasn't quite fifteen. It filled me with horror, and after he had caught me in the dark—he always loved to get people in the dark—and tried to kiss me, I asked father to let me go back to school at once. I can remember how sad he looked at me as if I had cut him to the heart when I asked him."

[illegible] this part of the tale Reyburn sat with stern countenance, his fingers clenched around the arms of the chair in which he sat, but he held himself quiet and listened with compressed lips, watching every expression that flitted across the sweet pale face.

"That was the last time I was at home with my father," she said, trying to control her quivering lips. "He took me back to school, and he came three times to see me, though not so often as before. The last time he said beautiful things to me about trying to live a right life and be kind to those about me, and he asked me to forgive him if he had ever done anything to hurt me in any way. Of course I said he hadn't. And then he said he hoped I wouldn't feel too hard at him for marrying again and bringing those boys into my life, and I told him it was all right and that some day they would grow up and go away and he and I would live together again! And he said some awful words about them under his breath. But he asked me to forgive him again and kissed me and went away.

"He was taken very sick when he got home, and they never let me know until he was dead. Of course I went home to the funeral, but I didn't stay; I couldn't. I went back to school alone. My stepmother had been very kind, but she said she knew it was my father's wish that I should finish my school year. But when vacation came she was traveling for her health. She wrote me a beautiful letter telling me how she missed me, and how much she needed me now in her bereavement, and how she hoped another summer would see us together; but she stayed abroad two years and the third year she went to California. I was sent to another school, and because I was not asked about it and there didn't seem anything else to do, I went. Every time I would suggest doing something else my stepmother would write and say how sorry she was she could not give her consent, but my father had left very explicit directions about me and she was only trying to carry out his wishes. She knew me well enough to be sure I would want to do anything he wished for me. And I did, of course."

Reyburn gave her a look of sympathy and getting up began to pace the little room.

CHAPTER XII

"IT WAS not until last spring that she sent for me to come home," went on Betty, "and was very effusive about how much she needed me and how she was so much better, and meant to be a real mother to me now, and let me see the world and have a good time. She took me from one summer resort to another, and of course it was pleasant after I had been shut up in school all those years, but she kept me close with her all the time, and I met only the people she chose to have me meet. All the time she kept talking about 'dear Herbert' and telling how wonderful he was and how he had grown to be 'such a dear boy.' Finally he arrived and began the very first evening he was with us to coax me to marry him. At first he was very courteous and waited upon me whenever I stirred, and I almost thought his mother was right about his being changed. But when I told him that I did not love him and could not ever marry him I caught a look on his face like an angry snarl, and I heard him tell his mother I was a crazy little fool, and that he would break my neck for me after he got me good and married. Then his mother began to come to me and cry and tell me how dear Herbert was almost heart-broken, that he would never lift up his head again, and that I would send him to ruin. It was simply awful, and I didn't know how to endure it. I began to wonder where I could go. Of course I had never been brought up to do anything, so I could not very well expect to go out into the world and make my living."

"Didn't you have any money at all?" interrupted Reyburn suddenly.

"Oh, yes," she said, looking up as if she suddenly remembered his presence. "I had always plenty of spending money, but if I went away where they couldn't find me, why, of course I would have to give that up."

"Why, where did your money come from? Was it an allowance from your stepmother, or did your father leave it to you, or what?"

"Why, I think most of it was an allowance my own mother had left to me, beginning when she died and increasing every year. It was in the hands of some trustees who lived up in Boston, where my mother's old home had been, and they always sent the check to me. But of course if I went away they wouldn't know where I was, and I wouldn't dare to tell them, lest Herbert should find out. He was very sharp, and he always found out what he wanted to know. I really never knew much about the money affairs. When I asked they always put me off and said that I was too young to be bothered with business affairs yet. I would be told all about it when I became of age. My stepmother always harped a great deal on keeping me a little girl as long as possible and said it was my father's wish that I should be relieved of all care until I came of age. But father told me once that mother had left me enough to keep me comfortably even without what he would leave me, so I'd surely have something to repay you if I could once get it."

"Don't worry about me!" he exclaimed: "It seems so terrible for you to have been alone in a situation like that! Wasn't there any one you could appeal to for help?"

"No, not any one whom I thought it would be right to tell. You see, in a way it was my father's honor. She was his wife, and I'm sure he loved her—at least at first—and she really was very good to me, except when it was a question of her son."

"I'm afraid I can't agree with you there!" he said curtly, "I think she was a clever actress. But excuse me. Go on, please."

At last, when things had got so bad that I thought I must run away somewhere, my stepmother came into my room one morning and locked the door. She had been weeping, and she looked very sweet and pitiful. She said she had something to tell me. She had tried not to have to do it, for she was afraid it would grieve me and might make me have hard feelings against my father. I told her that was impossible. Then she told me that my father on his death bed had called her to him and told her that it was his wish that I should marry one of her sons, and he wanted her to tell me. He felt that he had wronged them by hating them for my sake and he felt that I could make it all right by marrying one of them. My stepmother said that when she saw how infatuated dear Herbert was with me she hoped that she would be spared having to tell me, but now that I was treating him so she felt bound to deliver the message. Then she handed me a paper which said virtually the same thing which she had told me, and was signed by my father in his own handwriting."

"Was the paper written or printed?" interrupted Reyburn.

"I think it was typewritten, but the signature was papa's. There could be no mistake about that, and he wouldn't have signed something he didn't mean." Betty sighed as if it were a subject she had worn into her heart by much sorrowful thought.

"It might be quite possible for him to have done that under influence or delirium, or when he was too sick to realize."

"Oh, do you think so?" Betty caught at the hope. "It seems so awful to go against papa's last request."

"There is nothing awful but the idea of your being tied to that—beast!" said Reyburn with unexpected fervor. Betty looked at him gratefully and went on:

"I was simply appalled. I couldn't think, and I made my stepmother go away and leave me for a little while, but things got blacker and blacker and I thought I was going crazy. I couldn't marry Herbert even to please my father. The next day Bessemer arrived. He had been worrying his mother a lot about money, and when he arrived I couldn't help hearing what they said to him. They charged him with all sorts of dreadful things, and called him a disgrace, and threatened to let him be arrested, and a great many more such things, and finally his mother ended up by telling him she never had loved him. We were at the old home by this time, and I was sitting upstairs in my room with my windows open, and all their talk floated right up to me. It made me feel sick, and yet I felt sorry for Bessemer, for lately whenever he had been around he had been kind to me, and sometimes I had stayed around near him to get rid of Herbert. We often talked over our troubles together and sympathized with one another. He felt sorry for me, but he was weak himself and couldn't see any way out for either of us.

"They had pretty stormy times all that day. Late in the afternoon Herbert and Bessemer went to their mother's room and were closeted with her for two hours, after which Herbert went away in the car with his suit-case and bags as if he were not coming back soon. I watched him from my window, and in great relief went down to take a little walk, for I had stayed closely in my room all day and tried to plan what to do. One thing that held me from running away was that it would be such a disgrace to the family, and I knew my father would have felt it so keenly. That was always the great trouble when the boys got into scrapes at college, my father would groan and say he felt disgraced to be so conspicuous before the world. So I hesitated to do what would have been a sorrow to him had he been alive.

"Half an hour later I was sitting alone in the twilight on one of the porches, and Bessemer came out and sat down beside me.

"He looked so sort of homely and lonesome that I put my hand on his arm and told him I was awfully sorry for him, and suddenly he turned around and said:

"'Say, Betty, why don't you marry me? Then they can't say a word to either of us. Your father's wishes will be carried out and Herb'll have to whistle.'

"At first I was horrified, but we talked a long time about it, and he told me how lonely he had always been, and how nobody had ever loved him, and he knew he wasn't attractive, and all that; and then he said that if I married him we would go away and live by ourselves and he would let me do just as I wanted to. He wouldn't bother me about anything. If I didn't love him he would keep out of my sight, and things like that, till I got very sorry for him, and began to think that perhaps after all it was the best thing that would ever come for either of us. So I said I would.

"It surprised me a little that my stepmother took it so calmly when we told her. She cried a little, but did it very prettily, and kissed Bessemer, and told him he was fortunate. Then she kissed me and said I was a darling, and that she would be so happy if it only weren't for poor dear Herbert

LITTLE WAIFS OF THE GREAT WAR

By BLANCHE BRACE

THEY were going at it for all they were worth, tooth and nail, hammer and tongs—two small boys engaged in the immemorial pastime of small boys the world over. It was a glorious fight. Brown eyes snapped, and little brown fists danced through the air. The two forgot everything else, even what they had been fighting about when they began. They forgot they were orphans of the great war. Roger forgot how hungry he had often been, and Emile forgot how he had seen his mother die at Verdun, and his grandfather dragged after a cart through the streets.

How it would have ended will never be known; it is a battle lost to history. For just at that moment the directress of this particular one of the four orphanages that the Methodist Episcopal Church maintains in France for war orphans hurried up with a visitor and intervened. Grown-ups always do intervene at crucial moments.

"Why, boys!" she exclaimed. Her tone sounded surprised, but she knows small boys so well that perhaps she wasn't really so astounded as she seemed.

The culprits fell apart. Emile, the hardy warrior, put a thumb in the corner of his round little mouth. Roger grinned, shyly, and studied the ground.

"WHAT do you suppose this lady from America will think of us?" demanded the directress. "She has brought along some American candy, too—for children who are good. What ought we to do about it?"

Emile had no suggestions, but Roger lifted his eyes and spoke.

"I remember candy," he said, with pride. "We ate it. That was before my papa went to fight. My mother got it on Saturday at the store. We put it in our mouths, and bit it with our teeth, and ate it down, just like it was bread or anything. If I had candy now, I wouldn't do that. I would just let it lie upon my tongue. It would last, and last."

Roger ceased to speak as suddenly as he had begun, dropped his eyes, and worried the soil with the toe of his sturdy little shoe. The visiting "lady from America" found that her eyes were suddenly dim. When the directress of the orphanage spoke, after the smallest pause, her voice was brisk enough but curiously soft.

"Well, come around to the veranda with the others and get your candy," she said. "You and I will have a talk about fighting later. You are sorry that you have been naughty boys?"

"Oui, oui!" they cried, eagerly, while Emile slipped a small hand furtively into Roger's.

"You won't fight any more?" asked the directress.

"Non, non! Merci, madame!" they shouted, in a breath, and disappeared around the corner of the house, candyward. The directress looked after them with tender eyes.

"I'M SORRY you happened to see them at their worst," she said. "But they wouldn't be little boys unless they did things like that, now and then. And we are very proud of our little fighters of France."

Methodist Home for Girls in France

"Little fighters of France!" repeated the visitor from America.

It seemed to her that that was so exactly what they were, these little French children who had found homes in these Methodist orphanages. They knew, they understood far more about the war than any grown-up back in the United States could ever know or understand. There were children playing leap-frog in quite the American fashion, under the great pepper-tree in the big yard of the orphanage at Mentone, who had seen their mothers killed by the Germans in the streets—and no matter how young one may be, he does not forget a thing like that.

"Happier morrows"

A twelve-year-old girl, with a big blue bow on her bobbed brown hair, in the orphanage at Grenoble, had starved for two years as a prisoner of the Germans. In the boys' farm at Lyons one of the boys had been at play with his little sister when she fell, hit by the enemy's shell. A dumpling of a little boy four years old at Mentone, one of six orphaned children, had spent his babyhood hidden from the Boche in a beleagured village, and his mother had been killed one day by a piece of shrapnel when she crept out to try to get her baby some milk In the orphanage at Lyons there was a little girl whose feet had been frozen when she fled with other refugees of Lille, and whose grandmother—who alone remained of her family—had died on the way. These are no isolated cases either, but average instances among the children of the orphanages. No one will ever need to define war to the little orphans of France.

When one is very young, no matter how valorous he may be, he needs a helper in his fight. There must be some one to build the trenches for him and to furnish him with ammunition. That is what the Methodist Church is trying to do for the little war orphans over here—to put the right weapons into their hands, and to make the orphanges training-camps for the battle of life.

There is no training-camp in the world quite like a home, and no commander who can take the place of a mother. These the Church cannot supply for the orphans of France, but it does its best to make the orphanages real homes, with motherly women in charge. The boys' farm at Charvieu, just out of Lyons, is still so overcrowded that dormitories are necessary, but in the other orphanages there are not more than three or four little white beds in each room, and each child has a place for his own clothes, and his own corner for his toys and other prized possessions. The older ones have the iron book-cases and their own books.

It is touching to see how these little wanderers of war, some of them so tossed about for the last few years, value these places where they can feel at home.

They put queer, grubby little bouquets of the wild violets and wood primroses they have gathered in glasses upon the mantel. They ask permission to cut pictures out of the American magazines in the orphanage, and tack them up on the walls along with their own efforts at art. They keep their rooms tidy, the older ones doing the major part of the work as a matter of course. The bigger orphans are very tender with the little ones. They serve them first at the meals, direct their games, kiss their bumps, and help mother them in general.

THE children go to school in the towns or cities where the orphanages are situated, either to the public schools, or, when these are too crowded to admit them, to the school maintained for them at the Home. Some of the older ones, at fourteen and fifteen, are already almost through high school. The plan is to keep them in the orphanages until they are at least eighteen years old, and fitted to make their own way in the world. Where they show an aptitude for technical training of some sort, they will be allowed to follow their own bent wherever possible. At the boys' farm in Lyons, such of them as show a leaning toward farming or gardening will have an opportunity to learn these practical sciences under experts; but not all the boys will be made into farmers, willy-nilly; only those who show real liking for such work.

Life is far from being all work, however. Growing children need to be outdoors a great deal, so only the simplest household tasks are allotted to them. In Mentone the great yard with its trees and its flowers, and its graveled spaces, so useful for tag and ring-around-the-rosy, is on a hill looking straight down into the blue Mediterranean, in the sunniest corner of France. There are even larger yards, and almost as pretty ones, at Grenoble and at Ecully, and a whole farm to roam about on at Charvieu.

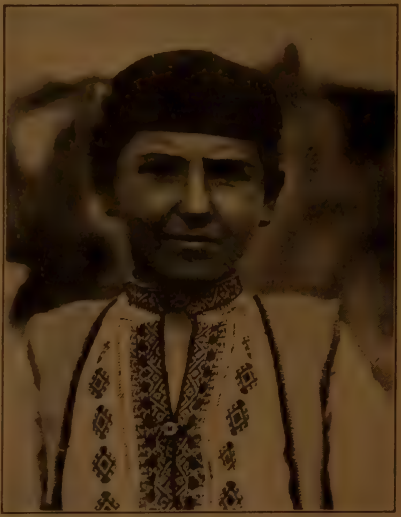
During their months as refugees the war orphans got very much accustomed to being moved on from one place to another. They lived the lives of unhappy nomads until they got into these Homes. Now and then one of them comes anxiously to the directress:

"We don't have to go away from here, do we?" he asks.

"Indeed you don't!" she says. "This place belongs to you, you know. It's just one of the war debts that the world owes you orphans of France. And we think the United States will see that your debt is paid."

Dalmatian Peasant Girl

Picturesque Costume of the Inhabitants of Italia Irredenta



PEASANT girls of Dalmatia wear hand-made garments artistically embroidered. The cloth itself is woven from the wool of the peasant sheep herds. This girl lives on the very edge of the territory occupied by the Italian military forces, near the Dalmatian coast towns of Sebenico and Zara—where Maraschino is made. It is the Italian point of view that Zara and Sebenico, the pro-Italian coast towns, are valueless unless some of the countryside is ceded to Italy, since without a certain amount of the country the towns are untenable from a military point of view.

IS THE SPIRIT OF CHRISTMAS CRACKING?

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"CHRISTMAS," said The Old Lady, a shade bitterly, "is like a cheap mahogany table! Now-a-days!" she added, after a moment's pause.

I followed the movement of her slim reproachful ful hand—a hand that pointed toward a dim corner where a scarred and dejected little tabouret was standing.

"Why do you say that?" I questioned.

The Old Lady sighed. "When I was a girl," she said, "Christmas was a time of merry making and good will—of happiness and gratitude and cheeriness. Christmas was a time when folk who loved each other gathered together to give simple gifts—to sing carols, to rejoice in the birthday of the King. Christmas was a season of unreserved generosity and unaffected joy. But now—" the Old Lady sighed again.

"But now?" I repeated after her, "but now?"

"Now," said the Old Lady, "the spirit of Christmas has been blurred by another spirit—the spirit of discontent and unrest. The carols that we sang have been replaced by rag-time music; the simple gifts have been put aside for presents with price tags attached to them. One person wants to outdo another person in generosity—and where that feeling exists the real meaning of generosity dies. A gift, to be a gift, must be given lovingly rather than boastfully. Folk don't gather together, around a glowing hearth, as they used to; they don't seem to know the spirit of good fellowship as we knew it, years ago. And many people," the Old Lady's voice shook, "seem to have forgotten the real significance of the day—to have forgotten that, on another Christmas, the Christ Child was born in a manger, in Bethlehem."

It was the tremble in the Old Lady's voice that made me revert, quickly, to the mahogany table that stood forlornly in its dim corner.

"What's the matter with it, anyway?" I asked.

"There wasn't anything the matter with the table when I bought it, some time ago," the Old Lady said regretfully. "The dealer told me it would last for centuries, that it was made solidly of the best wood, that it was well constructed. But I hadn't owned it very long before it began to crack, in places. And pretty soon the cracks got to be so noticeable that I had to stand it in dark places where it couldn't be seen. It was made of cheap wood, you see, and the mahogany was only veneered on very thinly."

"And you think that Christmas," I began, "is only veneered on!"

"I don't think so," the Old Lady said, very slowly, "but sometimes I'M AFRAID that perhaps the spirit of Christmas is cracking. I'm afraid that the beautiful season I knew, when I was a girl, is becoming shabby—an old bit of furniture to be set away in a dark corner so that people won't notice how scarred it is."

I LEFT the Old Lady's house; a stately brown stone house, it is, on a quiet side street; and went out into the crisp December air. The world was a-sparkle with snow, gay with electric signs and light-speckled office buildings. I saw a woman, with package-laden arms, stepping into a limousine and found myself wondering whether the packages were gift packages, in the real sense of the word. And then I saw a little girl in a shabby serge suit with a red and green bit of holly pinned to the threadbare lapel of it. And the bravery of that bit of holly made me forget to wonder about the packages, and what they contained.

On a street corner a vender of mechanical toys was rapidly winding up the springs that made small fuzzy animals dance, and leap, and crawl. He was surrounded by ragged children who laughed delightedly at the antics of each toy. Some of the children were very thinly dressed—one of them had no cap, and none of them had mittens. But they were laughing.

I walked along the crowded way, jostled by hurrying people. As I walked I watched the faces that flashed past me. Some of them were vain faces, some of them were cold faces, some of them were hard faces, and some of them were desperately discouraged faces. But about one out of every five was a smiling face.

The lights of a great church, standing in the middle of a busy avenue, fell softly across the street—as softly as hands raised, above the trouble of the city, in a benediction. As I walked by I glanced in through the wide flung doors, and saw people kneeling at prayer. And I saw that the altar was made beautiful with fragrant evergreen, and trailing ground pine, and the vivid scarlet of poinsettia.

SO I went home with the Old Lady's disturbing thought in my mind and the vision of the city streets before my eyes. And as I sat at my desk, writing this article, I wondered whether the Old Lady was right—or wrong. I wondered whether Christmas was a veneer that was cracking away from our ultra-civilization or whether it was a solid structure made firmly of the best materials. And as I wondered, my groping hand touched the worn cover of my old Bible. And I opened the Bible to the second chapter of Luke. I read:

"And, lo, the angel of the Lord came upon them and the glory of the Lord shone round about them; and they were sore afraid.

"And the angel said unto them, Fear not: for, behold I bring you tidings of a great joy, which shall be to all people.

"For unto you is born this day in the city of David, a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord.

"And this shall be a sign unto you; ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger.

"And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of heavenly host praising God, and saying,

"Glory be to God in the highest and on earth peace, good will toward men!"

And I closed the Bible softly with a great reassurance in my heart.

For, oh, friends of mine, it's this way. Christmas may seem something of a farce, something of a hollow mockery, to a generation who have been used to a simpler, kinder, more beautiful season. The hurry of the city, the social unrest, the harsh sound of a street piano, may drown, for them, the subtler undercurrent of real Christmas spirit. The aftermath of the war may still be lying over our land; high prices and duty-gifts may be too apparent, but there are always smiling faces in the crowd, always little shabby girls who will pin a brave sprig of holly to their coats, always great churches with wide open doors, churches that are ready to lead the way back to the realest sort of a Christmas. And there is always a Wonderful Book with a Wonderful Story printed on the pages of it.

And so I, as I write at my desk, am very sure that the spirit of Christmas is not like a poorly veneered mahogany table to be placed in a dim corner. I'm sure that the spirit of Christmas is one of the most beautiful things in the world—something that will never grow old or shabby or tarnished or cracked.

Are you?

CHRISTMAS IN THE CITY

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

SNOW is in the lane, dear— (Remember how it twisted
In between the cedar trees that stood so proudly high?) Snow is in the little lane. (What drifts we used to wade through Underneath the laughter of a vivid winter sky!)

CHRISTMAS time they tell me—it's not Christmas in the city—
(Cities are so full of crowds; and crowds are very lonely—)
Christmas is the home time, when holly wreaths are hung—
Christmas is the glad time when you and I and only
Those we love are gathered close, where the fire dances,
Tying gifts and popping corn and hanging mistletoe!
Christmas is the young time—when youth, renewed, rejoices—
Christmas is the home time.
Hear the chill winds blow
Down the narrow city streets; on the friendless corners,
Friendless people pass and pass; (cities are so lonely!)
Christmas is the home time . . . Buy a wreath of holly, dear, Christmas is a time of mirth— You and I and only
Those we love—the world shut out! Buy some paper flowers,
Buy some city mistletoe—oh, how wan it lies
On its stem of pallid green— (cities laugh at kisses!)
Smile at me and let me glimpse Christmas in your eyes!

SNOW is in the lane, dear (such a funny lane it was Twisting through the cedar trees that stood so proudly high);
Snow is in the little lane. (The lane that leads to Home, dear, Underneath the laughter of a vivid winter sky!)

True Charity Is Love

GOD had called to himself the children he had given to the farmer and his wife who lived upon a wonderland of childhood.

"Doesn't that mean He has other children for us, waiting somewhere in the big world?" they asked each other. They would ask a sign—if any children down in the Children's Home appealed to them it would be God's guidance that they were to take these little ones in His dear Name.

John and Helen, brother and sister, five and three years old, had that desired appeal. They would take both children.

It was not quite like having their own children back again but it was "next best." How the children loved their new mother and father. How they, in turn, were loved and cared for and wisely trained.

"The house is lonesome again. We have room and love for more children," remarked the mother the day after Helen started to school with John.

They left the children over night with "Aunt Lucy" and went child-hunting again. They brought back two little boys, two and four years old.

When Earl followed John to school so proudly the mother was lonely again.

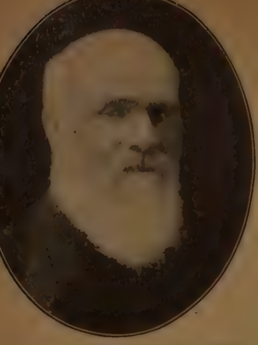
"I don't know how we can use our lives or our money any better than to keep on taking in His little ones," sighed the mother.

Another trip to the city and they brought back three little ones, a baby Grace, two-year-old Alvin and three-year-old Doris; brother and sisters. How happy the four older children were. John and Helen would gladly help with the extra work. It was a happy, busy household.

Baby Grace was so delicate she did not go to school until she was almost seven, when Sister Helen was teaching and would take such good care of her. John was his father's right hand man, but the mother wanted more children "under foot." The family was willing, so two more were taken into that home. When they were ready to go to school to "Sister Helen" the father and mother went upon their last journey to the Children's Home. The home was full now, eleven sons and daughters, God-given, loved and trained as a direct commission from the All-Father. No, it was not charity, it was the pure gold of LOVE.

THE CALL OF THE PATRIARCH

Fifty-two Years a Bishop, He Is Now Taking the Lead in the Episcopal Nation-wide Campaign



America's Senior Bishop—The Right Rev. Daniel S. Tuttle

"SUMMON the men. Call the women. Forget not the children. Discipline the recruits. Furnish the munitions and supplies."

It is the voice of the Patriarch of America sounding the call to the colors.

And who may this Patriarch be that speaks so trumpet-tongued to the men and women of the United States?

He is that man who, rifle in hand, cartridge-belt slung across his shoulders, braved the terrors of the marauding Indian bands of our western plains in 1867 to carry a message of hope to the white men and women who had settled in Montana, Idaho and Utah. He is the man who, when Deer Lodge, Montana, was being consumed by fire, carried water and poured it persistently and successfully upon a burning building in the vaults of which was stored enough powder to wreck the entire town.

He is the man who for nineteen years struggled hip and thigh against the doctrines of Mormonism in the very stronghold of Mormonism, and yet when he left Salt Lake City had the respect and good wishes of the Mormons because he was a just and fair, as well as an uncompromising, fighter.

He is the man who was elected a bishop before he was old enough to be a bishop according to the canons of his own church, and was obliged to wait until his thirtieth birthday to be consecrated. He had been in holy orders but five years before being elected to the Episcopate.

HE IS the Right Rev. Daniel Sylvester Tuttle, D.D., LL.D., Bishop of the Episcopal Diocese of Missouri, Presiding Bishop of the Episcopal Church of the United States of America.

He is the Patriarch of the United States, because in length of service as a bishop he outdistances every other bishop in his church, and, it is believed, in every other church. He was consecrated in 1867 and hence has served as a bishop for fifty-two years.

He is eighty-two years old, straight as a stripling, lively as a cricket, and deaf as a post. At a recent consecration service in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine in New York City he was the only participant who could be heard all over the cathedral. He stands more than six feet high, is broad-shouldered, and has the vigor of a well-preserved man a score of years younger. Near his eightieth birthday, he still went swimming at his summer home at Lake Wequetonsing, Michigan, and apparently enjoyed it as much as he had in his younger days.

It is to the colors of the Nation-wide Campaign of the Episcopal Church that he summons the men, women and children of that faith—a campaign of spiritual education which will result in the raising of a tremendous fund to be spent in increasing the activities of the Episcopal Church at home and abroad; in the building of churches, rectories, community houses, schools, colleges, orphanages, hospitals and dispensaries; in the raising of a new army of workers to carry the Church's message of sympathy, courage and help still farther afield.

Bishop Tuttle was born in the State of New York, at Windham, Greene County, educated in the public schools there, the Academy of Delhi, New York, Columbia College and the General Theological Seminary in New York City. He was a favorite of the late Bishop Horatio Potter, whose sons he tutored in Greek and other subjects, and who ordained him a deacon in the Church of the Transfiguration, New York City, in 1862.

IMMEDIATELY upon being graduated from the theological seminary, he went to Morris, N. Y., as assistant to the Rev. George L. Foote, rector of Zion Church. He served there five years, during which time he married Miss Harriet M. Foote, the rector's daughter. There their first son was born.

In 1867 he was appointed Missionary Bishop of Montana, having jurisdiction also in Utah and Idaho. Still under thirty, he could not be consecrated and was compelled to wait until the following January for that ceremonial.

Leaving wife and son behind, he journeyed to Salt Lake City by stage coach from North Platte, Neb., to Denver, and thence to Salt Lake City, through a country infested by hostile Indians. Every man in the party was heavily armed, and on parts of the journey an armed escort rode beside the stage coaches. Pursuing Indians were sighted across the swollen Platte River. The spot where a stage-driver had been scalped but a few days previous was passed, but Denver, and later Salt Lake City, was reached without untoward incident. The trip required one month lacking a day.

Bishop Tuttle found, on reaching the capital of Mormonism, that his stage-coach journeys had but just begun, and he was soon on the road again bound for that state (then a territory) whose titular Bishop he was. In his book, "Reminiscences of a Missionary Bishop," Bishop Tuttle states that he traveled 40,000 miles by stage-coach in the Rocky Mountains in the course of fulfilling the duties of his office.

THE territory within his jurisdiction embraced 340,000 square miles, and in the earlier days of his episcopate there was not a mile of railroad by which he could travel. In but a few of the towns in Utah, Idaho or Montana had there been any Episcopal religious endeavor before his arrival. In fact, in but few places had there been any sort of religious service, Protestant or Catholic.

Settling down in a lonely cabin in Virginia City, then the capital of Montana, he undertook the duties of a pastor there in addition to his episcopal duties throughout his territory. His only companion during that winter was a cat, Dick. It was for the recovery of this cat when he was sick that James H. Gamble, a friend that Bishop Tuttle made there, prayed, knowing what the companionship of the animal meant to his master.

"Bishop, do you know whom I have been praying for?" asked Mr. Gamble as the two men rose from their knees one night in the cabin. "I have been praying for Dick that he might get well. I couldn't help it—I know what an almost needful companion he is to you."

The following winter was spent in Helena, later the capital, and even then a rival of Virginia City. Mrs. Tuttle and their little son had joined him in the meantime. Gradually he had obtained a few rectors and established a few churches. The work was well founded and continued to grow and more and more of Bishop Tuttle's time was devoted to traveling over much of the 340,000 square miles of his territory where often his congregations were 1,000 miles apart.

In 1880, after many years of request, Montana was given a bishop by herself, and Bishop Tuttle took over the episcopacy of Utah and Idaho alone, his territory being diminished to 195,000 square miles.

IN 1868 Bishop Tuttle was elected Bishop of Missouri, but declined to accept, believing that his direct duty then lay in the Western missionary field, but eighteen years later, when the call was repeated in identically the same words, he finally accepted, and since 1886 he has been Bishop of Missouri. His territory then was reduced to 70,000 square miles. In 1890 West Missouri was made a diocese of itself, and his territory was then but 32,000 square miles, or one-tenth that which he had served thirty-three years before. Although his territory had shrunk, his duties had not, and in 1903, upon the death of Bishop Clark of Rhode Island, he became by seniority Presiding Bishop of the Episcopal Church of the United States in addition to his episcopal duties in Missouri.

Bishop Tuttle was the principal figure at the Centennial of the establishment of Christ Church parish, St. Louis, now the Cathedral parish, of which, by virtue of his office, he was rector, which fell on All Saints' Day, November 1.

This is the man who, as honorary chairman of the Nation-wide Campaign Committee, sounds the present call to the Episcopal Church:

"Gather to the colors of the Nation-wide Campaign. Summon the men. Call the women. Forget not the children. Discipline the recruits. Furnish the munitions and the supplies. Speak to American Churchmen, that they go forward. . . . The Son of God goes forth to war. The American Church goes with him."

Poor Housing of Labor

EVERY now and then interesting bits of evidence come regarding the relation of housing conditions to the labor turnover. In a Southern city in which a room and house survey had been made, one particular block was selected as typical of the conditions under which workmen were living and this particular block was canvassed on Monday and then recanvassed on Friday of the same week.

The Monday canvass revealed a total of one hundred men rooming in the houses of the block. They were living under congested conditions and sleeping in shifts. On Friday of the same week it was found that 115 men were sleeping in the same accommodations, but that only thirty of the original one hundred were still rooming in the block.

The majority of the others could not be located, and investigation revealed that they had left the city. Inasmuch as the workmen were employed at good wages and under fairly comfortable factory conditions, the manager of the canvass concluded that the large turnover was due to nothing so much as to unsatisfactory housing conditions.

Wide-awake business men are everywhere realizing that one of the greatest losses sustained by them results from the shift in their labor force. Cities, moreover, are realizing that the rapid migration of workers represents not merely a serious economic loss but an obstacle to good citizenship and community welfare.

KNIGHTS OF THE DOUBLE BARRED CROSS

By LORA KELLY

ONE of the most appealing pages in all history is that which tells the story of the Children's Crusade.

Great armies led by kings had failed to wrest the tomb of Christ from the hands of infidels. Repeatedly these strong forces were driven back from the Holy Land, disheartened and defeated.

Suddenly a strange thing happened. The hearts of the children became fired with zeal, and three bands of young pilgrims set out from western Europe in quest of the Holy Sepulchre.

But tragedy stalked beside them. Over the snow-clad Alps they trudged and down into the hot plains of Italy, with lessening ranks each day until the wayside was lined with little crumpled heaps of those who could march no further.

Disillusionment was in store for the survivors. The waters of the sea did not part to give them a path to their goal. Confidence in their leaders waned. Some listened to false promises and fell into the hands of slave traders. A few were turned back or were cared for by kindly hands, but death ended the romantic dream for most of them.

To-day more than three million American children are enlisted in a crusade—a chivalry of cleanliness and good health

They constitute one division of the great Army which is battling the white plague under the standard of the double barred cross.

"I played outdoors more than ten minutes to-day"

THEIR task is one of prevention. From coast to coast the younger generation of Americans is laying a firm foundation for health. On their own initiative they are fighting dirt and disease germs with humble weapons of tooth-brush, soap and water, and fresh air.

Something of the glamour surrounding the Crusades of the middle ages had been retained, too. The nomenclature of knighthood furnishes the touch of romance which appeals to the imaginative mind of a child. Through the faithful performance of his "health chores" he becomes successively a page, squire, knight and knight-banneret. If his score is sufficiently high, he is permitted to take part in the national tournament. "The Field of the Cloth of Gold."

Although tuberculosis, sometimes called "consumption," is not mentioned in any of the rules, the modern health crusade is a powerful ally against this menace which claims 150,000 lives yearly. More than 12,000 of these are children under the age of five years, according to a recent survey made by the National Tuberculosis Association which sponsors the crusade movement. Most of this enormous death toll is needless. Modern science has demonstrated that consumption is both preventable and curable. It has also discovered that it is not inherited.

Children are very susceptible to this disease. More than fifty per cent of all children are infected before they are ten years of age, and the percentage increases until at fifteen it reaches a maximum of from sixty to seventy per cent. By the time twenty-one is reached, practically eight out of ten persons are infected.

The power of the child to resist the disease can be built up by fresh air and sunshine and good food. If he is sturdy and strong, is taught to live a clean, well ordered life, tuberculosis will not gain a foothold. But if the system is weakened by illness, overwork, or worry, this enemy creeps in through the barrier.

FIFTEEN years ago little was done to banish this plague which makes such needless inroads upon human life. Only five states were making active efforts to cope with its ravages. To-day everyone of the forty-eight states has an anti-tuberculosis association, and so also have Porto Rico, Hawaii and the Philippines. Nearly 1,000 leagues are affiliated with the National Tuberculosis Association, the leading agency in America to combat tuberculosis.

Fifteen years ago there were only 100 hospitals and sanatoria for the treatment of tuberculosis. Most of these institutions were poorly equipped. To-day there are over 600 special hospitals and sanatoria, and more than 500 clinics and dispensaries, all thoroughly equipped for work.

Fifteen years ago the limited funds for the fight against this scourge came from a few contributors. To-day the work of this organization and its thousand leagues throughout the United States is financed largely through the annual sale of Red Cross Christmas seals. This year more than 650,000,000 seals at a penny apiece will be placed on sale beginning December 1.

Fifteen years ago the open-air school for children was a dream. Now there are more than a thousand.

What has been accomplished is a cause for congratulation and affords great encouragement for the future, but much remains to be done.

Post-war conditions have emphasized the fact that we have a physically shaken world, and that the greatest of all our health problems, that of tuberculosis, needs serious and prompt attention.

More hospitals, more sanatoria, more clinics and dispensaries, more visiting nurses, more open air schools are needed everywhere.

At present the only effective treatment known for the disease is plenty of sunlight, fresh air, good food and rest under competent medical supervision.

NO ONE knows where the plague will strike next. For this reason the tuberculosis workers are stressing the preventive measures among children. One of the defensive weapons is the open air school; it is no longer an experiment. From the sunny deck of an abandoned ferry-boat anchored to a Brooklyn dock to the balsam-laden mountain air in Portland, Oregon, children with rosy cheeks and sturdy little bodies are absorbing the lessons of good health. On a sandy shore on Long Island "where the sea comes up" are these young crusaders battling against the unseen enemy. In the clear sunlight of the southern states are the youthful campers enlisting the aid of Mother Nature in getting well and keeping well. On the top of a tall office building in Detroit, the children frisk about, gnome-like in their odd woolen outdoor suits, defying the cold of the northland winter.

Dotted throughout the country are these life-saving stations. Their routine is much the same: A nourishing diet in which milk plays a conspicuous part, abundant rest for the little bodies when play and study have tired them out, and constant watchfulness for their welfare by teachers and nurses especially trained for the work. Here and there the battle is too much for a frail frame, and like a waif of the medieval crusade, it falls by the wayside. But for the most part, the fight is a winning one.

What of the children still in the shadow however? They are not hard to find. Down the dark alleyways of a great city you will see them swarming. Out in a crowded street, dodging heavy trucks and swift moving traffic, they still claim their natural heritage of play.

Undernourished, neglected, sleeping in stuffy, ill-ventilated rooms, these children are easy prey of disease.

It is not alone in the great cities, however, that this unseen enemy stalks. Lack of proper sanitation in the smaller towns and in the rural sections is one obstacle to better living. Prejudice against health teachings on the grounds that the standards of fifty years ago are good enough, is responsible for much needless illness. Even the conviction that consumption can not be cured still persists in some unenlightened quarters.

The war against tuberculosis is everybody's war. Few families escape the terrible visitation of this plague. The physical examination that followed the drafting of men between the ages of twenty-one and thirty-one revealed approximately 80,000 cases of this disease—nearly three divisions of fighting men unable to serve at a time of great emergency.

CLERGYMEN can help by making adequate provision for indigent members of their churches; by distributing literature and educating people in the truth about tuberculosis; by co-operating with existing agencies working for the prevention of tuberculosis.

Teachers can help by instructing pupils as to the nature, prevention and treatment of the disease; by organizing Modern Health Crusader leagues; and by keeping the classroom well ventilated.

Parents can help by keeping the home clean and well ventilated; by teaching the children to sleep with windows open; providing proper and nourishing food, observing the laws of health and keeping small children away from infected persons.

Children can help by keeping clean; by not putting anything into their mouths except food; by staying as much as possible in the fresh air and sunshine.

CHORES OF Modern Health Crusaders

1. I washed my hands before each meal to-day.
2. I washed not only my face but my ears and neck and I cleaned my fingernails to-day.
3. I kept fingers, pencils and everything likely to be unclean or injurious out of my mouth and nose to-day.
4. I brushed my teeth thoroughly after breakfast, and after the evening meal to-day.
5. I took ten or more slow deep breaths of fresh air to-day. I was careful to protect others if I spit, coughed or sneezed.
6. I played outdoors or with windows open more than thirty minutes to-day.
7. I was in bed ten hours or more last night and kept my windows open.
8. I drank four glasses of water, including a drink before each meal, and drank no tea, coffee, nor other injurious drinks to-day.
9. I tried to eat only wholesome food and to eat slowly. I went to toilet at my regular times.
10. I tried hard to-day to sit up and stand up straight; to keep neat, cheerful and clean-minded; and to be helpful to others.
11. I took a full bath on each of the days of the week that are checked (x).

The Name That Saves

A CHRISTMAS SERMON BY REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

TEXT—Acts 4 : 12. "And in none other is there salvation: for neither is there any other name under heaven, that is given among men, wherein we must be saved."

THERE can be no doubt that the world needs to be saved. Industrial strife, race hatred, greed, lust, ,political jealousy, and indifference to religion are matters of every day news in the world's press dispatches. Although the Great War has been over for more than a year, several wars are going on at the present moment. The passions of men are apparently as wild and lawless in the Balkans as they ever were. A Grand Jury in one of the states of our own Union recently brought in a count of over one hundred murders committed within the state in a year. After nearly two thousand years of what we have called Christianity, sin still sways the hearts and wills of thousands of earth's inhabitants. We do not need to prove the statement that the world needs to be saved. The daily conduct of humanity is all the proof we need.

"Salvation" is the great word of the Bible and it is the central word of the Gospel. Let us ask what this great word means. Salvation was defined, not so very long ago, as missing hell and getting into heaven. An individual matter. But we are beginning now to understand this great word better.

Salvation, as the Bible uses the term and as Jesus taught it, means the redemption of the whole man, body, soul and mind, so that every part of a human being is in harmony with the will of God. And it is also the redemption of every energy. If a man is not saved in his business, politics, journalism, amusement seeking and everything else he does, he is not saved.

Salvation is also social as well as personal. A saved man is concerned with the redemption of the community and with every human being in the universe. Salvation is also a process, going on every day, each day adding something to the redemptive life. In brief, a saved man is one who holds for his great and consuming passion the supreme love of God and his fellow men. The mightiest impulse of the saved man's life is the creed of Jesus. On that, as the rule of his conduct, he lives and moves and has his being.

OTHER names have been invoked besides the name of Jesus as bringing salvation to society and making civilization. Let us look at a few of these names for a moment.

Culture has been invoked many times as the great name to save civilization. Education, travel, knowledge, the silken surroundings that leisure wedded to wealth assures the owner, have been considered by thousands in the past, and are considered by thousands now living, to be all that is necessary to redemption and civilization. But when the tax assessor of a great city a few years ago made out his lists on a magnificent avenue lined with the houses of the cultured rich, not a single oil painting or work of art could be found. They existed to the amount of hundreds of thousands of dollars, but the culture of the owners did not have saving power enough to save them from committing perjury. Culture never saved any one. It is absolutely powerless to save.

Commerce has been invoked as a great name to save. A few years before the Great War a well known book was written called "The Great Illusion." In it the author argued that all that was necessary to save the world from devastating wars was the education of the rising generation as to the real nature of money. It would be almost impossible for nations to go to war on account of the prodigious losses all would sustain. And yet all that knowledge did not have any real influence in curbing the passions of men who were willing to involve the world, themselves included, in the most stupendous commercial losses in order to exercise their hate. Commerce never saved a nation. It has in many cases, on the other hand, increased the spirit of greed and jealousy.

Science has been another great name invoked as a saving power for civilization. It stands for the search for the truth, it contributes to the joy and comfort of living, with its wonderful discoveries in the realm of Nature. But it has little if any influence over men's passions.

Many people today think that all that is needed to make a safe civilization is the making and enforcing of Law. Legislatures and national congresses are constantly passing new laws. At the same time, laws and treaties are being constantly broken and trampled on by those who are lawless at heart. Very many believe that if they could only pass certain laws, they could redeem society. And yet Rome, which stood as a synonym of Law and boasted of its power, was thoroughly corrupt and went down in ruin because it had no law that governed the heart.

CATHEDRALS, rituals, impressive services of worship, special kinds of clothing, sectarianism, organized denominationalism—these have been invoked as great names to save. As a matter of historical fact, ecclesiasticism has invariably kept the world back in an atmosphere of ignorance and superstition. Jesus confronted it and rebuked it in his day. All the cathedrals of Europe, with all their splendor, never stopped for one moment the hatred of men. The Pope had no influence to put an end to the ghastly slaughter. Simply joining a church never saves a man unless he has first of all joined his life to the life of the Saviour. All the gorgeous rituals devised by man and called worship, have no power to save if the heart has not been clothed in the garments of humility and confession of sin. Ecclesiasticism is a failure when it comes to salvation.

There is one Name, and one only, that when invoked, does save. It is the Name of Jesus Christ! What is this wonderful power? How does it come to pass that Jesus can save the world? For these reasons:

The first article of Jesus' creed contains God. This is fundamental. It is a matter of regret that the League of Nations does not contain a single reference to the Deity. Our own Declaration of Independence contains three distinct references to "Nature's God," "The Supreme Judge of the world" and "Divine Providence." Does the world today believe less in a Supreme Being than it did 143 years ago? However that may be, it is a vital fact that 2,000 years ago Jesus taught that faith in and dependence on a Divine Being was absolutely necessary before the world could be saved. And it is very certain that the League of Nations will not save the world from future wars and future hate, unless the nations put into the covenant what the men at Paris left out. For no man or nation was ever saved in all the history of the world, on a Godless basis.

Jesus lays great emphasis on the heart life. He said: "Out of the heart come forth evil thoughts, murder, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, railings." Jesus never quarreled with the Roman Government. He had not one word to say about the "system" under which he was born. His appeal was always to the reason and the heart. The trouble with men is not a lack of culture or education or the environment or a lack of wealth, but a wrong heart life. The guiding impulse, which has its seat in a love of men is not present, and as long as that is wanting, men will continue to hate one another. This teaching is fundamental. It is not the teaching of the world's philosophies. It is seldom heard on the floor of Congress. It is not often mentioned in the daily paper's editorials. But it is the basis of right feeling and right acting. If Jesus emphasized it, there must be great reason for it.

THE whole happiness and progress of the universe depends on good will to men. It was the song of the angels announcing the birth of a Redeemer. It is the essence of Jesus' rule of life. He even goes so far as to command us to love our enemies. If the nations would begin to do that, wars would cease without any Leagues or compacts. Commerce and intercourse between the nations would proceed on land and sea like a great symphony of praise to God. Race prejudice would die out. And heaven would begin on earth. The world would be saved, redeemed, if it would only obey this great fundamental law of Jesus.

Once when Jesus was talking in the intimate circle of his disciples, he said, "All of you are Brothers." And yet Matthew was a Jew with so little national spirit that he was willing to take the office of customs under the Romans, an office that made him despised by his own countrymen. On the other hand, Peter, the fiery Galilean, believed for a time at least that the Gospel was confined to his own nationality. All of these men were almost as different as if they had belonged to distinct nationalities, and yet Jesus said, "You are all brothers."

It is because the rule of Jesus strikes another fundamental here that it is a saviour of mankind. Ever since the Tower of Babel, mankind has been fighting on account of race hatred. Jesus' rule of life would do away with this feeling. And it is the only thing that will accomplish a seeming miracle. For men in all ages have taken for granted that race prejudice is a thing so deep seated that it could not be overcome.

The common argument always has been that Human Nature being what it is, race feeling can never change, and a universal brotherhood is impossible. But the blessed fact is that human nature can change. There was a time less than a hundred years ago when men said, "Slavery has come to stay." But slavery as an institution has gone. Men said, a hundred years ago, that duelling was the duty of a gentleman. Today it has been laughed out of court. Less than fifty years ago most business men in the United States believed that the liquor traffic was necessary to business and that the saloon could never be destroyed. They have changed their minds until 100,000,000 people are going to exist and prosper as never before, without a brewery or distillery.

Human nature, being a thing of life, has in it the possibility of change. Jesus' whole teaching is based on that possibility. He even went so far as to say, "Ye must be born anew."

A few years ago nearly every one believed that war was a thing that would always exist. Today millions of men and women are determined that militarism shall be a thing of the barbarous past, and the time will come when it shall be a thing of memory only. About the last great thing that divides men now is race feeling. But under the rule of Jesus even this will pass away, and men will act like brothers, love instead of hate and help instead of hinder. But to accomplish that, nothing except the Name of Jesus is powerful enough to bring it to pass. Because that Name stands for love in action, even the love of our enemies.

THE editor of a great daily commenting on President Wilson's letter to the Industrial Conference said: "The President in his letter asks, 'Are we to confess that there is no method to be found for carrying on industry except in the spirit and with the very method of war?'" And then this editor wrote this amazing sentence: "A method may be found and is earnestly to be desired, but it has not been found yet!"

"Not found yet!" Then what shall we say to the fact of Jesus in history, and the statement that in His name the world can be saved?

I have recently come out of a hospital after an operation that confined me nearly six months in bed. The last condition that confronted my doctor was what he called, for lack of any other name, "muscular rheumatism," which covers a multitude of troubles. This doctor was one of the most skillful physicians in this country. He frankly confessed to me that he did not know of any cure for my trouble. There are no sure remedies for some of the most terrible of earth's physical pains.

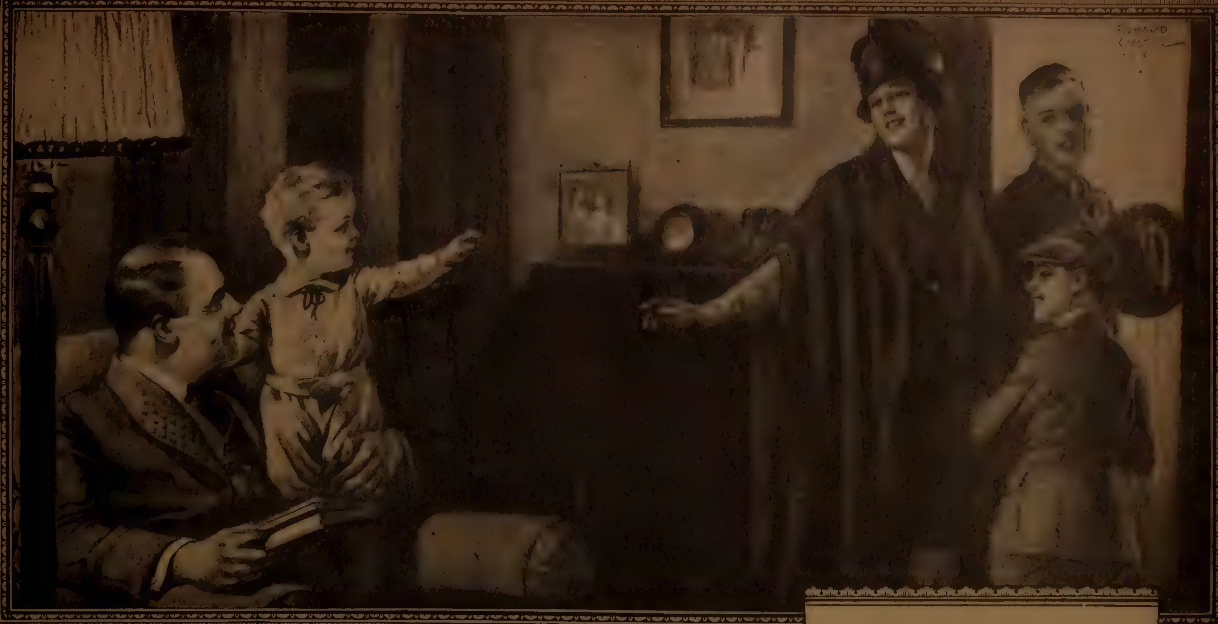
But when it comes to the most terrible of all things in this world—the sin and selfishness that are greater scourges than all the diseases of mankind, there is a remedy. That remedy is the Name of Jesus, that can save the sufferer. There is no doubt about this remedy, because in all the ages those who have taken it have been saved. Their testimony is unquestioned, their cure is without dispute.

This Christmas and the coming New Year find the world entering on a most tremendous chapter of history. It is the first business of every one to help make that history, with the cooperation of God, right instead of wrong. The newspaper editor, the politician, the merchant, the school teacher, the farmer, the lawyer, the author, the amusement director, the preacher—have no right to make anything else first except the business of redemption. The world is sick. It needs a remedy. That remedy has been found. It will cure. There is only one remedy that can save this old world in the year of our Lord, the year 1920. "There is a Name, a Name, a Name," that can save! The only Name! The mighty Name of Jesus! It will be the greatest year in the history of this world if that Name is exalted among the toiling, suffering, sinning nations of the earth.

THE VISIONARY

By ARTHUR WALLACE PEACH

HE SAW the star gleam down his future's night,
And pledged his years to win that shining goal,
Forgetting God had set it in his sight
Not as a goal but light to guide his soul!



It's father's turn home tonight

DAD has to be content with reading the story of the picture tonight. The folks will see it!

He's particular about what he reads, just as they are about what they see.

The story is great, classical of its kind. That is why it has been selected for Paramount and Artcraft.

Thus Famous Players-Lasky Corporation is laying the foundations of a screen tradition as classical as Homer, as undying as Dickens.

People will always want to see such Paramount and Artcraft Pictures as the screen versions of the world's greatest novels, immortal short stories and picked stage plays, as well as the greatest original photoplays.

By this deep-laying of the very foundation of the art of motion pictures, Paramount and Artcraft Pictures set the pace for the whole industry. Is it any wonder that they daily fill the seats of nearly ten thousand theatres? Why, you take a chance if you miss a single change of program at your favorite theatre!

PUBLISHERS' STATEMENT

CONGRATULATIONS all round! The printers' strike, which like a dark cloud cast its gloomy shadow over the periodical press for many weeks past, has rolled away and the sun is shining brightly again. It was a depressing time while it lasted; but it's now well over and we all are glad it didn't last longer.

Happening to be in one of the big New York publishing establishments a few days ago, while the strike was still under way, we ran across one of the managers. "Going yet?" we asked. He shook his head and smiled rather sadly. "No," he said, "not a wheel has turned here in the last five weeks, and we don't know when things will begin to move. Luckily we could get some work done in Philadelphia, otherwise we would have been completely at a standstill."

Today, our friend is smiling all over, because the wheels are going round again.

Of course, the bigger publications, including the Christian Herald, made the best use of the printing facilities in other cities while the strike lasted.

The Christian Herald was fortunate in finding excellent facilities in Chicago where we finally got out four issues, although they were somewhat late. Our subscribers must have been surprised at the appearance of the paper. The regular home plant and home product cannot be duplicated on short notice—go where you will—and we were well satisfied to be able to get it out at all. A great many periodicals suspended publication entirely during the strike.

Our issue of December 13 was particularly interesting. We decided to bring out this one issue in typewritten pages, photographed. This, doubtless, was a novelty to many of our Christian Herald readers.

As you have already heard, the strike was due to an internal conflict between the International Union and the local New York unions. After all these weeks of vain battling, the strikers have agreed to abide by the original contract made between the publishers and the International Union. In the final settlement the Publishers' Association have stood by their original offer of a heavy increase in the wages of the employees of the New York printing industry. All other matters in dispute are left to arbitration.

AND that's the whole story, from which our friends may gather some idea of the difficulties that have beset us lately in our efforts to keep on supplying them with the regular weekly visits of the Christian Herald. That some of you have missed it, we can well believe; but under all the circumstances, we feel confident you will agree with us that we did our best under very trying conditions. For any copies you may have missed, we will extend subscriptions in every case to cover the shortage.

For all the kind words and encouragement you have given us during this testing time, you have the heartiest thanks of the entire staff of the paper. Your letters came just when they were most welcome, and gave us courage and helped us more than can be told.

SOME time ago, when scanning the outlook for the coming year, we found that, with the increased costs of labor, print paper, mailing, and practically everything that goes into the production of the Christian Herald, our only way to meet these increases was to raise the subscription price. There was no alternative, and we took this step very reluctantly. We have determined, however, upon setting the date for the new subscription rate of $3 at January 1, in order that all of our present subscribers may have time between now and New Year's to renew at the old rate—$2.50. We hope to see practically the whole Christian Herald Family taking advantage of this, by sending in their renewals within the next ten days. No matter how far ahead the date of expiration may be, you can extend it and get the benefit of the old rate.

RELIGION AND BUSINESS

IN MANY minds there has long been an impression that business and religion were two entirely separate propositions—that the one should not be mixed up with the other. The world, however, is coming around to a different conclusion. In the general discussion of the disturbing national problems of our time, it is significant to find that there is a growing tendency on the part of men who rank as authorities in business, to adopt the view that religion is, after all, an essential factor to be taken into account in solving such troubles as those the nation is facing at the present time. Roger W. Babson, widely known as an expert statistician, is one of those who has been impressed with the applicability of Christian principles to present-day needs. In a recent article he very frankly declares the conviction that the Christian religion, practically applied, would prove a sovereign remedy for all of the present vexatious conditions in the political, social, economic and industrial world.

This is simply another way of saying that reasonableness, justice, fair play, honesty and unselfishness would win out where astuteness, greed, hostility and cross-purposes all round had produced a seemingly inextricable tangle. "The need of the hour," writes Mr Babson, "is not more legislation; it is more religion! More religion is needed everywhere, from the halls of Congress to the factories, mines, fields and forests. . . . The solving of the labor situation is wholly a question of religion. The wage-worker will never be satisfied with higher wages and shorter hours, any more than you and I are satisfied with more profits and a bigger house. Things never would satisfy anybody and never will. Satisfaction and contentment are matters of religion. Where right motives are paramount there are no serious labor problems. Both groups are largely actuated by selfish motives at the present time. This is tremendously short-sighted selfishness. We all need a new outlook on life, a new political policy, a new industrial policy, a new social policy. The old policy, founded upon and striving only for production, has fulfilled its usefulness. We need a new policy based upon faith and striving for production. . . . All men are human, whether senators or humble workers. We are actuated not by our intellects, but by our emotions. The agencies which develop hate, jealousy and fear, are running rampant today. One great organization which has the machinery and opportunity to develop the constructive motives of love, generosity and hope, is asleep, yet there exists enough energy in the churches to enable them to fight one another."

In former years, it used to be said among men of affairs that anyone who tried to run his business according to the principles laid down in the Gospels, would soon have no business to run. The world, it was believed, would simply deride and victimize him. Now, the conviction is forcing itself upon the minds of all classes that the only way to save business is to apply those very principles. The need of the hour is religion.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT'S RELIGION

IN HIS remarkable book on "Theodore Roosevelt, the Man as I knew Him," by Dr. F. C. Iglehart (published by the Christian Herald), the author has given not only an authentic life of the national hero from birth till death, but has also devoted an entire chapter to President Roosevelt's religion, claiming that it was the prime motive in the formation of his great character and his masterly statesmanship. "From both parents," the author writes, "President Roosevelt inherited the deepest religious instincts. He was trained in a home singularly devout. At the age of sixteen, he offered himself for church membership to his pastor in these words: 'I would like to become a member of the Church. I feel that one who believes so firmly in the Bible and in Christianity as I do, should say so publicly, and enter openly into the active service of the Church, to drill with the troops and fight in the battle-front with the soldiers of the Cross.' Every Sunday of his life when well, and when it was possible, he attended church service, and never more regularly than when President. On the 'gasless Sundays' last year, he walked to and from church, a distance of six miles."

In the chapter entitled "Roosevelt on the Bible," the late President's attitude is given in these words: "The teachings of the Bible are so interwoven and entwined with our whole civic and social life that it would be literally—I do not mean figuratively, I mean literally—impossible for us to figure to ourselves what that life would be if these teachings were removed. We would lose almost all the standards by which we now judge both public and private morals. Almost every man who has by his life-work added to the sum of human achievement of which the race is proud—of which our people are proud—almost every such man has based his life-work largely on the teachings of the Bible." Again, in a confidential chat at the White House, President Roosevelt said: "I consider the Christian ministry as the highest calling in the world, and feel that, occupying the most exalted position in the nation, I am enabled simply and sincerely to preach the practical moralities of the Bible to my fellow-countrymen and to hold up Christ as the hope and Saviour of the world. I believe deep down in my soul that I have preached the same Gospel that you are called to preach."

Theodore Roosevelt believed in a crucified Christ. In his love for the poor and his care for the women and children, he manifested a heavenly tenderness that indicated that he had been with Christ and learned of Him. The Sunday after the news of Quentin's death, he and Mrs Roosevelt went to the altar for the communion, which proved to be his last. As he took the emblems of the body and blood, his great soul fed on Christ, as he realized the meaning of the words: "Preserve thy soul and body unto everlasting life." It was because Theodore Roosevelt had so strong a grip on God that he held in his grasp so firmly the hearts of his countrymen, and the love of the greatest nation of the world.

HAD PAUL LIVED TODAY

WHAT a crusade Paul the Apostle could conduct on the vexed question of pastors' salaries, were he living in these times! How he could thunder forth his denunciations against those who would deny the underpaid preacher a right to a share in the comforts of life as the legitimate return for his services! When the same question was up for discussion in Corinth, in Paul's day, it was not the high cost of living but plain, unadulterated selfishness which had produced a situation that drew from the Apostle the very outspoken reproof he hurled at the Greek churchmen. Those who preached the Gospel, he told them, should live by the Gospel. Like other folks, they must eat. They plant the vineyard, they feed the flocks; should they be denied a share of the fruit and the milk? If the spiritual law forbids a man to muzzle the ox so that it cannot eat a mouthful of the corn it is treading out, will God take less care for man than for cattle? If the pastor plant the good seed in men's hearts, he deserves to be at least fed and kept alive while doing it. As his only source of revenue is his ministry, it is evident that he must live by that means.

It would seem that the real trouble was that, like many people today, those church wardens, deacons and elders and influential members of the congregation of that time, with all their love of the Gospel, so far forgot the preacher and his material needs that their indifference had become a scandal. Paul, the tentmaker, who gloried in the fact that he had never been a charge upon any congregation, was the one man peculiarly fitted to take up the cudgels for those ministers who had no skill to eke out their meager incomes at any other callings, and who bore their privations in silence, yet not without amazement and sorrow at the heartlessness they encountered, instead of having their burdens lightened. We may well believe that Paul's words burned in the hearts of his hearers and stirred them to adopt a kindlier course to their spiritual shepherds thereafter.

We are glad to learn that, following the Pauline precept, several of the denominations have already taken steps for an immediate increase in ministers' salaries, while others have the matter under advisement. This is as it should be. We hope soon to hear that the good work is sweeping all along the line.

THE "Y" CONVENTION

FEW men in public life have such skill in the presentation of a great idea or principle as Dr. John R. Mott possesses. In his address before the International Y. M. C. A. Convention at Detroit, he expressed in admirable terms the crusader spirit of the "Y." Like others he had been impressed with the high standard of efficiency of the organization's work at home and abroad, and by the confidence with which the record of its war work was submitted to the judgment of the American public. It is a record of which the nation can afford to be proud, showing as it did how far-flung was its influence, and how valuable the benefits it brought to a world which was in greater need of such help than at any previous period of human history. He regarded the entire showing at the Convention as proof that the "Y" is called to still wider service by the very facts themselves. Working in full sympathy with the Church, yet bringing into operation many features the Church itself does not possess, it rounded off the record in a way that conclusively demonstrated that not only in the religious but in the human aspects of the case, it had accomplished far more than even its leaders could have hoped for or anticipated.

And now, with a world under new conditions, with many difficult problems demanding solution, with a great industrial upheaval in process, and with dangerous elements plotting against America's government, its foundation principles, its security and its very life, there is still more and even greater work for the "Y."

Staging a Sunday School Play

The Story of Joseph and His Brothers and of Paul and Festus Provide Excellent Material for Study by Children

By WILLAMETTÁ PRESTON

THE first question to be decided in preparing a Sunday School play is what class or department shall present it. Next, what play you will choose. There are many Bible stories that hold great dramatic possibilities, but of course we must exclude all having Christ as a character. Although we are limited to Old Testament or apostolic themes, there is no lack of material. Job, Esther, Ruth, Gideon, the "love story of Isaac" and many others are available.

For a class of Intermediate boys Joseph offers itself. There must be the aged father, the twelve brothers, the Arabs, the men in the Egyptian prison, Pharaoh and his court. The entire class can take part. First must come careful study of the story by the class under the teacher's direction. The children must know each of the brothers not only by name but by nature. How did they live? How did they dress? How would you have acted in like circumstances? Then let the class elect the leading characters, those will make the best Joseph and Jacob and Benjamin and Pharaoh. At first they may just act it out, without using the words or let the teacher repeat the Bible words as needed.

In the first scene Joseph is telling his dreams to his brethren—the dreams about the stars and sheaves bowing down. And while he is talking his father sends for him and the brothers follow and he is given the coat of many colors, signifying that thereafter he is to be the head of the tribe over his older brothers. Joseph is too young to understand its significance, but the others do. They begin to plot and plan against him. This requires almost no stage setting, just a door at the back where Jacob is sitting.

Next, Joseph goes to his brothers who plot against him. Judah objects to killing the lad. The brothers put him in a pit. Then the Arab traders come and the lad is carried off to Egypt.

A very short scene follows when the brothers take the torn, blood-stained robe home to the father, who plainly shows his grief.

THE next scene is also a short one—Joseph in Egypt serving his master. Then Joseph in prison, interpreting the dreams of butcher and baker. The men are released. Joseph is left. In the next scene, Pharaoh can find no one to interpret his dream when Joseph is remembered. They send for him. He goes before the king and interprets the dream and gives such wise advise that Pharaoh marvels and makes him ruler of all the land next to himself.

Then follow the coming of the ten brothers, using the exact words of the Bible narrative, and the insistence that Benjamin come with them next time.

A short scene shows Jacob's grief at this demand and the older son's promise to be surety for his brother.

The banquet given to the brothers gives opportunity to illustrate the oriental table and customs of that early day. There is another short scene in which the missing cup is discovered in Benjamin's pack and the scene when Joseph makes himself known to his brethren. Then the wonderfully touching scene where Jacob meets his long lost son. Then, as a climax, Joseph takes them into court and presents them to Pharaoh as his father and his brethren and the king graciously gives the aged patriarch the "land of Goshen as an inheritance."

The boys will make what simple stage furnishing they need and they will find or invent costumes. They can be allowed entire freedom in the setting of the play. The only care must be taken is in the correct understanding of it before the dramatization begins. No books are needed but the One Book. They will find in the library all needed information about manners and customs. It will be less acting than living in that far away time—of being those fine heroes if but for an evening.

An apostolic theme that offers equal opportunity but takes less time as it is all in one act with no change of scene is that of Paul before Festus. For this the platform is severely plain with only a couch upon a raised platform at the back. The couch is supposed to be a throne seat for three.

To the sound of low music four heralds come in slowly, two from either side. They meet and pass, then take their places two on each side of the throne. Then they put their trumpets to their mouths and blow softly. They are arrayed in blue and silver, with long silver trumpets.

AS IF obeying the heralds, four soldiers in bright red Roman uniforms enter and stand either side the platform. Next come six civilians in court uniform. A prolonged wait. Then Festus and Agrippa come slowly down to the throne, turn and stand as if awaiting some one else.

Low music again, a march, and from the entrance by the door come first two little flower girls scattering roses, next four maids of honor, then two tall negro fan-bearers, waving their large fans rhythmically. Next Queen Berenice in her royal robes, four little boys holding the long train. Festus and Agrippa meet the queen and seat her upon the throne. Agrippa seating himself between her and Festus. Then ensues a brief dialogue. Agrippa asks questions about conditions in Palestine and Festus tells of Paul, who is stirring up strife but in whom there seems to be no fault other than his religious zeal.

Agrippa wishes to see him. Festus tells one of the soldiers to bring Paul in. Paul is in simple Jewish costume of dusty brown, his wrists chained together. The dialogue that follows is taken word for word from the Bible. Paul occupies the center of the platform and is intensely eloquent. When he appeals to Cæsar, Agrippa whispers audibly to Festus his regret, "else he might have gone free." The soldier takes Paul out. The heralds sound the trumpets. Flower girls, maids and fan bearers precede Queen Berenice from the stage, her train bearers almost stumble but regain their balance. Festus and Agrippa follow, then the soldiers and lastly the heralds. Then the curtain slowly falls upon a deserted platform. It had all been so real, so reverential, that one could think only of Paul and his high resolve.

"The rehearsals are more like prayer-meetings," one of the four maids of honor remarked before a performance. "We expected ever so much fun but—instead—we were just living back in those times when Paul was in such danger. It was our Paul who had the part and he decided, while studying the Bible Paul, that he would preach as Paul did."

American Warriors Decorated

IN a compilation of war department records the interesting fact is disclosed that 15,384 officers and enlisted men in the military service of the United States have been decorated by the Allied Powers.

France awarded the Cross of the Legion of Honor to 909; the Croix de Guerre to 11,684; Military Medal to 290, and various other decorations to 259.

In addition to these awards to individuals, the French Government awarded the fourragère, or shoulder cord, to four organizations; the Croix de Guerre, with palm, to fifty-one organizations; the Croix de Guerre, with gilt star, to twenty-five organizations; the Croix de Guerre, with silver star, to thirty-five organizations, and the Croix de Guerre, with bronze star, to five organizations.

Sousas Band and Conn Instruments

What Sousa Says

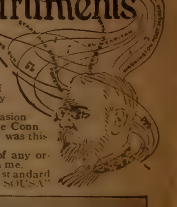
"I take this occasion to tell you of the genuine pleasure and perfect satisfaction your New Wonder Model instruments, used by the members of my Band, have given me.

In our extended engagement at the New York Hippodrome, your instruments have had a splendid opportunity to display their merits, and they have fully demonstrated their worthiness of the Grand Prize and Gold Medal of Honor given them by the Jury of Awards at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition.

During our pleasant engagement at the Exposition I had occasion to note the various bands and orchestras there engaged, and the Conn instruments seemed to be in evidence everywhere. Particularly was this the case where high grade musicians were engaged.

I still maintain that the new model Conn instruments enhance the musical value of any organization to a marked degree, and the members of my organization fully accord with me.

The Conn, Ltd., has created a high standard of excellence for Band Instruments, a standard worthy of emulation, if possible, by other makers. Very sincerely, JOHN PHILIP SOUSA"



The Famous Jackies Band, U. S. Naval Training Station, Great Lakes, Ill., Lieut. John Philip Sousa, Conductor

The organization and successful training of the "Jackie Band" is one of the most remarkable of Lieut. Sousa's achievements. Its members were recruited from all walks of life—many of them wholly unfamiliar with music and musical instruments—and yet in a few short months, Lieut. Sousa was able to develop them into a world renowned organization.

The Jackie Band of over 1200 members was equipped throughout with Conn Instruments—a most significant fact when one remembers the success achieved, for good music is no mystery. It is the expression of skill in both the artist and the making of his instrument.

Music In Other Organizations

The power of music to inspire and bind together was well illustrated in the Jackie Band. Hundreds of organizations and institutions are recognizing the same fact and are using it to the mutual advantage and the profit of their members.

Large manufacturing industries, Fire and Police Departments, Boy Scout Organizations, Schools, Colleges, Lodges, Churches, etc., are all beneficiaries of the bond of music. Many remarkable Bands and Orchestras have been developed among the members of such organizations with the aid of Conn Instruments.

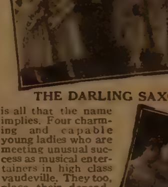
Unusual benefits of no small proportions await other similar organizations who are interested in the creation and development of a spirit of harmony in thought and action within their organizations.

Essential Tonal Qualities a Characteristic of Conn Instruments

The test of an instrument is its tonal qualities—its perfect intonation—its symmetry of proportion—its proper balance—its embodiment of Art and Science as expressed in appearance and performance.

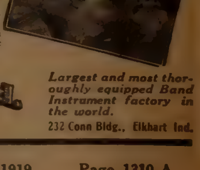
Conn Instruments are the product of a patented method impossible of attainment elsewhere. An intimate, scientific knowledge of requirements, plus a mechanical skill in production that approaches the Artistic and Ideal, gives a guarantee of quality and uniformity in tonal elements that is unsurpassed. The universal recognition of this superiority of Conn Instruments by all great Band Leaders of International Fame is the best possible guide and assurance for the beginner or the veteran purchaser of band instruments.

Let us send information about forming a band in your organization. If you are a player or beginner, ask for information concerning the instrument in which you are interested.



THE SCHUSTER FAMILY

Many brothers and sisters might well emulate the musical activities of the Schuster Family Saxophone Quintette which has earned an enviable reputation as entertainers. The degree of harmony expressed by this little family is truly wonderful—but then they use Conn Instruments, of course.



THE DARLING SAXOPHONE FOUR

is all that the name implies. Four charming and capable young ladies who are meeting unusual success as musical entertainers in high class vaudeville. They too, place their dependence in Conn Instruments. The result? Exactly what you would expect—the best ever.

Your best guarantee of a Good Band or Orchestra Instrument is to see that it bears this mark—

House cleaner—
Baby healthier!

THE wooden floors he's apt to creep on, the refrigerator that protects his food, the stairs he climbs on "all fours," his bathtub — all need the thoroughly cleansing action of Gold Dust.

For Gold Dust has a hygienic way of its own of dislodging dirt and dissolving grease. It helps to keep the surroundings of that precious "Star Boarder" of yours in a sweet, fresh, sanitary condition

Read what the maker of a famous baby-food has to say:

> "Simply rinsing feeding bottles in water will not do. As soon as the meal is finished, the bottle should be rinsed with hot water and Gold Dust, otherwise the fatty constituents of the milk cannot be removed from the inside of the bottle."

But for real, sanitary, Gold Dust cleansing be sure it is really Gold Dust you buy.

TRADE MARK REG.

Comfort, the Year Round on All Roads

THE reasons for the popularity of the new Overland 4, Four-Door Sedan, go deeper than its attractive body design and luxurious furnishings—

Deeper than its protection against all weather changes and its complete equipment, including Auto-Lite Starting and Lighting—

They go to the foundation of this remarkable car's success—its Three-Point Suspension Springs.

These springs make possible, for the first time a lightweight car which rides with the steadiness and buoyancy of a heavy car of long wheelbase. They combine the economy and ease of handling of 100-inch Wheelbase with the riding ease of 130-inch Springbase. They cushion passengers from jar and jolt. By lessening shock and vibration they reduce wear and tear on the car and prolong its life.

The warding off of road blows means a reduction in upkeep cost, while the light weight and efficiency of the Overland 4 are responsible for astonishing fuel and tire economy records.

Here You May Dine Well

ISN'T this a cheerful, hospitable dining-room? The novel, artistic floor sets off the green walls and light colored draperies, harmonizes with the brown furniture, and goes exceptionally well with the fabric rug. It is Carpet Inlaid Linoleum (No. 750), with the pattern running clear through to the burlap back.

Armstrong's Linoleum makes a practical floor for any room. The wide variety of colors and patterns is in the best of taste, and offers a range of opportunity for artistic interior arrangement far beyond the natural restrictions of other flooring materials. Have your merchant show them to you.

Armstrong's Linoleum—when well laid and rubbed with a good floor wax—makes a beautifully polished floor—durable, comfortable, and easy to keep clean. The ideal way to lay Inlaid, Jaspé, or Plain Linoleum is to cement it down firmly over a layer of heavy felt paper. This insures a permanent floor, the extra wear value of which more than makes good the cost.

Real Linoleum is made of powdered cork, wood flour, and oxidized linseed oil, pressed on burlap. And Armstrong's is high-grade, real linoleum. Be sure that you get it. Better still, ask for Armstrong's Linoleum by name. The name, Armstrong's Linoleum, with the Circle A trade-mark, appears on the back of all genuine goods. There is a difference.

Freedom of the Fixed Heart

SUNDAY. Ps. 57 : 7. "My heart is fixed, O God." This man describes his circumstances in extraordinarily vivid speech. Metaphor crowds upon metaphor in almost breathless pace. Every word presents a picture suggesting grave difficulty and antagonism. Figure is piled upon figure in the attempt to express the strenuousness of the conflict. He is "among lions." He moves "among them that are set on fire." "Spears and arrows" are hurtling about him. He is in peril of the "sharp sword." His enemy "has digged a pit," and skilfully concealed it. And yet he assumes an attitude toward these perils and antagonisms which gives his spirit strength and leisure to break into song.

Now, we need not share the circumstance of the Psalmist's external lot, but his vivid symbols may also describe spiritual circumstances in which he and we are closely akin. Who does not know the fierce antagonism of lions and fire? Who is not familiar with the rising of the passions? And who does not know the spear and arrow, especially the treacherous arrow that flieth by day, when no enemy may be seen? Who has not experienced the thrust of the sharp sword, the fiery dart of the evil one? And who is not aware of the pits of cynicism and pessimism, and many another gloomy hole? Yes, indeed, we know them, and we can share the psalmist's triumph.

What is his secret? "My heart is fixed, O God!" That is his secret. First of all, this sort of fixedness gives the truest circumspection. We stand still in order to see. In this fixedness we obtain the point of view which gives us the divine vision. The unfixed life has no sight. To be absolutely free is to be blind. What we see we misinterpret. Appetite is just "good living." We mistake the lion for a domestic cat, we play with it and fondle it. We mistake the cunningly covered pit for a bit of juicy pasture.

But there is another thing that must be said about the psalmist's triumph. It is only as the heart is fixed that we become truly free. It may seem as though the fixed heart forfeits its liberty. It is the gravest of all mistakes. The man who has no liberties has no true freedom. Vagrancy is not liberty. It is only license. The first condition of freedom is that we be bound. That is why we have those strange paradoxes in the letters of the apostle Paul. He writes about "Paul the bondslave," and almost in the same breath he sings of "the glorious liberty of the children of God." And the secret of the liberty is found in the bondage. It is just because he is gloriously fixed that he is gloriously free. The spiritually bound find their wings and are able to "rise into heavenly places."

Well, it is not far from wings to song. When the heart is fixed we begin to soar. "Because He hath set his love upon me . . . I will set him on high." That exaltation is as sure as the being of God. J. H. J.

The Old Gospel

MONDAY. John 8 : 32. "The Truth shall make you free." Women may cry out for freedom, and in many things they need it; but thank God they will never be emancipated from motherhood. As each generation comes on, motherhood is renewed with the beauty, grace, mercy and peace which have for ages set it above all other human achievements. Philosophers, critics, unbelievers and scoffers may attack the home, and predict its abolition; but the tide comes back as strong and true as before. So the old, old Gospel of Mercy and Salvation comes back as Jesus came back from the tomb, which the Pharisees thought was sealed for eternity. The old Bible comes back like the old springtime, and all is renewed. Its truths and inspirations are necessary to the human soul, and as the child goes away from a plenteous dinner-table and would dismiss the cook, thinking he would never need another meal, and yet comes back weeping and hungry, pleading for supper, so foolish men will declare there is no more need for Gospel food, until, famishing, they cry out for their old place at the table. The old Bible has been thrown aside, as the schoolboy on the way to school throws away his dinner-pail; but he hurries back at noon to find it. So the Bible's most destructive critics come rushing back for the Book, or search vainly for something just as good.

Christians, don't worry! Love and the Gospel are perennials. The same inspired Book on which fell your grandmother's tears will be bedewed with your tears when you reach that age and condition. That Book is favored above all other books with indestructible life. It is the best Book to live by and the only Book to die by. It is the Book, and always will be. The Book of Life is always up to date, as is Life itself; and Life can never die. How sweet the name of Jesus sounds in the believer's ear! And how sweet it will sound a hundred generations hence! Be ye therefore steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord. R. H. C.

God's Good Care

TUESDAY. I Peter 5 : 7. "Casting all your anxiety upon Him; because he careth for you." Does God care, and does he care for us? Are our steps ordered by the Lord? Does he think of us, and are we dear to him? Answer these questions affirmatively, and you have lifted a great load from the weary shoulders of men.

The stone which marks the resting-place of one of God's faithful servants contains only the name of the sleeper, the dates of his birth and death, and the single simple word, "Kept." "Kept" is the New Testament word, but "preserved" is the Old Testament word, for the result of God's care. Look at the "Traveler's Psalm" (Psalm 121): "The Lord shall preserve thy going out and thy coming in." Paul speaks of One who is "able to keep that which we have committed unto him." Moreover, the apostle speaks of those who are "kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation." These words have the military significance of a guarded camp. Sweet is the promise, "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee."

In all our wishing for our friends and families and for ourselves, is there any better wish than this, that we be "kept"? It means kept from evil, kept from everything which may not be turned to good. The Mizpah benediction, "The Lord watch over thee and me" was not originally a benediction. At first it was, rather, "The Lord watch between me and thee." That is to say, "The Lord keep his eyes on both of us that we take no undue advantage of each other." We have turned the words to Christian use, have given them an evangelical sense, and employ them to invoke God's care.

Nearly three hundred years ago, an English clergyman, in preaching on the last verse of Psalm 121, called attention to the fact that the Hebrew verb rendered "preserve" implies a very tender care. From it comes a word signifying the eyelids, because they are the keepers of the eye. What a comfort in this hidden meaning! How tender to the touch is the human eye! The Lord calls us "the apple of his eye." He is our Keeper even unto death. Unto death? He is our Keeper through death, for death is but a going out and a coming in—a going out from earth and a coming in to the larger chamber, the other room, the place prepared. C. C. A.

Power of Holy Zeal in the Heart

WEDNESDAY. Ps. 69 : 9. "For the zeal of thine house hath eaten me up." John Wesley, Bishop William Taylor, William Booth, D. L. Moody, J. W. Chapman and Billy Sunday all had the passion for souls which made them world-wide evangelists. The world was their parish, multitudes their followers into the kingdom of heaven.

Instead of trying to depreciate the work of evangelists, every minister should desire to be like these zealous souls. To be only a teacher, an instructor of the sheep in the fold, is not the greatest work of the men "sent of God." He who winneth souls is wise; reaching out after each single individual is the way to draw all men unto God.

Our passion for souls should be like the heart of the captain of the Titanic, who exclaimed, as the ship was sinking: "We must get them all into the lifeboats." Women and children and men—all; not one to be left behind. What if this baptism of burning zeal for lost men should fall upon the hearts of a hundred thousand ministers? Then the holy war against sin and Satan would make earth a heaven.

The sainted Brainard once said, "I have been dwelling upon the sides of eternity." After that vision he had still greater agony for the rescue of sinful men. Summerfield, in the midst of heavenly glories in his last illness, cried out, "Oh, if I might be raised again! I would preach as I never preached before, for I have had a look into eternity." McCheyne exclaimed to a brother minister, as he was on the borders of heaven, "Go on, my dear brother; only an inch of time remains to preach to perishing souls, and then eternal ages roll on forever."

Holy zeal is dynamical; it is God in the soul, pleading for his children. Mere oratory and rhetorical beauty of expression become platitudes and lip service, beside the flame of the Pentecost and the tongues of fire. It is the gift of the Holy Spirit for all, the power from on high, drawing all men to the arms of the Infinite. E. W. C.

Enthusiasm in Christian Service

THURSDAY. Rom. 5 : 3. "Tribulation worketh patience." No one has ever had to combat with a more difficult temperament than Paul's. It cost him tears to write a stiff letter, like his first epistle to the Corinthians. Yet he was not morose—he was no pessimist. He believed in victory. Like James, he counted it joy even to fall into temptations, because trial worked patience; and patience, the capacity to suffer, was worth while, because there is such patience in God.

According to Peter, this patience is more precious than fine gold, because suffering meant to him something more than a service or a sacrifice for Christ's sake. Suffering helped him to understand Christ—as if to say, "He and I have felt one pain—have been crucified together—will share one glory."

To men and women of the early Church who had once forsaken Jesus and fled, or actually persecuted him in his followers, this supreme chance of risking things with him and paying the ultimate penalty evoked the same rapture with which young soldiers go forth to die in their country's cause. Christianity was not so much attending Church as volunteering for the draft, embarking on a transport, creeping forward one by one over No Man's Land. They wished to win territory—a little here, a little there—and their zeal released them from the destroying cares, the sordid rivalries, the wretched lusts which war against the soul. The early Christians had no time to be miserable. The surplus of energy which in others developed sin, in them was consecrated to service—to worship—to prayer. Their joy was thus the scientific product of a life well balanced. P. W. W.

The Miracle of the New Birth

FRIDAY. John 3 : 3. "Except a man be born again." It is a new birth, in which old things pass away, and behold all things become new. The man who is thus twice-born is "a new man in Christ Jesus," with a new mind, new conscience, new heart, and, above all, a new will. Then he begins to live.

Do I mean that a man who has not accepted Christ has not really begun to live? Just that. He is "dead in trespasses and sins." How else shall we interpret the words, "I am come that ye might have life"? When Christ says "Thy sins be forgiven thee" it is as when a culprit's chains are broken off, and he enters upon the glorious liberty of the children of God. All that goes before is waste, the waste of energy in muckraking for gold, in chasing the thistledown of momentary pleasure, in striving after the worthless emoluments of this world. Waste, waste, frightful waste! Rise up, my friend; the Lord of Life is passing by!

Levi's biography is briefly comprehended in the words, "he followed Christ." It is recorded that he began by making a feast for Jesus, at which he entertained his business friends and associates. I doubt not he arose at the table and made an open confession of his faith, avowing his belief in Jesus as the Messiah and exhorting his guests to do likewise. Thus he burned his boats behind him.

All the rest was following Christ. And whither would those footprints take him? Can you follow, too? Or are you among those recalcitrants who say, "I don't believe in foreign missions"? If so, my friend, is it not obvious that here you part company with Christ? You cannot follow without following all the way. The whole-hearted Christian speaks on this wise:

"I'll go where you want me to go, dear Lord,
Over mountain, or plain, or sea;
I'll do what you want me to do, dear Lord,
I'll be what you want me to be."

Our Union With Christ

SATURDAY. John 17 : 21. "That they also may be one in us." It is not a union like a river flowing into the ocean, losing its identity; it is as "Thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee," both preserving personality, affection, will and powers of being. It is a stronger union than between parent and child, for "how much more will your heavenly Father give good things to his children?" The tie of human affection is often weakened by separation, but Christ will never leave you. A parent may change, but God is unchangeable; or a parent may die, but God ever liveth; or our friends may lose all their riches, but God's are unfailing and unsearchable. In him we cannot die; we lay off this mortal coil, which death grasps, while the soul ascends to its everlasting communion and blessedness.

The union with Christ is indissoluble, except by our own choice. He is the Head, we are the body. He is the Vine, we are the branches, one life-giving power pervading every remotest twig. Without him there is no fruitage; with him the leaf shall not wither. Paul begins the eighth chapter of Romans with "no condemnation" and ends the chapter with "no separation." Here we find certainty of salvation. Friends may leave us, but there is One who abideth forever. No enemy or tempter, no condition or circumstance, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus the Lord. E. W. C.

A Chinese Miracle That May Change the World

By H. C REYNOLDS

WONDERS are happening in China today. Every missionary comes home with his eyes bright and his heart bursting with them. Every traveler and trader sees marvelous things. And the chief marvel is a new fury of learning to read and write which is sweeping the world's most ancient civilization. Just imagine—old women of seventy mastering the art of reading in four weeks! Coolies shouting with glee because in three weeks they had found the key to literature. Little children learning to read in about the same time as American beginners learn English, instead of wasting two years on memorizing thousands of complicated ideographs. Business men forced to attend classes under threat of punishment.

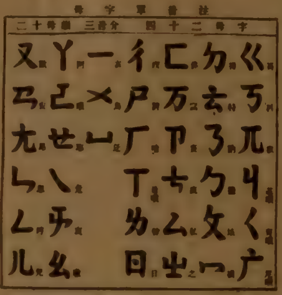
It is all because of the system of phonetic writing adopted by the Chinese government. You may not be able to remember the name—Chu Yin Tzu-Mu—but the thing may be more important in the history of the world than the steam engine or the telegraph.

Missionaries and others had made several attempts to introduce phonetic writing into China, but the conservatism of the people blocked the way. Then the government decided they must promote national unity, and this must be done first by having a national language which every one could read and write. So Chu Yin Tzu-Mu became the National Phonetic Writing of the Chinese Republic.

The missionaries and old-time foreigners keep discreetly in the background. The Chinese announce that they are doing this thing themselves. It may become the ladder by which China will grow great again.

Edwin C. Lobenstine, before his return to China to be in charge there of the Interchurch World Movement of North America, in New York recently gave a clear explanation of the new system. The Chinese language is made up of syllables, not of letters. There are only 450 of these sounds, or syllables, in the language as spoken. And as there were between 45,000 and 50,000 words, each sound has to represent an average of 105 characters. For instance "chi" may mean 185 different things when spoken. In writing, there are 185 different pictures or ideographs for these different things. To write "chi" in all its meanings you must have committed to memory all these 185 ideographs—quite a day's work, or perhaps a week's work. "Chi," spoken, has to have another word with it to identify its meaning. The Chinese school boy or girl must learn thousands of ideographs. The child usually has to study five or six years before he can read and understand. The Chinese boy wastes two years. An American boy who has been in a good school two years can read and write fairly well. A Chinese boy, at the end of his first two years, has learned nothing he can carry away with him, if he stops school then.

Chi Yin Tzu-Mu is being welcomed with enthusiasm. The system was adopted by a special Congress of representatives of all the chinese provinces, called by the National Ministry of Education, and was officially promulgated November 23, 1918, in Order No. 75 of the ministry. The system uses thirty-nine symbols, twenty-four initials, twelve finals, and three medials or connecting sounds, with which to represent all the sounds of what is to be the "National Language." Any monosyllable can be divided into two parts. So a system of phonetics can be arranged so that any sound will be shown by two letters, with or without a connective.



ㄡ ㄚ ㄧ ㄔ ㄈ ㄉ ㄍ
ㄢ ㄛ ㄨ ㄕ ㄪ ㄊ ㄎ
ㄤ ㄝ ㄩ ㄏ ㄗ ㄋ ㄫ
ㄣ ㄟ ㄒ ㄘ ㄅ ㄐ
ㄥ ㄞ ㄌ ㄙ ㄆ ㄑ
ㄦ ㄠ ㄖ ㄓ ㄇ ㄬ

Chinese characters: new and old

The "National Language" is founded on the Mandarin, spoken with great variations of pronunciation in fifteen out of the eighteen provinces. The pronunciation is so varied that natives of different provinces often have been unable to understand each other. The government has set up a standard pronunciation. Standardizing proved very simple. It only had to be decided for about 800 words, and all the other words in the language grouped themselves naturally about these.

The Christian forces in China are giving away or selling at cost great numbers of pamphlets explaining the new system. Some of the titles strike one unfamiliar with China as curious. Some of them read: "The Hundred Surnames in National Phonetic Spelling," "Chinese Phonetic Anagrams" (including directions for playing), "The Thirty-nine Symbols, inch square size, Chinese Key Characters."

The China Continuation Committee, the interdenominational body of which Dr. Lobenstine is chairman, proposes to teach every Christian in China to read and write. A few years ago, this goal seemed far away; now it looks quite near. The Committee will be assisted in its work by the Interchurch World Movement of North America. Dr. Lobenstine, a Yale '95 man, who has been twenty years in China, described the possibilities of the new writing as follows:

"Not more than ten per cent. of the men and less than one per cent. of the women in China can read or write. So you have 370,000,000 people who can't read. Now they are learning to read in from one to two months! Dr. Sidney J. Peill, head of the English Hospital in the Province of Chili, some time ago took up the phonetic system of Wang Chao, of which the present system is largely an improvement, with marvelous results. The China Continuation Committee has decided there are great possibilities in the new system. About fifty per cent. of our Christian church members and enrolled inquirers are illiterate. Two years ago there was no enthusiasm for the spread of literacy, even among the Christian Chinese leaders. Now there has been a wonderful change. The Christian Chinese see that the teaching of reading and writing is a great basis for service to their country in its hour of need. With $100,000 or even less to spend on this job, we would push right through the country. It means no less than a revolution in Chinese education. Christian schools in China have 190,000 pupils. We hope to have enough money to let the Chinese Christian forces make the new system a practical issue in a tremendous campaign.

"We foreigners will let the Chinese do everything—we will keep completely in the background. This is a government attempt to unify the language, not to simplify it. It is not attempting to do away with the old language. Nothing published for literary men will be put out in the new style, although all the literati are asked to back the new system."

MAKING LITTLE MEN AND WOMEN

Mother Has a Way

By Mrs. CHARLES M. SHELDON

THE summer cottage was on the beach, and that meant lots of sand; there were numerous cottages, which meant lots of children tracking sand into the cottages. Mrs. Hart called a meeting of her children and put the case before them.

The cottage must be swept every day. Would George and Buddy (his real name was Charles) take that for their task? Dad and Charlotte would wash the dishes; everybody would make his own bed, and mother would do the baking.

"What! Sweep every room in this cottage every day?" protested George.

"Oh, mother! have a heart," cried Buddy.

"But I have several—Harts," said mother, "and they should all be willing to do their part, and sand is easy to sweep."

"Well! All I can say is, I call it pretty tough to have to sweep this whole cottage every day, Buddy, don't you?" cried George.

"You bet it's tough, and we'll see about it," said Buddy.

"The session is ended," said mother. "I believe the work is evenly divided and we shall all have a happy summer and no one get too tired."

As the boys went out into the yard, one remarked to the other, "Mother carries things off with a pretty high hand it seems to me."

"Women are too fussy about keeping things clean, any way," was the reply.

The next morning after breakfast each member of the family made his own particular bed and then the boys disappeared. The sand was left on the cottage floor all day. More children than usual ran in and out, which meant more sand than usual.

Dad didn't notice it until evening when some friends came in to call, and he was about to apologize when a certain look on his wife's face made him change his remark to something else. After they had gone he said, "What does this mean, dear, that the boys did not obey you?"

"Oh, they will; but I want them to do it willingly; just leave it to me."

"Well, I know of a good stick, if they don't," said Dad.

"A stick will be the last resort; I don't like it"—and mother sent the boys off a little later with a kiss and a "good night, sleep tight."

"Say, she is some mother," whispered Buddy to George.

"I don't guess she noticed the sand," George answered.

"Well, it ain't fair anyway, or I'd do it," was Buddy's last remark before he fell off to sleep.

The next day at noon mother's cheeks were very red and she looked tired.

"What's the matter with you, mother, you look so hot and red?" asked Buddy.

"Oh! I've had a busy morning. Was it pleasant on the beach? I was going to make some chocolate cake for lunch, but haven't had time."

The boys were very quiet during lunch, but once outside they looked at one another as if each were ashamed of the other.

"Say, that cottage has been swept by someone. Now I want to know who," said Buddy. "I don't propose to have my mother sweeping out all the sand the whole neighborhood brings in and getting her face red, and we getting no chocolate cake because of it."

"Well, why did Dad let her do it; but say, women's queer! Why didn't she say something to a feller before she did it?"

"I don't care, I like mothers that don't fuss at you all the time about doing things, and my mother has got more sense than any I know!" was Buddy's final remark before calling out to the boy in the next cottage, "Say, what do you do to help your mother? We're going to sweep out our whole cottage every day."

That night two boys told the happiest mother on the beach that they were ashamed for being slackers and that it would not happen again.

After mother had gone and the light was out, a voice came out of the darkness:

"Say, mother has a way with her, hasn't she!"

"You bet," was the sleepy reply.

There are more ways than one for the mother to manage her boys.

Boys More Punctual Than Girls?

DID somebody say that girls were more punctual than boys? Well, in the city of Binghamton, New York, four boys have made a record for punctuality and regularity of attendance at public school that no girl has ever equaled. This is not to say that the girls have played hookey, but for some reason they have not been able in Binghamton to keep up with the boys.

The records of the Board of Education made public at the close of the school year in June, 1919, show that there are four boys who during the last five years have never been tardy. Neither have they during the five years missed a single session of the school.

Such a record means of course that these boys have had no serious sickness in the last five years. It means more than that, however. It was no lucky accident which produced such an achievement. These four boys had the spirit of determination. They would not humor themselves with little ailments. They had their minds on the job. When they started for school, they got there. They have established a record hard to beat because they set their wills to do what they dreamed of doing.

Training in Poising

By Dr. Roy Kerr Eldridge

HOW pleasing is the vision of the child whose every move is with grace and ease, whose walk shows life and buoyance! Yet how often, through carelessness during the growing period of life, this power of erect carriage is forfeited. When too late to change, many have found themselves stooping, growing prematurely old, gradually being made helpless, having lost their opportunity for that poise of body which marks man as master among his fellows and of the animal kingdom—found themselves rather with slouching appearance and ambling gait.

How then shall we go about the task of seeing that our children, and ourselves for that matter, build aright?

It is said that Habit is a kind friend but a bitter enemy. Shall we let Habit be our master or are we going to be the master of our habits? The thing to do is to study the habits of our children, determined to show them how to correct through physical exercises any bad habits which they may have formed and teach them to do even the difficult things, if need be, that they will in the end make the most and the best of the body.

The first important thing that the child should know is how to stand correctly. In all exercises there is a certain preciseness that makes the direction sound hard and harsh—but in the practice of those directions that harshness and precision are forgotten and lost.

The child should stand with heels together, toes turned out, to form a good base upon which to rest the weight of the body and to match the width of the shoulders. In looking down at the feet, you should find the heels even. Sometimes they will not be, and one knee will be in advance of the other. This should not be. Both should be together, the same as the heels.

Have you ever seen the girl or boy standing on one foot, with one knee bent? You did not realize that that boy or girl was forming a habit which in time would give that body a deformed appearance, in other words, was forming a curvature. Then again we often see the girl who carries her school books under her arm resting them upon her hip, or the girl who insists on sitting on one foot. The boy who slides down into his seat until he is sitting upon his back—that sounds strange, but that is virtually what he is doing, sitting upon the small of the back. The body that shows one hip forward and one-sided, feet and legs uneven is the body in which these habits have left their mark. Would it have repaid the parent to have kept guard? We say that it would have, indeed.

Then the shoulder position. Do you suppose they can be even, if the hips are not? Indeed not. Is the chest as high as is possible? Is it so held that the body is virtually pulled up into its correct and splendid position as was intended? Above all, is the chin in so that the head is carried high—that does not mean haughty by any manner of means.

If heels are together evenly, toes well turned out, legs straight, which will divide the weight of the body evenly, hips well back, the body poised over the balls of the feet, and the head held high, with chin drawn well in, then Nature will have the opportunity of carrying on her perfect work in body building; the body will have been held in good adjustment, and will the more easily assimilate the nourishing foods and the pure air which it needs in its growth.

If the children will be taught to carry the body with the thought of being just as tall as possible; if they will hold the body as though it were being suspended from above, they will move about with grace, with perfect freedom of motion. The body will be under perfect control, and power is always shown in a well controlled body.

Paint Spots

IN ORDER to remove a paint spot from a garment successfully, the housekeeper must first have an intelligent understanding of the chemical elements contained in paints.

Paints are made up of oils and some coloring matter with zinc oxids and lead, and spots of paint should be treated with a solvent for the oil, after which the coloring matter may be brushed off with a clothes brush.

The solvents used may be either Turpentine, Benzine, Naphtha or Gasoline, and this may be applied at once, without softening the spot, if the paint is fresh.

International Sunday School Lesson for Decemher 21: Isaiah 11:1-10 and Luke 2:8-14

By REV. GEORGE D. ALLISON, Ph.D.

THE glad Christmas time is here again and practically all of our schools will turn aside from the study of the lives of Peter and John for a distinctively Christmas lesson. This is well, for the recurrence of a world-wide celebration of the birth of Jesus gives us a rare chance to put the true purpose of his coming before our boys and girls. Without the Sunday School, for most children, there is grave danger that Christ's birthday may be commemorated without reference to Christ himself! But we can make such an emphasis in the school as shall be reflected in the varied homes of the children. For the Christmas message is an evangel; it is good news for all.

Now, the International Committee suggests, as the alternative or Christmas lesson, that we study again Isaiah's prophecy of the character of the Messiah. No Scripture could be more timely than this. The world has come out of the Great War, but has not yet entered the Great Peace. So we must take up the lesson of God's Word boldly, and not simply study our Gospels to see how wondrously Jesus fulfilled the predictions, but also ask ourselves what the teaching indicates as our duty today as individual Christians and as members of a Christian nation.

Once more in our day, the whole earth is groaning and suffering from the effects of bad leadership in high places. Those who should have been shepherds have led the flock astray. So it was in Isaiah's time. King Ahaz was unworthy of his place as the shepherd of Israel. Men of insight longed for a king like David. The great prophet was moved to utter his prophecy and to sketch the character of an ideal leader, by reason of the wicked and selfish caricature of kingliness that had led the people into suffering. In the second verse we have the spirit of Christ-like leadership, for every one in authority and for each person great or small in so far as his life influences the lives of others—"the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the Lord." Contrast such a spirit with the spirit of arrogance and lust of power, of selfishness and greed, of folly and brutality that brought on the war that has shaken civilization to its foundations.

CATCHING this glimpse of the spirit of a true king of men, see next the principles of his rulership. "He shall not judge after the sight of his eyes," that is by appearances and by the external things; "neither decide after the hearing of his ears," that is by hearsay or by merely traditional and customary standards; "but with righteousness." How many of us get an adequate mental reaction from that tremendous Old Testament word, "Righteousness"? It stands for the biggest moral ideal in life, the ultimate test of every plan and program. It is a foundation-thought in the Biblical theology.

And in such a spirit, with such lofty principles of conduct, Isaiah's ideal hero is one who will have especially in mind the welfare of the poor and the lowly! I suppose we do not get the contrast which was in his thought, as he realized how the politicians, the priests and the successful and well-to-do, made their plans then as now, with absolute disregard for their effects on the "other half," the great mass of the common people. What consideration have the War-Lords, the Diplomats, and the Captains of Industry given in the past to the people who fight the battles, pay the taxes and do the world's hard work? Surely, the men whose ruthless schemes have devastated Europe did not "decide with equity for the lowly of earth." As one of our poets has put it, "the blood of peasants is not red, a hundred miles away." The Prince of Peace must consider the poor. And he must be strong to act—"girded with righteousness and faithfulness," robes not luxurious and easy, but fastened up with a a leather girdle, as the garb of a man ready for service and keyed to action. Service, not power, must become the watchword of the greatest.

The prophet goes on to show the effects of such a leadership, which may be summed up as the banishing of fear from men's souls. He uses the symbolism of the taming of the wild creatures of the East. We can hardly realize the dread of wild animals in the ancient world. When we use the metaphor, "keeping the wolf from the door," we can scarcely picture the primitive times when the wolves with cruel fangs lurked about the home of the farmer, when each family had lost a child by the ravages of lion or bear or cobra. Well, we have conquered the wild beasts of the forest, but not yet the wild beasts within men's souls. Fear still lurks in the world. Scarce a family in Central Europe but has lost at least one son to the wild beast of war. Fear of famine, fear of oppression, fear of cruel torture and death still haunts the hapless Armenians and Galicians. What a dreadful condition this Christmas time, nineteen centuries after the birth of him whose angel attendants sang, "Be not afraid."

When Christ truly reigns everywhere "they shall not hurt nor destroy." How we long for the day when "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of Jehovah as the waters cover the sea."

ISAIAH had faith to believe that the Messiah would come, that his ideals should prevail, that his standards should be sought by all nations. He saw the breaking down of barriers between man and man, between peoples and peoples. He saw at last the unification of mankind under his ensign!

The birth of Jesus fulfilled this prophecy in that it brought the foregleams of the joy that is to come. Luke shows us in the shepherds' story the lowliness of his coming, the simplicity of his surroundings. The Gospels tell us how the Child Immanuel grew to manhood, how He exhibited all these qualities of true greatness, how He gave to men the eternal principles of righteousness and peace. They tell us how He suffered for the people, how He died and rose again.

Now we celebrate His coming. Let us not forget that Jesus lives, that He is more influential than He ever was before, that He is the only King. Those who trust Him and obey Him find His mercy sweet. For them already fear is banished. They work for the universal extension of His reign. They are sure that peace depends upon the acceptance of His message. They believe that "of the increase of His government and of peace there shall be no end."

It is for Christians to make Christmas resound with the angels' chorus "Peace on earth to men of good will." Men are saying that the war is over, but there is no peace. There can be no peace without good-will. Alliances, treaties, even a League of Nations will fail without leaders like the Man of Isaiah's Vision, and without good-will among those whom they have been chosen to serve. Will the children of today come to maturity in a world of Good Will? They surely shall, if they understand and follow the Prince of Peace.

Farm Standards of Living

AN INTERESTING survey of Orange Township, Iowa, has just been completed which shows something of the standards of living in the American farm communities. The survey developed that of the 142 farm homes in the township all have newspapers and magazines; 125 have libraries, with an average of 100 volumes; 132 have telephones; 80 have pianos; 79 have automobiles; 76 have vacuum cleaners; 72 have furnace heat; 68 have power-washers; 63 have electric light; 57 have running water and 47 have bathrooms.

Different from all other's—the NEW BENJAMIN AIR RIFLE

shoots harder and farther than any other. Made on a new principle. Is really a strong air-pump, compressing air in the air-chamber to any degree of power desired. Each stroke gives increased power, one to six strokes being sufficient.

Works like air-drills and air-hammers—with this difference:

You control shooting force. This block of hardwood shows penetrating power of each charge. No other air rifle can duplicate this feat.

The Benjamin is safe, because you control the power. Never loses shooting force—has no springs to get out of order.

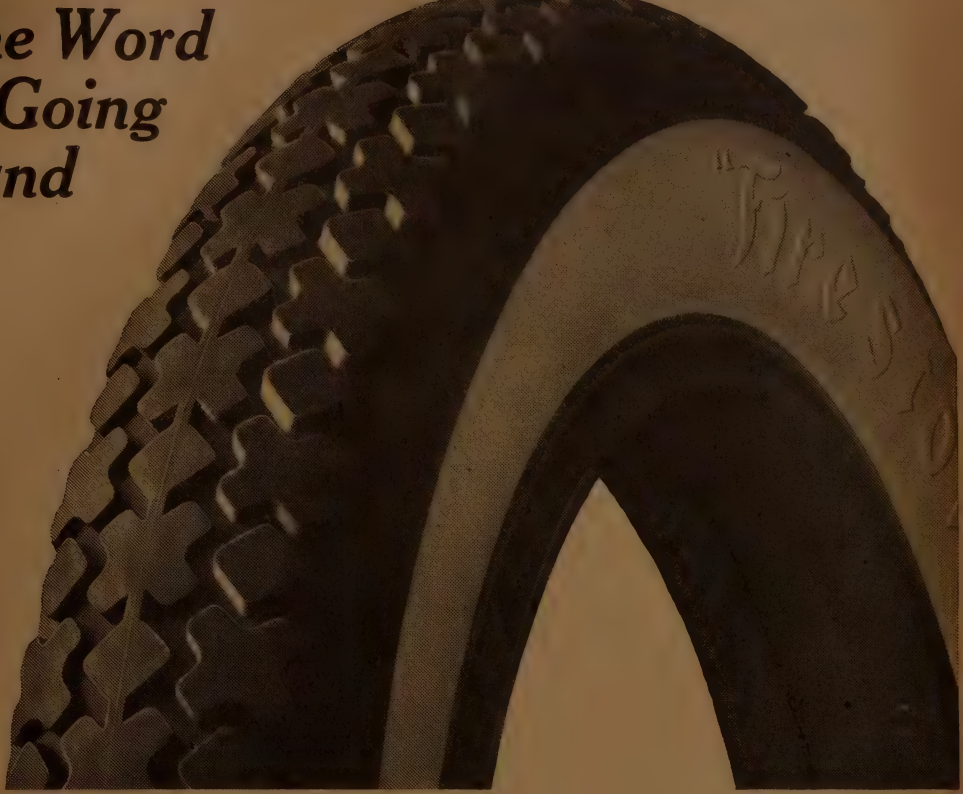
"Buy Firestones"

That's the Word That's Going Round



WHEREVER you go you hear car owners passing the word—"Buy Firestones. They're the best cords this year." The reasons are many, but the conclusion is the same—Buy Firestone Cords.

Read these spoken advertisements for the New Standard Oversize Firestone Cord with Extra Heavy Non-Skid Tread:

"It gives me a lot more service than the mere guarantee."

"Not only fine service but a tire that looks right."

"The extra air gives easier riding."

"The non-skid tread is fine; it holds in all kinds of roads and yet there's no power wasted."

"I bought it because of its extra size and the Firestone reputation."

"You'll notice that you go farther on a gallon of gas."

"It steers easy and grips the road."

With the mouth-to-mouth tire advertising centered on Firestone this year no thinking tire buyer can afford to remain uninfluenced. See your dealer.

The Three Essentials of Child Education

Physical, Mental and Spiritual Development Must Be Coordinated to Get the Greatest Results Out of Youth

By JOHN VAN BRAKLE

IF AT thirty-five my boy is able to do one thing so well he has lost interest in everything else; if at forty-five he is a recognized and respected authority in his work and yet is scientifically cynical in his outlook on life; and if at fifty-five the fruits of life are as ashes on his lips, then his education will not have been what it should.

But if he learns to do one thing well because he has been thoroughly grounded in many things; if his authority in his chosen line does not keep him from appreciating the good in other lines; and if as the sunset hours approach he is still able to feel that the work he has done is not all of the Past but is a preparation for something finer yet to come; then his education will have at least been in the direction of his best development.

Perhaps this is a long way ahead to visualize, and yet his best development will last throughout his life, and as his education is started in his school days, so will it progress through all his days.

How shall a child be educated for his best development? The answer is locked up in the interpretation of the word—development. In its literal sense development has a very lovely meaning. This meaning is to unfold. To unfold by degrees, or in detail, to reveal something unknown, to unveil something concealed; all these meanings dwell in this profound word.

If a child's education or training is to bring about his best development, it must directly answer to the true meaning of that term. The method of education will logically adhere to the term and will then indeed be an unfolding of his perceptions and powers and privileges. The materials of his education will supply him with the motives and characteristics that will best bring out all his latent possibilities for good.

OF THE two aspects of training, method and material, the first is if anything more important than the second. At least we will give it first consideration.

The history of education consists largely of a great controversy as to the best method. Into this controversy we have no desire to inject any new arguments but rather wish simply to point out the two or three great steps by which education has been advanced.

The beginnings of education found root in the dim past when in order to meet his environment, man must be physically strong. His education then consisted in a process of molding his body into a physical perfection with which he could best fight the battles of existence.

In time the mental part of his equipment came to have a greater relative importance and so his mental training became more and more the sole object of educational methods. To such an extreme did this period run that even today the term scholar brings to most of us a vision of one with bulging brow and frail body.

Now we are on the crest of the reaction to this one-sided development. The physical and the mental are provided for side by side in our present school system. It is a pedagogical axiom that a competent mind can be best exercised only when its abode is within a healthy body.

But there is a growing conviction that our educational method is still lacking. There is a third part of the child's nature that must also be coordinately expanded. This third side is the spiritual. It is true the Church, through the agency of the Sunday-school, has been a time-honored means of providing for this side of the child's nature. But as Sunday comes but once a week, it is easy for the growing child to put on his moral jacket for the day and as readily pull it off again Monday morning.

A BETTER method, it would seem, is to provide for a closely welded, coordinated method of education that takes into consideration all three of these various sides of life. While it is true that the keen mind best expresses itself in a sturdy physical being, it is also true that both are more nearly perfect themselves when the spiritual nature is well-founded.

A good education then, is going to be one that provides for the best development of the child in three senses of the word; he must be strong physically, adept mentally, and highly conscious spiritually. And these cannot be considered as three separate departments, any one of which may be molded singly, but rather as three component parts inter-related and inter-dependent.

Now for the materials of education. We must give the growing child the proper assortment of facts with which he will work out his own unfolding. The physical facts will include fresh air and sunshine, plain, simple food in variety, plenty of play and games, and a right proportion of sleep. The mental facts will at least cover the use of the English language, mathematics, history and human nature. Things spiritual will cover a conception of infinity and immortality, of creation and a Creator and of the value of one's soul. Upon this meager but fundamental foundation a firm, widespread structure may be built, the ramifications of which may extend this way and that in the boundless expanses of mental and spiritual existence.

BUT as these life facts are assimilated, a greater process must be served. The ability to handle these facts so as to produce some good must be inculcated. Better a man with but few facts and the ability to do something with them than the one with a vast storehouse of knowledge and lacking the means of putting his knowledge to productive work.

So the child should be taught a pride in his well-kept body. He should know that good health habits will produce the dividends of physical stamina and stability with which to face the storm and sunshine of his career. His mental facts must teach him to look for the principles of which each fact is but an illustration. Then he will be able to apply his facts intelligently toward building a successful living and life.

But if his best development is eventually to be consummated, he must learn that all the physical facts, all the mental facts, all the principles have an added significance which is spiritual. The letter of the law without the spirit is a dead thing, and the successful life that has no spiritual foundation is an empty husk.

For this reason when the child has unfolded so that he sees in the digestive functions of his being not only a few physiological principles but a mysterious wonder-impelling occurrence, so that he discovers in the tiny perfect world of the atom something greater than an electronic theory and in the skies of heaven something beyond Newton's law of gravitation; when he has unfolded so that the harmless worm in his path and the singing bird in the empyreal blue each has its place in his scheme of life, and when at last he discovers his own inner self which responds to the things that are of being and thought and meditation and yet which are unbounded by the laws of facts as he knows them, but are held together rather by a faith not to be defined; then and then only can he be said to be educated so as to bring about his best development.

Children Erect Living Memorial

A BEAUTIFUL means of honoring a dead playmate was adopted by the pupils of a fourth-grade school in Louisville, Ky., when they planted a tree in the school yard in memory of their former companion, and this is in line with the nation-wide planting of memorial trees for soldiers and sailors. Many persons and events can be most appropriately remembered in this manner.

The Tie That Binds

A Little Story of the Broken Family Circle and the Memory of the Morning Prayers

By ELIZABETH PALMER MILBANK

A GUEST at my breakfast table one morning "asked the blessing." Raising his head, he was silent for a moment and it was easy to divine that his eyes saw more than the company meal set before him. Then he shared his retrospective vision with us.

"I never go through this little ceremony," he began, "that I am not reminded of an incident that touched me deeply. I was a guest in the home of comparative strangers, and as we came out to the dining room I noticed there was some confusion and slight embarrassment, but I was asked to return thanks and the breakfast went on.

"The next morning the father said:

"'We have made you one of the family now and before we sit down I am going to tell you just how things are. You see, it's this way; we do not have much time for family worship, but it is a rule that there must be an unbroken circle at the breakfast table. Before we sit down each one of the family, commencing with four-year-old Jimmy, repeats a verse of scripture, after which we join hands around the table and repeat together the Lord's prayer, then I say a few words of prayer." After this explanation Jimmy started off with:

"'Suffer little children to come unto me and forbid them not, for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven.'

"I learned later that the four-year-old was allowed to say the same verse for a month; the ones under eight—Oh, yes, they had them all ages, as there were ten—must have a new verse every week; over twelve there must be a new verse every morning and it must not be repeated within thirty days.

"A few months after that I was in a university town, and there I met the oldest son of this family. I said to him:

"'A fine family you have back in the old home town.'

"'Yes, sir,' and his eyes lighted with pleasure.

"After talking with him a few minutes, I said:

"'Would you mind telling me what you miss most now that you are away from home?'

"The boy hesitated a moment. It isn't easy for a boy of that age to unveil the deepest feelings of his heart. Then, though a deep flush showed beneath his tan and freckles, he looked straight into my eyes, and replied:

"'It is the handclasp at the breakfast table. If I could feel my father's warm grasp, and repeat with them the Lord's prayer, it would start the day off right and nothing would matter then!' Again he hesitated, but finished manfully, with a slight huskiness in his voice.

"'The memory of those mornings at home stands between me and many a temptation; it keeps me going straight.'"

A Scotch mother, whose son was leaving to be ordained, went with him to the gate, put her arms around him and bidding him good-bye, she added:

"There will be many there can tell you mair than I can laddie, but this I do say to you: Remember, laddie, that whenever you lay your hand on the head of a bairn, ye put your finger on the heart of the mither."

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

A WESTERN pastor sends us this message to be laid before the Prayer League: "I am not a member of the Prayer League, but I do want to be remembered by this united group of God's people, and so I am asking you to place briefly in the column, the following:

"Wanted, united prayer of all the Herald readers for the following: A minister who has held important posts in the church, and who has attained some little success; but who now feels that he has reached the hour of his greatest usefulness, the moment for the highest efficiency for the Kingdom; and so begs that all Christians will pray that he be led consciously and definitely by the Holy Spirit, that he be filled and overflowed with the evidences of divine grace; that he shall be returned to the great centers again where the throngs are and the crowds surge, and sin and shame abound; and that God may make him a real minister, a bearer of good tidings, a lifter of burdens, a savior of men. Pray that God will set the seal of approval on his work, and that he shall so passionately serve and so ardently love and work, that he may be burned into ashes himself, if only God's work may continue; that though he has been in the service twenty years, the next five may crown the work of a lifetime."

The foregoing is one of the increasing evidences of a strong desire on the part of very many ministers to be spiritually strengthened and used in the largest degree, especially at this time when the need of a nation-wide revival is felt throughout the country.

Reader, Abbeville, S. C., writes: "I have been reading of the wonderful answers to prayer. Paralysis has been handed down from generation to generation in our family, accompanied by nervous prostration. I want to ask you to pray that it may cease, that our family may be converted, and that the rest of my mother's life may be made truly happy. We are both in great trouble just now. Please pray that the trouble may be removed."

A. P., Cincinnati, O., writes: "Please pray for a genuine Bible study among my nieces, that wives and husbands may be convinced about their conditions and that their partially blind mother may be a spiritual guiding star to them in her old age."

Among the individual requests twenty ask prayers for healing of self and others; five wives ask prayers for their husbands; eight request prayers for the conversion of relatives and friends; a mother asks prayers for the healing of her daughter, another that her son may be cured of the tobacco habit. Another mother asks for a reconciliation between father and son, and "a heartbroken mother" asks prayer for divine guidance. A daughter asks prayers for an aged mother.

The following members of our Prayer Circle desire to acknowledge answered prayer: A Friend; Mrs. J. M. M., Wash.; F. B.; B. M. V.; A. F. K., Lancaster, Pa.; Mrs. W. A. C.; J. J. B.; Mrs. C. W.; C. G.; Mrs. J. P. B.; Mrs. R. H. W.; Mrs. G. B. H.; A Mother; A Reader; Mrs. J. B.; V. C., and Mrs. T. C. M.

"What is a Boy's Best Habit?"

I, A North Dakota girl, believe that question is simply answered if we will but go to the Bible. For no habit, I believe, can so influence a boy's life as that of prayer and reading the Bible. Prayer can change the course of a whole life. It can change every other habit a person may have. It can mean more to a person than life itself. It can be a joy, an earnest seeking after guidance in everything one does, and it can mean a delightful communion that will lift one above the mere material problems of this world to nobler thoughts and aspirations. It thus makes it possible for one to "sit on the world," as it were. I know that this is the best habit I have and that it has done all these things for me.

What a life can result in when it follows the way that Jesus pointed out!

of the armistice line. The Jugoslavs were particularly alarmed by the soldier-poet's threat to seize Spalato. In view of the fact that Spalato is one of the American bases in the Adriatic and the headquarters of the squadron of warships we are maintaining in that part of the world, Europe was very keenly interested in our attitude in the event of a d'Annunzio attack on the port. In Italy there seems to have occurred a marked reaction against the "Firebrand of Fiume" and a desire is developing to settle the whole Adriatic question without adding to the animosities that the last year has engendered. In the meantime Greece is exploiting her position in Smyrna by extending her occupation far into the hinterland against the active opposition of strong Turkish forces.

Henry C. Frick

HENRY C. FRICK, one of the most famous of the steel industry's pioneers, has died leaving a fortune estimated at $100,000,000. Starting to work as a boy at $3.00 a week he became interested in the production of coke in the Pittsburg field and before he was thirty he was rated a millionaire. After the panic of 1873 he joined forces with Andrew Carnegie and rapidly became a power in the steel business. He and Carnegie became bitter antagonists when the former, after paying the latter a million dollars for an option on his share in the Carnegie Steel Company, was unable to take up the option. Frick had in mind the formation of a steel combination such as Carnegie soon after arranged through J. P. Morgan. In recent years Mr. Frick has lived in New York City where he devoted much of his time to collecting rare works of art. His collection, in his wonderful Fifth Avenue palace, is estimated to be worth more than $20,000,000.

Germany Refuses to Sign

GERMANY has definitely refused to sign the protocol which would bring the treaty of Peace into effect and her delegation left Paris for Berlin early in December, leaving one representative in touch with the Supreme Council. In the view of the Allied diplomatists the Germans hope to wring further concessions from the Council, but particulary they want to assure the safety of scores of their officers who are accused of crimes against the laws of war and humanity. Demand by the Allies of payment for the warships scuttled in Scapa Flow is pointedly refused. French newspapers are inclined to blame the United States for the whole situation because the Treaty has not been approved by the Senate.

DOMESTIC

Senator Newberry Indicted—Senator H. Truman Newberry, of Michigan, with 134 of his supporters and friends, has been indicted on charges growing out of the campaign in which he defeated Henry Ford for the Senate.

Baltimore Enforces Sunday Law—The Chief of Police of Baltimore is enforcing, by order of the Grand Jury, the so-called blue laws of the state. Sale of gasoline on Sunday now is forbidden.

South Dakota Picks Candidates—South Dakota, holding state conventions of the Republican and Democratic parties, has expressed its presidential preferences. The Republicans endorsed General Wood for president and Governor Coolidge of Massachusetts for vice-president. The Democrats endorsed President Wilson and Vice-President Marshall for reelection.

Big Army Sales—The War Department thus far has collected $476,727,874 from the sale in the United States of surplus army materials. The largest item is wool, which has brought $201,810,000.

Building More Transports—The United States Shipping Board has awarded contracts for twelve large vessels for the army transport service.

New Secretary of Commerce—Representative Joshua W. Alexander, of Gallatin, Mo., has been named by the President to succeed William C. Redfield as Secretary of Commerce.

Anarchists Ordered Deported—Alexander Berkman and Emma Goldman, the two most famous anarchists in the United States, have been ordered deported to Russia. Berkman served fourteen years in prison for an attempt on the life of Henry C. Frick twenty-seven years ago.

New Industrial Conference Meets—The new Industrial Conference, called by President Wilson to consider questions involving capital and labor, is in session in Washington. Seventeen men are in attendance.

FOREIGN

Dead Must Remain in France—The French Foreign Office has decided that the 65,000 American dead in France must remain there until France is ready to exhume her own dead, which will not be before 1922.

Egyptian Nationalists Arrested—Field Marshal Lord Allenby, British commander in chief in Egypt, has arrested the president and vice-president, respectively, of the Cairo Nationalist organization. Serious disturbances occurred in many parts of the country during November.

Trial of the Kaiser—The British Government has announced again in the House of Commons that the trial of the ex-Kaiser will begin in London early in the New Year. No demand has been made for him on Holland, according to the Dutch authorities. Should such demand be made, it probably will be refused, they declare.

Plot to Murder Venizelos—A large number of arrests have been made in Athens as a result of the discovery of a plot to assassinate Premier Venizelos and overthrow the monarchy.

Disorders at Fu-Chow—China has demanded reparation for the death of a number of Chinese and much property damage which followed disorders in Fu-Chow, led by Japanese citizens. The Peking authorities assert Japan instigated the attacks that she might obtain a tighter hold on the Fu-kien coast. Japanese warships are reported at Fu-Chow where they have landed marines.

Plead for Korea—The Federal Council of Protestant Churches of Korea has presented a petition to the Governor General of Korea asking that religious liberty, guaranteed by the Japanese constitution, be made effective in Korea. They declare that the preaching of the gospel has been consistently hindered.

The New Session of Congress

THE Sixty-fifth Congress had as its chief task the making of war. The Sixty-sixth is confronted by the task of making peace. It is not only peace with Germany and Austria, however, that must be decided. There is peace between capital and labor, peace with the complaining taxpayer, peace from the activities of radical agitators. In every sense the session which opened on December 1 will be the "Peace Congress."

In his annual message to the Congress, read by a clerk this year because of his continued illness, President Wilson stressed the subjects which are involved in a sane readjustment of the country's activities. He ignored entirely the Treaty of Peace which he is expected either to take up in a separate message later or to withdraw entirely from the Senate to resubmit when he regards the situation as more favorable to its ratification. The largest part of the communication was given over to a discussion of the issues between capital and labor and questions of trade growth at home and expansion abroad.

Sharp differences of opinion immediately developed in Congress over the President's labor views and some of the more conservative members declared his expressions are calculated to stimulate restlessness and the strike spirit rather than allay them. This paragraph in particular is construed as supporting the attitude taken by the labor delegates to the National Industrial Conference which disintegrated under the demands formulated by Mr. Gompers and his friends.

"Governments," says the message, "must recognize the right of men collectively to bargain for humane objects that have at their base the mutual protection and welfare of those engaged in all industries. Labor must not be longer treated as a commodity. It must be regarded as the activity of human beings, possessed of deep yearnings and desires."

"Return to all the old standards of wage and industry in employment," it says again, "are unthinkable. The terrible tragedy of war which has just ended and which has brought the world to the verge of chaos and disaster, would be in vain if there should ensue a return to conditions of the past."

MR. WILSON recognizes the right of the working man to strike, but he places some restriction on the exercise of that right, obviously with the situation in the coal industry in mind. He declares:

"The right of individuals to strike is inviolate and ought not to be interfered with by any process of government, but there is a predominant right, and that is the right of the Government to protect all of its people and assert its power and majesty against the challenge of any class. The Government, when it asserts that right, seeks not to antagonize a class but simply to defend the right of the whole people as against the irreparable harm and injury that might be done by the attempt of any class to usurp a power that only government itself has a right to exercise as a protection to all."

But, says the President: "There can be no permanent and lasting settlements between capital and labor which do not recognize the fundamental concepts for which labor has been struggling through the years. . . . To analyze the particulars in the demands of labor is to admit the justic[illegible]f their complaint in many matters th[illegible]e at their basis."

In this connection there is an appeal to combat and destroy radicalism. In one place the message says: "The seed of revolution is repression. The remedy for these things must not be negative in character. It must be constructive. It must comprehend the general interest. The real antidote for the unrest which manifests itself is not suppression, but a deep consideration of the wrongs that beset our national life, and the application of the remedy."

In another place occurs this warning: "This is the hour of test and trial for America. . . . There are those in this country who threaten direct action to force their will upon a majority. Russia today, with its blood and terror, is a painful object lesson of the power of minorities. It makes little difference what minority it is; whether capital or labor, or any other class; no sort of privilege will ever be permitted to dominate this country. . . . In America there is but one way by which great reforms can be accomplished and the relief sought by classes obtained, and that is through the orderly processes of representative government. Those who would propose any other method of reform are enemies of this country. America will not be daunted by threats nor lose her composure or calmness in these distressing times. We can afford, in the midst of this day of passion and unrest, to be self-contained and sure."

PRESIDENT WILSON'S first recommendation is for the establishment of a budget system. He wants the budget left in the hands of a permanent staff attached to the Treasury Department and not in those of a special bureau to be created and attached to the office of the President. The latter plan is incorporated in a bill before the House and prepared by Representative Good of Iowa. Senator McCormick, of Illinois, is sponsor for a measure along the lines advocated in the message.

Considerable attention is given to questions of tax revision. Simplification of the income and excess profits taxes are absolutely necessary, the President believes, and revision downward he seems to regard as the right step.

Stimulation of foreign trade with a steady growth of imports is advocated as a means of aiding Europe and assuring the cancellation of Europe's monetary debt to us. Brisk interchange of goods also would result and the increased world trade would absorb the larger production capacity of American industry brought about by war needs. Emphasis is laid on the need of making some provision for the encouragement of the infant American dye business.

Recommendations looking to reduction in the cost of living include an extension of the food control act for at least six months from the date of peace, regulation of the price of goods submitted for interstate commerce, control of storage warehouses, and Federal incorporation of all companies engaged in interstate business with especial provision to ensure competitive selling.

Do You Read Advertisements?

ONE of our subscribers has taken us to task as follows: "We look for your paper every week with delight, but we will have to admit that we did not enjoy the last week's paper very much; we thought there were too many advertisements for a Christian paper."

Now, dear friends, do you know that if it were not for those very advertisements, we would not be able to give you so large, so ably edited, so well illustrated a Christian Herald as the one you now so much admire.

In these days of almost prohibitive paper and printing costs the Christian Herald at $2.50 a year is a much greater value than could be produced for that price, were it not for the advertisements.

In other words, when we give you an extra number of pages of reading matter we are compelled to carry a proportionate increase in advertising space in order to make up the difference in expense. And so, the more advertising, the greater the amount of extra reading matter.

Furthermore, the modern art of advertising has progressed until the business pages of the up-to-date magazine have become as interesting from the readers' standpoint as the editorial pages. People who are not in the habit of reading the advertising pages may not realize this, but the fact is that the advertising pages of the Christian Herald are subjected to the most careful scrutiny, and no advertisement is accepted for publication until it has passed muster in every way as to its strict adherence to the truth.

Lesson VI—The Period of Moses

Scripture to be read: Exodus 1-12; 13-18; 19-24; 25-31; Numbers 27; 32; 34, 35; Deut. 1-4; 18; 27-30

THE descendants of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob had greatly multiplied during the centuries of their sojourn in Egypt, and had become, in the rough, the material out of which the chosen nation might now be developed.

Their experiences in that land had undergone a change for the worse, consequent upon a change of the Egyptian dynasty; and had this not been so, they would not have been willing to migrate to Canaan in fulfilment of the Divine plan for the redemption of the world. The climax of their experiences is recorded briefly in Exodus 1.

In the meantime, God was preparing for their deliverance by Moses, who unwisely and precipitately took matters into his own hands (Exodus 2), resulting in a delay of forty years. Read carefully chapters 3 and 4, noting God's revelation of himself to Moses at Horeb; the commission given to him, his hesitation, the different means of strengthening his faith, and the circumstances under which his brother Aaron came to be associated with him.

Chapters 5-12 are of thrilling interest, where we perceive the forces of light and darkness in a death grapple, so to speak. The same Satan who withstood Christ in the wilderness (Matt. 4), is here withstanding the same God in his execution of the same plan of redemption, only in an earlier stage. As previously stated, the difficulties and mysteries must be postponed for elucidation to a later period and an advanced course; but now let us be content with collecting the facts.

Note the hardening of Pharaoh's heart for, while being a free agent, he himself is responsible; note the holy boldness of Moses and the trial of his faith, in pleading with God; note the number and nature of the judgment plagues and the opposition and the impotence of the magicians (2 Tim. 3: 8, 9); note especially the details of the Passover associated with the final plague of death, which is an impressive and illuminating type of our redemption in Christ.

II

THE events between the departure from Egypt and arrival at Sinai must be passed over hastily, but the student is expected to read chapters 31 to 18, and be able to answer these questions:

Why did God require the sanctifying to him of the first-born, both of man and beast, in Israel? Why did he lead them through the wilderness? By what visible sign did he lead them? At what points did they rest in the wilderness of Shur (15: 22-27)? Locate the wilderness of Sin and name the date of their arrival there. What spirit marked the character of the people, faith or unbelief? What was the law about the gathering of the manna? What great miracle, and what great battle, occurred in the neighborhood of Rephidim? By what event would you identify chapter 18?

II

IN THE wilderness of Sinai, the most momentous occurrences, as bearing on the future history and mission of the people, were the giving of the Law chapters 9-24) and the revelation of the tabernacle and the priesthood (chapters 25-31).

The giving of the Law resolves itself into two parts; the decalog or ten commandments, so called, and the statutes and judgments following them, which show their application in certain details of human conduct. The decalog stands, say, for the Constitution of the United States, and the statutes and judgments for the legislation of Congress which always must be in accord with it.

The Law impresses us with God's interest in the common affairs of our daily life; with the nature of holiness and sin; with the need of Christ's work of atonement in order to our salvation, and with what the character of the coming Millennial age will be when the Kingdom of Heaven shall be set up on the earth and God will govern his people righteously.

The reference to holiness and sin and the work of atonement brings up the occasion for the tabernacle which, taken as a whole, and in its several parts, typifies the Person and the work of Christ in redemption. Note the three compartments of the tabernacle, the outer court, the holy place and the holy of holies, and note the articles which each contained, seven in all. Note the coverings of the tabernacle, the colors and the textures, for all these are significant and have meaning in the same direction. Obviously we can not pause at present to point it out, but there are small and inexpensive books to be obtained which will be found very illuminating on the subject. Address for information, the Bible Institute Colportage Association, 826 N. La Salle Street, Chicago.

The tabernacle grows in importance as it is seen to be the pattern of things in the heavens (Heb. 8: 4, 5; 9: 8-12, 23, 24), and also a symbol of God's dwelling with his people in the new heavens and the new earth (Rev. 21: 1-4).

IV

IN THE present series of lessons we omit Leviticus, which, though very important in its own contents, nevertheless does not carry us along further in the chronological sense. Its contents, revealed to Moses at Sinai, consist chiefly of laws and regulations governing the priests and Levites in the tabernacle service, and in the religious, social and hygienic welfare of the people. Observance of some of the laws of Leviticus would effectually settle not a few of the serious problems confronting all nations today, and they point to Millennial days.

The book of Numbers, except a small part of it, must also be omitted at present.

It records the journeys taken by the Israelites from the time they left Sinai, after the laws were given and the tabernacle built, and until they reached Moab on the eastern border of Canaan. About thirty-eight years are covered by the book, which might have been reduced to a few months, or weeks, but for the people's unbelief and disobedience at Kadesh.

Their journeyings may be divided into three stages, namely, their arrival at Kadesh, their detour of Edom, and their waiting period at Moab.

In connection with this waiting period, read chapters 27: 12-23; 32: 1-33; 34 and 35, which will serve as a connecting link between this and the next lesson.

V

DEUTERONOMY, as its name indicates, is a book of review, recapitulating the story of the wilderness journeys and repeating many of the laws, statutes and judgments which had been previously revealed. The occasion for this was that nearly forty years had elapsed since Sinai and a new generation of males had arisen who needed instruction in those important matters before entering Canaan.

The book might be divided thus: Chapters 1-4, review of the journeys; 5-26, review of the laws with additions of certain injunctions and warnings; 27-30, prophetic outline of the future history of Israel; 31-34, close of Moses' life.

The first three or four verses of chapter 1, will put you in possession of the time, place and circumstances under which the contents of the book were put together, which you are urged to read.

Following that you are advised to turn to chapter 18, where one of the new injunctions and warnings is recorded, beginning at verse 9. This is very important as showing why the Canaanites were about to be dispossessed and the Israelites to be given their land. It is also important because of its bearing on the current outbreak of spiritualism with which as Christians we now have to deal. And still further because of its remarkable prophecy of Christ as typified in Joshua.

After reading this chapter, turn please to the prophetic outline of Israel's future (27–30). Note the cursings pronounced upon her in the event of disobedience, especially chapter 28. At verse 36 of that chapter, the Assyrian and Babylonian captivities are foretold, which took place in the eighth and sixth centuries B.C. respectively; at verse 49, the dispersion by the Romans, A.D. 70; and at verse 64 and the following, we have a vivid picture of Israel's sufferings at the hands of the Gentile nations in modern times.

Chapter 30, however, speaks of brighter times ahead when, penitent and forgiven, believing Israel shall be restored to her land once more and victorious over her enemies, will continue to enjoy the blessing of Jehovah. THE MOODY BIBLE INSTITUTE OF CHICAGO.

Our Bible Course

ENROLMENTS for membership in the Christian Herald Bible Study Course will close on December 31. No further applications will be received after that date. The work is now fairly under way with the first line of students, numbering some 2500, and the second line will be in operation shortly. The Course covers six months, including periodical test questions and examinations by the Moody Institute.

Present subscribers intending to take the Course, or any of their friends who may intend enrolling, should do so now, instead of delaying until the last week. It is a great opportunity and one that will not be repeated. In accepting it, you are laying the foundation for a fuller and clearer knowledge of the Bible, which you will value more and more in the years to come.

Questions and Answers

Mrs. J. H. C., Sully, W. Va. "What should be done with the service flags, now that war is over and the boys are home again? The service flag in our church had eight blue stars; three of them have turned to gold. As the other boys came home one by one, the blue stars representing them are taken from the flag and given to them. Is this right? We do not think it is. We feel that the stars should all be left on the flag, for although the returning boys did not give their lives, they gave their service, and we ought to remember and honor them."

The service flags, in most cases we believe, are preserved by the church as a precious souvenir, and will be brought out very appropriately on any occasion that calls for their use, as on Decoration Day, for example. The old battle-flags of the army are treasured and kept even though they may be worn to tatters. The service flag, which represents the loyalty and consecration of our heroic young men, deserves a better fate than the one you describe.

H. R. B., Hoyt, Kan. The statements you quote giving the views of St. George Mivart, Professor Beale, Professor Shaler, and also of the late Professor Haeckel concerning the failure to establish the theory of evolution by scientific evidence, have become more and more recognized, we believe, among scientific nen than when they were expressed. Revival or Revolution?

BY DR. MILFORD H. LYON

President, Interdenominational Association of Evangelists

A GENUINE revival is imperative. First, for the salvation of the individual. Culture cannot take the place of conversion. Spiritual birth must precede spiritual growth. In Jesus Christ alone is the Source of eternal life. Your relationship to him is not merely a matter of good or bad, or good or better. It is a question of life or death.

A revival is essential for the salvation of organized Christianity. The church must have more religion or very soon it will have vastly less. When the cohesive power is weak among the particles of a substance, the tendency is for them to separate and form new combinations.

All sorts of social and religious vagaries are being promulgated and drawing away church members after them. Also when vitality becomes lowered, it is the signal for disease germs to begin their deadly work. The best antiseptic for disease is health. The most effective defense is an aggressive advance. The best antidote for backsliding is personal evangelism. The only permanent way to build up the church is by regenerated lives.

A spiritual awakening is necessary, also, for the saving of civilization. The prevalent social unrest is the manifestation of a wide-spread, deep-seated disorder. The cause of this disease is selfishness. It is evident alike in rich and poor, in employer and employee. Legislation and education alone are not adequate to effect a cure. It needs regeneration. Nothing less will suffice than the transformation of individual motives and desires by the dynamic of the personal, living Christ.

It needs no seer to discern that the condition of civilization is desperate. Forces are now at work which, unless checked or turned, must inevitably bring revolution and ruin. Property will not be safe; life will not be safe. No superficial remedy will suffice; it needs a blood cure. Congresses, conferences, discussions will not solve the problem. An improved social order must come only through improved citizens. The trouble primarily is that men have forgotten God. They must get back to him in repentance, restitution, confession and obedience. "If my people, which are called by my name, shall humble themselves and pray, and seek my face, and turn from their wicked ways; then will I hear from heaven, and will forgive their sin, and will heal their land."

How shall this revival be inaugurated? Nearly every great work of grace has begun primarily in the heart of some one loyal disciple, who has caught the vision of bigger, better things. In your community this may be the one who is now reading these lines. Call together a company of Christian friends, regardless of church affiliations, who you think would be interested in a forward movement. Present to them the importance of a special revival campaign. Make it the subject of earnest prayer. Endeavor to enlist the support of pastors and leading laymen. Plan for large things! Put the movement upon as comprehensive a basis as possible. Do not wait or expect to get all the members of any church to support the project at the outset. They will fall into line.

A Revival the Nation's Need

From the Atlanta, Ga., Constitution

AMID all the confusion of conflicting interests which is now keeping the country in a fever of turmoil and uncertainty, when it seems that a solution of all our problems is beyond the power of statesmen, economists and sociologists, the minds of many thinking men are turning toward religion and the need of a religious revival throughout the nation.

"It is largely due to our lack of practical application of religious beliefs in recent years that America has been brought to the edge of the cliff from which it now looks out over a vast chasm of industrial war, just as it has been the weakness of the churches in failing to create in the minds of their members a live, workable idea of Christianity."

Rural Critics of the Church

THE first Rural County Conference called to consider facts disclosed by the Interchurch survey met at Montrose, Pennsylvania, November 14 and 15. It consisted of the leading ministers and laymen of the county, with Interchurch experts on various phases of rural work present to give advice as desired.

The outcome of the conference was the appointment of a County Council to deal with problems confronting the community. This council of 42 members consists of laymen and ministers representing six denominations, besides five delegates at large.

The survey of the county which was laid before the conference contained the following observations:

(1) That it is not the lack of social activities in the country that calls for attention, but the need of a constructive, healthful and recreation direction of these activities.

(2) That there is great selfishness on the part of parents who have established lodges and granges for themselves, but have left out the boys and girls under 21.

(3) That the church buildings have an average seating capacity of 250 with an average attendance of 57.

(4) That 80 per cent. of the people have no interest in the Church.

(5) That 84 per cent. of church members are over 21.

(6) That unsystematic church financial records are one of the greatest drawbacks in extending Christian influence.

The Interchurch survey of the Pacific Coast lumber region is developing some picturesque opinions on spiritual subjects from the rough men of the woods.

Occasionally a man takes up the cudgels on behalf of preachers. One "jack" said they were the poorest paid, most imposed on, and least appreciated men on earth. Another was all sympathy for young preachers who lived on $800 to $1,000 a year, but had no use for bishops. Another man gave as his reason for not attending church that preachers "never preached any more about sin." They evaded the truth—and were too anxious to please people. In the main, the opinions of preachers were adverse. They were described as "kid-gloved, time-servers, compromisers, and parasites."

A Name for Your Home

WITH the growing need of advertising farm products and of identifying farms in connection with community enterprises, the New York State College of Agriculture at Ithaca suggests that all farms should have distinctive names, and that during the winter when the family gets together more frequently than at other seasons the matter of a name for the farm may be discussed.

Among the most common types o name are those derived from som topographic feature of the farm, suc as Riverdale, Brookdale, Lakesi Hillcrest, Shady Valley, and the li Other farms take their names from tr and are called Woodlawn, Shady La Maple Grove, Pinecroft, Birch F and so on. d,

Prices Advance Since the Armistice

The End of Hostilities Instead of Reducing the H. C. of L. Added Materially to the Difficulty of Making Ends Meet

THE first year following the Armistice fails to show the reduction in prices which had been greatly hoped for. In fact, prices have continued to advance except in few articles for which the war created a special demand, such as nitrates, high explosives, canned foods, copper, wool, barbed-wire, firearms, and certain grades of iron and steel.

A compilation by The National City Bank of New York shows that out of 150 articles enumerated in the Government's price lists of imports and exports 100 show advances, while, as above indicated, a large part of those showing a reduction is of the class for which the war created a special demand.

The price lists issued by the Government in connection with its figures of imports and exports are especially informative by reason of the fact that they represent the average price of the entire quantity of the article named in the import or export figures covering the period in question, irrespective of the effect of local price variations. For example, the fact that the average import price of the 75,000,000 pounds of cattle hides imported in September, 1919, was 33 cents per pound against 25.6 cents per pound in the month preceding the Armistice, October, 1918, indicates that the average advance in the price of cattle hides the world over has been 28.9 per cent. in the period in question, since the import valuations named by the Government in its figures are the wholesale prices existing in the countries from which the merchandise was imported, and as our imports of hides come from a score of countries scattered over the entire world, the average import valuation named at the custom houses represents quite accurately the average wholesale price of the entire hide-producing world. The further fact that the average expert price of men's shoes exported from the United States in September, 1919, was $4.40 per pair against $3.22 per pair in October, 1918, renders it apparent that the average price at which the shoe manufacturers of the United States as a whole are exporting their product has advanced 36.6 per cent. in the period in question.

Upon this Government method of determining the average value per unit of quantity of the merchandise passing through the custom houses of the United States, it appears that a large proportion of the articles named in the import and export price lists had a higher valuation in September, 1919 (the latest available figures), than in October, 1918, the month preceding the Armistice. Of the 75 articles specified in the export price list, 52 show higher average prices in September, 1919, than in October, 1918, while of the 23 which show a decline, a large part is directly affected by the cessation of demand due to termination of hostilities. Of the 72 articles named in the September import price list, 41 show advances when compared with October, 1918, while a large part of those showing declines is of the class for which the demand has been minimized by the termination of hostilities, such as nitrate of soda, copper, wool, barbed-wire, bar iron, India rubber, and canned goods.

Among the imported articles which show a marked advance in prices in the countries from which the merchandise is drawn are rice, advancing from an average of 5.4 cents per pound in October, 1918, to 8.6 cents per pound in September, 1919; coffee from 9.9 cents per pound in October, 1918, to 24 cents per pound in September, 1919; jute from $68.50 per ton to $96.88; calfskins from 36.5 cents to 49.7 cents; goatskins from 43 cents to 77.6 cents; mattings for floors from 18.5 cents per square yard to 23.3 cents; raw silk from $6.12 per pound to $8.04; and cane sugar from 4.68 cents per pound to 5.55 cents.

On the export side, the advances include cotton duck, advancing from an average of 53.3 cents per yard in October, 1918, to 84.2 cents in September, 1919; phosphate rock from $6.14 per ton to $10.35; canned salmon from 10 cents per pound to 18 cents; dried apples from 16.3 cents per pound to 21.6 cents; cheese from 32.1 cents per pound to 41.8 cents; cotton seed oil cake from 2.8 cents per pound to 3.3 cents; news print paper from 4.1 cents per pound to 5.2 cents; refined sugar from 7 cents per pound to 8.4 cents; bacon from 29.5 cents per pound to 33.3 cents and goat and kid upper leather from 34.5 cents per square foot to 61.2 cents.

Eats a Thousand Bugs

A CLIFF swallow will eat a thousand flies, mosquitoes, wheat-midgets, or beetles that injure fruit trees, in a day and therefore are to be encouraged. This bird is also known as the eave swallow because it plasters its nest on the outside of a barn or other building up under the eaves. Colonies of several thousand will build their nests together on the side of a cliff. These nests, shaped like a flattened gourd or water-bottle, are made of bits of clay rolled into pellets and lined with straw or feathers. This bird winters in the tropics.

Adventures in the High Andes

parently as much afraid of the precipice as we were, and at length got us down safely (no thanks to the driver) to the railway station on the Argentine side.

THERE was one great compensation for all the fatigue and perils of the journey. It was the sight of "The Christ of the Andes." The traveler across the mountains no longer sees this wonderful statue of the Prince of Peace, for the railway tunnel goes directly under it. I need not rehearse the well-known story of this statue, so peculiarly significant in these days, when the nations are longing for and groping after world-peace. In its solitary grandeur it stands on the highest pass of the Andes, on the border-line between the two republics, twelve thousand feet above the sea, with mighty mountains ten thousand feet higher towering around it. In its heroic proportions, in its expression of meek grandeur, in its historic [illegible]ce, there is no statue in the [illegible]d to compare with the "Christ of the Andes."

RISTIAN H

It must not be thought that this journey was undertaken simply for the sake of seeing the mountains and the interesting republics of the Andes. Like all my other journeys, this was undertaken for a religious purpose, and to address meetings already arranged in Panama and Peru, Bolivia, Chile and Argentina, and many in Brazil, including a large national Christian Endeavor Convention. I had the pleasure of seeing the beginning of the Endeavor movement in some republics, and of trying to strengthen it in others, and also the great joy of meeting missionaries of the Cross representing many denominations. The South American mission field is a difficult one; but many earnest souls are at work there, who realize that "obstacles are things to be overcome," and already in many sections God is abundantly blessing their labors.

I had the pleasure of meeting President Amador of the Republic of Panama, President Pardo of Peru, President Montt of Chile, and President Alcorta of Argentina, as well as a multitude of people in all walks of life, and I came home believing most heartily that South America is not only the "Continent of Opportunity" from the commercial and industrial standpoint, but a continent of vast opportunities for those who would win the nations to a pure and sane religion, and that these opportunities for the republics of South America rest very largely with the people of the greater republic of North America.

"Dad, Make the Kids a Peanut Butter"

The Story of a New-Grade Peanut Butter

Our policy is to brand nothing Van Camp's until we develop the best food of its kind in existence.

One Van Camp expert has a boy who knows this. Like millions of boys, he wanted a delicious peanut butter. And his urging is what first suggested this Van Camp creation.

For many months the Van Camp scientists studied peanut butter. These men are experts, college trained. So they went to the heart of the matter.

The Finer Points

First they found what peanuts yielded the richest butter. Then, by countless tests, they found the blends which brought the finest flavor.

They found the exact point at which roasting should be stopped. And they stop it suddenly by applying a cold draft.

They remove all skins for clarity. They remove all nut hearts, because the germ gives a bitter taste.

Thus they finally developed three of the finest blends ever known in peanut butter, and the choice was then left to the boys.

"Make That Kind"
At last the scientist developed three delightful blends, and then left the choice to the boy.

Now any child who loves peanut butter can enjoy a super-grade. Any mother can get it by specifying Van Camp's, and without any extra price. Order a jar and compare it.

"But after that they began to rush things for a grand wedding and I let them do it because I didn't see anything else in the world for me."

Betty raised her eyes and encountered the clear grave gaze of Reyburn fixed on her, and the color flew into her cheeks:

"I know you think I'm dreadful," she said, shrinking. "I've thought so myself a thousand times, but truly I didn't realize then what an awful thing it would be to marry a man I didn't love. I only wanted to hurry up and get it done before Herbert came home. They said he had been called away by important business and might be at home any day. I gave my consent to everything they wanted to do, and they fixed it all just as they pleased One thing that happened upset me terribly. When the wedding invitations came home my stepmother carried them off to her room, and had them sent out, without letting me know. I was too sad to pay much attention anyway. But after they had gone out I happened to be down in the kitchen looking over the papers that the maid had taken down from the waste baskets to search for a missing letter and there in the pile I found one of the invitations partly addressed and flung aside, and the invitation was still in the envelope. I pulled it out with a ghastly kind of curiosity to see how I looked on paper, and there it read, Mrs. Charles Garland Stanhope invites you to be present at the marriage of her daughter Elizabeth to Mr. Herbert Hutton.

"My heart just stood still. With the paper in my hand I rushed up to my stepmother's room and demanded to know what that meant. She smiled and said she was so sorry I had been annoyed that way, that that was a mistake, the invitations had come wrongly engraved and she had had to send them back and have them done over again. She was afraid I might be superstitious about it, so she hadn't told me. She was very gentle and sweet and tried to soothe me, and called me 'Betty,' the name my father always had for me, and at last I went back to my room feeling quite comfortable. She had said she always felt troubled for poor Bessemer, that nobody could love him right, he was so homely, and now I was going to make everything right by marrying him. She was going to try to forget what I had done to poor dear Herbert, and just be happy about Bessemer. She talked so nicely that I kissed her, a thing I hadn't done in years, not since she was first married to father. But somehow the shock of seeing Herbert's name on the invitation stayed with me, and I began to feel gloomier about it all and to wonder if perhaps I had done right. The last day I was terribly depressed and when I got to the church that night it suddenly came to me that perhaps after all I was not going to be free at all as I had hoped, but was just tying myself up to them all for life. I was thinking that as I walked up the aisle, and my throat had a big lump in it the way it always does when I am frightened, and then I looked up hoping a glimpse of poor Bessemer's face would steady me and he wasn't there at all! And right over me, waiting beside the minister, to marry me stood Herbert! My knees just gave way under me, and everything got black so I couldn't go on another step, nor even stand up. I had to drop. I wasn't unconscious as you all thought—I heard everything that went on but I couldn't do anything about it.

"After they had carried me into the other room and given me things to drink, and I could get my breath again I saw it all clearly. Herbert hadn't given up at all. He meant to marry me anyway. He had had the invitations printed with his name on purpose and they probably hadn't been changed at all. Everybody in that great church out there was expecting me to marry Herbert Hutton, and I was not going to do it! I didn't quite know how I was going to stop it, but I knew I had to! You see I was brought up to think a great deal about what people would think of me if I did anything out of the usual, and it seemed to me I had disgraced myself forever by dropping down in the aisle. I knew Herbert well enough to be sure he would carry that wedding through now if he had to hold me up in his arms till the ceremony was over, and I was desperate. I would have given everything I had in the world if the floor would have opened and swallowed me up then, but of course I knew wild thoughts like that wouldn't get me anywhere, so I just shut my eyes and tried to think of a way; and then I asked them all to go out a minute and let me be quiet. The doctor who had come out of the church told them to go. I shall always bless that man, whoever he was! Then when they were gone I opened a door that had a key in it, and I locked it behind me and ran away down some stairs and out a passage that led to the street. That girl, Jane Carson, was passing and she put her own coat on me and took me to her room and sent me here. Oh, it's been so good to get here! Do you think they can take me away against my will?"

"Certainly not!" said the young man. "Not without some foul play, but I don't intend to give them any chance for that. By the way, when do you come of age?"

"In three weeks," said Betty, looking troubled. "Why, would I be safe after I was of age?"

"You certainly would not be under their guardianship any longer," said the young lawyer. "and they would have no right to control your actions, unless of course you were incapacitated somehow and unfit to manage your own affairs."

Betty looked troubled.

"I've thought sometimes, ever since I saw that paper in which they hinted that I was temporarily insane, that they might try to shut me up in an insane asylum. Herbert wouldn't stop at anything. Could he do that?"

"They would have to get a doctor to swear that you were mentally unsound," said Reyburn, looking troubled. "Does he really love you, do you think or does he only want to get you in his power for some reason?"

"It is more like that," said Betty sorrowfully, "he couldn't really love anybody but himself."

"Well, don't you worry. I'm going at the case at once, and I'll put those people where they'll have to walk a chalk line before many hours are over. The first thing I must do is to see those trustees of yours, and by the way, there are one or two things I want you to write down for me."

He got out his fountain pen, and Betty told him all he wanted to know, that is, all she knew herself, and then suddenly it was train time and he hurried away. On the steps he paused and said in a low tone:

"Are you perfectly comfortable with these people for a few days until I can get you better accommodations where you will be safe?"

"Entirely," said Betty eagerly. "I wouldn't want to go elsewhere."

"But it must be very hard for one like you to be thrown constantly with illiterate, uncultured people."

Betty smiled dreamily:

"I don't think they are exactly uncultured," she said slowly. "They—well, you see, they make a friend of God, and somehow I think that makes a difference. Don't you think it would?"

"I should think it would," said Warren Reyburn reverently with a light in his eyes. "I think, perhaps, if you don't mind my saying it, that you too have been making a friend of God."

"I've been trying to," said Betty softly, with a shy glow on her face that he remembered all the way back to the city.

A "Movie" Theater Sunday School

By J. A. STEWART

Miss Jessie L. Burrall

ONE of the most interesting of new Bible classes anywhere is the Burrall class of Calvary Baptist Sunday School, Washington, D. C.

The rush of war-workers into Washington brought this novel class into existence. A thoughtful woman teacher saw the crowds of young women let loose on the streets of the National capital on Sundays and sensed the need which she was well fitted to meet.

She inaugurated her plan in November, 1917, with six girls, whom she invited to form her new class in Calvary Baptist Sunday School. She conducted this class with such attractive methods that it soon outgrew the large, well-equipped Sunday-school house. The attendance quickly increased to fifty and then to one hundred, and to two hundred, when it became necessary to find a bigger place in which to meet.

Right across the street is one of the finest "movie" theaters in Washington, large and handsome in its appointments. With some doubt as to the big rental which might be needed to secure this place for Sunday school services, the owner, Thomas Moore, was approached on the subject by Miss Burrall. To her great joy and delight, he declared that the class might have the use of the "movie" theater—heated, lighted, ventilated, with the use of the pipe organ—absolutely free. In his humble, fatherless boyhood he had been befriended by Pastor Samuel H. Greene of Calvary Baptist Church and he was delighted at the opportunity thus to do something to show his appreciation.

In this attractive place, some 500 girls meet every Sunday morning. The total enrolment is 800. The members hail from thirty-eight different states and represent thirteen denominations.

The class is efficiently organized. Two faithful secretaries keep two rolls, by card index system. One of these is in the possession of Miss Burrall (the founder and leader), and is kept correct to date. She is also supplied each week (every Monday morning) with the list of the new girls enrolled the day before, to whom she sends at once a hearty letter of greeting and invitation to take part in the various class activities.

Telling of her success in organization, Miss Burrall says:

"As teacher, I have made it a rule to learn the name of every girl in the class. Two years ago I could memorize the names one Sunday and know the girl and her state the following Sunday; but as the numbers have increased it takes longer to identify each one, and now with thirty to fifty new girls every Sunday morning, it takes me from three to six Sundays to be sure of the name of the girl. I take a personal interest in each one, and they seek me out with their joys and sorrows, for personal advice and counsel whenever they wish."

On one Sunday afternoon of each month, Miss Burrall is "at home" in the church parlors, where music is provided, quiet games and refreshments are enjoyed, and she makes a special effort to come in touch with each member.

She visits those who are ill, the names of the girls being given to her by the "captain" or "lieutenants" of the particular group to which the sick girl belongs. These groups are based on the twelve districts into which the city has been divided for the class activities. In an infectious spirit of pleasant hilarity the various groups chose humorous names—those of animals: "Daring Deer," "Calvary Camels," "Gritty Gophers," "Lively Lions," "Squirmy Squirrels," "Busy Beavers," "Terrific Tigers," "Burrall Bunnies," "Church Mice," "Mud Turtles," "Burrall Squirrels," and "Happy Hippoes."

Each group, too, has its appropriate song and yell, such as that of the "Happy Hippoes":

"Hippoes don't mind the water,
For on the rainy Sundays,
They come just as they'd 'otter'
And dry their skins on Mondays."

The chief aim of these twelve groups is the promotion of attendance by friendly competition, each striving to be the largest. To stimulate them, various devices have been introduced. One of these was the observance of "Twin Sunday" (the new members being the "twins" of the girls who brought them and who received two tiny twin dolls on a string. A doll is added to the string for each new member, the president of the class having the biggest "twin string" of over twenty-five.

The Burrall class has many activities, including a hikers' club; a ukelele and mandolin club; basket ball teams and a big choral club. There are a director of music and one of recreation. A bulletin of the class events is issued each Sunday.

The special aim of the able college-bred teacher-leader, who on her maternal side is descended from five generations of New England ministers and who taught school for several years in her native state, Minnesota, before going to Washington in 1915 as Chief of School Service of the National Geographic Society, is religious, and all her efforts have as their goal the stimulation of the girls' interest in religious work both at home and abroad. Girls' missionary societies and tithing are a vital part of the class activities. Starting with ten tithers, the class has now one hundred, which means about $12,000 a year for missions and for church drives and for the local church. The class contributions to missions last year was nearly $3,000. Recently, it pledged $2,780 to the Baptist $175,000,000 fund. Not long ago it raised nearly $1,200 for an automobile for a Methodist missionary in Malaysia.

"A part of my philosophy is that there is no fun in anything at all easy, but that the so-called 'impossible' provides a lure that makes everything possible, and that our chief business is to work joyously," declares Miss Burrall. "Our class motto is the third line of the little quatrain, 'The Song of the Panama Canal Builders,' which is 'We specialize on the wholly impossible!' The girls come knowing very little about the great world's needs. We try to interest them, give them a wholesome, hilarious good time, supply them with new methods of church and Sunday school work, so that when they return to their homes they will be efficient. Girls who have gone home write back telling of the work they are doing in their home churches.

"And you can picture the pleased surprise of the minister in a small church, when an earnest, enthusiastic girl, full of 'pep,' comes in, offers to back him up and then starts something really interesting with the young people! All that the young girls of the entire country need is leadership and direction to bring them together in a marvelous work."

But they do not save them. They leave the film and that wrecks them

You Must End the Film To Save Them

Millions of mothers know that children's teeth decay and discolor, despite the daily brushing. So do adults' teeth. But saving children's teeth is of supreme importance.

The trouble lies in a film—that ever-present, slimy film. It clings to the teeth, enters crevices and stays. The ordinary tooth paste does not dissolve it. The tooth brush leaves much of it intact. And that film causes most of our tooth troubles.

That film is what discolors—not the teeth. It is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

Science Finds a Way

Dentists know the danger of this film. They call it "bacterial plaque." Dental science has for years sought a way to end it.

That way has now been found. Convincing tests made by able authorities have amply proved its efficiency. Now it is embodied for home use in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And the makers supply a 10-Day Tube free to anyone who asks.

Ten Days Will Tell

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to constantly combat it.

Pepsin was not used before because it must be activated. And the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. But science has discovered a harmless activating method. And now this ideal film destroyer can be constantly applied.

Send us this coupon for a 10-day Tube.

Then you will know that Pepsodent does what was never done before. No mother who once does this will return to old-time methods. For the children's sake cut out the coupon now.

Pepsodent

A Militant Church School

By Rev. W. A. BARTLETT, D.D.

Pine Street Congregational Church, Lewiston, Maine

THIS church, like many others, has for years been struggling with the perplexing problem of a really efficient Sunday—or, as we prefer to call it—Church school. Aside from the matter of securing teachers and superintendents who would not be discouraged, we faced a curious situation! By an overwhelming majority it was voted again and again, after prolonged discussion, that 9:30 as the hour for school was preferable to twelve. And we were informed by one of our normal school expert principals that psychologically and physiologically, the lowest point of vitality in the child was between twelve and one. Hence no school based on such scientific facts could think of the noon hour! But after both teachers and pupils had voted to hold the school before church, they failed to appear on time, and came laggingly till almost ten o'clock.

After the resignation of two most efficient superintendents, one our superintendent of public schools, in a reckless moment, I took over the school myself and was willingly given full swing. I was not even a "forlorn hope," as there seemed to be no hope.

At that time, as now, I was teaching a men's Bible class from 9:45 till 10:30. The time for church service was put forward to 10:45, and I took up what my mother called my "stint."

As we had a long honor roll and were in the midst of the war, the school was called a Militant Church School, to get the atmosphere of the times. Next, a system of cash prizes was announced. To this end a card was given to each pupil containing name, address, date and class. This was both the enrolment and credit card. Credits were given as follows: for promptness (being in place before the close of the opening hymn); for helpfulness (equivalent to perfect order through the session); one for church attendance; two for perfect recitation of assigned Scripture passages, or two for a composition of at least 100 words on the lesson; two for each new scholar introduced.

AS I was a church organist before I was a minister, I found it simplified matters to play for the opening exercises myself, thus avoiding worry about the delay or absence of a pianist. I found it really easier to conduct the school in that way. My mind also harked back to student days in Hartford, Conn., when I used to see the Reverend "Joe" Twitchell act as superintendent of his school. But he did not play.

I found it a real rest and exhilaration to lead the singing, and arranged to have the Primary Department occupy the front seats with their teachers. I told them that their smiling faces were just as good to see on an unpropitious morning as the face of a deacon. Another psychological fact is that the youngest love the front seats and the oldest stick to the back. Thus the arrangement was mutually satisfactory. The credit cards for the Primary were for promptness, attendance and the introduction of new scholars. After the hymn and prayer, this department went to its room.

But the plan was much more radical than the foregoing. I decided to prepare the lesson myself, by a simple and easy method. I selected the book or passage in the Bible, and asked a dozen questions or so whose answers were found in the text to be studied. This was printed on our church paper or calendar one week in advance. Each pupil and teacher was given the paper of the day which contained the lesson for the coming Sunday. Lately I have been giving one credit to all who read the lesson over before Sunday. The credit card is printed with series of stars around the edge to suggest where it is to be punched.

At the beginning of the session the entire school is assembled together for the best singing effects and for other exercises. As the word is given to retire to their respective booths, the teachers come to the table and receive the credit cards for their classes, which I have kept through the week for examination. Each teacher is provided with a punch similar to a conductor's. Arriving at their tables, the teachers punch the cards for promptness and church attendance. Each pupil then opens one of the Bibles and with our church paper open, the teacher asks the questions about the lesson. They look up the answers in the context. It is seen that a substitute teacher of ordinary intelligence will have little difficulty in teaching a class, and often the young people take it, substituting for themselves. I never saw such good order, and I am sure I never kept it as a pupil myself. The reason is two old: They are on their honor to be "helpful," and the fact that each one has a Bible open and seeks to answer the questions, keeps them absorbed. The room is more quiet than the average school room, and every moment of the thirty is occupied.

I COME in from the men's class at about 10:15, and the school is assembled again in the body of the house before I arrive. Then begins the most interesting part of the morning. All who have read the lesson during the week raise their hands. Then is heard the click of the punch as the teachers give one credit for that. Then we have a little service of welcome for new scholars, who are brought forward and greeted. Two credits are given to the young friend who brought the recruit. Following that, members of classes in order begin reading the "compositions" about the lesson, which naturally are largely paraphrases of the passage, but exceedingly well done. This helps fix the story in the minds of all who listen, and they all do, as well as in the mind of the pupil. This exercise is open to friends and parents. When the compositions have been read, we hear the recitations of the assigned Scripture passages. These must be perfectly committed and recited. Sometimes when a small boy makes a brave struggle and his teacher says he has recited perfectly to her we put it to vote (we vote on everything) and give him one, and perhaps two credits for his effort. But there are few failures.

The younger or first grade scholars are required to commit but one verse when the older ones repeat three. Their compositions may be 50 words, and the older, 100.

Just now we are introducing these lessons into our mid-week meeting, to assist teachers and add to the general interest, with the result that men and women who have never before opened their mouths at such a meeting except to yawn eagerly take part.

This is simply a personal testimony, and might not fit in at all with other churches. But the whole thing is to me a sort of revelation and refreshment, and there is much more to it than I can indicate in twice this space. Instead of a lagging attendance, with boys and girls hanging around the doors waiting for each other, and the usual noise and confusion which always accompanies unsystematic services, I see practically the entire school standing before me by 9:35 o'clock, with others hurrying to their places.

After careful consideration by a competent committee, we give cash prizes the Sunday before Christmas and Children's Day, as a part of the church service. The present basis is 50 cents for every 25 credits. Church and Sunday School workers and experts have quite universally given their approval of the prize, as a "prize for a high calling." And the young people who receive them have worked hard and have committed hundreds of Scripture verses and written hundreds of words about the Bible, and have lived up to their vows. This is now past the experimental stage, as we have been using this method for more than a year and a half. By recent vote of church, school teachers and pupils, this method is approved, and never worked better than at the present time.

o you want legislation sed on “facts” like these?

The Federal Trade Commission, it seems, would like to show that the packers are getting control of the food supply of the nation.

If it were true, the commission ought to have no trouble in proving it. Every detail of the packing business has been open to them.

But the idea is absurd—and an absurdity cannot be proved.

The commission has published a list of some 640 articles said to be sold by the packers.

This list is a gross exaggeration.

90 of the items listed are not sold to the outside trade by Swift & Company but are supply and repair materials, such as brick, cement, etc., used in construction and maintenance.

Glaring duplications appear also. Sausage was listed 37 times under different varieties. Strictly beef products and by-products were classified as over 60 different items.

As a matter of real fact—

Aside from meat and meat by-products, Swift & Company regularly handles only butter, eggs, cheese, poultry, canned goods, lard substitutes, soap, and, to a very small extent, dried and salt fish. And it handles only a small percentage of the volume of these sold to the trade.

It is natural and logical, of course, that Swift & Company should handle these auxiliary articles.

Practically all of them are sold to retail shops. And plus this is the matter of plain economy. Swift & Company, by handling these auxiliary products, reduces overhead costs all down the line and gives cheaper meat and better service to the public.

That Swift & Company can serve the public at a profit of only a fraction of a cent per pound from all sources, is possible in large part because of these products.

We do not believe that intelligent, fair-minded American citizens want legislation based on the kind of “facts” the Federal Trade Commission is using to fight the packers.
Such “facts” are vicious and grossly unfair and can do nothing but harm to everybody concerned.

A Few War Facts

FROM a “Statistical Summary of the War with Germany,” issued by the War Department, we learn that the war cost the United States $21,850,000,000, or about a million an hour. The army at the signing of the armistice contained four million men, with 800,000 in other war branches. Of the 2,086,000 men sent overseas, 1,390,000 went into battle, 1,200,000 participating at Meuse-Argonne. Battle claimed about 50,000 of our dead and disease 56,991 up to April 30, while 236,000 were wounded. In the nineteen months of fighting 7,500,000 tons of supplies were sent across. The draft registered 24,234,021 men, of whom 2,810,296 were inducted into service, the remainder of the four million coming from enlistments, recruitment, etc. The British sent to France in the first year many more men than the United States, but it took England three years to raise two million men, which the United States raised in half that time.

The army needed about 200,000 commissioned officers, one-sixth of whom had had previous training in the Regular Army, the National Guard, or the ranks. Almost one of every hundred were from the ranks. The average soldier had six months' training before going to France and two more after landing before his baptism of fire. The fighters were massed in 42 divisions of 27,000 men and 1,000 officers.

Most of the troops crossed from New York. Of every one hundred men forty-nine went in British ships, forty-five in American, three in Italian, two in French, and one in British-controlled Russian ships. The Leviathan, formerly the German liner Vaterland, landed 12,000 men each month while troop movements approached their maximum. At no time was there a shortage of food, though there were men who went hungry for short periods, due to troop movements. Our engineers built eighty-three ship berths and 1,538 miles of railroad, strung 100,000 miles of telephone wire, and made and shipped 40,000 motor trucks.

When the war began, we had nearly 600,000 rifles. At its close we had 2,500,000. Of machine guns we produced during the war 226,557 and 1,500,000,000 rounds of rifle and machine gun ammunition were shipped, and at its close the production had reached 3,500,000,000 rounds.

Our Aviation training schools graduated 8,602 men from elementary and 4,028 from advanced courses, and over 5,000 pilots and observers were sent across. The personnel of the Air Service consisted at the end of hostilities of 200,000 men; and there were produced more than 8,000 training planes and more than 16,000 training engines. The Air Force on November 11 consisted of 45 squadrons with 740 planes.

A few outstanding statistical facts are summarized as follows:

“Of every 100 Americans soldiers and sailors who served in the war with Germany 2 were killed or died of disease during the period of hostilities.

“The total battle deaths of all nations in this war were greater than all the deaths in all the wars in the previous 100 years.

“The number of American lives lost was 122,500, of which about 10,000 were in the navy and the rest in the army and the marines attached to it.

“In the American Army the casualty rate in the infantry was higher than in any other service, and that for officers was higher than for men.

“For every man killed in battle seven were wounded.

“Five out of every six men sent to hospitals on account of wounds were cured and returned to duty.

“In the Expeditionary Forces battle losses were twice as large as deaths from disease.

“In this war the death rate from disease was lower and the death rate from battle was higher than in any other previous American war.”

So far as the United States was concerned, the cost is summarized as follows:

“1. The war cost the United States considerably more than $1,000,000 an hour for over two years.

“2. The direct cost was about $22,000,000,000, or nearly enough to pay the entire cost of running the United States Government from 1791 up to the outbreak of the European war.

“3. Our expenditures in this war were sufficient to have carried on the Revolutionary War continuously for more than 1,000 years at the rate of expenditure which that war actually involved.

“4. In addition to this huge expenditure nearly $10,000,000,000 have been loaned by the United States to the Allies.

“5. The army expenditures have been over $14,000,000,000, or nearly two-thirds of our total war costs.

“6. During the first three months our war expenditures were at the rate of $2,000,000 per day. During the next year they averaged more than $22,000,000 a day. For the final ten months of the period, from April, 1917, to April, 1919, the daily average was over $44,000,000.

“7. Although the army expenditures are less than two-thirds of our total war costs, they are nearly equal to the value of all the gold produced in the whole world from the discovery of America up to the outbreak of the European war.

“8. The pay of the army during the war cost more than the combined salaries of all the public school principals and teachers in the United States for the five years from 1912 to 1916.”

Ten Qualities I Want My Child to Have

FIRST. Courage to stand by one's convictions, to face life's struggles, to face death's summons, to defend the right.

Second. Cleanness of mind, which includes a hatred of low talk, strength to avoid it and turn one's thoughts to healthier things; respect for one's body, the temple of God.

Third. Unselfishness. Selfishness is one of the big vices. It includes so much —love of self—self centeredness—excludes growth; dwarfs the character, cuts out the privilege of service which means losing the real meaning of life.

Fourth. Faith: first, belief and trust in God through joy and trial; faith in others; faith in one's self as opposed to egotism.

Fifth. Honesty. Open, hating deceit; scorn of cheating in games, school work, or any other way. Above-board.

Sixth. Humor. This is the oil that makes the wheels go round, the sauce for the stale dry pudding; the boat which carries one over the waters of despair and depression. A prominent writer once said that she desired for her child first a sense of humor as equipment for life.

Seventh. Hope is humor's twin. St. Paul puts it next to Faith. It points the way out of darkness like the guiding star of old.

Eighth. Modesty, which does not mean depreciation that is weakening, but a fair and just estimate of one's powers, with the knowledge of others' superiority and fine qualities, and the constant effort to reach higher ideals which tends to humility.

Ninth. Generosity. This includes not only the giving of gifts but the giving of one's self. It eliminates the blighting power of envy, pleasure in another's praise or good fortune. Its contrast is greed.

Tenth. Imagination. This is a gift of gifts, if kept within bounds. It opens to the child a wonderful land of vision; it is the open sesame of literature; it gives zest to life, it often leads to creation. But it is very difficult of attainment. It is born, not made. If my child has it, I give thanks.

KLINGTITE BELTS

Threshing, Feed-grinding—and Goodyear Belts

Those who plan to use their tractors for feed-grinding are one of the largest purchasing groups interested in Goodyear Klingtite Belts. Their interest in Goodyear Klingtite is due to the same conditions that brought about such a wide use of this belt by threshermen this year. Like the threshermen, they realize that old style belts slip too much, stretch too much, have to be run too tight, cause too much trouble and waste too much time making repairs.

Modern high speed machinery needs modern high speed belts. Goodyear Klingtite Belts are modern highspeed belts—unstitched. They are flexible and hug small pulleys closely. They do not require hours of breaking in, but run sliplessly from the first minute that they are put to service.

Their friction surface grips the pulley face, even when the belt is very loose. Ross Diehl, near Botsford, Kansas, reports that he has run his Klingtite so loose that six feet of it touched the ground and yet there was no slip.

The threshing outfit of Mr. Askins, from near Winfield, Kansas, reports that because Klingtite runs sliplessly, even when very loose, it was much easier to set up his outfit—and he doesn't have to set it up so often. Threshing outfits everywhere have found also that Goodyear Klingtite is permanently water-proof, and stays water-proof without any painting or dressing.

Because of this water-proof quality, Goodyear Klingtite does not shrink when exposed to rain, dew, or snow. It does not stretch because of heat or dryness.

You can buy Goodyear Klingtite Belts from the Goodyear Farm Belt Service Station Dealers. They buy direct from the factory, so that they can sell you this high speed, supple, friction surface belt for just about the same price as that charged for ordinary belts. They have both endless and other belts in stock and can sell you any length in all standard widths. If you want more information about Goodyear Klingtite, either for feed grinding and other all 'round uses—or for threshing and other heavy duty—ask for the Goodyear Farm Encyclopedia. All Farm Belt Service Stations have it, and you can also get copies direct from Akron.

THE HOUSE WHERE THE WINDOWS ARE ALWAYS LIGHTED

EVERY one of us knows this house.

It stands like a landmark in every town. It is always pointed out to strangers. Every man, woman and child in the community knows the way to it.

The family who live here are not always the richest nor the oldest the town can boast; but they are the family the town is proudest of.

In times of danger, of difficulty or sudden need, the lights here are always shining.

When a panic came and the savings of hundreds of working people were threatened—it was the man in this house who went to the president of the bank and offered to stand by to the limit of his personal fortune. When an epidemic swept the town—the women in this family were foremost in giving aid. Their sons were the town's first volunteers in the Great War.

For the men and women, the sons and daughters who come from this house are born and bred to a tradition of service. Rich in integrity—steadfast to obligation—they have an influence and standing that money alone cannot buy.

The community is poor that cannot point to such houses, such families in their midst, these are the people who make the backbone of American life; who give standards, ideals, new impulses to the people among whom they live.

It is to families like these that the editorial policy of the Christian Herald is directed.

In their homes the Christian Herald is more than a magazine—it is a family institution.

Because it reaches the most vital thing in their personal life. Because it interprets, as no other magazine in America today, the religious ideals of the nation—practical Christianity, as it is influencing industry, politics, education, community and national affairs.

Because it represents the broadest, most progressive elements in the Church.

Three hundred thousand American families rely upon the Christian Herald as a guide in daily conduct, a stimulating influence upon public thought—a constructive force in every American community.

EVANGELIZING THE NEW REPUBLIC

By Rev. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

A Mission school group with Dr. and Mrs. Clark in Monastir, Serbia

EARLY in January Rev. Francis E. Clark, D.D., president of the World's Christian Endeavor Union, expects to go to Europe with Mrs. Clark, for the sake of studying the situation and of doing what he can for evangelical religion and the reconstruction of the Christian Endeavor movement, in the countries that have suffered from the world war.

He will spend some time in France, but will especially visit and try to help the struggling evangelical Christians of the new republics of Jugoslavia, Czechoslovakia and Poland.

He will write a series of fully illustrated articles about the present conditions in these war-devastated countries, and will act as the special representative and correspondent of the Christian Herald and as the almoner of the gifts of the Christian Herald readers for the physical relief and spiritual help of the peoples of the new Slavic republics.

MANY new republics have been carved out of the old empires by the World War. Three of the most promising and important of these are Jugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, and Poland. Jugoslavia embraces the kingdom of Serbia, what was formerly Croatia, Bosnia, Herzegovina, Slavonia, and some other sections of old Hungary. Eventually Montenegro will be included. Czechoslovakia embraces chiefly the progressive, well-educated peoples of Bohemia and Moravia, formerly a part of the Austrian Empire. Poland consists of that old kingdom which had been conquered and sliced up between Russia, Germany and Austria.

In these republics are more than fifty millions of people of the Slavic races. These peoples are among the most brainy, liberty-loving and enterprising in Europe, though their aspirations have long been crushed by despotic powers. All have had an interesting and at times a glorious history. They have given to the world some of her greatest statesmen, poets, novelists musicians and scientists. They have a splendid future before them. It remains for Christian people, especially for American Christians, to say whether or not this future shall be brightened and blessed by evangelical Christianity. Today comes our opportunity to sow in these lands, now wide open to the Gospel, the seeds of an intelligent Christianity which shall bear abundant fruit in the centuries to come.

LARGE sections of these nations have been devastated by the war. Over parts of Poland and Serbia opposing armies have marched to victory and retreated in defeat, over and over again, but, whether in victory or defeat, have left behind them bloody trails. Slaughtered men, homesteads reduced to ashes, crops ruined, starving and half-naked widows and orphans, have been left in the wake of these armies. Some sections indeed have been ravaged three and four times in less than as many years.

But now, freedom has been attained. Hope has revived. The dream of centuries is beginning to be realized. A new day is dawning, for these virile, patient, long-oppressed people.

Will the readers of the Christian Herald help to leaven these lands with the pure religion of Jesus Christ? Here is an opportunity such as they have never had before. At the very beginning of the life of the republics, republics seething with the new ambitions and the new hopes of a noble people, they can cast into the meal the yeast of the Gospel that will leaven the lump.

HOW can this be done? Not chiefly through missionaries sent from evangelical countries, but by the natives of these new republics themselves. There are men already on the field who will do this work if we will help them. Will you, my reader, be a copartner with these men and with God in this splendid task?

Let me tell you about one of these men. His name is Samuel Schumacher. At the beginning of the war he lived in Agram, Croatia, where he was a teacher in a Lutheran school. He was one of the most consecrated and unselfish men I ever saw. Mrs. Clark and I visited him in 1912, and were greatly impressed with his ability and his devotion to the Master. For years he spent all his summer vacations in forming little evangelical centers in the Balkan States—planned after the manner of Christian Endeavor societies. He traveled over Serbia and Slavonia and Rumania and Croati even across the black mountains of Mon gro, and everywhere he established these centers of evangelical influence.

In the early summer of 1914, when his sc closed, he started on another of these jour and had unusual success. He wrote me f Constanzia in Rumania on the Black Sea, God was blessing his labors as never before. had established many little groups of beli and workers.

THEN, in August, broke out the terrible and all Slavic countries were in the center of the maelstrom. The next letter almost the last one that could come throug America for more than four years, told me he had been called to the colors of the Aust Emperor. He had to go, of course, "but, he wrote, "it is a bitter thing that now I n go to fight against the very people to who have been carrying the message of the Pr of Peace." He added, "If I never come is there not some Christian instituti America where my fatherless childre be placed, where they may learn to and serve the Master!"

But he did go back, invalided home, cause of threatened tuberculosis. Thro the awful years of the war, of which Slavic countries knew all the horrors, managed to support his family. A many months came peace, and comm cation was reopened with America more. At once came a letter from my fr Schumacher, saying that he had not lived through these terrible months, had become an ordained minister, and pastor of a new, but vigorous chur Semlin, a beautiful city very near Belg the capital of the new republic. He has a work in Belgrade, and goes twice a week for services. Moreover, h charge of evangelical work in the who public of S. H. S. (Jugoslavia). He already established more little Chri Endeavor centers, has held one of t trict conventions, and is planning national convention in a few week

VERY soon after this article is published I expect to cross the ocea what help I can render to this noble Christian man in his work i slavia, and to others like him, in Czechoslovakia and Poland. I expect my own expenses and will contribute what I can to the work.

In some parts of these republics there is great destitution, not so much food, though that is scarce, but lack of clothes and other necessaries o Some of your money will be for needy cases of this sort. readers of the Christian Her have always been ready to o their purses to feed the hun clothe the naked, and care for orphan. They will, I am vinced, be equally ready to in these ways these peoples are struggling out of the gr and distress of war into the of freedom and self-governm out of their awful experienc the most awful of wars.

It will be a further stim their generosity, I am con that their money will also be to establish Christian cente over Jugoslavia, and if po in the other republics, whic decades and perhaps for turies, will keep the Gospel aflame, and be the mean leading a multitude to th of Him who taketh away the of the world.

The second day when Dr. Siegmund-Schultze offered prayer etitioned the Father for the forgiveness of Ger- y and besought for blessings upon the nations, ially upon Belgium and France. e Hague was an appropriate place for such a ng. In 1898, at the instance of the late Nicholas ssia, the first Peace Conference was held at The e in the Huis ten Boch (the House in the Wood) arked the beginning of the International Court itration. Five years later Andrew Carnegie put disposal of the Dutch government the sum of a and a half dollars for the erection of a palace e the Court of Arbitration. Holland gave the site on the Scheveningen Road in The Hague and the nations of the world contributed to its erection by donations of building material, objects of art and other necessaries, which should bear the distinctive mark of national production in order to symbolize the joint will of the nations in adjusting their differences by arbitration rather than by war, as suggested by Baron d'Estournelles de Constant of France. Sweden presented the granite for the base; Norway, the granite for the approaches; Denmark, the fountain in the courtyard; Germany, the iron gates to the grounds; Belgium, the wrought iron doors with bronze for entrance to the building; Italy, the marble pillars of the great vestibule; France, a painting for the Hall of Justice; England, the stained glass windows for the same hall; Japan, the silk tapestries; Austria, the bronze and crystal candelabra in the vestibule; Turkey, handsome carpets; China, valuable vases; Russia, a large Jasper vase; and so with all the nations, America giving a group of statuary on the landing of the great staircase, and Argentina, a statue of Christ in bronze. Six hundred and twenty-seven cases have been tried there, from which there was no appeal, some involving as many as twelve nations. Since August 1, 1914, the Palace has ceased to do business and is opened only a few hours a day for sightseers!

THE PEACE PALACE AT THE HAGUE
" It has ceased to do business and is opened only a few hours a day for sightseers"

OUR conference was at Hotel Kasteel "Oud-Wassenaer," beautifully situated on the suburbs of The Hague in a richly wooded section of great trees and beautiful walks, perhaps reaching back to the days when, as the word Hague indicates, "the court's enclosure" covered all that section, and when Louis Bonaparte, then King of Holland, wearied of the jealousy of the Dutch town in keeping The Hague a village corporation, and consequently at that time "the largest village in Europe," conferred upon it the privileges of a town. It is now a city of nearly 300,000 people. At "Oud-Wassenaer" the Continua- tion the Edinburgh Conference met in the same assembly room where the International Committee held its sessions.

Since its organization the chairman of the International Committee has been Mr. J. Allen Baker, M.P., who died last year. Instead of electing a successor at this time it was thought best to have representatives from several nations to preside over the various sessions of the conference. These were: Dr. J. A. Cramer, of Holland; the Lord Bishop of Winchester, of England; Dr. Arthur J. Brown, of America; Dr. Friedrich A. Spiecker, of Germany, and Archbishop Nathan Söderblom, of Sweden. The secretaries were: Rt. Hon. Sir Willoughby H. Dickinson, of London; Dr. Siegmund-Schultze, of Berlin; M. Jacques Dumas, of Paris; Dr. Frederick Lynch, of New York; Prof. Knut B. Westman, of Upsala; and Prof. Eugène Choisy, of Geneva, with the first named acting in this meeting as recording secretary and interpreter. The sessions were in English, and for those who could not speak English the addresses in French and German were interpreted by Si rWilloughby, or some one whom he chose to call on.

MANY committees were appointed. These dealt with special questions, such as an ecumenical conference of the churches, plans to authorize the creating of national councils in every country and to interest the Roman Catholic, Orthodox churches, and other communions in the movement; seeking adjustment of the German missions problem; matters of labor; social conscience; recognition of the present underlying unity of Christians; petitioning the League of Nations' acceptance of every state that desires inclusion and accepts the covenant of the League. There was a protest against the exploitation of the backward races of the world and a plea for the cultural and religious rights of minorities and the guarantee of equality of races before the law, and freedom of religious belief, besides many other questions of similar import.

Many of these problems were both delicate and difficult. One in particular was the taking over of the German missionary work by the Allies in all the countries of the Allies. The International Committee affirmed that this was a grave obstacle to the development of international Christian fellowship and expressed its hope that at the earliest opportunity the way be opened for resumption of the activities of the German missionary societies and that their properties, which are now, according to the Peace Treaty, held by a board of trustees, may be handed back to the German societies as soon as political permission is given to the German missionaries to return to their work.

The report on the ecumenical congress of the churches was referred to the Church Federations of the various countries represented. They will proceed independently of the World Alliance.

There were numerous delegates of whom much could be said to make interesting paragraphs. One of the most outstanding figures was the Lord Bishop of Winchester, always courteous, and regarded as one of the ablest men in the Anglican episcopate; likewise the Archbishop of Upsala, democratic in manner and universal in fellowship. But the whole committee was a fine group, keenly interested, and feeling that the uncertainty of European affairs called for searching of one's own heart as the best road for the searching of the nation's life to help in these times of crises.

It was the sense of the conference that whatever Germany may have done, or whatever she now is, we as Christians must treat her magnanimously to the degree of helping her get upon her feet, for conquerors can afford to be magnanimous to the conquered.

There can be no permanent peace if political diplomacy and economic rivalry prevail between the nations. The basis of international friendship must be Christian. Jesus Christ is the hope of the world.

The Orphans of the Holy Land

By BERTHA SPAFFORD VESTER

Of the American Colony, Jerusalem

THE Christian Herald and its readers who had helped to found the Christian Herald Orphanage in the Holy Land were overjoyed to learn through the American Colony that the orphanage work had been graciously preserved throughout the years of war, and that the industrial work, the income from which was used to help in orphan support, had been equally fortunate.

Patrons are now needed for the orphanage. If a few hundred readers of the Christian Herald, sharing the love the Lord's people have always felt toward Jerusalem, would become Annual Patrons of the orphanage, giving what they could toward its support, they would find in such a relationship a real pleasure.

YOUR timely check for $3,000 arrived safely. I hasten to notify you of its arrival, and to thank your readers heartily for their support. We had about $25 left in the bank when it arrived, so you can imagine how very welcome it was.

Our associates in the American Colony agree that a very good name for the Orphanage would be "The Christian Herald Orphanage in the Holy Land, under the auspices of The American Colony." We will have a sign made at once and hung over the entrance.

Not long ago I had the pleasure of taking General Sir Arthur and Lady Money to our Industrial School and Orphanage. General Money was Chief Administrator of O. E. T. A. South (Occupied Enemy Territory Administration) at that time. They were both very much interested in the work, and promised us their help and support. During his visit at the orphanage, I asked him further about the name, and he at that time gave us permission to use the name "Christian Herald Orphanage," provided the children were all Christian. At present we have about half Mohammedan and half Christian children with us. General Money said there could be no objection brought if Mohammedans chose to bring their children to the Christian Herald Orphanage. They would have to take the consequences. This statement will prove to you, as it did to us, a great relief.

A front view of the Christian Herald Orphanage in the Holy Land

"Commencement Day" at the Orphanage sounds grand, but it simply meant stopping school for two months. Although the children had been with us only for a few months, they had learnt some pretty drills, recitations and songs in both English and Arabic. Some of the wives of British officers were among the audience. They enjoyed the performance very much. The children showed the benefit of even a short period under Christian influence.

The doorway to the Industrial School

They are such a happy little family, and so much improved in health! They make a splendid showing as they walk out with their smiling, healthy faces. We are overwhelmed with applications for admission.

We are expecting to take in about eight more. These eight are very urgent cases. I cannot tell you the joy it is to us to be able to take these little ones into the Home, where they will be brought under the right influence and kind treatment. Poverty has made people hard; and suffering among children caused by nerve-racked, underfed relations is hard to witness.

Our Industrial School is a most necessary charity. We are convinced every day of the importance of providing work for the people in Jerusalem. We agree with our own good President Wilson that every one should do his utmost to save the war orphans if we expect the world to be better. They are to be the future citizens, and it behooves each one to do his utmost to make better men and women out of them than they would have been even in normal conditions in their own homes. However, there is something to be done for war widows and girls who have no male bread-winner. Many of these are tempted to follow evil paths, and get means of support by doubtful ways, simply because no employment can be obtained. There are no factories here, no industries to speak of, and there is nothing a woman or girl can do to support herself.

The lace of the country and embroideries are something in our hand to use. We ought to be able to find a market for this work. I understand that duty on such articles entering the United States is great; it is also a fact that handmade lace is imported into the United States, and that people have made a good business out of it. We had for a time a good market for our wares in Jerusalem. The British officers and Tommies bought freely of the pretty things and sent them home as presents. But the number of troops is so reduced in the city at present that we have now a collection of articles ready for sale. The work is exquisite and every one who sees it is charmed with it.

Materials are so very expensive that I think that when shipping becomes normal it would be advisable to send out from America all that we will need for the clothing of the orphans—towels, sheets and ticking for mattresses, sweaters, stockings and shoes and sandals for the summer. We had hoped to let them go barefooted in the summer, but several experiences with scorpion stings have caused us to change our minds

"WHAT SHALL WE DO

Some Answers to the Question of "W. A.," Whose Church Is Doing Nothing for the Community

A Church That Is Doing Nothing

(Reprinted from the Christian Herald of November 8)

WILL you consent to look over a few descriptive facts stated very briefly? I am a countryman, called farmer, and know that some people have no use for any such until it is time to share the products. The old homestead where I live joins on to a little settlement started before the days of great highways and air travel, so one time had a store and postoffice of its own. I can show you the door where the stage-coach stopped a hundred years ago, but wish the residence were more modern when the old brick oven won't stay latched in my house. Over on the green stand the old church and school house. State care has helped the school, but of the church—What shall I say?

Many of you know that there are thousands of churches all over the land with much such surroundings, that are kept in repair and have a pastor for a couple of hours on Sunday, who has to come from some neighboring church and hold an afternoon service or who lives in town and who because of advanced years or infirmities cannot take up the whole care of a church society; must preach and run for the train.

Now I want to know what to do for a community of this kind?

When a former generation maintained a church every effort was used to do big things. Nearly every family attended service, the children were all taken along, and sat quiet in the (possibly hard-backed) seats; prayer meetings were always held; Sunday schools and young people's societies came along, doing wonders—are doing wonders yet, in some places.

First, Call the Faithful to Prayer

FOR the "church that is doing nothing," I would say, first call a meeting of the few faithful ones and hold a prayer service. Tell the Lord all about it. Of course he knows, but he likes to have his children ask for what their hearts desire. Be sure and sing "The Lord Is Able to Do Great Things" and that other hymn "Wondrous Things the Lord Can Do by Just a Little Help from You."

Get some good speaker and call the people together to help build up the house of the Lord. Don't get discouraged if you don't see as many as you expected the first week or two, but keep on doing your best. Get some one to lead the singing, and have plenty of it. Advertise your meetings weeks ahead. When you get the people interested, tell them, "This Is God's House. Who will help build it up—your church and mine?"

Give a pleasant welcome to those that come. Show them that you are glad to see them. Get some sincere Christian woman to call on the people. Gather the children into a Sunday school. Don't be afraid to spend some money for the Lord. It will pay large dividends.

Get some help from outside until you get a good start. It is not necessary to bring the movies into the church, but we must do something to get folks interested first, and then hold them with the help of the Heavenly Father. He says, "Certainly, I will be with thee. Ask and ye shall receive."

In every place there are those who will be very glad to help if they are asked. So have a "get together" supper and talk things over and see what can be done. Don't have long prosy sermons, but lots of good singing, and let all join in. Get some good speakers, give the ladies a chance to help. Get some good music. Have a stereopticon show once a month of Bible pictures and advertise your meetings. Make them worth-while! MRS. C. H. T.

Real Work, Real Faith, Real Love

A CHURCH had been living at "a poor dying rate," for sixteen years. They did nothing. Did not try; had no vision, no real devotion; thought only of themselves, and the help they could get from "outside." There was not life enough to grow, scarcely to breathe! There were evidences enough of stolid indifference. The very fact of their inertia was attractive.

We took hold with zest. No salary was promised from any quarter. They were in debt up to their eyes, for they did not begin to pay running expenses. They had really never trustfully tried to do anything.

Finally we led them as far as possible to prayer meeting and to prayer. There must be no long-drawn, whining prayers. There must be no complaining testimonies." There must be hope, faith, cheerfulness.

Then they were led to pledge $400 for the support of the work. It fairly took their breath. That was a vast sum to pay for the Gospel that had been so freely given in the past! An Aid Society was organized, and set to work caring for the needy. There was to be no more church gambling; no more raffles.

The ladies were sent out, two and two, to call at every house in the ward of five thousand people. They were to offer a helping hand, to invite to the house of worship.

Then there was house cleaning. Back debts must be paid. Christian people must be honest. We tried to set an example in working and giving. Built the cement walks ourselves, with the help of one man. Cost us $135 the first year to sustain and stimulate the workers, for they did awake and began to work.

The old building was soon filled to capacity. Others heard of the real awakening, and came to study the change. Then a new church was suggested. "What? A new church? That is beyond our possibilities."

"It is needed, and it must be built."

We gave the proceeds from the sale of our horse and buggy to start the enterprise. It was pushed to [illegible]ous completion. Old people seemed to grow [illegible]. Many were won to Christ. The work goes a de[illegible] on yet, and we started more than twenty-[illegible]s ago.

[illegible] that is needed to wake a church up is more real [illegible]ith, more real work, more real love, more of the spirit of the Master, more "stick-to-it-iveness" and more looking on the bright side of things. Complaining, whining, sitting still—these will never rouse and set a church on fire, like a light on a hill!

Revival and a New Church

OUR community needs a good revivalist. There are plenty of courageous young evangelists who can be secured. The right sort of man with the "pep" can put the revival over and, furthermore, he can cause the tight-wads to loosen up, in order that the revival may be a financial success as well as a spiritual one.

After the evangelistic services, which ought to continue for several weeks, a half dozen of the best business men in the community should compact together and put up the money for building a new church. The ladies might hold bazars to raise part of the money.

When the church is completed the community's religious prospects will be on a par with its educational prospects, since you say your school receives State aid. Then the thing for you to do will be to secure some live, young man who burns with zeal, as your pastor. Let him live right there among you, and pay him a respectable salary.

Some public speakers might be induced to appear at the school, but their themes should be civic pride and local betterment. A Community Club—or some other kind of club—might be wise. What you want to do is wake up the sleepy-heads, the morally lazy and the backsliding.

The new pastor should know how to build up a good Sunday school. He could enlist the help of the women in attracting the children, and if you can get the children to church at some special service in which the children appear, like a Children's Day program, you will find that the parents will soon fall into line.

Have a field secretary of the Home Missions Board visit you. Work; pray; and things will presently have a more promising hue. Do you believe it?

One Person Saw the Need

THE description of your home-place is like many others. It makes our hearts sad thinking of the days that are past; then the church, instead of movies and card-parties, was the center of activity.

Do the mothers and fathers realize the responsibility of rearing children now? I'm afraid many think of pleasures before duty to their Heavenly Father, and the result is a neglected church.

What to do? How to get hold of them?

Perhaps this true story of a country church will help answer. One person saw the need in the community, but felt helpless. He took it to God in earnest prayer; this was mentioned to a dear friend, who did likewise. You know what results where two or three are asking—Matt. 18–19. For a time it seemed as if card-parties and dancing flourished more than ever, but one day the pastor suggested they have some evangelist meetings. This began to stir things. A few said "yes," some said they did not care, others "no," and some made many excuses about expense, etc., but the two or three determined ones kept praying and planning.

Well, the meetings were announced, they were discussed on street corner and in grocery-store, the night came and a mere handful gathered. The next night about the same with a few more who came for curiosity (but let me say they went out with something else—a guilty conscience), but they came again and onlookers said, "If they go I'll go," and they did. All the time the evangelist was praying and working.

Finally the call came for the enlistment for the Master's work. Do we believe that with God all things are possible? We must. The result was wonderful. One sinner came so fast he rushed past the others. Men, women and children were enlisting in the battle of life.

Now, you ask, How about afterwards? Did they still make good? Yes, nearly all. A few fell back. Many a brother helped another, and a sister did little deeds which had not been thought of before.

Let me say, the greatest help in keeping them together was in their meetings of prayer and Bible-study—just a gathering of brothers and sisters, in winter around a warm stove, in summer by a study table, with their Bibles.

And many a little prayer was said by those who said at first they could not—like a child learning its letters, little by little until they could speak to the Father unafraid.

This may not be the answer you were expecting but "seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness," and the other things will take their places, in an individual or a community. B. B.

A Church Must Do or Die

REPLYING to the letter of "W. A." which appears in the Christian Herald of November 8, 1919, whose words are applicable to hundreds of churches in Christian America, when he speaks of a "church doing nothing for the community." Please allow me to state first this well-known fact, that a lack of faith in God is death to any church, and narrowness is the funeral of the same. Faith works, lives and revives. Narrowness falls into a small channel and there abides till life expires.

It is a sad mistake in minister or layman to confine the work of the church within the limits of its walls, or to measure its laboring capacity by the dimensions of a single tabernacle. The boundaries of church influences cover the whole vicinity of every individual member. Then the influence of every member should be so effective in their respective localities as to convince all that they are not only members of some ecclesiastical body, but also members of the invisible body.

Whether in business transactions, or in social life, or engagements of whatever nature, our fellowman should feel the tremendous weight of a Christian influence in all of our dealings and conversations. Thus lifting up him who said, "And I if I be lifted up from the earth will draw all men unto me."

Men may invent attractive schemes and draw a larger attendance temporarily; but alas! no other source can ever be discovered in the whole universe with drawing ability to compete with the diabolical forces of modern times; and "to save with fear pulling them out of the fire" I know no better method of getting people into the church and into the Kingdom than to lift up Jesus.

So I recommend this as a successful method by many infallible proofs through the ages. It proved a successful method in A.D. 33 at Jerusalem, when three thousand were added to the church in a single day. But I fear some have lost sight of the great work of the Gospel and the evangelization of the world and have narrowed the plan of salvation to their own creed. John the disciple fell into this error and met the disapproval of Jesus when he rebuked the man for doing good, because he followed not with them.

May we be lifted above sectarian lines, to some degree at least, and broaden our minds and hearts, and begin to exercise ourselves in the great harvest-field of the Lord.

Four lepers sitting by the gate of Samaria cried, "Why sit we here until we die?" They arose and resorted to the Syrian camp, their last and only hope, and by this effort saved themselves and the whole famishing city.

May we all realize that as a church we must do or die, and by seeking after God and presenting Him to others we may save ourselves and the dying millions who may otherwise suffer the woes of eternal perdition. J. M. S.

Preaching the Pure Word of God

A VERY pertinent question, the logical answer to which is: "Preach Jesus Christ and Him crucified." Ah! the wonderful, holding theme of Jesus. It grasps the attention, where long literary bursts of eloquence fail.

TO GET HOLD OF THEM?"

But with growing reports we must remember population also grows. Other fast moves are made in other directions besides the church.

Some churches favor using their auditorium as a lecture hall, a club house, or—but I don't know. It seems to me the church is a distinct place for worship. The tabernacle was not turned into a big picture show when the priests made a stop, even if it was a tedious journey; it was the "house of prayer."

Still, how shall we get hold of the people outside the church? The few inside do not live enough example to offset and overcome by good influence the waywardness of those outside. We are covered up with profanity and thoughtlessness; many who never hear God's name in church continually listen to its mention outside; many who attend church—even members!—mention Heaven, Hell and Damnation, in exclamation every hour of the day. Young men and young women, starting homes of their own, used to work in the church, but are now forgetting it; new life takes their attention and their children growing up possibly never even get to Sabbath School. All ages and classes among us have lost or are losing interest in the church.

What shall we do to get hold of them?

Our church, it can be said, is doing nothing for the community.

How may religious organization and zeal be revived in this and many like communities?

Tell us definitely of methods that have been successful.

How Religious Organization and Ze May Be Revived in this and Other Lik Communities

Now, please do not read into this an arraignment against the godly men who dedicate themselves and their lives to the service of Him who gave His life for a sin-cursed world. It is their methods, alone that I criticize. I look into the face of my beloved pastor as he earnestly pleads with men—for his Master and theirs, and a little secret wish comes into my heart—that he would not merely select a verse, a part of a verse, or even a word, and build thereon an ecclesiastical structure, entertaining, instructive and uplifting. We leave the church better men and better women than when we entered, but—with a little hint of disappointment too. A feeling as though the "cornerstone" had been omitted, or veiled.

In the Tennessee W. C. T. U. there is a tall, unobtrusive woman, unnoticed, who, but for the light on her face, where His seal is impressed, would scarcely be noticed in a crowd. She selects a text, and then lets God's word preach the sermon! If it does take more time to prepare such a sermon would not the results overbalance the extra work? And then—the more we study God's word with this end in view, the easier it would become. This woman fills a house wherever she goes and holds it too!

Take as another example, Christian Science. In their churches there is never a sermon. They sing beautiful songs, alternating with the reading from their book and from God's Book such passages as seem to agree with their topic—allowing the whole audience to have a part in their services by relating their experiences of healing. The attention is claimed and fixed for the short, very short time, they are kept, and the next Sunday they come again.

Most people prefer to take their naps at home instead of in stiff pews and to the drone of long, prosy sermons.

Let our churches go back to the old Apostolic preaching where (without a single exception) the word of God unadorned by literary eloquence is brought to the people if they desire to hear once more the heart-cry, "Men and brethren, what must I do to be saved?" Mrs. L. H. W.

At Least One Christian Worker

THE letter of "A. W." is not wholly clear as to several things we should know, but we assume that his church is the only church, in some tiny, placid, sleepy settlement, located on some railroad, with at least one daily mail, with adequate telephone service, with a job printing office in easy reach, and with the average number of young folks who have pianos or organs in their homes.

Assuming the above to be about the environments of "W. A.'s" church, we can confidently say that it is EASY to arouse religious zeal and to put pep into the church life of his community.

It is difficult to be specific as to methods unless we have specific knowledge of his particular community, but in general, in any community, to arouse the sleepy religious life, we MUST have

1. At least ONE (as many more as possible) real Christian worker, consecrated, earnest, enthusiastic and, preferably, well known in the community.
2. A small sum of cash—instantly available, for publicity work. Ten dollars will do—but $100 is better.
3. The church, as a church, must DO something for the community. No church, big or little, will ever have its fullest measure of individual success until it becomes a lively factor in the SOCIAL and ECONOMIC life of the community in which it is situated.

As to methods, let me cite an instance or two: During the war our pastor was in Y. M. C. A. war work and for a time we had no services. Our prayer meetings dwindled to almost nothing—six or eight persons. One night, in absence of any other available, the writer was appointed leader for the next week's meeting. I had never led a prayer meeting in my life, but I HAD written some advertising. So I wrote a letter advertising my prayer meeting, had it nicely printed, and mailed to members and non-members. It cost me about five dollars, all told. At the prayer meeting that week there were more than sixty persons present. "W. A." can do exactly the same thing, and the interest will stay up if he works, and thinks.

Another instance: A country church four miles out, not in a "settlement," but on a main road, with members living from one-half mile to six miles away, held an old-fashioned revival. Several new members were added, and it is now doing well.

There are dozens of things that might be done in "W. A.'s" community. The M. E. Church (so press reports say) has officially endorsed picture films of religious character for church work. That might not suit "W. A." Personally I think it a splendid plan.

Sociables, class contests, lectures, lyceum numbers, musicals, a church play, stereopticon illustrated sermons, quartet and chorus choirs, community singing, plenty of things can be arranged to get the crowd, and after they are in the church it is vital that they are given something worth while. If "W. A." has an "old fogy" or an "old maid" for a pastor, the first and best thing to do would be to eliminate that feature, and get a live wire.

If "W. A." cares to take it up with me, and give me the specific information that I will ask for, I will be glad to give him the best aid in my power. R. A.

Make the Church the Center of Community Life

HOW religious organization and zeal may be revived in Churchville, N. Y., and like communities, is a question which has become worldwide and which has puzzled the brains of a great many people, but which can be answered, as has already been proved in so many cases.

Perhaps the name of the place in which "W. A." lives will suggest one of the causes why interest is lagging in his community as well as in other communities. Churchville may mean a village of churches where we ought to have only one—a community church. Such a project is possible where people of the same community meet together in common interest to develop community and religious life. Let us forget our differences and realize that we are more alike than we are different.

Here is a plausible answer to his question with definite steps: The first step to take is to rally and interest a community into a unit in thought, plans and action. This will be the means of concentration in starting from a center as a nucleus. Let that center be the Church, or the place of worship. The whole community may come together to erect a building, commodious and modern, to suit the needs of the people as a place of worship. In this edifice, which will be dedicated, are conducted services to build up and strengthen the religious character—the heart. The Sunday School, prayer meeting, missionary societies, men's Bible class work, Young People's societies, and interests of such nature will be observed in rooms built on one floor of this edifice. Morning and evening worship, revival effort, religious rallies, Bible lecture courses, etc., will be conducted in the place called "The House of Prayer."

Nearby is another building erected as a library for all the people of the community, both young and old, who gather here at any time to read and study. In this library will be found books that uplift, both religious and secular. Also in this part of the plant will be finished rooms where classes on social problems, community life, and common interests, will be formed.

Now for the third building. Let us call it the Social Building. In it the social life of the community will be developed. Build it suitable for the needs of the community. In it have the lobby or reading room, the gymnasium for all kinds of athletics, public auditorium where exercises may be held; the school may use it, the community may use it, and the Church may use it. Plays and public programs will attrac the whole community to meet there.

These are some of the answers which can be given to "W. A." of Churchville or to others who are interested, and which have proved successful in othe places. Make the Church the center of the community life and success is bound to follow. Let the bes people take the lead to guide the thought and plan of the community.

In this center the community can come together t discuss better roads, better sanitation, better school better streets and sidewalks, and a better communit life emanating from the homes which will be bett when a community comes together to develop th Kingdom of God, mentally, socially, physically, an religiously, and to emphasize the important life i Christ, because it is said of Him, "And Jesus increased in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God an man"—increasing mentally, physically, spirituall and socially. Boost the Church and Pray for It

I READ the article under the above title "W. A." with great interest. There are, doubt, thousands of churches throughout country in just such a situation as was described.

As to what to do for a community for which church is "doing nothing," please permit a few sugge tions. In the first place, allow me to state that o of the greatest problems connected with church wo today is getting people to attend the church; an attend regularly. This problem solved, there wou be no question as to what the church is doing for community.

Now, as to how people may be drawn to chur First, a series of concerts or some kind of a celebrati could be held for several nights; and, everybody the community who can sing, play, or speak should asked to appear on the program. As many fa ilies as possible should be represented on the p gram. This would draw people to the chur from every home; and, by and by many would b come interested in the church. This plan has b tried with great results.

Second, advertise the church by newspaper "ad by circulating dodgers, by personal letters, and abo all, by church members speaking favorably of church. Sometimes members of the church unint tionally hurt the church by complaining about poor attendance, the dull service, etc. If people c away from the theatre speaking disparagingly of show, it would not at all encourage others to go th The same is the case with the church. Boost church! Let each member week after week spea the interesting service last Sunday—the good mus the excellent sermon—the splendid congregatio And, people would come for the sake of curiosit you can get them to attend, they will become ested and be benefited.

And, Third, the righteous few (for there are some righteous in every community) should p the community. We say again, the church nothing for the community, unless the people community attend the church and are interested i work of the church. When all efforts have been hausted to interest people and get them to chu without the desired results, special prayer should resorted to. When one gets to the "What can done?" or "What shall I do?" in life, there is he should go to God in prayer. I prayed for th turn of a man who had deserted his family an living a wayward life, and he returned. I praye the safe return of a soldier from the world war, an returned. I prayed for the success of a rally w was held in our own church recently, and it was greatest success in the history of the church.

What can be done for a community which church is not reaching and helping? Pray fo "The effectual, fervent prayer of a righteous availeth much." (James 5 : 16.) Wm.

A Serial Story in Seven Instalments

By

GRACE LIVINGSTON HILL (MRS. LUTZ)

LAST INSTALMENT—CHAPTER XIII

HERBERT HUTTON lifted his head and watched Abijah Gage slouch into the room. He measured him cunningly and remained silent while Abijah opened up. There had been many other applicants for that reward that day, with stories cunningly woven, and facts, substantiated by witnesses, in one case a whole family brought along to swear to the fabrication; but as yet Herbert had not found a promising clue to his missing bride, and the time was going by. In a few days it would be too late, and his undisciplined spirit raged within him. It was not only his bride he wanted, it was her fortune, which was worth any trouble he might take; and every day, every hour, every minute now, it was slipping, slipping, slipping from his eager grasp.

Abijah was a little overawed in the presence of this insolent man of the world, but he felt he had, for almost the first time in his life, Truth on his side, and he was strong in the power of it. With a cunning equal to the one that matched him he dealt out his information bit by bit, giving only enough at a time to make his victim sure it was the real thing this time; and then he halted stubbornly and would say no more until that five thousand dollars was signed and sealed over to him. They had a long argument, but in the end Bi won, and was given certain documents which he was satisfied would stand in court. A little later the telephone in Reyburn's office rang sharply, and when Jimmie Ryan responded a voice that he had never heard before asked for Mr. Warren Reyburn.

"He's out of town," Jimmie replied.

"How soon will he be back?" The voice was like a snarl.

"I'm not quite sure. He's called to Boston on business," swelled Jimmie loyally.

An oath ripped over the wire, and Jimmie raged within, and quailed. Was his idol then losing a great case?

"He might be back in a few hours," insinuated Jimmie. "Who shall I say called up if he should have [illegible] over long distance?"

"You needn't say anybody! I'll call up again," growled the voice, and the man hung up.

Jimmie sat for a long time in blissful reverie. "He's getting there!" he whispered to himself. "We'll get the big cases yet, and I can keep my first [illegible]. I must see Jane tonight and tell her."

Meanwhile, back at Tinsdale improvements had been going on at the Carsons. Bob, always handy with tools, had been putting in a tank over the bathroom. They had one at the house on the hill, only it [illegible] by a windmill. Bob had a friend who was a plumber's son, and from him had obtained some [illegible] of second-hand water-pipe and an old faucet. [illegible] conceived the idea of a tank on the roof, and [illegible] plan had been only a rainwater tank, but [illegible] as his vision widened he included a force [illegible] in the outfit of desires. He hung around the [illegible]er's until they unearthed an old force pump that [illegible] for a few days' assistance the plum[illegible] acquired it, together with [illegible] hour help to put it into operation. The next [illegible] was a tank, which seemed at first to represent [illegible]possible; but the grocer at last offered a sug[illegible] in the shape of several large empty hogsheads [illegible] he readily accepted at the price of four Satur[illegible]' work in the store. [illegible] Bob's extra time was put into these improvements, and he was as excited every night when it grew [illegible] and he was forced to come to supper because he [illegible]ldn't see any longer to work, as if he had been [illegible] an airship.

[illegible] the day the hogsheads were marshaled and connected and the force pump sent its first stream into [illegible] was a great occasion. The family assembled in [illegible] yard, with Elise Hathaway, who had been allowed [illegible] come over for a few minutes with Betty Hope. [illegible] and his plumber friend pumped, and Emily [illegible]ed to the attic window, which overlooked the [illegible] of hogsheads, ranged so that the water would [illegible] from one to the other, and acted as pilot [illegible] the new enterprise. As the first stream from the [illegible] pump, which Bob had lavishly painted red, crept [illegible] up the pipes and began to wet the bottom of [illegible] first and highest hogshead Emily gave a little [illegible] of delight and shouted "It's come! It's come! [illegible]ater's come!" and the family below fairly held [illegible] breath with the wonder of it. Not that such a thing could be, but that their own freckled, grinning Bob should have been able to achieve it.

There was an elaborate system of tin conductors which conveyed the waste water from the bathtub out through a hole in the wall of the little laundry bathroom, and distributed it along the garden beds wherever its controller desired to irrigate. Thus the system became practical as well as a luxury. There was also an arrangement of gutter pipes for carrying off any surplus water from the hogsheads, so saving the Carson house from possible inundation at any time of heavy storms.

After the plumbing was finished Bob painted the laundry neatly inside with beautiful white paint and robin's-egg blue for the ceiling, and Betty told him it almost made one think of going swimming in the ocean. Next he began to talk about a shower bath. Betty told him what one was like and he began to spend more days down at the plumber's asking questions and picking up odd bits of pipe, making measurements, and doing queer things to an old colander for experiment's sake. The day that Warren Reyburn came for the first time Bob had the shower part finished and ready to erect, and the next day saw it complete with a rod for the rubber curtain that Betty had promised to make for him. He and she were planning how they would make further improvements on the house before Jane and Nellie should come home for their summer vacation week. Betty had thoroughly entered into the life of the little household now, and was a part of it. She saved her own small wages, and grudged all she had to spend for necessary clothes, that she might contribute further to the comfort and beauty of the general home.

After Warren Reyburn's visit the last barrier between Betty and Ma seemed to be broken down. As soon as she had closed the door she flew into the other room and flung her arms around Ma's neck, bursting into soft weeping on her motherly shoulder. Ma had done a rapid turning act when she heard her coming, for in truth she had been peeping behind the green window-shade to watch the handsome stranger go down the street, but she would have dropped the iron on her foot and pretended to be picking it up rather than let Betty suspect her interest in Betty's visitor.

"Oh, mother," she murmured in Mrs. Carson's willing ear, "I have been so frightened—"

"I know, dearie!" soothed the mother, quite as if she had been her own. "I know!"

"But he was very kind," she said lifting her head with an April effect of tears. "He's going to try to fix things for me so that I don't need ever to be afraid of any one making trouble for me any more. You see, I sort of ran away. There was somebody I was afraid of who troubled me a great deal."

"Yes, dearie, I thought as much," said Ma. "Jane kind of gave me to understand there was something like that. I'm real glad there's somebody goin' to look into your affairs an' fix things right for you. I knew you was restless an' worried. Now it'll get all straightened out. He's got a nice face. I trusted him first off. He's a church member, an' that's somethin'. They ain't all spiritual, but they're mostly clean an' just an' kindly, when they're anythin' at all but just plain hypocrites, which, thank the Lord, there ain't so many of as some would have us believe. Now wash your face, dearie, an' run back to your place so you can come home early, for we're goin' to have the old hen with dumplin's for supper to celebrate."

That was one charming thing about that household: they celebrated every blessed little trifle that came into their lives, so that living with them was like a procession of beautiful thanksgivings.

It was while Betty was eating the gala "hen," delicious in its festive gravy and dumplings, that she looked off across the little dining-room to the dark window with its twinkling village lights in the distance and thought of the stranger. A dark fear flashed across her sweet face and sparkled in the depths of her eyes for just an instant. Was it perhaps the distant bay of the hounds on her trail, coming nearer every moment? Then she remembered the heavenly Father and her new-found faith, and turned back to the cheery little room and the children's pleasant clatter, resolved to forget the fear and to trust all to Him who cared for her. Perhaps he had sent the pleasant stranger, andthe thought brought a quiet little smile to settle about her lips. She laughed with Bob and Emily at how they had got wet with a sudden unexpected shower from the new bath while they were arranging the curtain on the rod. And Emily had turned the faucet on without knowing it. The patient-eyed mother watched them all and was satisfied.

How good it is that we cannot hear all the noises of the earth at the same time, nor know of every danger that lurks near as we are passing by! We grumble a great deal that God doesn't send us as much as we think he might, but we give scarce a thought to the many perils, lying close as our very breath, of which we never dream.

At that moment, as they sat quietly eating their happy meal, a deadly particular peril was headed straight for Tinsdale.

Abijah Gage and Herbert Hutton boarded the evening train for Tinsdale together and entered the sleeper. Abijah shuffled behind, carrying the bags, a most extraordinary and humiliating position for him. He had never been known to carry anything, not even himself, if he could help it, since the day his mother died and ceased to force him to carry in wood and water for her at the end of a hickory switch. He glanced uneasily round with a slight cackle of dismay as he arrived in the unaccustomed plush surroundings and tried to find some place to dump his load. But the well-groomed Herbert strode down the long aisle unnoticing and took possession of the section he had secured as if he owned the road.

"You can sit there!" he ordered Bi with a condescending motion, dropping into his own seat and opening a newspaper.

Bi sat down on the edge of the seat, and held on to the arm in a gingerly way as if he were afraid to trust himself to anything so different. He looked furtively up and down the car, eyed the porter, who ignored him contemptuously and finally came back and demanded his sleeper ticket with a lordliness that Bi did not feel he could take from a negro. But somehow the ticket got tangled in his pocket, and Bi had a hard time finding it, which deepened his indignation at the porter.

"I ain't takin' no sass from no one. My seat's paid for all right," he said distinctly for the enlightenment of the other passengers, and Herbert Hutton reached out a discreet arm and dropped something in the porter's hand which sent him on his way and left Bi snorting audibly after him.

"You'd better shut up!" growled the dictator to Bi. "We don't want to be conspicuous, you know. If you can't hold your tongue and act as if you had ever traveled before, I'll get off this train at the next station and you can whistle for your reward. Do you understand?"

Bi dropped his toothless lower jaw a trifle and his little eyes grew narrow. This was no way to manage affable Bi. He loved a good visit, and he had counted on one all the way to Tinsdale. He had no idea of sitting silent and looking at that well-tailored back.

"I understand," he drawled, "an' I'll be gormed ef I'll agree. I ain't told you yet where we get off, an' I don't have to ef I don't wanta. Ef you can't treat me like a gen'l'man you know where you can get off, an' I ain't havin' to state it."

Herbert Hutton drew his arrogant brows in a frown of annoyance, and whirled around to placate his guide:

"Now see here, you old popinjay, what's got into you?"

"No, sir, I ain't nobody's papa," babbled Bi, seeing he had scored a point. "I have enough to do to support myself without any family."

"That's all right, have it your own way, only shut up or we'll have somebody listening. Have a cigar. Take two. But you can't smoke 'em in here, you'll have to go to the smoking-room. Wait! I'll see if we can get the drawing-room."

The porter appeared and the change was effected, to the great disappointment of Bi, who kept continually poking his head out to get a glimpse of the fine ladies in the chairs. He would much have preferred staying out in the main car and getting acquainted with people. His cunning had departed with the need. He had put things in the hands of this surly companion, and now he meant to have a good time and something to tell the gang about when he got home.

About midnight the train drew into a station and Herbert Hutton roused himself and issued forth with Bi, whose cunning had returned again.

"That's him! That's the guy," he whispered excitedly as another train drew in and passengers began to hurry down the platform and across to the waiting sleeper.

"Are you sure?"

"Sartin!"

"You mean the one with the coat over his arm, and the two men behind?" He stopped short with an exclamation.

Bi looked up cunningly. Now what was up? He saw a thunder-cloud on the face of his companion.

With embellishments Herbert Hutton asked if Bi had ever seen the two tall gray-haired men who were walking with their prey.

Bi narrowed his eyes and denied any knowledge, but perceived there were more sides than two to the enigma. Now, what could he figure out of those two guys? Were there more rewards to be offered? If so, he was a candidate. He wondered what chance there was of getting away from H. H. and sauntering through the train. He found, however, a sudden willingness on the part of his companion to vanish and let him do the scout work for the rest of the night.

With a sense of being on a vacation and a chance at catching big fish Bi swung out through the train. Bumping down among the now curtained berths, adjusting his long form to the motion of the express, lurching to right and to left as they went round a curve, falling over an occasional pair of shoes and bringing down lofty reproaches from the sleepy porter, he penetrated to the day coaches and at last located his quarry.

They were sitting in a double seat, the younger man facing the two older ones, and had evidently been unable to get sleepers. Bi hung around the water-cooler at the far end of the car until he had laid out his plans; then he sauntered up to the seat behind which was vacant and dropped noiselessly into its depths, drawing his hat down well over his face, and apparently falling into instant slumber, with a fair sample of Tinsdale snoring brought in at moderate distances.

The conversation was earnest, in well-modulated voices, and hard to follow connectedly, for the men knew how to talk without seeming to the outside world to be saying anything intelligible. Occasionally a sentence would come out clear cut in an interval of the rhythm of the train, but for the most part Bi could make little or nothing of it.

"In all the years we've been trustees of that estate we haven't seen her but twice," said one of the older men; "once at her father's second marriage, and again at his funeral. Then we only saw her at a distance. Her stepmother said she was too grief-stricken to speak with any one, and it was only by the utmost effort she could be present at the service."

"She looked very frail and young," said the other old man; "and her hair—I remember her hair!"

Bi changed his position cautiously and tried to peer over the back of his seat, but the voices were crowded together now, and the younger man was talking earnestly. He could not catch a syllable. "Trustees!" That word stayed with him. "Estate" was another promising one, and the fact that her hair had been remembered. He nodded his old head sagaciously, and later when the three men settled back in their seats more comfortably with their eyes closed he slid back to the water-cooler and so on through the sleeper to the drawing-room.

Hutton was sleeping the sleep of the unjust, which means that he woke at the slightest breath, and Bi's breath was something to wake a heavier sleeper. So they sat and planned as the train rushed on through the night. Now and again Bi took a pilgrimage up to the day coach and back to report the three travelers still asleep.

About six o'clock in the morning the train slowed down, and finally came to a thrashing halt, waking the sleepers uncomfortably and making them conscious of crunching feet in the cinders outside, and consulting voices of trainmen busy with a hammer underneath the car somewhere. Then they drowsed off to sleep again and the voices and hammering blended comfortably into their dreams.

The passengers in the day coach roused, looked at their watches, stretched their cramped limbs, squinted one eye out to see if anything serious was the matter, and settled into a new position to sleep once more.

Bi, stretched for the nonce upon the long couch of the drawing-room while his superior occupied the more comfortable berth, roused to instant action, slipped out to the platform and took his bearings. He had lived in that part of the country all his life and he knew about where they ought to be by that time. Yes, there was the old saw mill down by Hague's Crossing, and the steeple over by the soft maple grove just beyond Fox Glove. It would not be a long walk, and they had a garage at Fox Glove!

He sauntered along the cinder path; discovered that the trouble with the engine was somewhat serious, requiring to wait for help, took a glimpse into the day coach ahead to assure himself that the three men were still safely asleep, and sauntered back to the drawing-room.

His entrance roused the sleeper, who was on the alert instantly.

"Say, we got a hot box an' a broken engyne!" Bi announced. "It'll take us some time. We ain't fur from Fox Glove. We could santer over an' git a car an' beat 'em to it!"

"We could?" said Hutton. "You sure? No chances, mind you!"

"Do it easy. Those guys are asleep. They won't get to the Junction 'fore ten o'clock, mebbe later, an' they can't possibly get to our place 'fore 'leven."

"Lead the way!" ordered Hutton, cramming himself into his coat and hat.

"Better slide down on the other side," whispered Bi as they reached the platform. "We kin go back round the train an' nobody'll notice."

As if they were only come out to see what was the matter they idled along the length of the train and around out of sight, slid down the bank, took a short cut across a meadow to a road, and were soon well on their way to Fox Glove in the early cool of the spring morning, a strangely mated couple bent on mischief.

Back on the cinder track the express waited, dreamily indifferent, with a flagman ahead and behind to guard its safety, and while men slept the enemy took wings and flew down the white morning road to Tinsdale, but no one ran ahead with a little red flag to the gray cottage where slept Betty, to warn her, though perchance an angel with a flaming sword stood invisibly to guard the way.

"MORNING"

A SERIAL BY C. COURTENAY SAVAGE

THE name of C. Courtenay Savage has come to have a very real place in the hearts of Christian Herald subscribers. They have read, with breathless interest, his stirring war novel, "That Girl from Orchard Street," and they have welcomed eagerly each one of his gripping short stories.

And so the readers of the Christian Herald will be glad indeed to know that Mr. Savage has written a new novel, entitled "Morning," for the Christian Herald. They will be glad with the gladness that one feels upon welcoming a friend who has come again to visit—bringing with him a trunkful of delightful surprises.

"Morning" is indeed a trunkful of surprises. It is a new sort of a story for the Christian Herald to publish—a story of the business world. It tells of the romance, the adventure and the intrigue that go on, perhaps, in many a dull stone office building. It tells of destinies that are moulded and fates that are settled from behind a mahogany desk or a typewriter.

Anne Burnette, the heroine of the story, is the wholesome, religious type of girl that Christian Herald subscribers best love to read about. She meets the temptations of a great city, yes—but her sweetness and strength of character carry her safely through those temptations. She is in danger, more than once. She knows fear. But she is brave and determined. And she wins!

"Morning" is a worth-while story—with a thrill in every paragraph and a heart-throb on every page. Christian Herald subscribers will enjoy it even more than they enjoyed "That Girl from Orchard Street," which is saying a great deal.

The altercation in the kitchen had reached white at. Hutton's suavity was fast disappearing behind loud angry tone. He had about sized up Ma and cided to use force.

It was a tense moment when Bob, his hasty arngements made, silently swung open the laundry or in full range of the uninvited guests and waited the psychological moment. Mrs. Carson had opped her knife and seized the smoking hot frying-n of bacon as a weapon. She was cool and collected, t one could see in her eyes the little devil of battle at sometimes sat in Bob's eyes as she swung the ying-pan back for a blow. Suddenly out flashed a ld steel eye, menacing, unanswerable, looking raight into her own.

At that instant, unannounced and unobserved, rough the laundry door lumbered a long ugly tin nductor pipe, and the deluge began. Straight into eyes of the would-be husband it gushed, battering shingly down on the cocked revolver, sending it mlessly to the floor, where it added to the confusion going off with a loud report, and sending the uffeur to the shelter of the parlor. Bob never w how near he came to killing some one by his y service, and Ma never had the heart to suggest Instead she acted promptly and secured the pon before the enemy had time to recover from shock.

ob, in the laundry, standing on a chair mounted a board across the bathtub, sturdily held his bling conductor pipe and aimed it straight to the k. Of course he knew that even a well-filled anx of hogsheads could not hold the enemy for- but he was counting on the fire company to e in time to save the day.

The hysterical little engine bell banged away, ding with the sound of the bell of the incoming at the station. Bi, with his mouth stretched and one foot holding him for the train while the urged toward the fire and excitement, vibrated platform, a wild figure of uncertainty. Where and Inclination both called, Cupidity still had per hand.

quick, then!" said Reyburn, climbing into y spring wagon that Bi indicated, the only view. The two trustees climbed stiffly and into the back seat as if they felt they were ir lives, and Bi lumbered rheumatically a driver's place and took up the lines. It rd, what the only living thing in Tinsdale that ke and keen to go to the fire was that g and Bi had to do quite a little urging with the ed to the old whip. It struck the uarely in the middle and sent him sprawl- oor. ed the conductor pipe in exhausted relief and flew to the scene of action. It had been fearful to be held from more active service so long. Emily, outside, could be seen dancing up and down excitedly and directing the procession, with frightened shouts, "In there! In the kitchen! Quick!" as the neighbors and townsmen crowded in and filled the little kitchen demanding to know where the fire was.

Mrs. Carson with dignity stepped forward to explain:

"There ain't any fire, friends, an' I don't know how you all come to get here, but I reckon the Lord sent you. You couldn't a-come at a better moment. We certainly was in some trouble, an' I'll be obliged to you all if you'll just fasten that man up so't he can't do any more harm. He came walkin' in here tryin' to take away a member of my family by force, an' he pointed this at me!"

She lifted the incriminating weapon high where they could all see.

Herbert Hutton, struggling to his feet in the crowd, began to understand that this was no place for him, and looked about for an exit, but none presented itself. The chauffeur had vanished and was trying to make out what had happened to his car.

Hutton, brought to bay, turned on the crowd like a snarling animal, although the effect was slightly spoiled by his drabbled appearance, and roared out insolently:

"The woman doesn't know what she's talking about, men; she's only frightened. I came here after my wife, and I intend to take her away with me! She escaped from an insane asylum some time ago, and we've been looking for her ever since. This woman is doing a very foolish and useless thing in resisting me, for the law can take hold of her, of course."

The crowd wavered and looked uncertainly at Mrs. Carson and at Betty cowering horrified behind her, and Hutton saw his advantage:

"Men," he went on, "there is one of your own townsmen who knows me and can vouch for me. A Mr. Gage. Abijah Gage. If you will just look him up—he was down at the station a few minutes ago. He knows that all I am saying is true!"

A low sound like a rumble went over the little audience and they seemed to bunch together and look at one another while some kind of an understanding traveled from eye to eye. An articulate syllable, "Bi!" breathed in astonishment, and then again "Bi!" in contempt. Public opinion, like a panther crouching, was forming itself ready to spring, when suddenly a new presence was felt in the room. Three strangers had appeared and somehow quietly gotten into the doorway. Behind them, stretching his neck and unable to be cautious, appeared Bi's slouching form. The crouching Public Opinion caught sight of him and showed its teeth, but was diverted by the strangers.

Then suddenly, from the corner behind Ma, slipped Betty with outstretched hands, like a lost thing flying to its refuge, straight to the side of the handsome young stranger.

He put out his hands and drew her to his side with a protecting motion, and she whispered:

"Tell, them, please; oh, make them understand."

Then Reyburn, with her hand still protectingly his, spoke:

"What that man has just said is a lie!"

Hutton looked up, went deadly white and reeled as he saw the two elderly men.

The crowd drew a united breath and stood straighter, looking relieved. Bi blanched, but did not budge. Whatever happened he was in with both crowds. Reyburn continued:

"I carry papers in my pocket which give authority to arrest him. If the sheriff is present will he please take charge of him? His name is Herbert Hutton, and he is charged with trying to make this lady marry him under false pretenses in order to get control of her property. She is not his wife, for she escaped before the ceremony was performed. I know, for I was present. These two gentlemen with me are the trustees of her estate."

Estate!

The neighbors looked at Betty respectfully.

Bi dropped his jaw perceptibly and tried to figure out how that would affect him. The sheriff stepped forward to magnify his office, and the silence was impressive, almost reverent. In the midst of it broke Bob's practical suggestion:

"You can shut him in the coal shed. It's got a padlock an' is good an' strong. He can't kick it down."

Then the law began to take its course, the fire gang stepped out, and Mrs. Carson set to work to clean up. In the midst of it all Reyburn looked down at Betty, and Betty looked up at Reyburn, and they discovered in some happy confusion that they still had hold of hands. They tried to cover their embarrassment by laughing, but something had been established between them that neither could forget.

CHAPTER XV

THE days that followed were full of bliss and peace to Betty. With Hutton safely confined in the distant city, and a comfortable sum of her accumulated allowance in the Tinsdale bank, with a thorough understanding between herself and her trustees and the knowledge that her estate was large enough to do almost anything in reason that she wished to do with it, and would be hers in three weeks, life began to take on a different look to the poor storm-tossed child. The days in the Carson home were all Thanksgivings now, and every member of the family was as excited and happy as every other member. There were arguments long and earnest between Betty and her benefactor as to how much she might in reason be allowed to do for the family now that she had plenty of money, but in the end Betty won out, declaring that she had wished herself on this family in her distress, and they would take her as a man does when he marries, for better for worse. Now that the worse had passed by she was theirs for the better, and she intended to exercise the privilege of a daughter of the house for the rest of her natural life.

Bi Gage was worried. He was still trying to get something out of the estate for his part in the exercises, and he vibrated between Tinsdale and Warren Reyburn's office working up his case. The five-thousand-dollar reward was as yet unpaid, and the papers he held didn't seem to impress the functionaries nearly so much as he had expected. It began to look as though Bi had missed his chances in life once more, and when he took his old seat in the fire-house and smoked, he said very little. Popular Opinion was still crouching with her eye in his direction and it behooved him to walk cautiously and do nothing to offend. So while he smoked he cogitated in his cunning little brain, and hatched out a plan by which he might get in with Betty Hope later, perhaps, when things had quieted down a little and she had her money.

Betty received a pitiful letter from her stepmother, trying to explain away her part in the affair and professing to be so relieved at the news that Betty was still alive and well that she cared nothing about anything else, not even the fact that poor dear Herbert was landed in jail, or that the fortune which she had schemed so long to keep in her own power was wrested from her so ignominiously. She begged Betty to come back to their home and "be happy again" together.

But Betty was so happy where she was that she could afford to be generous and try to forget her wrongs. She wrote a decent little note gently but firmly declining to come "home" ever again, making it quite plain that she was no longer deceived by honeyed phrases, and closing with a request that if in future any communication might be necessary it should be made through her lawyer, Mr. Warren Reyburn.

This same Warren Reyburn had returned to his city office in a very much exalted state of mind. He could not get away from that little hand of Betty's that had been laid so tremblingly and confidingly in his, and yet how could he, a poverty-stricken lawyer with absolutely no prospects at all, ever dare to think of her, a lady of vast estates. Still, there was some comfort in the fact that he had still some business to transact for her, and would have to return to Tinsdale again. He might at least see her once more. So he solaced himself on his return trip, feeling that he had done some good work, and that he would have a pleasant report to give to Jane Carson when he called upon her, as he meant to do the next day.

He arrived at home to find James Ryan in a great state of excitement. A pile of mail had arrived, and he had memorized the return addresses on the outside of all the envelopes. One was from a well-known firm, and another bore a name widely spoken of in the circles of the world of finance. Jimmie, in close council with Jane Carson, had decided that it must be from that person who called up twice on the phone and swore such terrible oaths when he found that Reyburn was away.

Jimmie hovered nervously about, putting things to rights, while Reyburn read his mail. He had come to the smallest envelope of all, a plain government envelope now and nothing had developed. Jimmie saw his first place fast slipping away from him and his heart grew heavy with fear. Perhaps after all nothing good had turned up yet.

Suddenly Reyburn sprang up and came toward him with an open letter, holding out his hand in a joyous greeting:

"Read that, Ryan! We're made at last, and I shan't have to let you go after all!"

Ryan read, the letters dancing before his delighted eyes, every one wearing an orange blossom on its brow. It was from an old established and influential firm, asking Reyburn to take full charge of all their law business, and saying they had been referred to him by two old friends in Boston, who by the way were Betty's two trustees.

"Come on, Ryan, come out to lunch with me! We've got to celebrate," said Reyburn. "I have a hunch somehow that you have been the one that brought me this good luck. You and a Miss Jane Carson. You both share alike, I guess, but you were the first with your five-thousand-dollar reward story."

"Jane Carson!" said Jimmie mystified. "Why, she's my girl!"

"Your girl!" said Reyburn, a queer look coming in his eyes. "You don't say! Well, you're in some luck, boy, with a girl like that! And, by the way, next time you see her, ask her to show you her wedding dress!"

And not another word would Reyburn tell him, though he recurred frequently to the subject during the very excellent lunch which they had together in friendly companionship.

They spent the afternoon composing the brief and comprehensive letter in response to the momentous one of the morning, and in the evening together they

SEEING THE WORLD AS A WHOLE

The Inter-Church World Movement in Series of Conferences Receives Reports of Christian Work and Needs in Many Lands

By ELSIE McCORMICK

SEEING the world as a whole with all its spiritual loneliness, its needless suffering, and its many races waiting in forgotten valleys for a message that never seems to come is an experience which makes a lifelong im pression. This sums up the opinion of 1,852 delegates who gave ten days from precious summer vacations in order to attend study classes outlining the purpose, plans and methods of the Interchurch World Movement of North America. Grouped in seven conferences, the delegates heard the story of world needs, glimpsed the vision of service for which the movement stands, and studied methods of missionary leadership for their own churches and communities.

The delegates ranged in years from high school students to men and women grown old in Christian service. Enrolled on the conference lists were ranchers from the mountain slopes of Colorado, pastors both of great city churches and of schoolhouse chapels, business men from the factory cities of New England, working-women from New York, men in the lumbering industry of the Pacific Coast, and farmers' wives from the prairie country of the Middle West. There were representatives of mission boards, young people's societies, women's missionary organizations, and clubs of community workers, besides a large number of interested people who came as individuals.

Despite high railroad fares and the present inconveniences of traveling, the enrollment showed an increase of nearly fifty per cent. over that of last year. The conferences, which were held at Silver Bay, New York; Ocean Park, Maine; Blue Ridge, North Carolina; Lake Geneva, Wisconsin; Asilomar, California; Estes Park, Colorado; and Seabeck, Washington, were formerly given under the auspices of the Missionary Education Movement, all the resources of which are now merged with the Interchurch World Movement. The Laymen's Missionary Movement, which has also ceased to function independently, devoted its energies to making the conferences a success. Missionaries from practically all the evangelical boards cooperated by lecturing on their experiences and problems to the various study classes.

Two of the conferences—that of Seabeck and of Estes Park—were compelled to turn delegates away. The Western conferences set the pace for those of the East in attendance increase, the Asilomar conference of California having an enrollment of 305 compared with 153 who attended last year, and Seabeck having a roster of 253 names, representing a gain of exactly 100 over last year's record. The conferences were "Interchurch" in membership as well as in subject, eighteen denominations being represented.

In open parliaments and in lectures, the textbooks and in pageants, the conference members saw humanity as from a hill-top.

The two outstanding problems studied were the duty of the church to Americanize the foreign-born by pointing out the close relationship between democracy and Christianity; and to conserve human life throughout the world by the establishment of medical missions.

The latter duty was brought out through many astonishing facts—the death, for instance, of two babies out of three in Korea, and the seventy-five per cent. infant mortality rate in Egypt.

Another course placed emphasis upon changing conditions in China, and the obligations which the social awakening of this ancient country has put upon Christian missions.

The delegates came away with the conviction that the day of Homeopathic Christianity is passing, and that a prescription larger than any one denomination can prepare is necessary for healing the spiritual and social ills of humanity. Though each evangelical church possesses the all-sufficient gospel, no one religious body has the means or equipment for meeting the multiple problems of the mission field.

Dr. J. Campbell White, who resigned the presidency of Wooster College to become associate general secretary of the Interchurch World Movement; Dr. C. H. Pratt, former secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions for the Presbyterian Church, South; Dr. E. C. Cronk of the Lutheran Church, in charge of the conferences; Dr. Robert H. Patton, director of the Nationwide Campaign being held by the Protestant Episcopal Church; Bishop Luther B. Wilson of the Methodist Episcopal Church; and Dr. John Timothy Stone, famous pastor of the Presbyterian Church, were among the prominent religious leaders who explained the Interchurch World Movement to the conference members.

The mission study classes were conducted with the same thoroughness that has characterized them in past years. Leading some of the courses were Miles B. Fisher of the Congregational Board of Education; B. Carter Milligan, educational director of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions; T. H. P. Sailer, educational adviser for the Presbyterian Board; and John Clark Archer of the Chair of Missions at Yale University. The courses ranged from an efficiency course for pastors given by Dr. F. A. Agar of the Baptist Church to fascinating tales of China prepared for delegates in their early teens.

Pageants so colorful that they expressed in a picturesque way the facts of the text-books and yet so simple that any church might produce them without expense formed an important part of every program. A young woman doctor seeking the most needy part of the world in which to hang her professional shingle showed graphically the call for medical missionaries. One by one, women from other lands came forward, each with a pathetic tale of suffering and neglect. No one could leave such a pageant unimpressed by the fact that medical missions are a worldwide necessity.

At two or three of the conferences the [illegible] of spiritual leadership which the United [illegible] now holds was beautifully expressed in [illegible] called "The Striking of America's Hour." In it the whole sweep of the ages was portrayed in a short half-hour. Egypt, Babylonia, Greece and Rome are brought before the judgment bar of Justice and Brotherhood, only to be turned away again as unworthy of a claim to true greatness. The pageant culminates in the vesting of America with a supreme opportunity for world service.

Those who attended the conferences were touched by the deep spiritual tone which marked all the sessions. Dr. W. E. Doughty, head of the Department of Spiritual Resources in the Interchurch World Movement, led the thoughts of the members to the necessity of prayer, not as a mere devotional exercise, but as the underlying strength of the entire conference.

At Asilomar alone fifteen young people dedicated their lives to Christ, declaring their intention to serve either as pastors or as workers in the mission field.

Vespers on the "Sunset Slope" at Seabeck, the "Hour of Spiritual High Tide" on the shores of Lake Geneva, evening prayer in the shadow of the Colorado peaks, twilight service on the rocky beach at Asilomar, and daily intercession in the pine-covered Adirondacks emphasized the fact that the Interchurch World Movement is primarily spiritual and that upon its religious inspiration it places its hope of success.

In the quiet of the mountains or in the changing glory of the sea, the delegates heard the still, small voice with its constant urge toward work and prayer.

"Follow this trail to higher plains" was the sentence from which the Estes Park conference drew its inspiration and which could rightly be chosen as a motto for the others.

Bidding them carry its high purposes into the walks of common life, the Interchurch World Movement pointed toward the path of consecration in a prayer-poem, "The Homeward Way," and bade the delegates Godspeed.

The New Home of Peace

WHILE the famous Peace Palace at the Hague has ceased to do business and is opened only a few hours a day for sightseers, a new and vastly more pretentious peace center is being planned for Geneva as the seat of the government of the League of Nations.

Dispatches coming from Switzerland describe the location of the capitol of the League as embracing a mile of frontage on Lake Geneva and extending back from the water for approximately two miles. The correspondent, looking into the future, sees this area dotted with great office buildings, each bulging with news of world-wide importance.

That proposed site may not be too extensive for the purpose can be appreciated when it is recalled that President Wilson took with him to Paris, or had assigned to the work of the American Peace Commission, more than 1,400 attachés, clerks and attendants. If it required that number of persons to look after the interests of the United States in formulating the Peace Treaty it is easy to conceive tens of thousands needed to carry on the almost limitless work the League of Nations organization is preparing to undertake, for the covenant provides that the council of the League keep in close political, economic and military contact with every member nation. Not only will it know the intimate details of government of the members, but it will have to know what other countries outside the League are doing from both the economic and military standpoints. In other words, its machinery will completely cover the earth.

While the organization of the League of Nations is temporarily in London, its permanent home is to be Geneva. It will be transferred there after the first formal meeting, which is to take place in Washington at the call of President Wilson if the covenant is accepted by the Senate, and then by the Allied and Associated Powers in the event the Senate votes for the proposed reservations.

Jesus, the World's Hope

A NEW YEAR'S SERMON

By REV.
S. EDWARD YOUNG,
D.D.*

Text: 1 Tim. 1 : 1, "Christ Jesus, Our Hope."

OUGHT not this New Year's message to be one of hope? There is hope for the world while the world has hope. Should despair seize upon mankind, our very gloom would be our doom. How bold the writer of Hebrews is! He takes the ship's anchor and hurls it upward, until it hooks about the throne of God, and draws us, ship and all, toward the celestial haven—"Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and stedfast, and which entereth into that within the vail."

What is our Hope? Christ Jesus—the babe, the youth, the man, the crucified, the resurrected. Usually the New Testament speaks of him as Jesus when His stay in the flesh is contemplated, as Christ when His Messiahship is emphasized, as Jesus Christ when both His earthly life and His Messiahship are thought of, and as Christ Jesus when His birth, death, resurrection and worldwide mission are in view:—

"Not what, but Whom, I do believe
That, in my darkest hour of need
Hath comfort that no mortal creed
To mortal man may give—

"Not what, but Whom!—'
For Christ is more than all the creeds
And His full life of gentle deeds
Shall all the creeds outlive."

Why is Christ Jesus our Hope? Because there is no other. Could Mohammedanism be? Not hope enough there to compose a hymn! Every Mosque is songless. Not Buddhism—hymnless, too, except when stealing from Christianity. Not all the world's philosophies. They reached their climax when Germany reissued the whole of them, plus additions of her own, and philosophized the nation into a militaristic hell, into which she tried to drag the rest of mankind. Not commercial interests, so loudly proclaimed a few years ago as certainly guaranteeing universal peace! Did they? And here we are again, by reason of commercial upheaval, at chaos' edge. Will education suffice? If Christless, it only makes wits keener to do iniquity. Twice recently in one of America's largest high schools, eighty per cent. foreign, I have found two thousand boys applauding loudly other points in a speaker's utterances, but maintaining a dead silence when Bolshevism was denounced. Anarchy in the schools! Mere head-drill can never save humanity.

WHY is Christ Jesus our Hope? Because He claims to be. Take such a passage as St. Matthew 11 : 27–8, "All things are delivered unto me of my Father. . . . Neither knoweth any man the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal Him." . . . "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Or St. John 7 : 37, "In the last day, that great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried, saying, If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink." Who else ever spoke so?—Himself the only way of knowing God; Himself the only giver of the heart's deep calm; Himself alone to quench the soul's eternal thirst! Just one Being has lived who never regretted anything he ever did or said or was—Christ Jesus. Just one good Person never broke with his past—Jesus of Bethlehem. His past was ever perfect and required no breaking with. Just one meek spirit never apologized. Paul had to apologize for saying to the high priest, "God shall smite thee, thou whited wall,"—"I wist not that he was the high priest." But the Master confessed no error in knowledge or intention—He had none to confess. Just One never needed to ask to be forgiven. Even in formulating the Lord's Prayer, He took pains to have the Greek, the Aramean, pronoun, "Ye" stand out emphatically, "After this manner therefore pray ye"—He himself could not pray the clause "forgive us our debts"—He had none. Just One ceaselessly kept full communion with God the Father. At any moment He might be heard saying, "I thank thee, O Father," "Even so, Father," "Father, I thank thee that thou hastheard me."

Was he not constantly like somebody standing in the doorway of a darkened room, the sun shining on Him and He conversing with somebody there in the light whom we do not see? Just One lived without once, for a second even, displeasing the Heavenly Father—Christ Jesus—"I do always those things that please Him." Just One was above the Sabbath Day and might do as He chose thereon—"The Son of Man is Lord also of the Sabbath." Just One was above the Scriptures and could add to them—"It was said . . . thou shalt not kill; but I say unto you that whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause, shall be in danger." Group together the claims of every other reformer since time began, and would they begin to equal this Nazarene's?

WHY is Christ our Hope? Because His life supports His claim. Precisely right it has been to turn upon Him history's searchlights and go microscopically into each nook and cranny of His career. Precisely right also that the unanimous verdict be that His claims and His conduct agree. Omit, if you prefer, the testimony of His own disciples, the eleven, the seventy, the five hundred. Omit John the Baptist and the angels and "the voice from heaven, saying, 'This is my Beloved Son.'" Omit the children's—by no means the least significant, their pure instinct often shunning one whom their elders do not detect to be false—chanting "Hosanna in the highest!" Pilate, cool, calculating, Roman Governor, how does Jesus impress you? You have the answer when Pilate, keen to gratify the Jews by releasing their Barabbas, willing to go almost any length to keep their good will, deliberately, before the multitude, charges them with murder as he washes his hands, declaring, "I am innocent of the blood of this Just Person." The Jews knew exactly what he meant and raised the shout: "His blood be on us, and on our children!"—and it has been. Roman centurion, accustomed to seeing all sorts of men die, what is your conclusion after three hours near Him on the Cross—"Truly, this was the Son of God." Nicodemus, member of the Sanhedrim, in whose semicircle you sat while Jewish religious leaders uttered their worst against the Galilean, your private night interview with Him affording you double opportunity to judge, Tell us your estimate. We know it by your coming to the cross and helping take down the Lord's dead body and prepare it for the grave, thus ostracizing yourself from Sanhedrim, home and nation.

Joseph of Arimathea, rich, cultivated Sanhedrist, absent when Jesus was voted to death—your witness is that you throw your wealth and public favor to the winds and go to Pilate and beg the poor, lifeless form of the Saviour, that you may do Him honor.

And Judas, city fellow among country disciples, treasurer of the circle, aware of the source of every penny and how it was spent, observing with quick eye the Master's whole behavior in the intimacy of privacy, His dealings with whomsoever came and went, with His mother and brothers and the women who accompanied, as you, the traitor, cast your thirty pieces before the chief priests who hired you, what is your final word on Jesus?—"I have sinned, in that I have betrayed the innocent blood."

We, believers of the twentieth century, thank thee, O Father in heaven, for Judas who had every chance to know and every incentive to find a flaw to excuse his treachery—we thank thee for Judas' testimony that Jesus' life supported His claims divine!

WHY is Christ Jesus our Hope? Because He satisfies all varieties of mortals. Children ripen toward Him, as morning glories open to the sun. His birthday makes childhood glad the whole world round. The aged take His hand to walk through the last great shadow. Your dear old grandmother never looked lovelier than when she adjusted her spectacles to read once more the blessed Gospel verses that had been her cheer ever since she, a tiny girl, responded to "Suffer the little children to come unto me." The mid-years of our pilgrimage must lean on His strength and follow His wisdom. In sorrow we are desolate without Him. Time and space and race part not any from His presence and power.

A missionary speaks of Him in darkest Africa. A youngster, so black a piece of charcoal would almost leave a white mark on him, becomes a Christian, goes back with the missionary to England, is consecrated bishop, returns to Africa and in one of his meetings, a poor savage woman, her kinky wool whitening, leaps up and puts her arms about him. His arms go about her—Bishop Yulong and his mother, both Christians now! Ah, my soul! what Christ Jesus can do for any human anywhere!

Keep to the fore the radiancy of His nature. Remember that his critics were everlastingly finding fault with His happy manner of living. He represented Himself and His disciples as a wedding party, theirs the right to be of good cheer. Yes, "Be of good cheer,"—that is the chime of sweet bells you hear Him ringing over and over.

HOW does Christ Jesus become our Hope? By our taking Him. He respects the freedom of each human will. To be good or bad you must have the making of the choice. Our Lord's sensitiveness, delicacy and insight reveal themselves precisely here. The heart of love is to want to be wanted, to go not where it is not wanted. There is many a hint hereof in the Gospels. Walking on the sea near His disciples in the boat He "Would have passed by them; but when they saw Him . . . they cried out." At Emmaus gate "He made as though He would have gone further; but they constrained Him, saying 'Abide with us.'" Revelation pictures Him, "Behold I stand at the door and knock; if any man hear my voice and open the door, I will come in to him." He will never break in the door.

In the thunder of the war, He was knocking for the world to rise and open and receive Him In the labor upheaval of our country, He is knocking for America to admit Him. In the troubles of your business, in the trials of your family, in the wrong that will not allow you rest, in the wound that will not heal, He is knocking for you to let Him in. Ere He enters, the world must want Him, America must want Him, your family must want Him, you must want Him. Your soul's time of rejoicing waits till your soul wills it.

THE WORLD NEWS OF THE WEE

The Coal Strike Settled

AFTER five weeks of strike which brought severe suffering to many parts of the country and dislocated business everywhere, the United Mine Workers of America have voted to accept a 14 per cent. increase in wages subject to a review of the award by a commission named by President Wilson. This commission will comprise a representative of the coal operators, the miners and the public, and will meet as soon as the mines are again placed in full operation.

The third great industrial upheaval since midsummer, there is reason to believe that if the terms of settlement finally prove satisfactory to the rank and file of the miners' organization the crisis in a very tense labor situation has been passed. The government is in a fair way to composing all its differences with the railway brotherhoods, the steel strike virtually has come to an end, and with real resumption of production by the mines the basic industries will be back to normal. The effect on the public of the coal settlement, however, is still in doubt. The 14 per cent. raise in wages tentatively accepted must be absorbed by the coal companies and not passed on to the consumer in increased prices, but the commission to be named by the President is authorized to collect data on wages and production costs and in certain circumstances charge any further increases in wages against the public. This feature of the settlement was strongly opposed by Dr. Henry A. Garfield, Fuel Administrator. He saw in it a possibility for a combination of operators and workers against the people and resigned as a protest against it.

Just before the union officials met in Indianapolis to discuss and accept the President's proposal for settlement the Fuel Administration put into effect conservation measures more drastic in some respects than those in force during the war. Factories were closed three days a week, stores and offices were limited to six-hour days, street lighting was cut to the minimum, advertising signs were shut off and trains were annulled on all railroads. More than 500 trains running into and out of New York City were taken off, including both the Pennsylvania and New York Central eighteen-hour trains to Chicago. Enforcement of the orders devolved on the Railroad Administration which was expected to refuse to carry coal to any company or individual violating them. The Fuel Administrator warned the country that the utmost care in coal consumption would be required for several weeks after the mines resumed production and that there was no early hope of the conservation orders being cancelled. Middle western states which seized the mines and operated them by volunteer labor will retain control of the properties until conditions are wholly normal. Kansas has been the most active in state mining and Governor Allen says he has no present intention of relinquishing control of the properties seized in the Pittsburg field.

Peace Delegates Home

THE American delegation to the Peace Conference has returned to the United States after closing up its work in Paris and turning over to Ambassador Wallace the task of conducting any further negotiations. Much bitterness of feeling was displayed in England and France when Frank L. Polk, Henry White and General Tasker H. Bliss with their staffs left the Crillon. As the delegation was starting for the train to carry them to Brest the members placed their signatures to the Roumanian racial minorities treaty, ending for the time at least, the difficulties the Supreme Council has been having with the Roumanian government, for the agreement also included a definite promise to adhere to the Allied program with regard to Hungary. The action paves the way for the preparation of a treaty with Hungary and the government at Budapest has been requested to send a delegation to Paris to receive the terms that will be imposed on her. Mr. Wallace will sign this treaty for the United States.

The breaking of all formal American connection with the Peace Conference and the absence of American representation on the numerous inter-allied commissions set up by the treaty with Germany has placed in the hands of England and France the task of directing the enforcement of the peace terms. The disinclination of Germany to sign the protocol and complete the process of ratifying the terms signed at Versailles has made this problem a disquieting one. Premier Clemenceau of France left for London when Mr. Polk and his associates started for New York and a series of important conferences were held in the British Foreign Office between Clemenceau and Lloyd George. The question of a definite treaty of alliance between England and France was particularly considered. France is determined, in the event of the complete failure of the League of Nations proposal, to have a strong friend ready at hand in any emergency.

In the Senate there is no disposition on the part either of the President or Senator Lodge to revive consideration of the treaty. It seems to be Mr. Lodge's intention, immediately after the holiday recess, to push to a vote his resolution paving the way to a declaration of separate peace with Germany. Senator King, of Utah, shortly before the recess, introduced a resolution authorizing the President to employ the army and the navy in any joint measures which might be undertaken to enforce the terms of the Versailles treaty, but no action was taken on it.

Cost of Government

DEPARTMENTAL estimates for the next fiscal year presented to Congress call for an expenditure of $4,865,410,031. To this must be added deficiency bills which bring the aggregate demands of the executive up to $5,249,470,000. Any federal assistance required by the railways will still further increase the requirements. Against this huge estimate is placed $4,000,000,000 as the maximum that Congress can appropriate to the operations of the government. In other words, according to Representative Good, Chairman of the Appropriations Committee, a billion and a quarter dollars must be pared from the estimates by the congressional knife before next June 30. The disclosure of the departmental needs makes particularly valuable reading an article by Representative Good published in this number of the Christian Herald on the necessity for a national budget system with some balance between income and expenditure, and centralized appropriations.

More Trouble in Korea

GOVERNOR GENERAL SAITO of Korea, according to advices from Tokio, has urgently appealed to the government to send twelve battalions to reinforce the Japanese garrison in Korea. Persistent rumors of increasing disorders in the colony thus seem to be confirmed. The strength of the Japanese military and police force now in control has never been disclosed by the authorities but it is estimated at about 125,000. The twelve battalions asked for by Baron Saito would increase it by 12,000 men. Fresh Japanese troops also are being sent into Siberia. Two transports had been unloaded at Vladivostok at the last advice and several others were en route. The despatches are not clear whether these are reinforcement units or replacements.

ARE RACE WARS NECESSARY?—NO!

By EUGENE KINCKLE JONES

Executive Secretary of the National Urban League

> EMINENT leaders among the white and colored races in the United States are joining hands and hearts in an earnest organized effort to stem the rising tide of race prejudice and to bring about mutual understanding and cooperation that will end riots and hatred. In the spirit of Christ and in a right conception of the interests of the human brotherhood lies the only real solution of the problem. Chief among the agencies working to this end is the National Urban League, the purposes and activities of which are set forth in this article.

THE recent race riots in Washington, Chicago and Omaha have set many minds working to determine the best means of quelling disturbances when threatened or provoked.

Iore far-sighted students of race relas, however, long have been seeking s for preventing or removing the con-ns which lead to trouble.

e universal plan adopted by religious social workers alike calls for the forma-in each community of joint comees of white and colored people to con-together the relations between the es; such committees to meet frequently rk and play, housing and civic matters which both races are concerned. From se conferences it is proposed that ncies for social betterment will be de-ped and that publicity of a construcand concordant type for the good of alike will result.

ounded on this principle, the Illinois mission on Race Relations, appointed overnor Lowden following the Chicago resting to relate, the program roved race relations, now so advocated, has for fourteen en the program of the Nation-n League. The conception of anization was that of William ldwin, Jr., former president of Long Island Railroad. The place of the idea was a colored bureau, a home for con-women and men, play

mmer camps for children, hool visitors, probation and ficers, an emergency workshop and other relief measures during the period of unemployment in the winter of 1914-15, all followed in rapid succession. The work spread to other communities until thirty-two cities embraced the League's program—prominent among them being Chicago, Brooklyn, Detroit, St. Louis, Cleveland, Columbus, Pittsburg, Boston, Savannah and Memphis. Philadelphia had already established the Armstrong Association, which became affiliated with the League.

During the Chicago riots the League's office never closed. The League's local executive, T. Arnold Hill, remained at his post for a whole week—day and night—keeping in touch with the police, the Governor's and Mayor's offices, colored leaders, white labor leaders, social workers and business men. At one time he was demanding the militia to supplement the work of tired and often ineffective police; again he was urging union labor officials to declare themselves publicly as willing for the Negroes to return to their former employment at the stock yards instead of allowing the riots to be an excuse for their dismissal. Later he urged the appointment of an unbiased state commission on race relations and placed the Urban League office at the disposal of the Red Cross, which organization he had summoned to give relief to the foodless isolated Negro population in the South Side district.

It was Hill to whom the Mississippi planter came to find out whether he could induce the former Negro migrants to return South, with the argument that the North treated the Negro as badly as the South and that conditions around his plantation had become ideal. It was to Hill that a dubious southern Negro replied—when confronted with the query whether he wanted to go South again to live—"No, sir; in the South we are left out of everything in which the public figures. In the North we can even take part in the riots."

Between the East St. Louis riots of May 30 and July 3, 1917, and after that event, I went to that ill-fated city representing the National Urban League to ascertain what one could do to remedy the situation.

I met with colored and white citizens and finally arranged for a joint meeting of representatives of the two races at the Rotary Club of that city. Out of that meeting sprang the East St. Louis Urban League, which, with George W. Buckner as executive secretary, has secured colored welfare workers for four large industrial plants; organized night schools for illiterate adult Negroes; organized boys' and girls' clubs; inaugurated canning clubs and community parties—all looking toward solving the Negro's part in the problem of race disturbances.

On the Crest of the Horizon

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

WHEN the New Year stands upon the crest of the horizon and smiles into the face of the world, the world smiles hesitatingly back and realizes, in its heart, two things. It realizes that it is being given a double gift—a new chance and a new responsibility. It realizes that the old slate is being wiped clean of last year's marking and that a new surface is being extended, shiny, smooth, and spotless, to be written upon. When the New Year stands upon the crest of the horizon and smiles into the face of the world, the world feels a quickening throb of joy and at the same time a curious weight of premonition.

GLADLY the New Year smiles across the earth,
Waking dim echoes of forgotten mirth,
Painting the hills with rosy tinted laughter,
Gay with the promise of forever after.

Sadly the old world raises up its eyes,
Dreaming to find the hope that wakes and dies—
Praying to find the New Year's smiling glances Touched with the rainbow shine of lost romances.

Out through the mists of suffering and strife
Sounds forth again the New Year's call to life,
Urging the world to conflict, bloodlessly:
Urging the world to reach real victory,

Victory over stubbornness and pain,
Victory over bitter loss and gain,
Victory over empty-hearted sighing,
Victory over discontented crying.

Gladly the New Year smiles across the earth,
Bringing again the promise of rebirth;
And the sad world, with tired eyes uplifting,
Sees that the darkest clouds are breaking, drifting . . .

I SPENT last New Year's Eve in Paris. It was a strange, unreal sort of a New Year's Eve, for one usually associates New Year's Eve with the noise of merrymaking, with the ringing of bells and the blowing of horns and the sound of laughter. One usually associates New Year's Eve with mirth and gayety and exuberance just as one associates Paris with the thought of lights and sparkle and georgeous gowns and beautiful women.

But New Year's Eve, last year, in Paris, was a quiet affair. At ten o'clock the streets were deserted and when, a bit later in the night a mist of rain crept across the city it seemed almost like a mantle covering dim buildings and corner lamps and hotels. Paris was a dream place—a place asleep, or dazed, or perhaps, in a state of coma.

At eleven o'clock in my cold and dingy hotel room I sat down to write a letter home. And as I sat there I had a quaint, make-believe feeling that the New Year was coming to me, alone, of all Paris; I was the only one who was wide awake, the only one who was looking expectantly forward into the New Year's smiling face. And when the hands of my little watch touched softly together at the midnight hour, cutting the old year from the new one, I turned my wistful eyes in the direction of home and sent my New Year's pledge silently back to the waiting hearts across the sea.

PARIS was silent, last winter, when the New Year stood upon the crest of the horizon. All of France, I think, must have been silent. Because, after four years of chaos and war; after seasons of bloodshed and suffering and death the whole of France was too worn out with the breathless struggle for existence to be able to smile. It was too bruised and beaten to be able to smile. And, I think that, last winter, the whole world was weighed down with the same feeling that enveloped France.

For last winter the world was waking wearily from a bad dream—last winter civilization was being brought to life again after a bloody and mangled death. Hearts were still filled with sorrow, eyes were still tear-blinded, minds were still misted with suffering and lips were still twisted with agony. And the New Year's smile was too bland and self-sufficient to be noticed and answered. The world covered her sorry face with her hands and let the New Year enter, silently, into her soul.

BUT this winter the situation is vastly different. The New Year is coming to a world that is wide awake, that is thrilling with excitement and alive to the greatest possibilities that have ever existed. The hearts that were filled with sorrow have, since last year, found room for another interest, the tear-blinded eyes have learned to look past the grey veil of unhappiness and into the future; the minds that were misted with suffering are groping out into the sunlight and the lips that were twisted with agony have learned—though perhaps a shade wanly—to smile. The New Year comes to a world that is throwing off the aftermath of a bad dream—that is beginning to take up old tasks and old duties—to redeem old promises and to make new ones.

There have never been such opportunities to do worth-while things, to break old records and to set a new pace, as there are now. There may never again be a time when everybody is looking eagerly to his neighbor for inspiration, when everybody is anxious to make a new start, and to receive and take good advice. The world realizes that it is coming into a period of renascence—a period when originality and grit and courage and steadfastness will count for infinitely more than they have ever counted before.

THERE are those who will look mournfully into the face of the New Year as it smiles, this winter, from the crest of the horizon. There are those who will murmur gloomy words that have to do with strikes and labor problems; with the high cost of living and the social unrest. There are those who will say that the world is still in the midst of a maddened dream—that, perhaps, it will never wake again to sanity.

But—well, look into the eyes of the mother whose son has come back to her, safe, from the battle-field of France. And glance into the faces of the young lovers in the subway train who have forgotten to read the blatant headlines of the papers they carry. And see the baby who is sitting on the floor of some cozy little home—the baby who is raising its tiny hands to catch the errant flicker of a dancing sunbeam.

SOMEBODY said, once, that there was nothing new under the sun. And it's been quoted over and over, that saying, until the world knows it very well indeed. But it isn't true—it isn't. For there's something new under the sun every time the first of January rolls around.

Friends of mine, I feel, somehow, that the world is being given something especially splendid upon this New Year.

BRIGHTENING SKIES

THE New Year opens auspiciously. For many months the whole world has been filled with turbulence and distractions, and the peace the nations had hoped for and which seemed actually within reach, remained illusive. It is true, a little group of governments had signed the Treaty, but others, including ourselves, held back until the Spirit of Peace, drooping and discouraged, must have looked upon us in surprise and sorrow.

We set the bells a-ringing; we paraded and illuminated and rejoiced, yet after all these heartening demonstrations we found ourselves in the attitude of the patriarch when he proclaimed that his days were "full of trouble."

Yet this nation felt that the same Almighty Hand which had led our armies to accomplish their heroic task for justice and righteousness so nobly and self-sacrificingly, was still at the helm.

And now, the skies are everywhere growing brighter. Distractions at home, the industrial turmoil, the menace of Bolshevism and anarchy, the cloud of trouble with Mexico, and other disturbing conditions, which hung like storm-clouds all over the sky, are dispersing before the sunrise. The coal strike is happily settled and the men are going back to work. New hopes have been awakened that the Treaty which was framed with so much care and devotion, to save civilization and construct a program that would give hopes of world peace, may yet be saved. After months of disappointment, the peoples of those lands, whose future depends upon the restoration of order and tranquillity, are still confidently hoping and praying that wisdom may be given to those upon whom the peace of the world depends, and that beyond and above all disputes and differences, they may see their duty and do it.

Faith in action has been defined as "Trusting in God and going forward." Our people need this faith in action today. Our God-fearing forefathers held this faith strongly. Their consciousness of justice and righteousness dominated all other considerations. With God on their side, they felt assured of the outcome. They trusted in God and went forward!

So must we do, if we are to bring to this nation the peace Americans so greatly desire. On all sides we have seen the results of an incongruous situation. Industrial troubles multiplied; radicalism led to grievous excesses; the forces of disorder found in the disturbed conditions opportunity for baneful activities.

But now it is sunrise time—the time of new inspiraon and confidence. To realize the energy of the n in clearing away the clouds, one must climb some gh peak and there witness the break-up of a storm. ke a king in his majesty and strength, the glorious b appears; the clouds, immovable before, break, atter, and as though affrighted, finally scurry of all directions. Soon the atmosphere is clear and things are seen in their true perspective. So, n troubles assail and storms surround us on every l, we must climb the heights of Faith. Then, in response to our prayers, the sun of righteous- breaks through, the clouds lift, and what was ingly hopeless before, is now flooded with light, radiance and encouragement. The very storm- ds of trouble are seen to have been merely a veil ide victory.

WEALTH A STEWARDSHIP

RECENT years there have been many notable nstances of great fortunes being dedicated to the blic good, either during the lifetime or after the of the possessors. There are evidences that a rial change is taking place in the minds of men erning their attitude toward society in this re-. Ability and the power to grasp opportunity e them rich beyond reasonable human needs; when we see that many of them have kept a high pose in view all through life, and carried it out lutely in the face of temptations to extravagance vulgar display, to which weaker natures yield, cannot withhold the recognition of their laudable especially when it works out for the benefit of fellowmen.

nry C. Frick, when he found himself achieving ss in the business world, set up a high ideal, the ment of which would be a lasting benefit to the n. He decided to make his money clean, and vote it to the advancement of education, art and nthropy. Of his entire fortune of $145,000,000, one-sixth was left to kindred and friends when he the great bulk of it being represented in the ficent endowed collection of art treasures he gave to New York, the beautiful park he conveyed to the people of Pittsburg, and various educational gifts to universities and technical institutes, as well as liberal bequests to nearly a score of hospitals and dispensaries. Many years ago, Andrew Carnegie said that he believed the time was coming when it would be considered a disgrace for an American to die rich. Helen Gould, about the same time, put herself on record as holding the cardinal principle that wealth was a trusteeship. These two conclusions have taken root in the American mind, and are spreading. The Christian Herald has long held that the proposition that all wealth is a trusteeship, and that the holder has a moral accountability for the uses to which he puts it, was sound Christian doctrine, which could not be successfully refuted. Any man or woman who, being blessed with abundance, honorably attained, applying it to worthy purposes for the benefit of their fellowmen, is like the faithful servant who multiplied the talents his lord placed in his keeping. He who makes money merely to be a servitor to his desires, a minister to his pleasures, will be accused by his own conscience at the last, and will also forfeit the respect of his fellowmen.

Great wealth involves great responsibility. The spirit of service needs awakening in all of us. If the churches of America, in this age of inflated incomes and suddenly amassed fortunes, were to preach the doctrine of Jesus regarding the danger of wealth when it becomes a barrier to spiritual growth and progress, they might lead many to use their riches for the benefit of humanity, instead of making it a wall of social division and a cause of better strife and heart-burnings.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER

THE Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, cooperating with the Interchurch World Movement of North America, has summoned the Church to the duties and obligations of the new year. Preparation for gathering questions and assembling problems of these new and stirring times will be made in a united Church in united study and prayer. A spiritual Plattsburg will be held throughout the land during the week of January 4-11.

The problems of "An Awakened Church" will engage the study and earnest investigation of the allied forces of Protestantism. The topics for each evening of this most important week are "The Church Awakened by Her New Opportunities," "The Church Awakened by National Self-Examination," "The Church Awakened by a Vision of World Needs," "The Church Awakened by the New Call for Cooperation," "The Church Awakened by a Revival of Family Religion," "The Church Awakened by the Call for Workers," and "The Church Awakened by a Rediscovery of the Reality and Power of Prayer."

Facing the task of a world-reconstruction, the Church must assume the prerogative of initiative and leadership. It must bring into efficient play its power of divine equipment as expressed through prayer and ministry. There are new questions, situations, obstacles, new trials that can only be adequately met with the potency and power of a new discovery of God. Denominational backgrounds and policy as ecclesiastical luxuries must give way for an aggressive denominational propaganda of the pure Gospel as a religious necessity. Our slogan must be "One Church, One God, One Christ, One Gospel, and One Fundamental Purpose." We have no time for petty discussions, narrow horizons, selfish aims, and private interests. These are times that demand convictions, clear-cut, iron-bound, steel-clad, Gibraltar-like, unmovable. We can only preach the Christ our denominational lives reveal. Our power over the world is only as strong as our convictions, and we may never hope to be helpful with mere opinions. We are to strive for the perfect coming of the Kingdom of God as a consummation devoutly wished for by perfect organizations. Organization in itself is null and void unless it is a means to an end, not a means unto itself. The world is burning and the firemen dare not tarry in convention to discuss the relative value of any particular brand of rubber-hose. A terrible epidemic of unrest and upheaval is sweeping the world and physicians dare not pause in clinic to discuss first aid. The Church must be done with its experiment and give to a needy humanity its experience. Holy service, heroic ministry, consecrated endeavor and passionate effort is the challenge of the hour.

We have done well with the spirit of the sword, but we can do much better with the Sword of the Spirit. We have had enough of Might and War and have convinced the world of its insufficiency. Now let us use Love and Brotherhood and convince the world that these are more efficient. Cæsarism, Napoleonism, Czarism and Kaiserism have had their trial and they have failed. Let us give God, the Christ, and the Church a trial. Let us take the Gospel into the arena of human thought and action, public and private, national and international, and usher in the day for which the whole creation has travailed until now.

THE FARMER AND THE MINER

A FARMER in Leon, Iowa, reading of the demands for shorter hours of labor in some of the industries now on strike, is stirred to make some very sensible observations. "Permit me a word about the strikes," he writes. "If we farmers should strike for a 30-hour week, or in other words, if we did not work three times 30 hours a week, those fellows would starve to death. We fed $2 corn to hogs this summer, expecting 20 cents a pound for the fat hogs. Instead, we are getting 10 and 11 cents here—a loss of half—and we have worked from 10 to 12 hours a day and tried to produce all we could. Now it's up to those fellows to do the same, or be shut out of their jobs. When they have a steady job at a fixed price they know what to figure on, while we have storms, droughts and floods and almost everything else to contend with. And then we have to take for our stuff what we can get, and pay the other fellow his price for his stuff."

This is quite true, but our farmer friend overlooks an important point of the case. While the farmer has a steady job, week in and week out, the year round, there are a number of industries, coal mining among them, in which different reasons, which the workers themselves cannot control, may cause shutdowns for days and even weeks at a time. All this of course, is lost time to the worker. Mr. Gompers, of the Federation of Labor, in a recent statement wrote that those days of unemployment sometimes counted up several months in a year. Now, it is the workers' contention that it would be better in such cases to shorten the hours, in order to equalize production and make the work last longer.

Our whole nation appreciates the work of the farmers. Our people know how earnestly and devotedly they have labored for the general good, and that without their splendid zeal not only America, but the world, would have suffered immeasurably. Theirs indeed has been Distinguished Service. They have never failed to respond to the call for greater production, feeling that upon their cooperation depended the welfare and the lives of multitudes. The real contrast between the farmers and the miners is that while the former have been inspired by a knowledge that the people's welfare depended upon their efforts, the latter have had no such high incentive. Instead, in planning their strike, they knew that it would involve millions of innocent sufferers—indeed, the whole population. This no organization has the right to do; the national welfare must not be imperiled.

1919 HOLIDAY GREETINGS 1920

IT IS with a deep feeling of gratitude that I wish the readers of the Christian Herald a very Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year.

No other publisher ever had the loyal support you have given. During the recent New York printers' strike, which so seriously interfered with the regular publishing of the Christian Herald, I learned how big were your hearts. Letters pledging your support came flooding in—letters telling what the Christian Herald meant to you and of your interest in its welfare.

MORE generously than ever have you contributed to the Bowery Mission and Mont Lawn, and when a special need for help to India came, you sent over sixty thousand dollars to relieve the starving there.

Who could fail to respond to that wonderful spirit? Our feeling is one of gratitude and our answer to you will be a better Christian Herald, full of inspiration and help. One of the answers will come within a few weeks when we will make an announcement that will delight every one of you.

THERE is nothing in life so broadening as misfortune, or so humanizing as suffering. There was never a time within your memory or mine when the people of this country were so sober and thoughtful as they are at present. Because they have suffered they have sympathy with pain and trouble; because they have lost, and stood for months in imminent danger of losing, some loved member of the family, they have a new conception of the realities of existence and of the manner in which these realities merge with and are linked to those things which belong to the spirit. They want to be of some use in the world; they want to help other people; they want to live better lives themselves.

IT IS exactly the same way with nations. This country has come through the war with a feeling of new responsibilities, a different attitude toward the things which lie beyond this life, a different feeling as to its duties to itself and to the world at large. It has a strengthened and exalted belief in the divine Providence, and as a result of this a renewed interest in the things which are spiritual.

These things being true, it becomes obvious that the Christian Herald is invested with a new significance. The publication stands where it has always stood, but the public has come to meet it. It fits into human daily needs in a way it never has done before. The things it has always talked about are now the things in which all are supremely interested.

LET us together make this coming year the greatest in the history of the Christian Herald, of modern Christianity and of spiritual, social and moral progress.

God Our Home

SUNDAY. Ps. 90 : 1. "Lord Thou hast been our dwelling-place." "Our dwelling-place!" It is the lovely and winsome figure of a home. The word recalls what ought to be to us the most alluring and radiant spot on the planet. And then it applies the remembrance to the interpretation of the hospitable house of the love and grace of God. Anybody can furnish a house if he has the money; but no money can furnish a home. Home means a certain atmosphere. It is indefinable and indescribable. It means a certain communion which is so sensitive and refined as to be almost independent of speech. It is the realm of a wireless ministry of a superlative order. Home means a delicious freedom whose very simplicity is its defense. Home means love, deep as life and deeper than death. The authority of the home is steeped in grace. Its bonds are silken cords. Its statutes are songs. Let us think of all these riches and we may then begin to feel the amazing welcome, and the boundless grace that are hidden in this old familiar word, "Lord, Thou hast been our dwelling-place in all generations."

Now, there are multitudes of people who do not settle down in God as their spiritual home and enjoy abiding communion. God is only a temporary refuge, not a permanent home. Their religion is a sort of umbrella which they use in a storm. It plays no part in days when the storm is over, and the weather is calm and bright, and every circumstance is genial and comforting. God is just a shelter in time of trouble. ale is not a home.

There are others to whom the Lord is only as a mple to which they periodically recur for stated and rmal devotion. They pay visits to God. They do ot live with Him. They have hours of worship, but ey do not offer Him their lives. They flirt with od, they do not seek the settled fellowship of edded communion. They go to His temple, they do not live in His home.

And all this misses the real inheritance. God alone is our true home. And until we make Him our home everything in our life will be pinched and dwarfed like stunted trees which are away from their native clime. "Why art thou cast down, O my soul, and why art thou disquieted within me?" Why so drooping? Why so stunted? Why so withered? Get away to hy native clime! Get away home to God! Thou rt in the smothering air of the world. Away home! et to thy nature air, into the vitalizing communion the Father, for there thou shalt find the wealth of hy sonship, and there disquietude shall be changed nto confidence, and anxiety transformed into rest!

O my soul, thou art living in the streets of vagrancy! way to Thy home in the Lord! J. H. J.

The Promise of "Greater Things"

MONDAY. John 14 : 12. "Greater works than these shall he do." Our idea is that the big days of power were when Jesus visibly walked in Palestine, working His miracles. But His promise was that the disciples—and He sets no time-limit—would do greater things than these. So completely did He mble Himself, that He would speak like a modest neer who leaves to others the fruits of his discovery. Every organizer knows that success depends, not on doing things oneself, but on inspiring others to do them.

Our Saviour is the Author of capability. The greater things "that He desired are on record." He rebuked a fig-tree and it withered. Peter rebuked Ananias and Sapphira and they died. Jesus mastered storms on a lake. The storms that He enabled Paul to master were oceanic. He spoke to the Jews in one country. He sent His disciples to all nations in every land. He escaped wild beasts in the desert. Paul survived an actual snakebite. The Baptist died in a dungeon, but no dungeon could hold Peter and Paul when the work of Christ Risen had to be done. A woman touched the hem of His garment and was healed. But in the very shadow of Peter there was the same power, and Paul's garments were laid on the sick, who were made whole. If He cast out devils, so did they. If He raised the dead, so again did they. If He preached the Gospel in one place at one time and in one language, they were scattered abroad, preaching in many places, in many languages, with His signs following. The greater things were, thus, a fact.

But there were conditions. "Without Me," He had said, "ye can do nothing," and in the plenitude of their authority, the disciples never forgot this. P. W. W.

Seeing the Invisible

TUESDAY. Heb. 11 : 1. "The proving of things not seen." Christ came into the world, that he might give his people the far-away look. He postulated all his teaching on the reality of the unseen world and our vital interest in it. Take away God and immortality, and the Gospel is resolved into nil. Take away the supreme importance of other-worldliness and the Cross is no more than two transverse beams on which a man dies like other men. "I go to prepare a place for you," said Christ; "in my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so I would have told you." Wherefore we are enjoined to lay up treasure not here but in the world further on. And to make that injunction the more impressive, he propounds a problem that staggers all science and philosophy. "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his life?"

How, then, are we living? Are we among those who, "forever hastening to the grave, stoop downward as they run?" Or have we the far-away look? Are we sojourning here as "pilgrims and strangers, looking for a better country, even an heavenly, and for a city that hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God"? D. J. B.

Seek High Ideals

WEDNESDAY. Judges 5 : 23. "Curse ye Meroz, because they came not to the help of the Lord against the mighty." Indifference is to be despised as strongly as actual opposition. The fig tree was cursed not because it was baneful, but barren. Every one must be for or against our Lord; there is no neutral position for real manhood. Cowards are as despicable as enemies. Negatives are ciphers, valueless unless alongside the positive Christ. To neglect the great salvation of the Son of God is as deadly as to reject Him. For the Christ to be thought not worth the attention or consideration of a human being is superlative folly. Never to be interested in the "what, whence or whither" of the soul is to be dead to the highest aspirations of being. To realize no Divine presence in the universe is to sink to the level of the brute. To see no Providence at work in the history of nations, in the progress of education, civilization and Christianity is to be blind as the mole burrowing in the ground. To be indifferent to the great and awful possibilities in manhood is to be a nonentity in time, and a rebel in eternity.

Great infidels do not flourish in this century. The attitude of unbelievers has changed from open hostility to insidious indifference. Millions are drifting down the river of time toward the great chasm, careless, thoughtless, and deaf to all appeals. They love everything but Christ and His salvation. O for a flash of Divine lightning to awaken a world. Prosperity in wealth, delight in pleasure seem to dull the conscience and blind the eye to the light of God. The cross becomes a stumbling block and the Gospel foolishness to those whose only hope lies in trusting in the word which abideth forever. E. W. C.

Waiting On God

THURSDAY Ps. 46 : 10. "Be still and know that I am God." We cannot go through life strong and fresh on constant express trains, with ten minutes for lunch; but we must have quiet hours, secret places of the Most High, times of waiting upon the Lord, when we renew our strength, and learn to mount up on wings as eagles, and then come back to run and not be weary, and to walk and not faint.

The best thing about this stillness is that it gives God a chance to work. "He that is entered into His rest hath ceased from his own works, even as God did from His." When we cease from our works, God works in us; when we cease from our thoughts, God's thoughts come into us; when we get still from our restless activity, "God worketh in us both to will and to do of his great pleasure," and we have but to work it out.

Let us dwell in "the secret place of the Most High"; let us enter into God and His eternal rest; let us silence the other sounds, and then we can hear "the still, small voice." A. B. S.

The Growth of the Kingdom

FRIDAY. Luke 12 : 32. "It is your Father's good pleasure to give you the Kingdom." All nature is subsidized to furnish forth prophecies of the triumph of Immanuel. Look upon the fields and see how souls are springing up "like willows by the water courses" and how the harvest of an handful of corn is "waving like Lebanon." Lift up your eyes to the hills and behold, "the mountains and the hills are breaking forth before him into singing," and the trees upon their verdant slopes are "clapping their hands before him." Turn toward the desert and see his caravans, "the rams of Nabaioth and the dromedaries of Midian," laden with gold and spices to lay before him. Gaze out upon open sea and observe "the ships of Tarshish coming from far." Or look upward and count the host of heaven if you can; "Even so shall his seed be!"

All history, moreover, is in evidence. The eleven men who issued from an upper room in Jerusalem after the resurrection of Christ were practically the sum total of the Church at the beginning of the Christian era. A more preposterous campaign was never undertaken; for they were setting out upon the conquest of the world! But a great promise was theirs; "Fear not, little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the Kingdom." Follow them for ten centuries and you shall see fifty millions trooping after them: for ten more and behold five hundred millions of Christians singing as they march, "All hail the power of Jesus' name!" D. J. B.

Cross Bearing

SATURDAY. Matt. 10 : 38. "He that taketh not his cross is not worthy of me." Our Lord was no doubt contemplating Calvary, when he said to His disciples, "Let him take up his cross and follow Me." When Jesus became too weak to bear the heavy burden of the wooden cross, one Simon was found to bear it for Him.

It is said that when Charles Simeon, a university professor, was in a great trouble, he strolled forth one day reading his Greek Testament as he went, and praying that some comforting passage might be given him. The first text that caught his eye was this, "They found a man of Cyrene, Simon by name. Him they compelled to bear His cross." Simon being the same as Simeon, a great blessing came upon the professor, when he had the hint that he might bear the cross after Jesus. He truly felt it a great honor that he could participate in Christ's sufferings.

Should we not suffer willingly with Him that we may be glorified with Him forever? Should we not deny ourselves and take up our cross as willingly as Jesus bore the Cross the Father gave Him for humanity, remembering that the disciple is not above his Master? If the great aim of our life is to save it, we will lose it, but losing it for the sake of Christ and the world, we will find it forever. Let us remember Calvary that we may know what it means to follow Christ, going with Him all the way, through the garden, up the hill, down to the sepulchre, and with Him, ascend to glory.

WHY UNCLE SAM NEEDS A BUDGE

By

Hon., JAMES W. GOOD, M.C.

Chairman, Select Committee on the Budget, U. S. House of Representatives

IF YOUR income is $5,000 a year, common sense tells you that your expenditures must not exceed $5,000. Whether you have a fixed program for spending your income, you divide it more or less carefully between the items that enter into the cost of your living—so much for rent, so much for meat, so much for groceries, insurance, church, charity, clothes, etc. Even if you do not have it down in black and white, you know approximately what these items are going to cost you in the course of a week or month, whichever may be the unit of your income.

It may surprise you to know that your system of mental budgets is an advance in economy over anything the Federal government has attempted, because in Washington there is nothing that even resembles a budget. The departments go on the theory that the United States Treasury is just around the corner and all they need do is send over and get all the money they want. Expenditure bears no relation to income. Some of the government economists, however, have long felt the need of a revolution in fiscal affairs and Mr. Good, in the accompanying article, tells what is being done to put the nation on a budget basis.

TIME was, and that not so long ago, when the American citizen, with few exceptions, took but little interest in the administration and financial operations of his national government. Until a few years ago that government made no direct demand upon him for funds. Now it stretches its hand into the pockets of millions of the people and, through its system of direct income, corporation, excess and other taxes, makes a total demand upon them for the payment of billions of dollars annually. The war has brought with it an annual charge of a billion dollars for the payment of interest on debts incurred for its prosecution and for one or two other billions to be paid annually in the support of a larger army and navy, the promotion of inland communication, foreign shipping and many other fields of activity into which the government was forced to enter as a part of its war program. Even prior to the war the administrative activities of the government had expanded greatly.

The result is that, at the present time, the American citizen is directly interested in the affairs of the national government both from the revenue and expenditure standpoint. While formerly it was a matter of more or less indifference to him, in so far as his personal interests were concerned, as to how the affairs of the national government were administered, now it is a matter of direct moment to him. Due to this, an overwhelming demand has arisen that the national government shall throw off its old haphazard and easy-going method of determining what expenditures shall be made and apply itself to the problem of putting its system of financial administration upon a sound and economical basis. It is now fully realized that it is only in this way that the existing high rate of federal taxation can be diminished, if, indeed, still further levies are to be avoided.

Years of careful study of the existing system under which the expenditure needs of the government are estimated and of the procedure employed by Congress in providing for them, has made it evident that these evils can only be avoided by the national government adopting what is known as a budget system as the central feature of its system of financial administration.

BRIEFLY stated, a budget system has for its purpose to insure that Congress will annually get before it a carefully formulated, consolidated and coordinated statement of the revenue and expenditure needs of the government balanced one against the other in such a way as to make known the extent to which the program or activities as therein set forth will result in a deficit or a surplus over anticipated revenues; that this program, which should emanate from the administration, will then be considered by Congress as a program, in the sense that all of its parts will be considered in their relations to each other at one and the same time; and, finally, that adequate provision will be made by Congress, as the fund-raising and fund-granting authority, of means by which it may assure itself that the orders that it has given to the administration, through revenue, appropriation and other acts, are faithfully carried out.

Upon the assembling of the Sixty-sixth Congress on May 20. 1919, the leaders of both parties in that body agreed that a measure looking to the establishment of a budget system, as above described, should be immediately elaborated and as speedily as possible enacted into law. To this end the House of Representatives on July 31, 1919, provided for the appointment of a Select Committee on the Budget, of which the writer was made Chairman, which should have the duty of making a thorough investigation of the existing system for the handling of the national finances, of determining what steps should be taken for its improvement, and of reporting the results of its conclusions to the House by bill, resolution or otherwise. This committee immediately entered upon the discharge of its duties, organized public hearings, at which thirty-seven persons appeared and gave their testimony, and, on the conclusion of such hearings, reported its findings in the form of a bill entitled: "A Bill to Provide a National Budget System and an Independent Audit of Government Accounts and for Other Purposes," and a House Resolution providing for the amendment of the rules of the House governing the procedure to be employed in making appropriations for the support of the government.

AMONG the persons appearing and testifying at such hearings were such high authorities as: former President of the United States, William H. Taft; Frank O. Lowden, Governor of Illinois; former Secretary of War, Henry L. Stimson; former chairmen of the House Committee on Appropriations, John J. Fitzgerald and Swagar Shirley; the present Secretary of the Treasury, Carter Glass; the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Franklin D. Roosevelt; the Comptroller of the Treasury, Judge W. W. Warwick; members of Congress who had given special attention to the problem of financial reform; and a number of private individuals who had made special studies of budgetary systems in this and foreign countries, which rendered them specially competent to assist the committee with their views. The report of these hearings was published in a volume of nearly eight hundred pages and constitutes a mine of information regarding all phases of the problem under consideration.

The prime feature of the bill providing for the adoption of a national budget system is that it definitely imposes upon the President of the United States the obligation of annually laying before Congress a complete program of what provision in his opinion should be made for meeting the revenue and expenditure needs of the government for the year to ensue. This will do away with the vicious system at present existing under which each department and establishment of the government, independently of the other, and without any attempt on the part of any administrative officer to revise, harmonize or correlate them, formulates and, through the Secretary of the Treasury as a transmitting but non-revising organ, submits its estimates of the sums of money which it would like to have granted it for the prosecution of its work. These estimates are thus formulated without any reference to their relative importance or to the bearing of their aggregate upon the state of the treasury and prospective revenues. It is a common thing for a number of services to ask appropriations for work in identically the same field. Duplication of organization and activities is thus widespread in the administrative branch of the government.

UNDER the system that is proposed these estimates, instead of being sent directly to Congress, in the way that has been mentioned, will go to the President, and the latter, as head of the administration, will have the obligation and responsibility of considering them, subjecting them to such revision as he deems necessary, and of bringing them together in the form of a harmonious, financial and work program. Seldom in the past has the question of economy and only incidentally that of administrative efficiency been made a political issue. The requirement that the President shall be the only officer authorized to make requests upon Congress for funds will make this operation of the formulation and submission of a budget a supreme administrative and political act. If the President asks for unnecessary funds or suggests an organization for their expenditure in which duplications, overlappings and inefficiencies exist, his will be the responsibility, and the people will be afforded a means by which this responsibility will be made clear and definite.

To enable him efficiently to perform this duty the bill makes provision for a bureau to be known as the Bureau of the Budget, which will have as its duty that of acting as the executing agent of the President in exercising this function of determining and making known financial needs. If the bill is enacted the President will thus be put in the position of general manager of the government as a business corporation, and he will be given a service through which he can discharge the duties of that office. Emphasis is upon this feature of the bill since, if economy is t realized, the evil of unwise and unnecessary expe tures must be attacked at its source and this sourc the estimates of needs as formulated by the admi trative branch of the government.

THE suggestion has been made, and it is und stood has some support in the Senate, that t duty of preparing the budget, as above describe should be vested in the Secretary of the Treasu instead of the President. Doing so would represen great mistake. The President is the head of t administration. He is the only officer who is the su rior of all other administrative officers. He is the o official who can in any way act as general manager the administrative activities of the government. I is the only administrative officer who is elected by t people and who can be held politically responsible f his acts. Apart from this, it is certain that Cabine officers will not acquiesce in a revision of their expend ture proposals by a fellow Cabinet officer in the sam way that they would yield to the wishes of their supe rior, the President. Should this duty be entrusted t the Secretary of the Treasury it is therefore to b apprehended that it will either be performed in a perfunctory or timid manner or will give rise to consta friction between the departmental heads. The que tion as to whether the President coul perform the duties which this bill proposes to confer upon him was very carefully considered by the Selec Committee that reported the bill President Taft was emphatic in th statement that the President coul easily do so if given the special servic provision for which is made by the bill

The second important feature of the bill is that providing for an independent department of accounts whose duty it will be to examine and audit all expenditures made by the government. At the present time the government has a Comptroller of the Treasury and six auditors who apparently have such duties. These officers, however, are officers of the Treasury Department and thus of the administrative branch. The result is that the administration in effect examines and audits its own accounts. Under the system proposed by the bill this examination and audit, as stated above, will be performed by an agency independent of the administration. It will be its duty, not merely to see that all expenditures made have been in compliance with law but of determining and reporting to Congress the extent to which administrative authorities have exercised unwisely discretion conferred upon them, have been guilty of extravagance or inefficiency, or have failed in any other manner to organize and operate an efficient system for the collection, custody and expenditure of public funds. At the present time Congress seeks in a very ineffective and cumbersom manner to secure such information through the co duct of special investigations.

THIS bill was taken up by the House a few da after its introduction, was ably debated an finally passed and sent to the Senate on October 21, 1919. The measure was discussed from a thoroughly non-partisan standpoint and the vote in its favor was almost unanimous, being 285 to 3.

The resolution reported by the committee and now on the House calendar provides for a change in the committee organization and procedure of the House so that all authority to initiate and recommend appropriations will be vested in a single committee on appropriations, thus doing away with the present system under which a number of committees have authority to report general appropriation bills, and almost any committee can report measures containing clauses providing for the appropriation of public funds. Under this system responsibility is not definitely located anywhere. Congress itself does not know what is the total of the moneys that it is voting nor the relation of this aggregate to prospective revenues until it has terminated its work, and it is of course then too late to do anything looking towards the establishment of a closer relationship between income and outgo.

Fortunately these evils which I have barely touched upon are now well recognized in both the legislative and executive branches of the government, and practically all in authority are agreed that the remedy of these evils lies in the establishment of a budget system along the lines set forth. It is fortunate, moreover, that a definite beginning has been made for the accomplishment of this great reform. The House of Representatives has acted in part and has now before it a favorable recommendation from its Select Committee for the taking of the additional step required to perfect the new system. It is to be hoped that the Senate will act with equal vigor.

Bonds Versus Cash

Some Factors That Should Govern Investment in Securities and the Desirability of Holding Gilt-Edged Bonds

DURING the financial depression of 1907 a number of firms which had plenty of money deposited in bank found themselves unable to use that money because o' the failure or temporary closing of their banks. Some of these firms were nearly driven to the wall in consequence of not being able immediately to draw the cash which was rightfully theirs.

It occurred to the head of one of these firms that it would be much better to buy a number of securities, which might be kept in a lock box and might at any time be turned into cash, rather than to depend upon the exigencies cf the banking situation. To invest a large amount of money in bonds immediately was not practicable, but with the object of securing the desired protection before another financial depression could occur the firm indicated above made special arrangements with a well-known banking house as follows:

The banking house was placed upon the firm's weekly pay-roll. On every pay-day a separate check is drawn in addition to the regular salary check and is sent to the banking house mentioned, with instructions to have it deposited in what is known as the firm's regular bond account. The banking house accepts the money and at proper intervals invests it in good bonds, which are sent to the various firms as the bonds are acquired. At least one of the firms indicated has now a very large holding of bonds, which stand not only as a reassurance of protection from disaster, but which at the same time yield a profit in the form of yearly interest.

During the depression of 1907 many persons thought it expedient to carry large amounts of money in lock boxes. This saved them from the predicament in which firms that could not use their bank reserves were placed. But on the other hand, as the money thus remained idle, it earned its owners no profit for quite an extended period of time. The practice of acquiring bonds as a reserve has the advantage of being quite as safe and at the same time yielding a good profit. It might be argued that bonds are not saleable during periods of depression. On the other hand, Wall Street during the 1907 depression was full of bargain-hunters who showed a capacity and willingness to absorb large quantities of securities at the then prevailing prices.

Now, if the practice of buying bonds for the reason and in the manner suggested above is deemed wise by such concerns, why would it not be just as desirable for the individual who wishes to provide for the possible rainy day? If the large firm finds it expedient to place the bond house upon its pay-roll, sending money weekly or monthly until enough has been acquired to buy bonds, why could not the householder or the farmer in like manner lay aside a certain amount weekly or monthly, which would accumulate with the very definite object of buying bonds?

The money can be deposited in a savings bank until such times as a sufficient amount had been acquired for the purchase of a bond. Where bonds are sold upon instalments the money can be sent directly to the bond house, or it can be held in the family treasury until the amount necessary for the purchase of one or more bonds has been accumulated. Where the money is deposited in a savings bank, or paid on a partial payment bond account, each deposit draws interest from the day it is made, and thus the earning power of the investment would be, as it were, set in motion even before the bond was actually purchased.

If the intending bond purchaser happened to be a storekeeper, he might reserve a weekly amount equal to the wages of one employee. It he happened to be a farmer, he might set aside a definite percentage of his monthly expenses. If he happened to be a wage earner with a raise in hand, he might set aside that raise each week for the purchase of a bond, instead of using it to defray the expense o' an increase in his mode of living. If the person, whatsoever his walk of life, happened to have a reserve fund already saved, he might start in and purchase bonds at once, since it happens that good bonds offer exceptionally high yields at the present time; and the prices of good bonds are likely to be higher later on.

A bond has an advantage over many other forms of securities in that it is redeemable at par upon the date of its expiration. All forms of securities fluctuate from time to time, though bonds fluctuate least of all. Thus a bond of $1,000 par may, because of conditions entirely unrelated to its safety, sell at $900 in the open market. When its term of life has expired, however, it must be redeemed at the value expressed upon its face, which, in the case supposed above, would be $1,000, so that a person who purchased a $1,000 bond at say $900, would receive $1,000 fo: it when its term had expired, in addition to the interest which would be paid on it each year during its period of life. Individual purchasers of bonds usually buy for investment, seldom for speculation. That is, they expect to keep the securities until they are retired. If the company which issues the bond is financially sound, the owner of the bond can confidently expect in the end to be paid the full amount of the money promised on its face.

A $50,000 Carpet

WHAT is regarded as the most interesting carpet in existence was sold at an auction in New York recently of the late Captain J. de Lamar's art effects. In 1910 Captain De Lamar bought for $27,000 the famous mosque carpet of Ardebil. When the furnishings of the De Lamar mansion were put on sale the Ardebil carpet sold for $50,000, which was said to be a record price for a carpet sale.

The Ardebil rug is one of a pair made for the famous mosque of the Sheikh Sefil at Ardebil in Persia. They were made by the same artist, this rug succeeding the other on the loom, both being signed and dated. They were made in the sixteenth century, when rug-making in Persia was at its height. The De Lamar rug is 23 feet 11 inches long by 13 feet 5 inches wide, texture 400 Persian hand-tied knots to a square inch, approximately 18,600,000 knots to the fabric. This rug is somewhat smaller now than its mate, which is in the South Kensington Museum, parts of it having been used years ago to repair the latter. The South Kensington rug is slightly coarser in weave, having only 380 knots to the square inch.

Growing Bank Deposits

THE last rep-rt of the comptroller of the treasury shows that the national banks of the United States have 18,240,300 depositors. That is approximately one-sixth of the whole population. This compares with a total of 7,690,468 individual accounts on June 30, 1910, the increase in the number of depositors from June, 1910, to June, 1919, being 10,549,832 or 137 per cent. in nine years.

In the same period the total deposits (individual and bank) have grown from $7,257,037,747 on June 30, 1910, to $15,924,865,000 on June 30, 1919, an increase of 119 per cent.

The average balance to the credit of each individual depositor (not including balances of banks) on June 30, 1919, was $651.92, which compares with an average deposit of $689.47 on June 30, 1910.

NEW Mitchell
SIXES

The Latest in Closed Cars

Above is shown the latest four-passenger Coupe built on the new Mitchell chassis. It is luxuriously finished, upholstered and equipped. Every detail shows the final touch.

Appreciated Improvements

These closed cars, in every detail, are winning men's appreciation. On the road people turn to admire them. If you are at the wheel, you know you are driving a new-type car. If you are a rear-seat passenger, you experience new riding comfort.

The Coupe seats four—the Sedan five. Both models are extremely roomy.

Note the body work. Notice the interiors. The upholstery is rich gray velour, as are the ceiling and side panels. There are gray silk curtains and high-pile Wilton carpeting to match.

Many Chassis Betterments

These new Mitchell Sixes embody numerous improvements. They come as a result of two years of revisions, based on sixteen years experience.

All these new standards aim at lasting newness. There are larger parts and stronger parts. There is vastly more endurance.

Brake efficiency has been increased. A new-type disc clutch is added.

In the motor, fuel cost has been reduced. Power has been increased. There is utter smoothness, perfect balance.

Inspect These Cars

Before you buy a closed car, become acquainted with the Mitchell Sedan or Mitchell Coupe. Each is a fine car—a car to keep—built in the way you will favor. Both are mounted on the Mitchell Victory Chassis.

Factory efficiency brings this fine car at a moderate price. The Mitchell plant is famous for its cost-reducing methods.

Mitchell dealers will be delighted to show you these closed cars as well as our open models. They will show you dozens of improvements and dozens of refinements. Or, if you wish, write us direct for an illustrative book.

Nation-Wide Prayer for Revival

The Spiritual Awakenings of the Past and the Lessons They Teach

AT THIS time, when the hearts of multitudes are praying for a great spiritual revival, it may be helpful to review the revivals of the past to note how they originated and what they accomplished. The whole history of the Christian Church is one of successful revivals. Without these periodical awakenings, it would never have made the spiritual progress it did.

In these sordid days, when multitudes are bent on the acquisition of wealth, the indulgence of extravagance, and the pursuit of pleasure, there are many who belittle revivals. They assert that they are things of the past—out of date and unsuited to the needs of the modern age. Even in some of the churches, we hear such mistaken teachings. There are pastors who regard the revival as an intrusion upon the calm of their church life, with its formalities and proprieties. They will join in a "drive" for any one of a multitude of good causes, but never in a drive for souls.

As we look back on history, we see how even the Exodus itself was in a large sense a revival. Israel, blind and besotted in its bondage, hugged its flesh-pots and had no vision of the future. Even after it had started across the wilderness, its faith needed constant renewing.

Pentecost, which has been called the commencement of the new era, of organized Christianity, was essentially a revival. The whole ministry of Jesus was preparatory work for the up-building of his Church on earth, and the revival came as he had promised, with the Pentecostal enduement of power.

IN HIS notable book, "The History of American Revivals," Dr. F. G. Beardsley has reviewed the historical succession of spiritual awakenings in comparatively modern times. The first notable American spiritual arousal came in the middle of the seventeenth century. The first generation of the early settlers had passed away. They were men of strong faith, and fine character. Under their successors, however, spiritual life deteriorated. Although church attendance was compulsory and church membership was requisite to citizenship, religion languished. One or two earnest preachers kept the Gospel light burning in their pastorates. It was in New England that the "Great Awakening" began, which ultimately spread throughout Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, New York, and other states. Beginning in 1734, it continued with increasing momentum, until a great harvest of souls had been gathered.

The period that followed was one of steady spiritual growth, even after the first fervor had expended itself. It gave to the nation a large group of strong spiritual leaders, whose influence spread. It is recorded, that when an account of the numerous conversions fell into the hands of John Wesley in London, he wrote in his journal: "Surely this is the Lord's doing, and it is marvelous in our eyes!"

BUT the "Great Awakening" had been preceded by a long period of preparation. The blessing had not come unsought. When it did come, the revival fire swept from state to state, until the spiritual conflagration was recognized as sent of God. The great preachers of those days, Whitefield, Edwards, Blair, Finley, Dickinson—all men of fine training and superior ability—devoted themselves wholly to revival work. Rev. Jonathan Parsons, writing of tho effects in his parish, said: "Rough minds became peaceful, gentle, easy to be entreated. We observed a delight in Christian fellowship." Jonathan Edwards wrote of the revival in Northampton: "This work of God, as the number of the converts multiplied, soon made a glorious alteration in the town. It seemed to be full of the presence of God. It never was so full of love, nor so full of joy. There were tokens of God's presence in almost every house. Our public assemblies were beautiful; the congregations were alive in God's service." Similar accounts came from many other cities.

It is on record that the results of the "Great Awakening" were momentous and far-reaching. Beardsley says: "Prior to this mighty upheaval, the churches were devoid of spirituality and power. Their membership was largely unregenerate, drawn hither by social and political influences. Outside of the church, indifference and irreligion were on the increase. The 'Great Awakening' resulted in the spiritual quickening of all the churches."

Rev. Ezra Stiles, later President of Yale, wrote that over 150 new churches sprang up in different towns and parishes, and that from 25,000 to 50,000 were added to the churches of New England. Even in the middle colonies and in Virginia and the South, there was a notable increase in Congregationalists, Presbyterians and Baptists. All shared in these accessions. Further, a secondary result of the awakening was a quickening along missionary and educational lines, which bore fruit afterwards in great Gospel enterprises at home and abroad. Still another outcome was the influence of the revival upon religious and political liberty. It brought greater tolerance and a broader conception of liberty of conscience. Sects, once rivals, began to live harmoniously together, under the unifying influence. Thus the "Great Awakening" became Pentecostal in its subsequent results. It not only quickened the spiritual life of the nation, but it was the forerunner of a long chain of revivals which are bright spots in the nation's history.

The spiritual life of the nation had again declined when the period of the Revolution dawned. Revivals were rare. The most notable were the Princeton, N. J., revival in 1771-72, which transformed the religious life of the college, and revivals at Elizabethtown and Newark, N. J., various points in Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Connecticut and New Hampshire. The most remarkable movement of the period was the rise and growth of Methodism, for which the labors of Whitefield had prepared the way. At the close of the war, as Dr. Beardsley relates, Asbury was able to write triumphantly: "We have about 14,000 members, and between seventy and eighty traveling preachers. The Gospel has taken a universal spread. Oh, America! it will certainly be the glory of the world for religion!". In the main, however, other church organizations had settled down to a state of apathy. Worship was neglected and it is recorded that vice and immorality increased alarmingly.

About this time, a wave of French infidelity swept over the land. It became fashionable to be regarded as a doubter or unbeliever, and scoffing was common. Religion was regarded as out of date. Infidel literature flooded the country.

SOON, however, there came signs of a new awakening. In the last years of the eighteenth century, revival fires, kindled no one knew how, began to appear. This new movement did not expend its force quickly. There was a long succession of "times of refreshing." It spread through Pennsylvania, New York, Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia, the Carolinas, and the Southwest. It resulted in the overthrow of the infidel propaganda and the quickening of the churches, and its converts reached up into the hundreds of thousands. One of the great denominations had over 40,000 accessions.

Charles Grandison Finney, perhaps the greatest of American revivalists, was a leading figure in the evangelism of the last century. Under his ministry, multitudes were brought into the Kingdom. His preaching was peculiarly suited to the age in which he lived and labored, and the results attained were deep and lasting.

In 1841 the pastors of Boston united in a work of revival which attained remarkable dimensions. Elder Jacob Knapp was the leader, and more than 4,000 converts were added to the churches.

The great religious arousal of 1857 began at a time when the country was swept by financial panic, the result of over-speculation. Thousands of business concerns failed and manufactories were shut down, making multitudes idle. Specie payments were suspended. Business men stood face to face with ruin. In this trying time, the distracted people appealed for Divine help. Special leaders were prepared and a great revival work began in New York, quickly spreading to Philadelphia, Albany, Boston, Cincinnati and Chicago. Before the movement closed, it was described as "a continuous prayer meeting all the way from Omaha to Boston." Estimates of the number added to the churches in this phenomenal visitation ranged all the way from 300,000 to 1,000,000. It is said that while the revival was at its height, the number converted weekly was over 50,000.

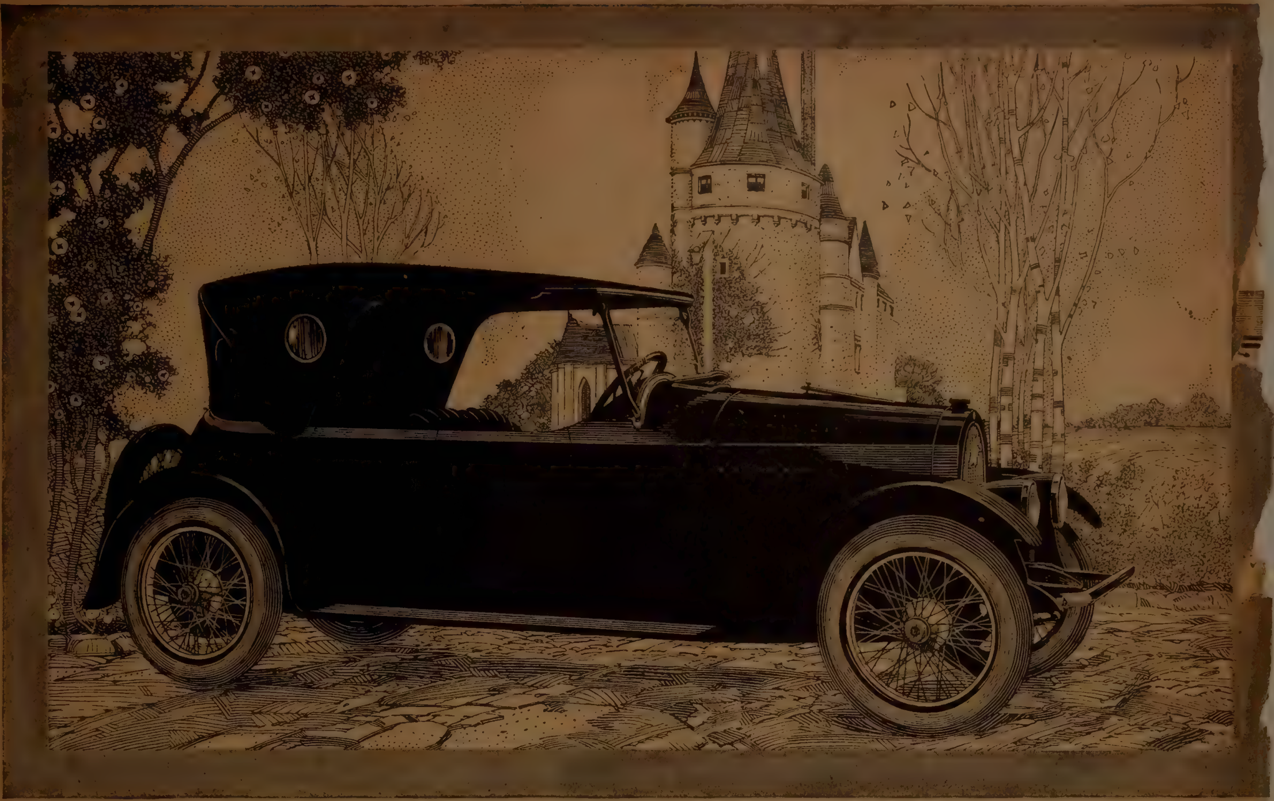
IN COMPARATIVELY recent years, the remarkable revivals conducted by Moody and Sankey stand out as typical illustrations. Major D. W. Whittle, George F. Pentecost, J. Wilbur Chapman, C. H. Yatman, G. C. Stebbins, P. P. Bliss, L. W. Munhall, Thomas Harrison, R. A. Torrey, W. A. Sunday and a host of others—many of them still remembered by Christian Herald readers and some of them still active soul-winners—all belong to the later evangelism, which in its time has produced wonderful results, and brought souls without number into the Kingdom.

Never has the world needed revival as it needs it today. That this situation is fully appreciated by a very large proportion of Americans is evident from the movement which has sprung up within the last two months, both in and out of the churches, looking forward hopefully to a revival in the near future, and preparing for it. A simultaneous movement for Watch-Night Meetings, with which to close the old year, has been suggested. The primary object is to intercede for a world-wide revival. Tens of thousands are praying for revival—such revival as was witnessed in the days of Wesley and Whitefield, and later in the days of Finney and Moody. It is not too early to plan definitely for a Watch Night movement of intercession throughout every evangelical denomination. If every church would respond to the call to humiliation and prayer, there will be days of spiritual refreshing ahead.

A friend in Chicago, Mr. Thos. L. Stephens of the Great Commission Prayer League, writes us: "Would that God might lay it upon the Christian Herald to become one of the foremost in urging prayer for revival, and the cooperation of its readers in the Watch Night movement."

Is not this a time of all times when prayer is needed? Surely it is, and when can there be a better time than on the night of December 31 for all God's people "with one accord" to cry mightily unto Him?

The time has come when the Church must go to God for itself, before it can go to God for a lost world. Prayerless churches are powerless churches—from God's point of view—no matter how full of "good works."



DEFINITE VALUES DECIDE

APPERSON

"The Eight With Eighty Less Parts"

Definite, permanent values have proved their power with the car buyer.

Many have recently been added to the army of Apperson owners.

Thinking buyers approve the Apperson swing into speed—from 1 to 40 miles an hour in high in 20 seconds.

And the Apperson emergency stop—from 40 miles an hour to standstill in 4 seconds—40 yards.

The complete turn of this 130-inch wheelbase car in 38¼ feet is another tribute to Apperson engineering.

The economical mind studies the remarkable tire and gasoline mileage of the Apperson.

The man with an eye to comfort likes the Apperson control immediately below his right hand; the pedal accelerator the full length of the foot; and the levers that form a natural brace for the leg in touring.

He finds himself driving long distances with no arm cramp. The splendid balance of the Apperson makes steering easy. He climbs out of the car after a day's run, rested, not wearied. Long springs and deep cushions have given a full measure of comfort.

And his satisfaction is the greater when he reflects that these qualities are assuredly permanent. The Apperson record of car building—continuous since 1893—is warranty of that.

Buy your car as the men who know are buying.

Drive an Apperson First—Then Decide.

You'll find an Apperson dealer near you. Or, if not, write us.

sought out Jane Carson, Reyburn staying only long enough to outline the ending of the Elizabeth Stanhope story, and Jimmie remaining to hear the beginning, and get a glimpse of the wedding gown, which Reyburn assured her he was sure she need never return. He said he thought if the owner of it was married ever in the future she would be likely to want a gown that had no unpleasant associations.

Great excitement prevailed in Tinsdale as the weeks went by. Betty had bought the lots either side of the Carson house, and wonderful improvements were in progress. A windmill was being erected and water pipes laid scientifically. Workmen arrived, some of them from the village, some from the city. Extensive excavations went on about the old house, and stone arrived. It began to be whispered about that "Miss Stanhope," as Betty was now called, was going to build the house all over and all of stone.

The work went forward rapidly as work can go when there is money enough behind it, and the family, living in the little old part of the house, and still using the faithful tin bath-tub and shower of Bob's manufacture, now looked forward to real bath-rooms on the bedroom floor, with tiled floors and porcelain fittings. Large windows cropped out on the new walls that were going up, a wide stone chimney and porches. A charming little stone affair in the back yard that went up so quietly it was hardly noticed until it was done suddenly became the home of a big gray car that arrived in town one morning. Betty gave up her position at the Hathaways so that she could have more time to superintend the work and see that it was just as she wanted it, and she and Bob spent hours going over the plans together, he making many wise suggestions. Mrs. Hathaway called her "Miss Stanhope" with elaborate ceremony, and made Elise kiss her whenever she met her.

Betty went to a near-by town and bought some pretty clothes, and a lot of things for Ma and Emily and Bob. A beautiful new piano came by express and took the place of Mrs. Barlow's tinpanny one.

Then Betty went up to the city and bought more things, furniture and silver and curtains and rugs, and brought Jane back with her to take a rest and see the little old house once more before it became the big new house, and stay until she was ready to be married, for Betty was determined to have the house ready for Jane's wedding.

When all the new beautiful things began to arrive Betty told Ma that she had taken her in when she was poor and homeless and absolutely penniless, and now all these things were her reward, and Betty couldn't do enough ever to thank her for what she had done for her. They had offered a five-thousand-dollar reward for news of her, and Ma had done more than ten thousand and thousands of thousands of dollars' worth of holding news back about her, and she was never going to get done giving her her reward.

Of course Betty brought Nellie home too, and established her in a lovely new room just fit for a young girl, and began to pet her and fix her up with pretty things as any loving sister might do if she had money of her own.

All this time Reyburn had much business to transact in Tinsdale, for Betty had asked him to look after all the little details about the building for her, and he had to come down every week-end and look things over to see that she was not being cheated. And once he brought Jimmie down with him for Ma to look over and approve and they had a wonderful time with the two best hens in the hen-coop for dinner. Ryan incidentally gave his approval to Betty.

During these visits Reyburn was making great strides in the wisdom and the knowledge of the love of God. One could not be in that family over Sunday and not feel the atmosphere of a Christian home. Even Jimmie felt it and said he liked it; that he wanted his house to be that way when he had one. He went obediently to church with Jane and marveled at the way social classes were getting all muddled up in his world.

The Christmas time was coming on when the house finally got itself completed and was ready for living, and with holly and mistletoe and laurel they made it gay for the wedding. Betty spent several days with Jane in New York picking out Jane's "trooso" things and then a few more days doing some shopping of her own, and the wedding day arrived.

Nobody thought it queer, though Jimmie felt just the least bit shy when the two trustees of Betty's estate arrived the night before from Boston and incorporated themselves into the party. Ma seemed to think it was all right, so nobody said anything about it.

But the next day, after the ceremony when Jane and Jimmie were happily married, Jane looking very young and pretty indeed in Betty's old wedding gown, veil and slippers and all, and standing under the holly bell in the laurel arch to be congratulated just as it had been arranged, there suddenly came a hush over everybody. Jane noticed for the first time that Betty was not anywhere in the room. Then everybody's eyes went to the wide staircase, and here came Betty trailing down the stairs on the arm of Reyburn, just in the simple little white organdie she had worn a few minutes before as bridesmaid, only she had thrown aside the rose-colored sash and put over her brow a simple tulle veil, and her arms were full of little pink rosebuds and lilies of the valley.

Up they walked in front of the minister just where the others had stood, and were married with the same sweet simple service, and everybody was so surprised and delighted and excited and breathless that Bob simply couldn't stand it. He slipped into the little music room where the piano had been installed, turned a handspring on the floor, and then sat down and played chopsticks on the piano with all the pedals on, till Ma had to send Emily in to stop him.

World Temperance Fund

THE W. C. T. U. is sending Miss Christine Tinling, one of its national lecturers, to China for a stay of two years to push the world prohibition campaign. The organization hopes to provide a fund of $300,000 for foreign use in connection with the anti liquor fight. The situation in China is particularly interesting to the American temperance organizations because of the exportation to the Far East of large quantities of brewer's and distiller's equipment and machinery no longer in use in the United States. There is abundant evidence that American interests are planning the construction of huge plants for the manufacture of alcoholic drinks in both China and Japan. The transfer of machinery began as long as a year ago and has been growing in volume recently.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

REQUESTS for prayer for revivals continue to increase. In view of the growing sentiment favorable to a revival, a hundred evangelical leaders were asked by an evangelical association to consider carefully whether in their judgment it would be pleasing to God to have them unite in a covenant of prayer for a world-wide revival. A large majority of those interrogated responded, and the replies were almost without exception strongly in the affirmative.

Thomas E. Stephens of the Great Commission Prayer League, Chicago, writes: "We are asking God to open the columns of the Christian Herald and other widely circulated papers to a movement for a revival that will effectually counteract and put to silence the undermining atheistic forces at work throughout the world to destroy the very foundations of Christian civilization. The world seems to have lost its head, but God still reigns."

Requests for prayers for a revival in the following places have been submitted: Lexington, Ohio; Dilworth, Minn.; a country church in Ohio; Dorset, Ohio; Beacon, N. Y.; Gooding, Idaho; Herrick M. E. Church, and for church and Sunday School work in Jerome, Arizona, also at Grindstone Hill, Pa., and in behalf of revival services to be conducted in Norfolk, Va.

M. A. H., in a letter to the Christian Herald, sends a request to the Prayer League asking prayer for a revival all over the State; also that the excessive rains in Texas may cease in order to avert heavy losses.

Sixty-six letters ask prayers for bodily healing for self or others; nine for the healing of sight, and six for the restoration of hearing. Five wives ask prayers for the conversion of husbands; a mother, that her sons may be converted; and eleven request prayers for the conversion of relatives and friends. A mother asks that her son may be cured of the drink habit, and a wife that her husband may be cured of the tobacco habit. Seven ask prayers in financial matters, and a sister asks for guidance for her brother in his new field of work. Twenty-five ask the prayers of the League in behalf of friends, and seven for spiritual guidance and blessing. Another mother asks the prayers of the League that her three sons may devote their lives to God's service; also that an invalid mother may be restored to health, or kept from severe suffering until the end may come.

G. E. H., acknowledges answered prayer, and requests the League to continue praying that he may be saved from his sins.

Mrs C. L. S., also acknowledges answered prayer. A pastor asks prayers that his labors may be fruitful and that he may be able to win many souls to Christ.

The Human Touch in South Africa

AFTER neglect, oppression and legalized wrong for many years had been the regular portion of the blacks in South Africa wherever they came in contact with the white man, a better day seems to be dawning, according to missionaries of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (Congregationalist) who have returned from posts near Durban, Natal.

South Africa boasts that it does not have lynchings, but in Transvaal and what was once the Orange Free State, a negro, the ancient possessor, cannot own land under any conditions. In the cities he is confined to the "Location," or segregated black district, where he endures frightful surroundings. There he can only rent the use of a plot of land and in some cases cannot even do that. In Pretoria the negroes for the most part live in shacks made of old oil cans and bits of sacking. Johannesburg announced the building of a model city for its blacks. The site was seven miles from town and the path to it led through the municipal dumping grounds. Here there were set up "houses" consisting each of half of a cylindrical iron water tank! In those the natives were to bake in summer and freeze in winter, and pay $5 a month rent. This was too much for even the long-suffering natives, and the "model village" stands vacant.

But the city of Durban has just completed a real model "Location." It consists of one hundred houses for negro families and a dormitory holding about five hundred single men. There is actually a municipal bath in this village and the two-room cottages are magnificence itself compared with what the natives have been accustomed to. Here live the messenger boys and factory hands who have come in from the wilds to earn a living the white man's way. Their chance in life is not very great—at least it would not be considered so in any part of the United States—but it is better than it was.

The improvement in conditions is largely due to missionary influence. The Americans have been on this field for eighty years. They have built schools, taught the Gospel, and tried to do something to ameliorate the awful conditions they saw around them. The Interchurch World Movement expects to do much to increase mission effort in South Africa.

One other comparison is worth making. Up to the present there have been no government schools whatsoever for the blacks in South Africa! All the chance for schooling the negroes have had has been in the mission schools. Now the government finally has recognized its duty and is taking over the mission schools and promising to extend the work.

Evangelist Gypsy Pat Smith to Revisit U. S.

CAPTAIN GIPSY PAT SMITH, the well-known British Evangelist who conducted a five months' tour of America in the earlier part of 1919, has been witnessing great scenes in his evangelistic campaign in Great Britain. He left New York on August 23 last, and started in September for a three weeks' evangelistic campaign in Sutherland, in the north of England. There the churches under the Y. M. C. A. joined in a united campaign and the meetings were held in the great Victoria Hall, the largest hall in the north of England, seating 3,300 people. Night after night many decided for Christ, and on the closing Sunday night 150 people confessed conversion.

Gipsy Pat then began his next campaign in Motherwell, Scotland. Motherwell has been the home of red-hot evangelistic effort for many years, carried on by the late John Colville M. P. and now maintained by his widow Mrs. C. M. Colville, who is a real "Mother in Israel." The Captain's meetings were in the Town Hall and great scenes were witnessed nightly of demobilized soldiers deciding for Christ.

The Captain then crossed the Channel and commenced his next campaign in Belfast. The meetings were under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. and were aided by the city ministers. They were held in the large Y. M. C. A. hall, seating 2,000 people. The campaign lasted eight days, touching all parts of the city.

At the farewell meeting on Monday night, October 27, the building was packed to suffocation, crowds seeking admittance blocking the trainway system of the centre of the city.

The evangelist sailed on December 16 for New York.

On January 4 he will open a big Evangelist Campaign in Brooklyn,

Putting on a Sunday School Play

By MYRTA ALICE LITTLE

A PLAY with the whole school in it and enjoying it! Why not? It's not such an impossible problem after all.

Why not have a Sunday school pageant-play which shall be a joy to the Sunday school folks and a glad revelation to the audience who perchance never realized before what a thoroughly alive organization that Sunday school is.

There are scores of helpful books on the subject and related ones. For example those published by—The Presbyterian Board, Baptist S. S. Bd., Fleming H. Revell, Methodist Book Concern, W. A. Wilde Co., University of Chicago Press, Sunday School Times, Scribners', American S. S. Union, Pilgrim Press and just as many others. Selections from titles furnished by these companies will help with the basic ideas about which each school may weave an appropriate play—and like it. Then the reports of the International S. S. Conventions contain a grist of material waiting for originality and adaptation to the individual needs of a particular school.

Let's see how this might work out. Let us take a copy, say of "The Development of the Sunday School, 1780-1905," which is the official report of the 1905 Toronto Convention. Now let's put beside it statistics and side-lights and alive facts about our own school—all we can get together.

We see that the first division of the book is historical. Does that suggest anything? Why not use the different departments of our school as steps in the development of the International Sunday School, or, if you choose, in the growth of your own school. To illustrate: Let the cradle rollers, the older of them, with little one-line greetings, and as many others as possible in their older sisters' arms, tell about the infancy of the school. A preliminary announcement—pithy, entertaining, in song or story should pave the way for the arrival of the babies—and a cry or two will make the little difficulties in the organization of the school more realistic. Just let the littlest ones act the way they feel. The impression they make will be lovely, anyway.

The Primary Department may sing the next step in the school history. Pale pink and blue costumes (crêpe paper, cambric or cheese-cloth) are effective. And after the little marches, if you wish, it can take its place in the choir loft (if that is in the front of the church). The arrangement of the participants must of course depend upon the size of the church or hall, but some plan should be carried out which will permit the audience to watch easily the growth of the school by departments.

Next the Juniors may act out in pantomime, a typical Sunday's lesson in miniature. They may speak if this method of emphasizing this phase of the work seems better. Anyway, they'll love the acting, and the Junior Superintendent can be prepared to fill in heavier bits that the audience may like to hear about, but which the Juniors are not mature enough to supply. All-alike costumes (silver tinsel—Christmas tree tinsel festooned on white background is effective) should be provided if possible, the simpler, the better. But the effect of the ensemble will be increased manyfold, with pretty costuming.

The Intermediates may fittingly supply an acting out of the preliminary exercises of the school which occurs each Sunday before the separation into classes, and another announcement of the growth of the school should be inserted at this point in the pageant. Here the marches to the class sections may be simple but most effective and joined in by the Juniors and Primary children from each end of the platform—with soft music and Sunday school songs.

The Seniors may exemplify in clever ways a typical Sunday school convention, if they wish, using as little narrative as possible, but showing the fine spirit of those gatherings and letting different ones of their members have charge of a two-minute portion and responsible for its attractiveness. (Reference to the book Part 3, will be suggestive, also Division 2, by clever adaptation of which various relationships of the school may be illustrated. e. g.—missions—by use of members of each department—or Seniors merely—in simple tableaux of Japan, India, etc., in a city Sunday school mission, and hosts of other novelties.)

The final tableau is the mass of Sunday schoolers in the front of the church, each with a strand of cambric of her own color uplifted on a wand (whose end must have a snap or a small tack to hold the cambric). A temporary stage has been erected near the railing of the gallery. Here stands the superintendent or assistant superintendent of the school dressed in white and gold. (Here again Christmas tree tinsel on white cheesecloth may be used to advantage.) She gathers the streamers in her hands so that a colorful pointed roof tops her workers and she holds these while she unfurls the flags of the nations. The whole school leads the audience in singing the national hymn or adapted words to the same tune, or if preferred, to the tune of America. The last verse should be sung very softly while, if possible, the lights be turned low, or only the platform lights left on, and a little benediction-song closes the pageant.

and we have decided to put sandals on them for the summer.

Even in normal times English and American missionaries have considered it cheaper to bring out such necessities from America, and with the poor quality of material obtainable at abnormal prices now, the money seems to melt like snow before the sun's rays.

I have consulted with the head-master of St. George's Collegiate School, who has had many years' experience, also with the superintendent of the Syrian Orphanage under the auspices of the American Red Cross. Both feel certain that much would be saved by getting such material from the United States.

We feel that our Industrial schools fills a real need in Jerusalem. Girls have been trained as teachers heretofore, but for those who could not afford to attend the training schools for teachers there was no chance. We teach Arabic and English, with lessons in arithmetic, grammar and geography, but we emphasize the industrial part. After leaving our school, we want the girls to have a means of earning their living.

The lace department and the embroidery department are doing good work. The needle-lace and embroidery are useful as an assistance to the family. While the mother is watching her sleeping infant or waiting for her oven to heat (for we must remember that their housekeeping does not take all their time) these women, as in the case of the hand embroiderers of Ireland, can earn something which helps the family, through making lace. This is the reason we have added a dressmaking class and a department for lingerie.

Miss Holmstrom and Miss Henwood, who are carrying on these two departments, have volunteered their services. They receive nothing in return for the time they give. We cannot expect that such a state can continue. But through their untiring efforts, we have overcome some of the difficulties of starting a new department which our limited means could not have covered.

Miss Larson who is designer and embroidery teacher is also a voluntary worker and gives her full time. Our teacher of English, giving three hours daily, too, is a voluntary teacher.

Up to the present time, we have been able to sell all the lace work we produced. The military stationed in and around Jerusalem were good customers.

The Christian Herald Bible Course

Lesson VII. Joshua to the Monarchy

Read Joshua; Judges 1–16; I Samuel

OUR last lesson left the chosen people at Moab on the east of the Jordan, and ready to cross over into the Promised Land. Moses had left them, and Joshua had been divinely appointed and endued as his successor. The book named after him and doubtless written for the most part by him, is the history of the conquest and division of Canaan among the twelve tribes.

Chapter 1 gives us Joshua's commission and shows him issuing his preliminary commands to the leaders. In chapter 2, he is making, in military phrase, a reconnaissance of the enemy's position. In chapters 3–5, the people have miraculously crossed the river and are on the enemy's ground. Note here the several interventions of Jehovah to encourage them. That of verses 13–15 is one of the several Christophanies of the Old Testament, i. e., where the Second Person of the Godhead assumes visible form.

Chapters 6–12 inclusive carry on the story of the campaign, showing that after capturing Jericho, at the strategic center, the plan was first to overcome the alliance of the nations to the south and then those to the north. By-and-by we shall be free to consider such questions as the miracle in chapter 10, but just now we simply note it as a recorded fact.

Chapters 13–22 inclusive are taken up with the adjustment of the land boundaries among the tribes, in which we note the setting up of the tabernacle at Shiloh (18), the assignment of the cities of refuge (20), the fulfilment of Moses' promise to the two one-half tribes (22), and other features that had previously been planned.

Read very carefully the closing chapters (23 and 24) to obtain the setting of the next book which covers a period of some hundreds of years.

II

FOR a preface to, or practically a synopsis of the book of Judges, read chapter 2 : 6–19.

Joshua and his captains had been instrumental under God in conquering Canaan in bulk, so to speak, i. e., they had so far succeeded as to be able to apportion the territory to the different tribes according to the Divine appointment; but now it remained for the latter to complete the work each on its own part.

This was never done, because of unbelief, which in some instances took the form of fear, and in others that of selfish indolence or lust. The chastisement of Divine love fell upon them in consequence, which brought captivity and suffering until they cried out in penitence and faith. Then a leader, known as a "Judge," was divinely raised up and miraculously endued to deliver them from their oppressors and to rule over them for life; but on his decease, the same round of disobedience, punishment, distress, repentance and deliverance was repeated, and this again and again during the history of some fourteen judges, including Eli and Samuel named in the next book.

Familiarize yourself with the names of these Judges and an outline of the history of each of the three or four principal ones.

III

THE first book of Samuel brings us to the transition period, when because of the experiences narrated in the book of Judges, intensified by the bad behavior of the sons of the last two Judges, the people demand a change (chapter 8). Note that the need for this change had its roots in their failure to obey God. The form of government designed for them was a Theocracy. God Himself was their Sovereign, Whose laws in general terms had been revealed to them at Sinai, and Who was guiding and directing them in their current affairs by the prophets and priests to whom and through whom his will was made known in their particular affairs.

In what language does God lay this indictment against them in chapter 8?

Note the steps leading up to the final confirmation of Saul as the first king of Israel (chapters 9–12). Note the cause of his final rejection by God (chapters 13–15).

Who is chosen of God to succeed Saul (chapter 16)?

How had he been described previously by God (chapter 13 : 14)?

What word describes Saul's treatment of David thereafter, down to the time of the former's death?

For the answer to this, read the rest of the book.

How does David's conduct in comparison with that of Saul throw light on the meaning of the description in chapter 13 : 14?

T. T., Benton Harbor, Mich., asks for a good name for her Sunday School Class. We submit a short list some of which she may regard as appropriate: Friendship Class (or Circle), "Forget-Me-Nots" (for little folks), The Whatsoever Band, Willing Workers, Sunshine Band, The Volunteers, The Service Club, "True Blues," Friendly Helpers, The Sunnyside Set, Golden Text Circle, "Do-It-Now" Club, Good Friends' Coterie, "Ready" Club. We would be glad to have any of our readers send us a few titles to add to the foregoing list.

"Perplexed," Latohachee, Ala. Your problem as to what church you should join is one in which, under the circumstances as you have outlined them, we cannot advise. We feel, however, that we may venture so far as to say that you would do well to worship with the church of your parents, until you become convinced that a change is really essential. All the denominations teach the essentials of the Christian faith.

Reader, Twin Falls, Idaho. One who has fallen away from grace and been led into sin must come in sincere repentance and seek forgiveness and a new consecration. Go to the minister of the church you wish to join and tell him frankly what is in your heart. He will help you in your desire for assurance of forgiveness. Then you can write to the home church for your letter, if he so advises; or you can enter through confession of faith. Be guided by his counsel.

H. S. F., Lakeside, Calif. "In these days when evil seems to reign on the earth, does God direct his children in all their ways if they acknowledge him in all things? As I talk with Christian people, and even some ministers, there seems to be a doubt in their minds as to the truth of Prov. 3:6. Many admit that it ought to be so, but as individuals they cannot prove it. If this Scripture is meant for us of today, then it is hard for me to conceive of a heavenly Father who would not do this very thing if we only believe and trust him to do it. I know he has directed me at times, but am I right in claiming this promise at all times and for all things?"

"In all thy ways acknowledge him and he shall direct thy paths," is as true of Christian life and experience today as in olden times. What is needed is faith to lay hold of the promises, faith that looks for divine guidance in every difficulty and which asks, in full confidence, for wisdom and direction. Every true Christian has personal experience of this character. There are times when we come to the crossways where we sorely need the higher wisdom to aid in making a decision. Jesus has clearly told us that whatsoever we may ask in his name, having faith while we ask, it will be granted. We have known personally of many instances where perplexing problems were solved only after appealing for divine help. There are godly men and women without number who pray for it every day, and whose entire lives are subject to God's will and direction in all they undertake. In this age of widespread unbelief, however, it is not surprising to find doubts cast upon God's love and care for those who trust in him.

Peter Preaches at Pentecost

International Sunday School Lesson for January 4, 1920
Acts 2 : 1-47

By L. D. WHITTEMORE, A.M., LITT.D.

Prof. Whittemore, who conducts these Lessons, is a practical Sunday School teacher of many years' experience and he will prepare these Lessons with great care. We believe they will appeal strongly to the readers of The Christian Herald, especially to all Sunday School teachers

HINTS FOR THE STUDENT:—(1) Read with close attention the entire passage on which the lesson for the day is based. Preparation should not be confined to the study of the text ordinarily printed in the Sunday-school manuals, which is necessarily fragmentary. (2) Read such additional collateral and illustrative matter as may be available, and especially the passages referred to in these lessons. For to-day the words of Paul concerning speaking with tongues, I Cor. 12: 28-31; 13:1; 14:1-28, are especially illuminating. (3) Think over the material in modern terms, with a positive effort to interpret the lesson in the phraseology of to-day. (4) Concentrate on essentials, the purpose of these lessons being not to direct an exhaustive or critical study, but to present the most vital subjects in the most practical and suggestive manner. (5) Apply and practice the teaching.

1. The significance of beginnings. All days that mark the beginnings of great movements are full of significance. The Hebrew never grew weary of recounting the great deliverance of the Israelites from the Egyptians, which signalized the beginning of his nation; and we, as Americans, should be equally diligent in reciting to our children and children's children the exploits and achievements of the Pilgrim Fathers and the pioneers whose devotion to God and duty gave us Christian America. The Day of Pentecost, if it was not the birthday of the Christian church, was at least the day on which its marvelous expansion began; and thus its incidents are full of interest and should be cherished in the memory of every Christian. Will this new year of 1920 be celebrated forever as the year that marked an agreement among all the nations to abolish war and to substitute reason for force in the adjustment of difficulties? If this is so the Day of Pentecost will shine with new lustre, because without it there would have been no Christian civilization and no Christian democracy anywhere. Let us hope and pray that in this year of our Lord all nations may learn one language, the language of peace and good will, and that the apostles who teach the new doctrine may be understood by every nation.

2. On fire with holy zeal. The disciples who for three years had enjoyed the unique privilege of intimate association with their Master, Jesus, were only human and shared human frailties. At the critical moment their courage failed and they forsook him and fled. All their hopes were dead and their ambitions blighted. Suddenly they had been aroused from the spiritual sleep in which they had dreamed of sharing the dignity of the king-to-be; but the memory of that last promise lingered. "If I go away," he had said, "I will send another comforter who shall abide;" and not only that but, "I will be with you always."

Somehow, inexplicably, those words began to seem real and true. Despondency gave way to exaltation as they realized that the time had come for them to obey the last command th t they should go forth and teach all nations. But here in Jerusalem, at the feast of the harvest, all nations were gathered. What could be more opportune! Hence, as the Spirit gave them utterance, they began to speak; and all of the assembled sojourners appeared to understand. What opportunities for Christian service have been providentially provided for every disciple! and how many Pentecosts there would be if every such opportunity should be accepted with flaming zeal!

3. The greater miracle. In the study of an event like this, surrounded by circumstances which we can only represent to our minds by the imagination since we have never experienced anything precisely identical, it is better to project the essentials in the narrative forward for interpretation according to our present understanding, rather than to attempt to project our thought backward in an effort to explain something which is not explainable. The matter spoken of by the disciples, rather than the manner of their speaking, was the essential thing; and this was evidently uppermost in the mind of Peter, who, after he had sharply denied the superficial judgment of the amazed and perplexed witnesses, did not pause to explain the phenomenon of speaking with tongues, but proceeded himself, as the other disciples had done, to speak of the mighty works of God.

Sixteen localities are mentioned, perhaps as examples of others not named, from which devout Jews, who must have had much in common in traditions, beliefs, and expectations, were the sojourners who heard the disciples speak; but what are these among the hundreds of tribes and peoples, barbarian and heathen, in whose own language the Scriptures have been translated and printed, the language itself, in many instances, having been produced for the first time in writing by the translator? Greater works than were done by the first disciples have been done by their successors, taught and inspired by those who were the personal companions of the Great Teacher and were taught by Him. The language in which the truths of the Christian religion are expressed is indeed a new language; and its vocabulary is peculiar to itself; but in a marvelous way it is comprehensible in every nation and in every age.

4. Peter's Pentecostal sermon. A brief outline only is recorded of Peter's remarkable sermon, the first to be preached after the departure of the Lord. It seems to have been impromptu, inspired by the immediate occasion, as were many of the discourses of Jesus. As a document it is full of human interest, revealing, as it does, Peter's intense loyalty to his Master, his own unhesitating belief in the resurrection, his familiarity with the Scriptures, his readiness in applying the prophecies quoted, his fearlessness in accusing his hearers of responsibility for the crucifixion; and containing his powerful appeal for repentance and the assurance of forgiveness and salvation. The amplification of the outline in the "many other words" with which he exhorted and testified can only be supplied by the imagination aided by a consideration of the remarkable results which followed.

5. Steadfastness. The effect of Peter's sermon is conclusive evidence of its power. Not only the number of converts, about three thousand, is significant, but their steadfast abiding in the observance of the doctrine. The church now became a substantial organization with assurance of permanence and growth, its members united and filled with enthusiasm.

a. What is the literal meaning of the word Pentecost? What does it signify to the ordinary reader?

b. What was symbolized by the appearance of the tongues like as of fire?

c. Of what was the speaking with other tongues a sign and promise?

d. How widely had the Jews been dispersed at the time of this Pentecost? What was the consequence of the providential gathering of so many Jews from distant places in Jerusalem at this time?

e. What in Peter's sermon smote the consciences of his hearers? Were they personally and directly responsible for the act of which he accused them?

Trained Bible Teachers

The Sunday School Standard Should Be at Least Up to That of the Common Schools

By MARY B. MARTIN

WHAT the public school is to the nation, the Bible school should be to the church. Government seeks to make the public school adequate to the increased and enlarged demands of the nation. Nearly all cities require teachers to hold life certificates or to be university graduates. The requirements of the rural teachers have been proportionately increased.

The church is asking shrewd boys and bright girls who sit five days out of a week at the feet of these trained teachers to attend Bible school and have teachers who are far inferior to the public-school teacher. Yet these teachers are to teach truths from the greatest Book the world has known—the Book from which all other books borrow that which is worth while.

The church must provide the Bible school with trained teachers to direct the growing minds of the youth, if these are to be kept within the church. One way to do this would be for every college and seminary to give courses in Bible study for Sunday-school instruction. Every phase and aim of Sunday-school work should be thoroughly understood by ministerial students and others preparing for special church work, A training class should be established in every local church.

The primary object of the Bible school is to teach the Bible. Is such instruction given merely to give Bible knowledge? No, it is to train boys and girls, men and women, for citizenship in God's kingdom. The public-school teacher keeps every pupil busy as a safeguard against disorder. So too must every Sunday-school pupil find something in his Bible study that leads to action. The state has a place to put its vagrants or inactive citizens. The church must see to it that its Bible teaching leads to positive action or the inactivity of its membership will soon impoverish the religious wealth of the kingdom.

There are churches that hold the young people in Bible school and Church. That Bible teachers do interest and keep the boys and the girls in their classes proves that it can be done. The teacher who succeeds puts time, money, sacrifice, and prayer in her work. It costs something to be a Bible teacher. There will be better attendance in Bible class and church when people realize that God needs the very best efforts, the keenest business principles, the most genuine loyal service brought into the administration of his work. One Bible teacher charges five dollars per year for each person who belongs to her class. That money is used in making her instruction more effective. This teacher has so many classes that the greater number of her evenings are given up to teaching the Bible. God said, "My Word will not return unto me void." When young people are given the Bible with all its richness, beauty, and power they will be found in the Bible Class.

Last but not least, the Bible school should be evangelist. "Go ye therefore and teach all nations." The Bible school that ceases to teach Christ the Savior of the world, ceases to go out in the by-ways and hedges and bring in those needing the redeeming power of God will eventually have vacant pews and finally closed doors. Even in the social world success comes to those who are mindful of others. The founder of our Christianity gave his life for others; he is the Great Teacher. If we wish to follow him we must carry on the work he began, teaching, leading others back to God. Let man remember that his life purpose should be to bring others within the radiant influence of the life of Christ. Then will he take time to do a man's part in the Church. He will recognize the importance of financing the church and in giving his energies for its welfare. His boys and girls will find him with them in the Church and Bible school.

A Young People's Director

Social Life in the Church Supervised by One of Special Training Opens a Broad Field for Appeal to Youth of Both Sexes

By MARTHA TUCKER

YOUNG people are interested in the church just to the extent that their social life lies within the activities of the church. With this maxim in mind, every church of fair size has organized within the past few years clubs, boy and girl scout organizations, or at least a social side to the Christian Endeavor, to provide within the church good times for its young people. It has been difficult, however, to keep at the head of each group an able leader, some-one who can hold the enthusiasm of the young people to its original intensity, and be free to work and play with them at all times. Because of this lack of leadership, many church social organizations fail to supply wholesome good times sufficient to keep the interest of the young people centered in the church.

The problem of providing able leadership for the young people's organizations is being solved in an original manner by a church located in one of the smaller cities of the Pacific Coast. This church, which has a membership of about 1,200, has employed a young woman to serve as young people's director, paying her an initial salary of seventy-five dollars a month. The trustees were most fortunate in securing for the position a young woman who was admirably fitted for the work. A college graduate, she had for a number of years been superintendent of a college sorority house, working and playing with college men and women, and tactfully helping her girls to adjust the differences that arose from the unusual intimacy of their sorority life.

The young people's director gives her afternoons and evenings to the work, and is always ready, also, to hike, swim, or breakfast with any group that wishes a morning frolic. She has complete charge of every organization composed of boys, girls, young men, or young women, helping them to outline and carry out successfully the program of work or study, and suggesting schemes for entertainment. She is present at every meeting; she is the chaperon of every party.

Besides supervising the social and club work, the young people's director renders much service to the superintendent of the Sunday school, for it is her duty to take charge of all classes in the intermediate and young people's departments. She appoints teachers, supervises their teaching, assists in the courses of study, welcomes new scholars, and urges those who are absent to return next Sunday.

That their plan of interesting the young people will prove to be a thorough success is the firm belief of the members of the church which has employed the young people's director. Never before has their large body of young people taken so whole-hearted an interest in the activities of the church.

"It's fifty-fifty now," explained a bright-eyed high-school girl. "Half of our fun at school, and half at church."

Although only a large and comparatively wealthy church could employ a young people's director according to the ideas adopted by this Pacific Coast church, their plan simplified could be adapted to the needs of practically any church that has difficulty in winning and holding the interest of its younger members.

Are Race Wars Necessary?—No!

During the war the Ordnance Bureau of the War Department decided that stabilizing influences were needed for the protection of government contracts placed in East St. Louis industrial plants. A war civics committee with a budget of $300,000 for a three-year program was formed to further welfare work among all groups alike in East St. Louis. The Urban League, because of its prior establishment, its efficiency and the efficacy of its program, was officially selected as the agency representing the interests of the Negroes there.

At the height of the Negro migration of two years ago, Southern communities became agitated over the departure of their black labor supply, and Northern labor organizations urged the organizing of Southern Negroes to get higher wages and better conditions of labor for them in order to remove the underlying causes of the unrest and to protect white labor of the North from the results of an oversupply of the labor market. The League led a campaign which resulted in the creation of the Bureau of Negro Economics in the Labor Department and in the decision of the American Federation of Labor to enroll Negroes as members in all the internationals of the Federation, North and South.

The Bureau of Negro Economics has for nearly two years, under the direction of Dr. George E. Haynes, the Urban League's first executive head, been adjusting the problems of Negro labor through local joint councils or committees of white employers and employees and colored employees formed wherever Negroes comprise an appreciable proportion of the working population.

The League has just launched a campaign to organize more Southern cities, and Jesse O. Thomas, formerly employed as field agent under Booker T. Washington, has been appointed Southern Field Secretary, with headquarters in Atlanta, Ga.

In order that more competent trained colored social workers may be available for the many positions in social service opening up, Alexander L. Jackson, a Harvard graduate, has been appointed Educational Secretary for recruiting prospective social workers and arranging for their training and subsequent employment.

The members of the League believe that race wars are not necessary; that if each race is taught the good qualities in the other and together they discourage untoward acts on the part of either, eventually out of the apparent muddle harmony will prevail.

Too long have the shortcomings of the Negro been receiving undue publicity while the race's contributions to art and literature and to the economic life of the nation are never advertised and seldom published.

To this end the League holds frequent conferences on phases of the Negroes' problems where white and colored social workers from all parts of the country come together to discuss new measures of improvement and to exchange ideas and plans for bettering race relations.

The League's interest in the questions of the day is not merely to elevate and help the Negro, but to aid our beloved country in meeting one of its most serious internal questions, which in the last analysis will have a very definite bearing on our position of leadership as a world power in the League of Nations which is to be.

that bleed easily are the first symptoms of pyorrhea. Loss of teeth may follow if these conditions are not corrected.

Pyorrhocide Powder is the only dentifrice whose value in treating and preventing pyorrhea has been proved by dental clinics devoted exclusively to this phase of oral prophylaxis. Pyorrhocide Powder's specific purpose is to restore and maintain gum health. It cleans and polishes the teeth. Scientifically compounded for these purposes, dentists everywhere prescribe it.

Take prompt action to restore and then maintain gum health. Use Pyorrhocide Powder daily.

Pyorrhocide Powder is economical because a dollar package contains six months' supply. Sold by leading druggists and dental supply houses.

"Pussyfoot" Johnson Mobbed

RECENTLY W. E. "Pussyfoot" Johnson, who was sent by the Anti-Saloon League of America to England to organize that movement in Great Britain, was dragged from the platform of a hall in London where he was speaking on prohibition, by a mob of drunken medical students who placed him on a plank and carried him two miles through the streets in derision and contempt. Among the banners were "We have Pussyfoot. Now meow!" "What won the war? Rum."

Johnson's American manhood asserted itself, and with his bravery, tact and magnanimity turned in an instant this outrage prompted by the liquor dealers into the most powerful conceivable weapon for their destruction, and made himself a world hero. He had not a word to say against the students. He knew the liquor men had stirred them to it, but he wrote to them: "You had a good time. I had a good time. I have no complaints, but if you want fun get into the game against the greatest enemy of the human race—drink."

Though the policemen were in collusion with the liquor cause and the mob, Johnson did not make any complaint against them, saying that another course might have resulted in bloodshed. By his wisdom, patience and magnanimity Johnson captured London.

The devil rum is at his old tricks trying to suppress the truth with violence and lawlessness; by choking the throat of the one who proclaims it. London made a serious mistake in counting the Anti-Saloon League or "Pussyfoot" Johnson a joke. They represent a triumphant democracy against the beastly source of all evil. The mobbing of "Pussyfoot" is the beginning of the end of the liquor traffic in England. Most of its colonies have voted it out and Scotland is likely to go dry immediately. The loss of the hero's eye is felt around the world, and will be avenged. It has pushed the world ahead ten years in its fight for universal prohibition. The same spirit that crucified Christ and most of his apostles, mobbed Johnson, the one which "cried out, saying, Crucify him, crucify him." (Jno. 19:6.)

Henry Clay Frick Dies

H. C. FRICK, worth $150,000,000, and one of the leading financiers of America, died at his New York City home December 2d. He was born in the country near a little town in Pennsylvania, seventy years ago. He became interested in coke ovens, bought soft coal lands, and before he was thirty was counted a millionaire. He became a partner of Andrew Carnegie in the steel making industry. He was deeply interested in the development of the Pennsylvania Railroad system, and with Harriman in the Pacific systems. He was a very generous man to the poor and especially to children. This hardy practical business man was passionately fond of fine art, and gathered one of the finest private art collections in the world. As a home for himself and his art treasures, he bought the site of the old Lenox Library, Fifth Avenue from Seventieth to Seventy-first Street, New York, where he erected a building just ready for a public museum of art. In that building are the immortal pieces of Titian, Bellini, Goya, Velasquez, Rembrandt, Van Dyck, Vermeers and others. The drawing room of this Frick home contains pictures of Fragonard, formerly the gems of the Morgan collection. It is known that Mr. Frick paid $1,250,000 for these panels. He spent $30,000,000 of the money he had dug out of his coke and hammered out of his steel to purchase these precious treasures of art, and then provided in his will many millions more for the endowment of his museum, which will be a monument to him for generations to come. The people of the country will not long remember Frick, the coke man or steel man, but they will never forget Frick, the patron of art, and lover of his fellowmen.

Mr. Frick regarded this injunction of the apostle to the rich: "That they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate, laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come." (I Tim. 6:18, 19.)

Tremendous Meteor Falls

NEAR the foot of Lake Michigan a monster meteor plunged into the lake the other night, shaking the corners of three states like an earthquake, and sending up a flame of fire into the air which was observed for fifty miles around. Bodies of iron and stone are thrown off from heavenly bodies and fall on our earth. November is the time when the earth in its journey enters the region of the meteors, and shooting stars. The universe, from flickering meteor to blazing sun, emblem of the eternal, is full of mystery, wisdom and love. In awe of it the psalmist said: "When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, the sun and the moon that thou hast ordained, what is man that thou art mindful of him, and the son of man that thou visitest him." (Psa. 8.3, 4.)

Luxurious Aeroplane

THE feature of the exposition in Amsterdam, Holland, which attracted most attention was an aeroplane with a cabin luxuriously furnished with Russian red leather upholstering, desk, clock, electric light, a lounge unfolding into a bed, etc., including telephone connection with the operator in the cockpit in front. Man has a foot nature that walks on the earth, and a wing nature that flies above it. Faith and service are the motor which overcomes the gravity of sin and enables the soul to range the altitudes of the intellectual moral and spiritual worlds. The thought is thus expressed: "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength: they shall mount up with wings as eagles." (Isa. 40:31.)

Methodist Preachers' Salaries Increased

AN average increase of 40 per cent. in the salaries of Methodist pastors throughout the country to meet the high cost of living, was announced the other day by the Centenary Conservation Committee of the Methodist Episcopal Church in New York City. The new scale of pay, it is asserted, will go into effect January 1. The fund raised for the World Programme of Conservation Committee will furnish the increase. Ministers whose congregations have moved up their salaries to meet the exigency of the times will not get the benefit of this general fund. The average Methodist minister's salary in 1918 was $1,111. The new average will be near $1,500. No person on earth renders a higher grade of service than the true minister. The Methodist Church is to be congratulated on the wise and just advance in salaries, justified by Christ's statement: "The Laborer is worthy of his hire." (Luke 10:7.)

Railroad Over Andes

BOLIVIA secured a loan and is building a railroad from Laplaz to connect the railways of the high table lands of the Andes with the luxurious valleys of the Yungas, known all over the world for its Yungas coffee. It will be one of the most picturesque railroads in the world and will hasten the transcontinental transportation between the Atlantic, up the Amazon and over the Andes by rail to the Pacific. It is a great distance in civilization between this railroad and the beasts of burden, or the ox cart of 4,000 years ago, found yet in the valleys of South America, the same kind that was used by the ancient Jews and thus referred to: "Make a new cart, and take two milch kine, on which there hath come no yoke, and tie the kine to the cart." (I Sam. 6:7.)

ATWATER KENT

TYPE CA IGNITION for the FORD

Equipped with electric starting and lighting 1919 and later models

The Type CA Outfit for Fords is furnished absolutely complete on a special mounting which fits the front of the new style Ford engine. All wiring required is cut to the proper length ready for connecting up the system. A special socket wrench is supplied for use when attaching the mounting to the engine. All these minor parts are as rigidly inspected and held to the Atwater Kent quality-first standard as the Unisparker and Coil themselves.

The special Ford mounting holds the Unisparker in an upright position where it is fully protected from oil and grit, and readily accessible for inspection.

A spark lever is furnished with each outfit in order that manual spark advance can be used in connection with the automatic advance if the driver desires.

ADVANTAGES of Atwater Kent Ignition on the FORD

1. The same hot spark at all speeds from cranking to maximum.
2. This hot spark at low speeds permits throttling down to three or four miles per hour.
3. Makes starting easy in all weathers by furnishing a hot, fat spark as soon as contact is broken, regardless of motor speed.
4. This easy starting prolongs the life of the storage battery.
5. Automatic spark advance reduces gear shifting to a minimum.
6. Auxiliary spark lever permits of manual spark advance.
7. Fool-proof in construction—one adjustment only and that made with an ordinary screw driver.

RECORD PENSION PAYMENTS—Notwithstanding the fact that the roll of Civil War pensioners for the last fiscal year was the lowest since 1890, the annual report of the Commissioner of Pensions shows a new high record in pension payments. Payment of $222,129,292 was made to 624,427 during the year as against $179,835,328.75 to 646,895 persons in 1918. Total pensions paid on account of the Civil War is $5,299,859,509.99.

BERGER RENOMINATED—Victor L. Berger, debarred from the House after conviction on a disloyalty charge, has been renominated for Congress by the Socialists of the Fifth Wisconsin district in a primary election.

CHARGES OIL PROFITEERING—The Federal Government has brought an action at Pittsburg against officials of a large oil company, accusing them of charging an unjust and unreasonable price for fuel oil.

COLLEGE TEACHERS' UNION—Representatives of professors in sixteen New York City colleges and universities have organized a College Professors' Union to be known as Associated Teachers' Union, Local No. 71 of the American Federation of Teachers. A provisional organization was chartered by the American Federation of Labor last spring.

REAL TAX ON WHISKEY—The international Reform Bureau, if the Supreme Court upholds the war-time prohibition act, will ask Congress to put a tax of $500,000 on a pint of whiskey.

U. S. TRADE BALANCE—The trade balance of the United States for the last fiscal year was $3,978,134,947, according to the annual report of the Secretary of Commerce. This figure, the Secretary says, was never approached in the history of any nation's commerce. The world's shipping tonnage, the report discloses, was 50,919,000 as against 49,089,000 in 1914.

EXPORTS TO GERMANY—The Department of Commerce announces that since the armistice the United States has exported goods worth $52,420,095 to Germany. English exports in the same period have been $80,000,000.

NEW CONSORTIUM PLAN—Negotiations are in progress between the United States, England, France and Italy in regard to the new China consortium over which there have been disagreements between the United States and Japan—disagreements that have delayed relief to the Chinese government. China needs $25,000,000 immediately and efforts now are being made to provide this money without the United States being put in a position of agreeing to Japan's peculiar claims in Eastern Inner Mongolia and Southern Manchuria.

LIQUOR INTERESTS WARNED—The government has warned the distillers that they have only until January 16 to export the remainder of their stocks. No liquor may be shipped after that date.

"ERSATZ" GOLD—Paris newspapers report that Sir Ernest Rutherford of the University of Manchester has learned the alchemists' secret of making gold. Professor Rutherford, one of the world's most famous scientists, succeeded in 1903 in dividing the atom.

IRISH SECRETARY ATTACKED—It has been disclosed in the House of Commons that Ian MacPherson, Chief Secretary for Ireland, narrowly escaped death when an assassin shot at him recently. The bullet passed through the sides of the automobile in which he was riding.

PADEREWSKI STILL PREMIER—Jan Ignace Paderewski, Polish premier, discouraged by the difficulties of the Polish situation, resigned his post and began to move his effects from the Warsaw Palace when he was persuaded to reconsider his action.

COSTA RICO'S NEW PRESIDENT—Costa Rico, in which President Wilson has taken a keen interest for the last two years, has elected Dr. Julio Acosta as president. President Wilson refused to recognize Tinoco as head of the state, and virtually caused his overthrow and banishment late last summer.

JAIL OR FINE FOR REV. MOWRY—Rev. Eli M. Mowry, Presbyterian missionary, arrested by the Japanese in Korea last spring on a charge of sheltering native rebels, has been sentenced, on the appeal of his case, to pay a fine of 100 yen or serve twenty days in prison.

BOLSHEVIST PEACE PROPOSALS—The Peace Conference at Dorpat between the Baltic states and the Bolsheviki shows signs of developing a Baltic Confederation. The Soviet Russians have offered peace proposals embodying thirteen points. The conditions declared the treaty must be based on the principles of self-determination, without indemnities and without annexations. All reports from Eastern Europe indicate a very strong and consistent trend of Bolshevism toward the Indian frontier.

NEW BRITISH ARMY—The British army estimates for 1919-1920 provide for an expenditure of $2,025,000,000 for the support of an army strength of 300,000 British and 100,000 Indian troops.

$10,500,000 FOR MISSIONS—The Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist Church has announced an appropriation of $10,500,000 for foreign missions and war reconstruction work. The same denomination has started out to win 1,000,000 converts before January 1, 1921.

MR. WANAMAKER HEADS SUNDAY SCHOOLS—John Wanamaker has been elected chairman of the executive committee of the World's Sunday School Association to succeed the late H. J. Heinz.

NEW INTERCHURCH HOME—The Interchurch World Movement has taken over the huge Greenhut Building in New York City, until recently used as an army debarkation hospital, and is centering all its activities in the one building. A large number of denominational organizations associated with the Interchurch work also are moving to the new headquarters.

UNCHURCHED SUBURBANITES—Curious facts about unchurched areas surrounding many large towns and cities are reported by rural survey supervisors. Comparison of statistics from several states would seem to show that the outreach of the nearest country churches cityward is frequently not wide enough to bring their areas of influence to the city limits. This often results in a marginal zone that swings several miles wide around the city. Within this zone live families entirely untouched by Christian institutions.

THE CHRISTIAN HERAL, Decem 27, 1

By INIS WOOD

DURING this period of upheaval when the Church is earnestly endeavoring to secure industrial peace founded on Christian teaching it is important to look into the hearts of industrial workers, to understand what their organizations mean to them, and in how far they square with the ideals that have motivated Christianity.

In women's labor organizations, notably in the National Women's Trade Union League with its membership of 600,000 workers, the thoughtful person will find a striving for something more than wages—a striving for spiritual expression. They are putting into their unions the aspiration and idealism which under different conditions they might have expressed through the social and religious institutions of the Church.

The writer has interviewed many of the girls in the League, many of whom are foreign born, or the children of foreign born, to find out the significance of their organization to them. First of all apparently it means "brotherly love." A beautiful Italian girl in the Philadelphia branch of the League, when asked this question, replied, "How can I say it? It means so many things! I was so lonesome in this country. Every day I went to the shop and every night I came back to mother and she talks always of Italy because she does not speak English and she does not get acquainted with Americans. I did not know people in this country who really understand America. And then I joined the League and everyone is so kind as if they were my sisters. Suddenly America seemed so warm and friendly and now I love it here. America seems such a good country."

A little Polish girl in the Chicago branch of the League when asked the same question answered: "I do not feel so afraid as I used to. You see I have had some bad times in my life—when I was sick and could not go on earning money. A girl cannot save much when she has everything to pay for herself. It is all right until you get sick and then when you need money most you can't earn it. I got sick a good deal. My trade is not a healthy one. And always after I got back to work I would worry what should become of me if I fell ill for a long time. But since I joined the League it is different. When I fell ill the girls were so kind to me. They came to see me and best of all, they paid my landlady and helped me over the bad time. They helped us organize our shop to stand for shorter hours. Now I work eight hours in the shop and do not get so tired out and I do not get sick so often. I have more chance to get out in the air. It is all so different from the old days. I have a lot of sisters and I am happy."

A very able American girl from the Chicago branch of the League explained how this organization started and what it had gradually grown to mean to her.

She began: "I don't know whether you women who have never done factory work know what it means to do one little thing over and over all day long. You see the work is so divided and subdivided that each girl does one thing thousands of times. Almost any of these jobs can be learned in a week or two so that there isn't anything new to think about in your work. You get hungry for something attractive to occupy your mind." She looked searchingly at the writer. "A little group of us got together to study poetry. I suppose there are people who would think that was a very wasteful thing for a working girl to do, but we're not so different, really, from the girls who have a chance to go to high school and to college. We love beautiful things, too, though maybe we aren't all such good judges of what is beautiful. But anyway we started our little poetry meetings and loved the fine things we read. Afterward we would get to talking about other things—what life meant to us and what life ought to be like. And of course we began asking, what can we do about it, how can we make our lives happier? And we knew we would be happier if we weren't so tired and overworked and if we could work in rooms with more light and air and have cloakrooms that were clean and nice. And gradually our little poetry group became an organization to create the best possible conditions for working girls, to secure better pay, shorter hours, sanitary conditions, protection from dangerous machinery and the terrible factory fires in which so many girls have been burned to death. But the League has never been an organization just to secure better economic conditions. We have always worked for the all-round development of the girls. We have built up classes on whatever subjects the girls want so that we shall know what is going on in the world and shall be able to appreciate the good things of life. When you go to a big concert did you ever look up in the gallery and wonder how many of the people up there were working girls who had been saving up their pennies to hear something really fine? More than you imagine. And just because these girls crave contact with the great spirits of the earth who have written and painted and composed beautiful things, doesn't mean that we don't do our work well. No, it means that we do it a great deal better. A girl who isn't all tired out and who has a little leisure for recreation and the capacity to enjoy good things—if a girl is really happy she does better work and more of it. More and more employers are beginning to see that, and to do their share in this work because it pays them."

An eager Russian girl from the New York branch of the League explained that to her the most wonderful thing about belonging to the League has been the opportunity to attend evening school two evenings a week.

"Before our shop joined the League we worked such long hours that I was too tired to study," she said. "Then when we organized and got shorter hours and I found the League had courses that were meant for girls like me, I joined. Of course there are the city night schools, but somehow the League classes are different. They are planned by the best teachers in the country together with the older girls who realize what it is we most want to understand. I don't know just how to explain it but these courses are so closely related to us—to our lives. Take a course in American history. We foreign girls need it taught in a different way from American girls. And girls who work in factories like to know about the history of industry and how it is related to government. I can't begin to tell you how different America seems now that I know more about its ways and government, and what I can do with my vote and how everyday girls like me can count for something in getting good laws. I think," the girl concluded, "America can be the most wonderful country in the world if we will only work hard enough and all pull together."

The League is not limited in its membership to workers in particular trades. It is open to all women interested in securing protective legislation for women and children. Many distinguished women belong to the League which thus affords a meeting ground where women of different classes and widely varied interests may come to more sympathetic understanding. Together they are one of the strongest forces in the country for labor legislation.

Among the Workers

MISSIONARY ELMER E. HUBBARD, who for over twenty years has conducted a successful work among children in Cardenas, Cuba, is about to transfer his activities to Mexico. He will probably go to Morelia, in the state of Michoacan, about 300 miles west of Mexico City. Evangelist Charles R. Scoville writes to the Christian Herald from McKinney, Texas: "I am delighted to note your movement for a nation-wide revival and will extend every possible aid to this worthy cause. We are in a fine union meeting here in this city, with over 900 persons responding to date. We had a special Stewardship Night and secured 224 definite pledges at the one call. At Nacogdoches, Texas, before this, we had 1,344 persons come forward. One hundred and two responded to the last invitation on the last night—74 being men.

If you could see the Germs in your Throat—

THE sight would more than convince you of the vital necessity of throat protection. The throat is the natural gateway for germs to enter the body. The many folds and crevices back of the teeth and tongue offer an ideal breeding ground for germs of all kinds. There they wait for the first favorable chance to invade the system and that chance comes whenever the body happens to be a trifle below par, provided always the germs are sufficiently numerous to overcome the body's natural defense.

Our first duty, therefore, is to reduce germ-life in the throat to a safe minimum and a trustworthy means of doing this lies in the regular use of Formamint Tablets.

Little tablets, handy, pleasing in taste, they free in the saliva a most effective, yet harmless, germicide that searches out and destroys germs in the most secluded corners of the throat. Taken regularly, they not only soothe away irritation, but help prevent serious infection, such as tonsillitis, influenza, etc.

More than 5000 American physicians have endorsed them in writing.

This is the Task the Methodist Church has Set for Itself During 1920 Every Four Members Must Win a Fifth

By H. C. REYNOLDS

SUPPOSING four husky acquaintances of yours kidnapped you some night, hustled you into an automobile, carried you to an upper room in the house of one of them and announced: "You are our quota!"

You would be surprised, mystified and perhaps alarmed.

But supposing further, instead of producing instruments of torture, one of your unceremonious friends drew forth a copy of the Good Book and all four took turns reading to you, exhorting you, praying on their knees for you and altogether giving you such a grueling as would make the attacks of the eleven jurors on the twelfth and obstinate one seem mild.

You would be amused by their audacity, if not touched by their devotion—devotion to God and to you. And if you were not all clay, if you had some small spark of Godliness within you, if you ever were going to unite yourself with Him, you would yield then.

But what has this to do with "quotas"?

Simply this, every four Methodists have set out to capture one soul for the Lord before June 1, 1920.

There are a little over four million members of Methodist Episcopal churches and the minimum "subscription" of the whole church must be a million souls for Christ. They have set out to do it, they are in honor bound to do it, and anybody who knows them will say they cannot fail.

Perhaps your head has been so dazzled with talk of billions (of dollars) during the war that a million looks small to you. Then think over this carefully: never since Christ came down to earth has such a number been brought to his feet in such a length of time!

Foreign missionaries tell us the people of India today are being won to the Kingdom faster than the old Roman Empire was Christianized in the first centuries A. D. But the average number of baptisms in India for all the Protestant churches is only about 15,000 a month or 180,000 a year, of which Methodist baptisms are about 50,000.

Some more comparisons:' The great awakening in New England, beginning in 1734 and lasting eight years won 50,000. The brilliant crusade led by Finney in 1831 was termed by Lyman Beecher "the greatest work of God and the greatest revival of religion that the world has ever seen in so short a time," and he added, "100,000 were reported to have connected themselves with the churches." In the revival that began in 1857 a traveler from the West declared he had "ridden through a prayer meeting 2,000 miles long." Some enthusiastic observers set the harvest at 1,000,000, but the more conservative figure was 300,000 and even that was the result of two years' work. The Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor won a million up to 1914, but the work had covered thirty-three years.

So the Methodists have tackled a pretty big order. They have set out to astonish us, as they did a year ago when they raised $120,000,000, the largest sum ever pledged to Christian work at one time. They'll do their job this year as they did last, even if it takes a good many "kidnappings" such as we have imagined.

But this enormous effort—how puny it becomes beside the whole task the followers of Christ have before them. The population of the world is about sixteen hundred millions, of whom only about six hundred millions are even nominally Christians. If the Methodists could convert their million this year and next year and so on, with no allowances for losses by death or for increase of population, it would take them until the year 2919 to make every man a confessed Christian.

Curiously enough, 2919 is just a thousand years from now. Is that the year of the millennium? Not necessarily. The other Christian bodies will help the Methodists out in their world task. The new million Methodists will help too. The thing grows by geometrical progression. Nothing succeeds like success. We may not have to wait anything like a thousand years for the world to be all Christian.

The church historian sitting in his study in the year 2919 may look back to the complete evangelization of the world as already an ancient event and will he point out the year 1920 as the beginning of the upward rush to the wonderful consummation?

Profiteering All 'Round

EDITOR, The Christian Herald: Doubtless a good deal, if not the major portion of the present industrial and other troubles can be laid at the door of the profiteers. Ex-Secretary of the Treasury W. G. McAdoo tells of mines earning 2,000 per cent. profit, yet whose managers are unwilling to grant any wage increase until they find out how much of it they can impose on the public. He adds very appropriately that it would be a good idea to reveal the income tax returns of these profiteering operators to the public.

Then there is Governor Smith of New York, who is endeavoring to solve the milk problem and who asks the question how it comes about that the farmer, who raises, milks, feeds and houses his cows and delivers the milk to the middleman, admits that for all this work he is satisfied with 7 or 8 cents a quart, while the city distributor, who puts on 10 or 12 cents a quart for his services, claims to be making no money. The Governor wants a closer alliance between farmers and consumers, to do away with the profiteering middlemen altogether.

Similarly in many other lines of production, the necessaries of life when they reach the ultimate consumer, are raised to the highest prices the consumer can be made to pay. This applies to clothing as well as food. In every case where the inquiry has gone down to the bottom, the profiteer at the middle of the line from producer to consumer has been found to be the "main guy" in the combination.

The profiteer must go! His disappearance from the scene would seem to be not only necessary to the comfort and welfare of our people, but he is now recognized as a prime cause of the industrial unrest. Labor, in its demand for higher wages to meet his exorbitant charges, has not been able to keep pace with his lawless rapacity. He is so skilled in the art of extortion that he can keep many laps ahead of the game and outrun all his pursuers. While a few of his type may fall into the hands of the law, the profiteer usually sails along on his career of freebooting, plundering as he goes, regardless of all calculations of labor or production cost. And the worst feature of it is that his victims are usually those who are least able to bear it, and who can offer little or no resistance to his greed.

These Parents Found Stimulation in Their Boy and Girl Who Thought They Were Outgrowing Their Home

By WILLAMETTA PRESTON

AS FATHER and mother asked eager questions about college life—the sports, fraternities, classes—they noticed Rob and Ethleen exchange glances. Somehow the long-anticipated vacation was a disappointment all around. Rob and Ethleen were out of patience with farm life, out of tune with their surroundings. They tried to conceal it but their parents felt the lack of genuine heart-gladness.

"They're outgrowing us!" mother faltered as the parents found themselves alone again.

"They better not!" growled father, but his voice was husky.

Christmas proved the fact. They had invitations they wished to accept. Of course father and mother would not mind—much.

Mother had the letter in the morning. She had time to regain her self-possession and make plans to ease the disappointment for father.

"They feel that they are outgrowing us. Let's outgrow them!"

"How can we? I'm ready for anything!" There was a glint of mischief in his eye.

"They know us just as father and mother. Let them see us in our rightful places in the community. We can do it if we half try. You get elected to something at March meeting and I'll take the presidency of that Woman's club they've wanted to start. We can feature our old friendship with the governor's family. You know we were going to refurnish the house when Ethleen was through college and you expected to get a car for Rob. Get the car for yourself and I'll do the refurnishing. We'll take the initiative. It won't be a bit put on—it will just be showing our boy and girl what we really are."

"And we study up the latest fads until we can talk them silly," added father. "And I'll get down my old family tree. If I don't need it, they may."

They had a community Christmas at the home that otherwise would have been so lonely. They wrote the children glowing accounts of it.

Ethleen and Rob had other invitations for the summer vacation which they would have accepted but for the fact that father had written to each of them: "We want you to come directly." It had all the force of a command they could not well ignore. If only father and mother were not so behind the times. Yes; they would be ashamed to introduce any of their classmates at home.

Father met them at the station in his new car. He discussed different models with Rob as if he knew them all intimately.

Mother, with her hair waved and a new dress that suited her admirably, was waiting on the front porch which had been converted into a living room. The supper table was at the far end where they could watch the sunset. Supper was different, somehow. The mother asked Ethleen about the course in Domestic Science. Had she made her sorority? Father was asking questions about Rob's interests.

"We didn't like to disappoint you about your vacation," remarked mother casually, as they were lingering about the supper table, "but we had invited guests and it would have been discourteous to have had our son and daughter not here to entertain them. Governor Bates, his wife and Lynn and Dorothy are coming Wednesday to stay a week with us."

"The Governor speaks at our celebration the Fourth," added father. "Mother is president of the Woman's Club and they have got up quite a program."

"Just as if father wasn't right beside me in everything! He's first selectman this year and president of the Men's club and leader of the band."

The house had been newly furnished so daintily that even Ethleen was satisfied. The week's visit from the Governor's family was illuminating. They found how these distinguished people regarded father and mother with high honor. Lynn and Dorothy were delighted with the farm and with everything. They thought Rob and Ethleen "so fortunate."

During the weeks of that summer vacation father and mother took the lead.

There were picnics, musicals, so many "things doing" that Rob and Ethleen has to hustle to keep up with them. Everywhere they found that other people of note deferred to their parents, asked their advice and wished to entertain the son and daughter for the parents' sake. They took to studying the family tree in the hall. It took them back to colonial days, across to England, to royalty.

"Yes, there was a title in the family, but what do those things count beside the honor of being a true American?" father said as Rob looked at him with pride.

"Guess I'll come back to the farm after all," decided Rob. "Father has some ideas I'd like to help him try out."

"If I can make such a woman as mother I'll be satisfied," admitted Ethleen. "I've promised to leave Home Economics to take with her, next summer. Mother says we can each invite a friend if we like."

"I'd like to ask that uppish Launce Elliot and show him a thing or two—but only for a few days. We want to really do things, father and I."

"I don't want to ask any one until I get better acquainted with mother. The idea of our ever fancying we could be ashamed of them! I don't believe two children ever had such parents."

"We agree for once," answered Rob.

The Chinese Native Physician

Waiting for Patients on the Street Corner

IN SPITE of having a well-equipped mission hospital in this city of Taichow where men and women can receive the best of medical care and treatment the native doctor still flourishes. He sits at the street corner as shown in the photo, and the ignorant Chinese flock round him, especially on market or festival days. No method, however painful and drastic, deters the believers in his powers of healing—indeed they expect to be made to suffer acutely in order to "expel the original pain."

Nevertheless modern surgery and hospitals are increasing, especially in large places and wherever the railway has come. Recently a very fine building was opened by the Chinese themselves in a town to the north of this province (Chekiang). The staff are all natives trained in "foreign" methods and deserve the utmost credit for the efficient and excellent work done in a magnificent institution. Nothing could be more aseptic or better equipped. It is a center of Christian influence and efficient healing methods. A. O. STOTT.

has the Croup

That's a cough with croupy rattle, so hurry fo the Musterole and rub it i right over the chest an neck. How it will tingl at first and then grow eve so cool. And how it wil reach in and penetrate righ to the spot! It will dissipate all the stuffy congestion which causes tha hacking cough.

Why shouldn't grandmother swear by Musterole for colds and coughs? It i better than a mustard plaste —good as that was in the old days. And the explanation is this:

Musterole is made of oil o mustard and other home simples. It penetrates under the skin, down to the part. Here it generates its own heat, and this heat disperses the congestion. Yet Musterole will not blister. Musterole, on the contrary, feels delightfully cool a few seconds after you apply it.

Try Musterole for Bobby and Helen and Dorothy's croup—and for your own cough, too. Try it for rheumatism—it's a regular router out of all congestions. Always keep a jar handy.

Many doctors and nurses recommend Musterole.

Three Reasons this Parish Found for Encouraging the Motion Picture as a Part of the Parish Equipment

By G. J. FRITZ

"HOW has the motion picture helped our church work?"

It is almost a threadbare remark "that the screen is today the most powerful factor in popular education," and may be for good or evil, depending on what the exhibitor chooses to present.

It is equally well known that "movies" today are the most luring attraction the world over, and it is generally recognized that a very large percentage of the films, in spite of all censorship, are anything but elevating.

On the other hand, observation proves that the most eloquent preacher could not convince his congregation to stay away from the "movies." Neither would it be fair or sensible to do so. Hence our simple reasoning: Let us have well selected, clean, instructive and amusing pictures of our own, to which we may freely invite our friends without risk of embarrassment.

As success may, of course, be measured by different standards, I may mention three points of view from which we consider our undertaking a success.

First. It offers the opportunity, always looked forward to with interest, of a social gathering of old and young of our own congregation and many of our outside friends as well, as often as we like, say twice a month,'

Secondly. It instantly raised the standard of pictures shown in our local "movie house," though we in no way intended to start competition, and

Lastly. It proved that there is a large class of people who will patronize a guaranteed clean picture entertainment (especially older folks) to which they may bring their families. These persons would forego the pleasure otherwise. Thus our venture is made a financial success, our understanding being, of course, that as a social body no one profits individually, and all net proceeds are devoted to the higher development of picture art, and the necessary musical accompaniment thereof by installing the finest up-to-date equipment so as to enable us to render high-grade work at nominal admission, and then devote the surplus to whatever educational or charitable purpose we see fit. And there are plenty of worthy purposes, in any parish, to which surplus cash may be applied.

It is presupposed, of course, that you have a live pastor who will realize the necessity of some social activity to produce the proper family spirit among the people; that you have an auditorium equipped with electric lights, and that you have a few willing workers, such as musicians, operators, and general attendants found in almost every congregation, and that you get in touch with a reliable film concern, most of whom make it a specialty today to cater to churches, schools and societies of all kinds. Good lectures may always be combined with the pictures. Powerful sermons for good, and instructive matter of every kind may be brought before your people more successfully than in any other way. In fact the possibility for disseminating the best thoughts in life are unlimited, though the undertaking has its difficulties, which generally speaking, lie mostly in getting hold of the right kind of pictures.

Personally, I am too old to be classed as a "movie" fiend, but I have always realized the power and possibilities of the screen, and by careful management have proven that a first-class picture outfit is a valuable asset to any church, school or social club.

Utilizing the Vacant Lot

By REV. H. H. SAVAGE

ALMOND is a village of about 500 inhabitants, situated in the midst of a prosperous farming community. I first saw the place one Saturday evening in August.

The streets were almost blocked with automobiles. The sidewalks were crowded with people who seemed to be "all dressed up and nowhere to go." A vacant corner lot in practically the center of the village immediately impressed me as a fine place on which to have something, but what should that something be? Why, free open air "movies" of course. Inside of six months, after a large amount of presentation, reiteration, agitation and perspiration, enough money was subscribed by the business men and the high-school graduating class to buy a suitable projector to be jointly owned by the school and the municipality. When the next summer came we were ready and we began running programs one night out of every week using a variety of splendid subjects as furnished free by the Extension Division of the University of Wisconsin.

The first summer (1917), our policy was to win the confidence of the community so all that was done to further church work was the showing of a church announcement slide and scripture text slide. The second summer (1918), I gave a short (never to exceed ten minutes), snappy, evangelistic message immediately after the last reel to an audience averaging 500 to 600 people. The third summer (1919), the village board voted me more money than I asked for to run the pictures again, as the proposition had become such a valuable community asset.

How did the "movies" help the church?

First. The church was doing something for the community instead of continually asking the community to do something for the church. As a church, we believe in being self supporting. The business men were not long in making the application and the prestige of the church grew accordingly.

Second. The church through its pastor became a social factor in the community to the resultant practical exclusion of all harmful amusements during the past two years at least.

Third. During the past three years about 300 new members have been taken into the churches of the community. Our own church has tripled in membership. Many of these newly professed Christians have told me personally that their first serious thoughts regarding eternal things came during one or more of those ten-minute sermonettes.

This is necessarily a very brief and incomplete presentation of the work, but the work itself has paid tremendous dividends with us, and should be just as valuable a program to others.

Gets 'Em on the Fly

THE Wilson warbler is the champion fly-catcher of the United States. His method of getting most of his food is to dash out from the limb of a tree and snatch passing insects on the wing. They catch other insects which are flitting about or sitting on the foliage or blossoms of the trees. You will often find these little birds in apple trees when in bloom. Their olive green and yellow plumage harmonizes with the green leaves of the trees. The male bird has a black crown patch on the top of his head, while on the female this cap is greenish like the back. This bird is found throughout the eastern United States but winters in Central America.

Wife and His Success

W... a an appallingly bombastic undertaking it is, how characteristically mannish, to try to tell the world "How My Wife Has Helped Me to Success"! It assumes in the first place that I have attained success, and then, by implication, that I did the greater part of the job myself, though it does admit that I had help. But never mind. Recognizing the nature of the task may enable me to approach it with a greater modesty.

As I look back over my twenty-five years of married life I see two hands that are always busy, and usually with what we are accustomed to regard as commonplace things. Sometimes, it is true, they play softly with the keys of the piano or turn the leaves of books or magazines; but more often they are kneading bread or washing dishes or hanging out clothes or ironing them or folding them smoothly to be put away for a brief time, only to be wrinkled and soiled again—things that the daily routine of life, the mere fact of living, will only undo.

When I leave home in the morning the hands rest for a moment on my shoulders, and the eyes and the lips behind them wish me good luck and a successful day. When I get back at night they rest on my shoulders again and the eyes and the lips bid me welcome. If for any reason they are absent for a few days, the evidence of their work remains. Clean clothes are waiting for me. I have only to lift the covers of certain jars in the pantry to discover treasures. My slippers are where my feet can find them in the dark. When I go up to my empty bedroom the c of the bedclothes is turned back, r for me, and the window-shade is ra because I like to see the morning when I wake. Always and everywh are signs of a faithful and affection thoughtfulness.

"How like a man! Thinking alw of his own comfort," I hear you s Perhaps; but just now, dear ladies, t is none of your business, for I am w ing, you will remember, not about m self but about Her.

Well, and what is the success that s has helped me to? Not money, fo have little; nor public office, nor hi place in the community in which I li nor, indeed, any of those things t men usually mean when they speak success. But I can say with a thank heart that I have come well past mid life with a healthy mind as well as healthy body; that I have kept u dimmed my faith in mankind and t general goodness of human nature; th I can still appreciate the glory of t morning and the beauty of the nigh that I know and love the simple thin of life, and common people; that perceive and recognize the worth humble duties faithfully performe and so have come to find contentme and happiness in doing my own uni portant and monotonous work. Tha friends, is the success to which m wife has helped me, and I want better.

I know, of course, that she is one of thousand, but I know, too, that she just as surely one of millions.

Boston, Mass. E. W. F.

A Minister's Helpful Wife

IN many ways, but, perhaps, chiefly by her prayers. She was truly fond of prayer, and often went behind "the shut door," where she prayed for her husband, her children, and for herself, and for the Cause which she loved above all. She was mighty and irresistible in prayer. While I was preaching I knew she was praying for me; she always knew my theme beforehand, and took a deep and special interest in it, and was able often to make valuable suggestions for me, and this, too, produced in her a desire for my success, and was conducive to prayer.

Another way in which she was helpful to me was by her loving, tactful, but skilful criticisms; this was often neither pleasant to her nor to me; here is a case in point: in my earlier ministry (and I still have a strong tendency in the same old direction) I was very demonstrative and sometimes even quite vociferous, which led me to pound the pulpit, to prance around in the space behind and at the sides of the pulpit, and to "scream" as she called it; this I must modify; the people are not deaf; noise is not power, but it is waste and loss. My improvement was slow, but I did, under her friendly and persistent criticism, I did improve, and became a more effective speaker, without the loss of earnestness, force and effectiveness; for I did and do believe in "fire."

She was herself a good and sympathetic listener, and after the service she could almost perfectly reproduce my sermon or address; this I knew, and that knowledge had a good effect on every effort I made as a speaker; she was fond of apt illustrations, especially if they were original, and were gathered from some experiences of our own in our ministerial life and travels; this had much to do in making me what may be called "an illustrative preacher." I have always been careful to gather my illustrations from the Bible, from the History of Christianity, and from personal experiences.

My wife was herself a good public speaker, though she was so timid and modest that it always required a great deal of urging to make her occupy the pulpit or platform; however, she was so deeply devoted and interested in the salvation of the Christless nations of the earth that she was soon ready to speak on their behalf; she was in close touch with all missionary enterprises; was fully informed, and never failed to ta and read missionary papers and mag zines; she was the president of t Woman's Foreign Missionary Societ but her interest in the world co ditions was far from being limit by the work of that society. I learn from her speeches much about the grac of speech; that it is what you say, rath than the manner in which it is sai though that, too, is very important, th draws the people; that you must be mo than full, overflowing with carefull prepared and arranged facts, facts th have gripped you, and that you no feel the people should know, must know and that they must be made to feel a you do.

She rarely made any "trips or slips the tongue," which have bothered not a little; she knew what she wanted say, and she was able to say it in clas cal English. This led me to prep more carefully, and often to rehearse sermon in my study; or, if not the then I would go to the surroundin fields or woods, where I could find private and suitable place, where I hav often actually preached my sermon o address that I had mentally prepared and spiritually prepared on my knees and with much and often painful medi tation.

SUCCESS is the last word in thi question. But what is ministerial su cess? I give seven elements of suc success, as follows:—

1. To increase the membership of th church, and to make y an genuinely spiritual
2. To raise large su the church and
3. To make and tive but alwa
4. To work for hi in the commu
5. To be a mod

1500 Eggs

I have fed 2 boxes of "More Eggs" to my hens and I think they have broken the egg record. I have 160 White Leghorns and in exactly 21 days I got 125 dozen eggs.
Mrs. H. M. Patton, Waverly, Mo.

160 Hens—

LAST winter eggs sold as high as $1.00 a dozen. As America's foremost poultry exp I predict that this winter eggs will go even higher. That means tremendous profits for poultry raisers. Now is the tim or you to get the biggest yield from your hens—while prices are high and profits big. A few cents worth of Reefer's M Eggs Tonic will give you a bigger egg production from your hens in a given time than you ever thought was possible. Ree More Eggs Tonic is acknowledged the best and most reliable egg producer on the market today. It has stood the test of years. 400,000 chicken ers have used this tonic and many, many thousands have written me of their success. No progressive poultry raiser should think of getting along with Reefer's More Eggs Tonic. The cost is ridiculously small—it comes back to you many times over in egg profits. Every day that you delay means money t. Send the cou today.

Makes Layers Out of Loafers

Don't be satisfied with half profits when you can get full profits. Be progressive. Reefer's More Eggs contains every element that goes toward the making of more eggs. It is a concentrated tonic—not a food. It is a perfect regulator, aids digestion, stimulates egg production and builds firm bones and strong muscles. It makes layers out of loafers and helps the ordinary barnyard and farmyard hens produce 200 eggs a year! The foremost authorities in America and poultry raisers from every state endorse Reefer's More Eggs Tonic.
